When Sextus had made Herod Gouernour of Cœloſyria (which eſtate he ſold vnto him for ready money) Hircanus was afraid leſt Herod ſhould make warre againſt him: neither paſſed there long time before the effect grew anſwerable to his feare. For Herod marched forth againſt him, with a great army, ſuppoſing himſelfe to be much wronged by the aſſignation hee had ſent him, and in that he was ſummoned to giue a reaſon of his actions before the councell. But his father Antipater, and his brother Phaſælus came forth againſt him to hinder his approach towards Ieruſalem, ſtriuing to appeaſe his fury, & counſelling him not to attempt any thing by way of action; but that contenting himſelfe that he had threatned and affrighted Hircanus, hee ſhould not attempt any further againſt him, who had raiſed him to that high degree. They told him alſo, that it became him not onely to remember that he was cited to anſwer, but that he was abſolued alſo, and permitted to depart without danger or any violence. Moreouer, that he ought to thinke, that God gouerneth the ballance of warre, and that the iſſues of battels is vncertaine, and for that cauſe he ought not to expect the victory, if hee made warre againſt the King who was his familiar, and from whom he had receiued farre more kindneſſe, and no diſpleaſure: who though hee made ſome appearance and ſhadow of ſeueritie, touching the accuſation intended againſt him, yet notwithſtanding it proceeded not ſo much from him, as from his euill counſellers. Herod in ſome ſort pacified by theſe perſwaſions, obeyed his father, ſuppoſing that it ſufficed him in regard of his future hopes, that he had giuen the people ſo large a teſtimony of his power. This was the eſtate of the Iewes at that time.

Alias, chap. 11 Sextus Cæſar ſelleth his Preſidents place to Herod for ready money.

Herod marcheth againſt Hircanus with a great army, and is diſſwaded from warre by his father Antipater, and his brother Phaſælus.

But Cæſar arriuing at Rome, prepared himſelfe to ſet ſaile towards Affricke, with an intent to make warre againſt Scipio and Cato. To him Hircanus ſent Embaſſadours, beſeeching him to confirme the amitie and aſſociation that hee had with him. But now at this preſent, I thinke it very conuenient to declare all the prerogatiues, and aſſociations that the Romanes and their Emperors made with thoſe of our nation, to the end that all other people might know, that the Kings of Aſia and Europe haue beene well affected towards vs, and haue made great account of our valour and fidelitie. And although diuers men lewdly affected towards vs, beleeue not that which the Macedonians and Perſians haue written of vs, becauſe the ſame matters are not extant in all places, neither ſet downe in publike writings, but only amongſt our ſelues and ſome Barbarians; yet is it manifeſt that they cannot contradict the declarations made by the Romanes, which are manifeſtly affixed in publike places in Cities; as likewiſe alſo at this preſent they are written in the Capitol in brazen pillars. Iulius Cæſar, in like manner in a brazen pillar erected by him, hath declared vnto the Iewes that inhabited Alexandria, that they were free Citizens therein. And to the intent that theſe things may more manifeſtly appeare, I will propoſe the decrees of the Senate, and of Iulius Cæſar, made in fauour of Hircanus and our nation. Caius Iulius Cæſar Emperour, high Prieſt, Dictator the ſecond Time, to the Gouernours, Senate and people of the Sidonians, Health: If you are well, we are in health, both our ſelues and our armie. I haue ſent you the Copy of an inſcription, regiſtred in fauour of Hircanus Alexanders ſonne, high Prieſt and Prince of the Iewes, to the end it may bee placed among publike monuments: and my will

The Iewes much honoured by the Kings of Europe and Aſia.

Iulius Cæſar teſtified in a brazen pillar, that the Iewes were free Citizens of Alexandria.

Iulius Cæſars Decree as touching the honours, immunities and priuiledges granted to the Iewes.

The yeere of the world, 3922. before Christs Natiuitie, 42.

will is, that it be engrauen in a table of brasse, both in Greeke and Latine letters; the tenour whereof is this that followeth: Because Hircanus Alexanders sonne the Iew, both at this present as also heretofore; as well in peace as in warre, hath expressed his fidelitie towards vs and our estate, as diuers Chieftaines of our armies yeeld testimony of him; and for that in our last Alexandrine warre, he seconded vs in the battell with fifteene hundreth men; and hauing beene sent by vs to Mithridates, hath surmounted all those of his company in valour. For these causes my will is that Hircanus Alexanders sonne and his successors, be Princes of the Iewes: and further, that they continue alwaies in the high Priesthood, according to the ordinance and custome of their countrey: and that both he and his children be our associates; and be inrowled likewise amongst our chiefest friends: and all that which appertaineth to the Priesthood, according to the ordinances of the Iewes, be attributed to him and his. And if there happen any different as touching the discipline of the Iewes, our pleasure is, that it be determined by him. And as touching the munitions of warre, and the money to be leuyed for the entertainment of souldiers, we thinke it not meete that they should be charged. The Decrees made and granted by Caius Cæsar being Consull, are these:

That the sonnes of Hircanus bee Princes ouer the nation of the Iewes, and inioy the places granted vnto them. That the high Priest and Prince of the Iewes giue fauour and aide vnto those that are offenced. That Embassadours be sent to Hircanus the sonne of Alexander high Priest of the Iewes, to intreat of amitie and association with vs. That a brazen table be erected in the Capitol: and likewise at Sidon, at Tyre, and at Ascalon in the Temples, wherein shall be engrauen the contents hereof in Romane and Greeke letters, to the end that all the Treasurers that are in the Cities, and all other Magistrates may by this our Decree vnderstand, that they are our friends, and that their Embassadours bet entertained with kindnesse and presents, and that these Edicts be sent into all places.

Caius Cæsar Emperour, Dictator, Consull, for the good of the Senate and people of Rome, hath granted to the honour, vertue, and humanitie of Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, that both hee and his children shall bee high Priests in Ierusalem, and of the whole Nation, according to the Rites and Customes, whereby their ancestors haue enioyed the Priesthood.

Caius Cæsar, Consull the fift time, hath ordained that they shall inhabit Ierusalem, and build againe the walles of the Citie; and that Hircanus (Alexanders sonne, the high Priest and Prince of the Iewes) shall gouerne as best him liketh, and that euery second yeere of their tribute, there be a Chore deducted out of the rent they owe, and that they be exempt from all other impositions, and tributes.

Caius Cæsar, twice Emperour, hath ordained, that the Iewes shall contribute euery yeere for their Cities, except Ioppe; he acquiteth them also euery seuenth yeere (which they call the yeere of rest) because that therein they neither reape, nor sow, neither gather the fruits of trees. His further pleasure is, that euery second yeere, they bring their tributes vnto Sidon, which shall be the fourth part of that which shall be sowne; and besides this, that they pay the tenths to Hircanus and his sonnes, which they haue paid to their Predecessours vnto this day. Commanding that no man, whether he be Gouernour, Captaine, or Embassadour, or any other whatsoeuer hee be, leuy souldiers within the countrey of Iudæa, or draw any thereout: neither exact any money, whether it be for garrisons in winter, or for any other cause, but that the Iewes be exempt from all troubles in all places, and enioy all that which sithence they haue had, bought, and possessed. It is our pleasure also, that the Citie of Ioppe be vnder their gouernment (which they haue euer enioyed since the beginning of their friendship with the Romanes.) We further grant, that Hircanus Alexanders sonne and his children, receiue the tribute of that Citie (both by them, that till the land, as by the gates, entries, and issues of merchandizes that are transported vnto Sidon) twentie thousand, sixe hundreth, seuentie and fiue bushels euery yeere, exempting the seuenth yeere, which is called the yeere of rest, wherein they neither labour nor gather any fruit of the trees. It is the Senates pleasure also, that Hircanus and the Iewes haue those villages, which are in the great champain, which he & his predecessors haue possessed, and that with the like interests that they held them before this; and that the same customes continue therein, whereby they held and gouerned them. Their will is likewise, that the same lawes which haue from the beginning beene respectiuely obserued betweene the Iewes and their high Priests, be continued; and whatsoeuer benefits were granted them, by the consent of the Senate and people of Rome. Moreouer it shall be lawfull for those of Lydda, to vse the same rites and priuiledges also. And as touching the the demaines places, and habitations that haue appertained to the Kings of Syria and Phœnicia, by the gift made vnto them at such time as they were allied to the Romanes: the Senate (I say) ordaineth, that Hircanus the high Priest & Prince of the Iewes possesse the same. It is lawfull also for Hircanus and his sonnes, and their Embassadours sent by them, to behold the Iusts and Combates, and to sit among the Senators, and that at all and euery time or times wherein they shall require to be brought into the Senate by the Dictator, or by the Master of the horse, they may haue free entrance; and that within ten daies at the most they receiue their answer, if there bee any decree ratified by the Senate. The yeer of the world, 3922. before christs Natiuity, 42.

Caius Cæsar, Emperour, the fourth time Consull, and the fift time Dictator for terme of life, hath ratified these things, as touching Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, the high Priest & Prince of the Iewes: Because that the Generals my predecessors haue testified as well in the prouinces, as before the Senate and people of Rome, both of the good deserts of Hircanus high Priest and Prince of the Iewes, and that nation also, towards vs and our State; and whereas both the Senate and people of Rome haue gratified them for the same: wee thinke it conuenient also to haue the same in memory, and to giue order that Hircanus and his sonnes may be remunerated by the Senate and people of Rome, according to the measure of their loyalties and good deserts.

Iulius Caius Cæsar Romane Consull, to the Gouernours, Senate and people of Patras: Health: The Iewes are come vnto vs to Delos, with some of the Colonies of their countrimen in the presence of your Embassadours, and certifie vs of a decree made by you: whereby you forbid them the practice and ancient vse of their sacrifices and oblations: I thinke it not meete that you make any such decrees against our friends, and associates; neither that you forbid them to liue according to their fashions and customes; or to imploy their purses together in furnishing their feasts and sacrifices; since in Rome it selfe they are not interdicted or forbidden to performe the same. For at such time as Caius Cæsar Consull had prohibited by Edict, that in celebrating the Bacchanals, no one should dance about the Citie; yet were the Iewes alone exempted from this inhibition: and neither haue they beene prohibited to contribute, neither to banquet together. My selfe also in like case in the defence I haue made to forbid all other sodalities, haue excepted the Iewes therein, and haue giuen them leaue and licence to assemble and demeane themselues, according to the customes, ceremonies, and ordinances of their countrey. If therefore you haue made any such decrees against our friends and associates, you shall doe well to disanull them, by reason of the vertue of the Iewes, and the forwardnesse they haue protested in performance of our seruice.

M. Antonius, and P. Dolobella, bring Hircanus Embassadors into the Senate.

After Caius Cæsars death, the Consuls Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolobella, assembled the Senate, and hauing brought in Hircanus Embassadours, they declared their requests, and contracted amitie with them: the Senate likewise ordained, that each thing should bee granted them that they required. And Dolobella hauing receiued Hircanus Letters, sent them thorowout all Asia, and to Ephesus (which is the Metropolitane City of Asia) in these termes: The Generall Dolobella to the Princes, Senate, and people of Ephesus, Health: Alexander the sonne of Theodore Embassadour to Hircanus the high Priest and Prince of the Iewes, hath giuen vs to vnderstand, that his subiects cannot goe on warfare, because it is not lawfull for them to beare armes, nor to trauell on the Sabbath day; as also for that they may not seeke for their victuals and other necessaries (on that day) according to the custome of their countrey: for this cause I grant them exemption from the warre, in like manner as my predecessors haue done; permitting them to vse the ceremonies and rites of their countrey, assembling themselues to make their oblations and sacrifices, as their lawes and customes require, in contributing to the offering of the sacrifices in the Temple. And my will is, that you write to this effect to euery Citie of the Prouince. See here how Dolobella honoured Hircanus at such time as he sent his Embassadours vnto him.

Dolobellas Letters to the Ephesians.

Lucius Lucullus in the French, Lentulus in the Latine, being Consull, maketh an Edict in behalfe of the Iewes. Iosephus conclusion concerning these Edicts.

Lucius Lentulus Consull pronounceth that the Iewes (that are citizens of Rome) and that obserue and offer the sacrifices of the Iewes in Ephesus before the tribunall, be exempt from warfare, by reason of their religion. Giuen the nineteenth of October. There are besides these many other Edicts & Ordinances made to the like effect, by the same Generals, and by the Romane Senate in fauour of Hircanus and our nation, and some other cities. In like sort there were diuers decrees and writs sent vnto the Gouernors & Rulers of the prouinces touching our priuiledges: all which may be easily beleeued by those that shall reade our History, with no preiudicate opinion, if they consider those that we haue here inserted. For wee haue shewed more expresse and liuely testimonies of the friendship that we haue had with the Romanes, and such as at this day are affixed to pillars, and engrauen in tables of brasse in the Capitoll; and that hereafter shall remaine affixed for euer: For which cause, I haue thought it to bee a friuolous and vnnecessary matter to insert all in this place; and I thinke that there is not any man of so siniſter iudgement, that will not beleeue how much we haue beene esteemed by the Romanes, as they haue giuen testimonies by diuers Decrees publiſhed in our behalfe; neither may any man suppose that we lye, considering the truth of that which we publiſh.

Cæcilius Bassus murthereth Sextus Cæsar.

Thus haue we sufficiently declared the amitie and association, that in times past wee haue had with the Romanes. About this time it came to passe, that the estate of Syria was sore troubled vpon the occasion that ensueth: Cæcilius Bassus one of Pompeies partakers, laid an ambush for Sextus Cæsar and slew him, and seizing vpon his army, vsurped the gouernment: whereby there arose great warre nigh Apamea. For Cæsars Captaines marched out against Cæcilius, with great force both of foote and horsemen, to whom Antipater sent his sonnes with a power to second them (in remembrance of the benefits he had receiued at Cæsars hands) supposing it to be an act of iustice, that the murtherer should be punished for his so hainous offence. Now whereas this warre continued a long time, Marcus came and succeeded Sextus. Meane-while Cæsar was slaine by Cassius and Brutus in the midst of the Senate, after he had commanded three yeeres and sixe moneths, as it is expressed in another place.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 20. Cassius commeth into Syria, and exacteth more then 700. talents of siluer from the Iewes.

AFTER Cæsars death, the brand of ciuill warre began to flame, and the greatest men of Rome trauelled the one this way, the other that way, to gather men of warre. But Cassius came into Syria, with an intent to take the army that was neere to Apamea: and hauing leuied the siege, he drew both Bassus and Marcus to be of his faction, and trauelling from City to City, he gathered a number of souldiers, & much furniture, and imposed huge tributes: but especially he afflicted Iewry, and exacted of that country more then seuen hundreth talents of siluer. Antipater seeing the State in so great feare and trouble, committing the exaction of the two parts of this money to his sonnes; the other hee commanded to be assigned to Malichus, who was his enemy, and the other part vnto another. Herod first of all gathered that which was commanded him in the countrey of Galilee, and for this cause was greatly beloued by Cassius: for hee being prudent and discreet, thought it no small policie at that time to win the Romanes good will by other mens expence. Vnder the other gouernours the Cities were set to sale, together with their inhabitants: and amongst them these foure were the chiefest, namely, Gophna, Emaus, Lydda, and Thamna: for Cassius sold the people thereof to them that would giue most. Furthermore, Cassius was so much transported with choler, that he had slaine Malichus) so much was he mooued against him) if Hircanus had not restrained his fury, by sending him one hundreth talents of his owne money by Antipater. But as soone as Cassius was departed out of the countrey of Iudæa, he practised Antipaters death, supposing that his cutting off would assure Hircanus state the more strongly. But Antipater was not ignorant of this his resolution; for hauing an inkling thereof, hee got himselfe on the other side of Iordan, and assembled an armie of souldiers both Iewes and Arabians. Hereupon, Malichus (who was a politique and subtill fellow) denied stoutly that he had intended any Treason, purging himselfe with an oath before Antipater and his children, that he had neuer any such intent, especially for that he saw that Phasælus held Ierusalem, and Herod had an armie at command. And in the end, perceiuing the difficultie wherein he was, he reconciled himselfe to Antipater, and they agreed at that time that Marcus gouerned Syria: who perceiuing that Malichus began to raise troubles in Iewry, resorted thither, and there wanted little but that he had slaine him, had not Antipater by earnest request obtained his life.

Hercd winneth Cassius heart by the money he leuyeth in Galilee.

CHAP. XIX.

MALICHVS poysoneth ANTIPATER.

Cassius and Marcus make Herod Gouernour of Cœlosyria.

BVT imprudent Antipater saued Malichus to his owne mischiefe: For when Cassius and Marcus had assembled their armie, they committed all the charge into Herods hands, and made him Gouernour of Cœlosyria, and deliuered him great forces both of foote and horse, and ships by sea: They promised him likewise the kingdome of Iudæa, after they had finished shed the warre, that was at that time betwixt them and Anthony and Cæsar the yonger. Whereupon Malichus mightily fearing Antipaters power, determined to make him away; and hauing corrupted Hircanus butler with money (with whom both of them celebrated a feast) hee made him away by poison, and afterwards assembling many men of warre about him, hee made himselfe Master of the Citie. When Herod and Phasælus vnderstood of the traiterous conspiracie attempted against their father, they were grieuously incensed against Malichus. But he denied all, and in especiall abiured the intent or practice of the murther. Thus died Antipater a iust and vertuous man, and such a one as dearely loued his countrey. But Herod, who was his yonger sonne, incontinently resolued to reuenge his fathers death, and came forth with an army against Malichus: But Phasælus, who was the elder, determined to circumuent him by policie, for feare lest he should raise a ciuill warre. He therefore accepted of Malichus iustifications, and made a shew that he supposed that he had in no such sort sought Antipaters death, and onely intended his fathers monument and funerals. Meane while, Herod resorting to Samaria, and finding it in desperate estate, restored the same, & pacified the dissensions that were amongst the inhabitants. Not long after (by reason of a feast) he came to Ierusalem with his men of warre. Whereupon Malichus being affraid of this his accesse, perswaded Hircanus that he should not permit him to enter into the Citie: whereunto Hircanus condescended, alleadging for pretext of his defence, that amongst the holy people it was not lawfull to intermixe a troupe of polluted men. But Herod made small reckoning of them that brought him this newes, & notwithstanding this command, entred the Citie by night: whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his wonted dissimulations, he openly wept & bewailed the death of Antipater as his especiall friend; but vnder-hand he prepared a guard for his owne safety. Notwithstanding it was thought meet by Herods friends, to take no notice of this dissimulation; but to make a shew for their parts, that they were well-affected towards Malichus.

CHAP. XX.

HEREVPOM Herod certified Cassius of Antipater his fathers death, who knowing very well of what conuersation Malichus was, wrote back vnto Herod that he should reuenge the death of his father: besides, he sent secret letters to the captaines that were in Tyre, commanding them to aide and assist Herod in that so iust execution which he intended. After therefore that Cassius had taken Laodicea, and the inhabitants of the countrey came together, bringing with them crownes and siluer to present him, Herod expected that Malichus in that place should receiue his punishment: but he entring into suspicion of some practice, at such time as they drew neere vnto Tyre in Phœnicia, attempted farre greater things. For whereas his sonne was an hostage in Tyre, hee entred the City with intent to draw him thence, and afterwards to returne into Iudæa. After this, vsurping vpon that opportunity which he had by reason of Cassius troubles (who hastily marched forward to meet with Anthony) he determined to draw the people to an insurrection, and to make himselfe Lord of the country: but God disappointed his vniust purposes: For Herod being a man of a ripe iudgement, incontinently discouered his pretence, and sent one of his seruants before, as if vnder purpose to prepare a banquet, because he had told him beforetime that he would entertaine all his followers: but in effect, he sent him to the Captaines to command them to issue out with their daggers, and to meet Malichus; who marching foorth and meeting him neere vnto the shore of the City vpon the sea coast, stabbed him in that place with their daggers. Which act did so much astonish Hircanus, that through amaze he waxed speechlesse: and finally being much mooued, hee demanded of Herods men, what accident had happened, and who it was that had slaine Malichus? Whereof when they certifyed him, and how nothing was done without Cassius command: he answered that all things were well done, for that Malichus was a wretched man and a traytor to his countrey. See here how Malichus was iustly punished for the wickednesse hee committed against Antipater.

When Cassius was departed out of Syria, there arose a new tumult in Iudæa: for Felix, who was left in Ierusalem with an army, marched forth against Phasælus, and all the people were in armes. For which cause Herod speedily repaired to Fabius, Gouernour of Damasco, and intending to succour his brother, was preuented by a sicknes: so that Phasælus obtaining the victorie by by his owne forces against Fælix, encloſed him vp in a tower, whence afterwards hee diſmiſſed him vnder compoſition. Whereupon he preſently and grieuouſly rebuked Hircanus, for that being forgetfull of diuers benefits which he had receiued by him, hee had giuen aide vnto his enemies. For Malichus brother being at that time reuolted, planted garriſons in diuers fortreſſes, & namely in Maſada, which was the ſtrongeſt of them all. As ſoone as Herod therefore had recouered his health, he drew forth his forces againſt him, and diſpoſſeſſed him of diuers places that hee held, and after ſuffered him to depart with his life and goods.

PTOLOMEY Mennæus drew vnto him by force of his money Ariſtobulus ſonne the yong Antigonus, who had gathered a power, and hired Fabius, and was likewiſe drawne by Ptolomey, vnder titles of conſanguinity and adoption. With him ioyned Marion (whom Caſſius had made Gouernour in Tyre:) For this man hauing occupied Syria by tyranny, kept garriſon therein: Marion alſo inuaded Galilee, which confined his countrey; and hauing ſeized three ſtrong fortreſſes therein, hee kept garriſons in the ſame. Herod alſo marching forth againſt him, diſpoſſeſſed him of them all; & graciouſly diſmiſſed thoſe Tyrians that had the keeping thereof, beſtowing benefits on ſome of them, for the loue he bare vnto their Citie. And that done, hee came and encountred with Antigonus, and fought with him, and ouercame him before hee had ſcarcely entred on the marches of Iudæa, and draue him from thence. When hee was come to Ieruſalem, Hircanus and all the people honoured him with crownes: for already was hee inſerred into Hircanus family, for that by promiſe hee was his ſonne in law; by which meanes, he had more willingly vndertaken his defence, for that hee was to marry Alexanders the ſonne of Ariſtobulus daughter, who was Hircanus neece: on whom hee begat three ſonnes & two daughters. Before her alſo had he married a wife of his owne nation, who was called Doris, on whom he begat Antipater his eldeſt ſonne.

CHAP. XXII.

HEROD meeting with ANTONIVS in Bithynia, giueth him a great ſumme of money, to the end hee ſhould not giue eare to thoſe that would accuſe him.

ANTONIVS and Cæſar hauing ouercome Caſſius neere vnto the Citie of Philippi; Cæſar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Aſia. And being in Bithynia, Embaſſadours reſorted vnto him from all parts: Thither alſo repaired certaine principall men among the Iewes to accuſe Phaſælus and Herod; ſaying that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authority of the Kingdome. But Antonius greatly honoured Herod, who came vnto him to anſwer thoſe accuſations that they had impoſed on him: for which cauſe they that were his oppoſites, could obtaine no audience: for Herod had bought that priuiledge from them with his money. As ſoone as Antonius was arriued in Epheſus, Hircanus the high Prieſt and all our nation preſently ſent an Embaſſadour vnto him, with a crowne of gold; requiring him that he would write vnto the prouinces, that the Iewes whom Caſſius had taken priſoners (contrary to the law of armes) might be ſet at liberty, and that their countrey (which was taken from them in Caſſius time) might be reſtored. Antonius ſuppoſing that the demands which the Iewes had propoſed, were reaſonable, wrote backe preſently to the high Prieſt Hircanus and the Iewes; and ſent an edict alſo to the Tyrians to this effect:

The Iudge corrupted with money. Hircanus Embaſſadours preſent Antonius with a crowne of gold, and require the captiue Iewes liberty ſold by Caſſius.

Antonius writeth to Hircanus as touching Brutus and Caſſius actions and death.

A haue had any knowledge of your good and honeſt conuerſation and pietie. For at ſuch time as our aduerſaries and enemies of the Roman nation ſpoiled all the countrey of Aſia, and without regard of their oathes ſpared neither cities nor temples; we haue oppoſed our ſelues againſt them, not onely for our priuate reſpect, but in the quarrell of the commonweale, to the intent to puniſh the authors of ſuch offences committed againſt men, and of ſuch impieties perpetrated againſt God: for which we ſuppoſe that the ſunne hath in a manner obſcured himſelfe, by beholding with vnwilling eies what an hainous offence was committed againſt Cæſar. But wee haue gotten the vpper hand of their impious enterprizes, which are fallen vpon Macedonia, as on the countrey and ayre, from whence proceede ſuch deteſtable and vngracious deſſeignes: and wee B haue likewiſe cut off the courſe of their deſperate reſolution, which made them encounter vs neere to Philippi a city of Macedonia, where we ſeized their places fortified by nature, and encloſed with mountaines as if it were with walles, as farre as the ſea, in ſuch manner as the paſſage was barred vp, as it were with a gate, had not the gods giuen vs way by reſiſting their vniuſt exploits, & furthering ours. Brutus is likewiſe compelled to flie to Philippi, where being incloſed by vs, he ſuffered the like ruine with his conſort Caſſius; and ſince they haue beene puniſhed as they deſerued, me ſeemeth that we are ſeized of peace, and that Aſia hath had repoſe from warre, and all the body thereof is releeued from a grieuous maladie, by the meanes of our victory. For which cauſe remembring vs of you and your nation, to the end to increaſe your good fortunes, we will bethinke vs of that which ſhall be commodious for you: and wee haue already ſent letC ters from city to city, to the intent that if any one among you, either captiue or free-man, haue been ſold to the vtmoſt by Caius Caſſius, or any of that army, they may be ſet at liberty. And our will is, that you make vſe of the bounty which we beſtow vpon you, both in our ſelfe as in Dolabellas right, forbidding the Tyrians to moleſt you, and commanding them to reſtore all that which they haue taken from the Iewes in goods or poſſeſſions. As for the crowne which you ſent me, I accept the ſame.

The yeer of the world, 3924. before Chriſts Natiuity, 40.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Gouernours, Senate and people of Tyre, Health: I haue been informed in Epheſus by Hircanus Embaſſadors (who is high Prieſt & Prince of the Iewes) that you haue ſeized their country, & ſpoiled the ſame, at ſuch time as our aduerſaries held that prouince. But in as much as we haue vndertaken the warre for the Empire, and that in defence D of right and pietie, we haue puniſhed theſe ingratefull, diſloyall & perfidious perſons; our will is, that you ſuffer our allies to liue in peace: and as touching that which you haue obtained by our aduerſaries, our pleaſures is, that you reſtore the ſame to thoſe that are diſpoſſeſſed. For no one of them hath obtained either prouince or army by the conſent of the Senate; but haue rauiſhed them by force, and afterwards beſtowed them on thoſe who haue been miniſters of their impieties and iniuſtice. But ſince they haue beene puniſhed according to their deſerts, wee require that our allies may enioy their owne, without any impeachment: and if you hold any places at this preſent, which belong to Hircanus Prince of the Iewes (that were ſeized ſince the time that Caius Caſſius by iniuſt warre inuaded our prouinces) reſtore them vnto him, without offer of any violence, to hinder him from the poſſeſſion of his owne. And if you haue or pretend to haue any right in them; at ſuch time as I ſhall repaire to thoſe places, it ſhall be lawfull for you to debate your right, and we will ſo iudge, as that our allies ſhall receiue no wrong.

Marcus Antonius writeth to the Magiſtrates of Tyre, to reſtore Hircanus and the Iewes their lands, goods, and liberty.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Gouernours, Senate, and people of Tyre: Health: I haue ſent you my edict, which my pleaſure is that you carefully looke vnto, and that you regiſter it amongſt your publicke records in Romane and Greeke letters, and ſet it vp in writing in an open place, to the end that it may be read by all men.

Marcus Antonius Emperour and Triumuir, in the preſence of the Tyrians aſſembled for their publike affaires, hath declared, that Caius Caſſius during the troubles, by the aſſiſtance of his ſoldiers, hath rauiſhed another mans prouince; and hath in like ſort ſpoiled our allies, and hath ranſackt the nation of the Iewes, who are friends to the people of Rome: and for that by our valour we haue repreſſed his inſolence, by our edicts and iudgements we will correct his offences; to the end that all things may be reſtored to our allies, and that all whatſoeuer hath bin ſold, and appertained to the Iewes (whether they be priſoners or poſſeſſions) be reſtored to their maſters, to the end that each man may be at liberty as he was before; and that each mans poſſeſſion may be reſtored to his firſt owner. And my pleaſure is, that whoſoeuer diſobeyeth this ordinance, he may be puniſhed. And he that ſhall be conuicted to haue diſobeyed the ſame, hee ſhall be puniſhed according to his demerit. He wrote to the like effect to the Sidonians, Antiochians, and Arabians; all which we will inſert in a conuenient place, to teſtifie what account the Romans made of our nation.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. Cleopatra commeth into Cilicia to Antonius.

AFTER this, Antonius retyred himselfe into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meet him neere vnto Cilicia, and entangled him in her loue. At that time also, one hundreth of the chiefest reckoning among the Iewes, came once againe in Embassade to him to accuse Herod, and his adherents: who to this end had chosen out the most esteemed Orator that might be found. Messala likewise vndertooke the defence of the yong men that were accused, and made them answer. Hircanus also was there in person, who was already by marriage allied vnto them. After that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the City of Daphen, he demanded of Hircanus, which of both the parties gouerned the common-weale best? who returned him answer, that they, who were on Herods side, were most studious of the weale publike. Antonius (who long since had borne good affection towards them, by reason of the ancient hospitalitie that he had receiued with their father, during the time that Gabinius was in Iudæa) established them both for Tetrarchs, committing to their hands the affaires in Iudæa: And to this effect wrote he his letters, and committed fourteene of their enemies to prison; whom had not Herod besought for their liues, he had condemned them to death. This notwithstanding, as soon as they returned from their Embassade, they could not containe themselues in quiet, but resorted once more vnto Antonius to the number of ten thousand, to the city of Tyre where Antonius soiourned. But Antonius (already corrupted by store of money by Herod and his brother, who commanded in that place) ordained that the Embassadours of the Iewes should be punished, for that they had attempted and affected some innouation; where contrariwise he confirmed Herods gouernement. At that time Herod, who walked by the sea side, came vnto them, aduising both them and Hircanus (who at that present was with them) to giue ouer their appeale, for feare lest some grieuous misfortune should befall them. Whereunto since they gaue no regard, certaine Iewes and inhabitants of that city, all at once ranne vpon them, who slue some of them, and hurt other some, & the rest taking their flight towards their country, euer afterwards contained themselues and liued in quiet, through the feare they had conceiued. But when the people ceased not to exclaime and protest against Herod, Antonius was in such sort displeased, that hee commanded all those whom he held prisoners, should be slaine.

The yere after, Pacorus the Kings sonne, and Barzapharnes a Prince among the Parthians, inuaded and seized Syria. And about this time died Ptolomey the sonne of Mennæus; and his sonne Lysias raigned in his stead, who plighted friendship with Antigonus the sonne of Aristobulus, who obtained this fauour at his hands by the counsell and sollicitation of a certaine Prince of great authority and credit with him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 22. Antigonus promiseth the Parthians a great summe of money to install him in the kingdome

AFTER this, Antigonus promised the Parthians to giue them one thousand talents of siluer, and fiue hundreth women, if so bee they would depriue Hircanus of the Kingdome, and restore it vnto him, and withall put Herod and his friends to death. Yet did hee not deliuer them that he promised, notwithstanding the Parthians led their army into Iury to restore Antigonus, to wit, Pacorus by the sea-coast, and Barzapharnes to the landward. The Tyrians locked their gates against Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Ptolemaidans receiued him into their Citie. He sent a troupe of horsemen into Iury to discouer the estate of the countrey, and to giue succours to Antigonus. The chiefetaine of these horsemen was the Kings butler; who in like sort was called Pacorus. But for that certaine Iewes (inhabiting about the mount Carmel) ioyned themselues with Antigonus, and were prepared with him to inuade his enemies, he conceiued some hope that he might by their meanes reduce a certaine part of the region vnder his gouernment, which is called Drymæ: & certain of his wel-willers meeting him in the way, perswaded him to presse forward as farre as Ierusalem; where being seconded by others (and his followers already much increased in number) they addresse themselues to assault the Kings Palace. And whereas those of the faction of the brethren brought present supplies, and the skirmish was maintained tained in the market place, the yong men repulſed the enemie, and draue him into the Temple. Which done, they ſent certaine armed men into the houſes neere adioyning, to guard them: but the people ruſhing in vpon them, and ſeeing they were deſtitute of aide, burned both them and the houſes wherein they were. But this iniquity of theirs was preſently reuenged by Herod, who in a skirmiſh that he had with them, ſlew a great number of them. And whereas there were daily aſſaults betweene both parties, the enemies expected vntill ſuch time as the people (aſſembled from all parts of the countrey) ſhould repaire to Ieruſalem to celebrate the feaſt of Pentecoſt. Which being come, many thouſands of men aſſembled about the Temple, both armed and vnarmed, who ſeized both the Temple and the City; except the Kings houſe onely, which Herod made good with a few men of warre. The wall thereof did Phaſælus his brothers keepe. But Herod with a company of his followers ſallied out vpon the enemy, who were planted in the ſuburbes, and fighting valiantly againſt them, he put diuers thouſands of them to flight, wherof ſome retired themſelues into the City; other ſome into the Temple; the reſt into a certaine bulwarke neere at hand. In this battell alſo Phaſælus ſhewed no little fauour.

Pacorus Chieftaine of the Parthians entering the City, perſwadeth Phaſælus to go Embaſſador to Barzapharnes

But Pacorus conductor of the Parthians, came into the City with ſome few horſemen at Antigonus requeſt, making ſhew that he came to appeaſe the ſedition; but the effect and ſcope of his comming was, to obtaine the ſoueraignty for Antigonus. Furthermore, after that Phaſælus was come out to meet with him, and had courteouſly entertained him in his houſe, Pacorus perſwaded him to goe Embaſſadour with him to Barzapharnes, laying a baite vnder this pretence to ſurprize him. He ſuſpecting no treacheries, was eaſily perſwaded, notwithſtanding that Herod miſliked the courſe, who knowing the perfidious manner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to aſſaile Pacorus, and to aſſault and oppreſſe his forces, when they were come vnto him. Naitheleſſe Hircanus and Phaſælus vndertooke this Embaſſade, and Pacorus (leauing with Herod two hundreth horſemen, and ten of thoſe whom they call free men) conducted the Embaſſadors. Now as ſoone as they came into Galilee, the Gouernours of the Cities in that countrey, came forth armed to meete them: Barzapharnes alſo at the firſt gaue them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with preſents; but anon after, he began to practiſe treachery. For Phaſælus and his attendants were conducted to a lodging that adioyned the ſea; where hearing tidings that Antigonus had promiſed one thouſand talents, and fiue hundreth virgins to the Parthians, he began already to ſuſpect the Barbarians. For a certaine friend of his had giuen him an inkling that there were treaſons intended againſt him that very night, and that his lodging was priuily beſet with a guard. And ſurely they had beene ſurprized, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Ieruſalem) ſhould be ſeized of Herod, fearing leſt he hauing an inkling of their diſaſter, ſhould betake himſelfe to flight. And that this was true, they incontinently gathered by the guard that was ſet about them: For which cauſe there were certaine of Phaſælus friends, who counſelled him, that without any more delay, he ſhould betake him to his horſe, & flie from thence: and amongſt the reſt Ofilius was moſt earneſt, who had wrought out of Saramalla a rich Syrian (who offered them his ſhips that road hard by to further their flight) all that which they pretended. But Phaſælus would neither forſake Hircanus, nor leaue his brother Herod in danger, but repairing to Barzapharnes, he told him, that he did him wrong to vſe theſe ſiniſter practices againſt them. For that if he had need of money, he was more likely to receiue it at his hands, then from Antigonus; and howſoeuer he wrought, it was an intolerable iniury to put Embaſſadours to death, who came vnto him vnder pledge of his honour, and had no waies offended him. But the Barbarian hearing theſe things, proteſted by an oath, that no one point of that which he had ſuſpected, was true; but that he was onely troubled with falſe ſurmize: whereupon he preſently departed to Pacorus.

CHAP. XXV.

The Parthians lead away HIRCANVS and PHASÆLVS into captiuitie.

AS ſoone as he was departed, certaine of the Parthians tooke Hircanus and Phaſælus priſoners, who mightily deteſted their periuries. But the Eunuch that was ſent vnto Herod, had commandement giuen him to entice and traine him without the City walles, and afterwards to apprehend him. But Herod was forewarned of this treachery, by certaine meſſengers (who were ſent by Phaſælus to giue him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemie in the way, and Herod getting notice thereof, he addreſſed himſelfe to Pacorus (and thoſe in in greateſt authority among the Parthians) as to them that were the maſters: who ſubtilly diſſembled, notwithſtanding they knew how all things went, telling him that he ſhould doe well to repaire with them without the wall to go and meete thoſe meſſengers, who brought him letters; who had not as yet beene ſeized by their aduerſaries, but came to certifie him of Phaſelus good eſtate. But Herod gaue them no credit, becauſe hee was already otherwaies aduertized of his brothers ſurprizal, & had alſo farre greater ſuſpicion of the Parthians by the ſollicitation of Hircanus daughter, whom he had married. And although the reſt made no account of her aduertiſements, yet Herod gaue credit vnto her, for that ſhe was a moſt wiſe woman. Now whileſt the Parthians were in deliberation what were beſt to be done (in that it was held no policy to make open aſſault vpon ſuch a man) they deferred the whole matter vntill the next morning. Whileſt thus they were debating of their differents, Herod came vnto them, who rather giuing credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treaſons intended againſt him by the Parthians) then to his aduerſaries, as ſoone as it was night, concluded to make vſe of the time, & to make away, without ſtaying any longer amongſt thoſe vncertaine dangers, which his enemies intended againſt him. For which cauſe hee fled with thoſe men of warre which hee had with him: and mounting his mother, his ſiſter and his betrothed, whom he was to marry (who was Alexanders daughter, the neece of Ariſtobulus) and her mother (who was Hircanus daughter) and her yonger brother, with all their family & traine, he departed into Idumæa without eſpiall or ſuſpicion of the enemy. Amongſt whom there was not one ſo hard or yron-hearted, who ſeeing ſuch a pittifull ſpectacle, could not be mooued to compaſſion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their countrey with teares and complaints: and that which was worſe, to leaue their friends in bondage, without any hope of cõfort or redreſſe.

The Parthians lay a plot to ſurprize Herod: hee diſcouereth it, and preuenteth them by flight.

But Herod maſtered theſe misfortunes by his inuincible courage, and for that hee was a conſtant man in all fortunes, he exhorted euery one of them whom he met in the way, to be of good courage; and not abandon themſelues to immeaſurable ſorrow, for that by ſuch meanes they might hinder his retreat, on which their ſole and ſecureſt conſeruation depended: whereupon they for their parts indeuoured themſelues to digeſt their griefes, according to Herods exhortation. Meane-while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himſelfe, by reaſon of the chariot wherein his mother rode, which ouerturned and had almoſt ſlaine her; yea ſo much did this caſualty terrifie him (for feare leſt the enemy in purſuit ſhould ſurprize him during theſe delaies) as that he drew and prepared his ſword to kill himſelfe, had not ſome aſſiſtants and followers ſtept in to him & ſtayed the ſtroke, beſeeching him inſtantly not to forſake them, & leaue them ſubiect to the enemies violence: aſſuring him that it was not the part of a valiant man to reſpect his owne priuate intereſt, and neglect his friends perill. By theſe perſwaſions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reaſon of the apprehenſion of theſe words, which were ſpoken vnto him, as alſo for that he was ouerruled by the multitude of thoſe who would not permit his hand to execute his will: ſo that taking vp his mother, and doing her all the ſeruice that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the ſpeedieſt & neereſt meanes he could, he retired toward the Caſtle of Maſſada; where in the way, he oftentimes fought againſt the Parthians that charged and purſued him, and returned alwaies with victory from them. The Iewes alſo were not in peace with him during this his flight; for ſcarcely had he trauelled ſixtie ſtounds out of the City, but that they aſſailed him in the high way: but he put them to flight and obtained the victorie, not like a deſperate man enforced thereunto through neceſſity, but like a diſcreet well furniſhed and valiant ſouldier. So that in the very place where he obtained that victory againſt the Iewes (after ſuch time as hee was made King) hee builded a moſt ſumptuous palace, and neere vnto the ſame a city which he called Herodium. Whileſt hee remained at Reſſa (a borough of Idumæa) Ioſeph his brother came forth to meete him, and to conſult with him as touching their whole eſtate, and to know of him what ſhould become of that great multitude that followed them, conſidering that they had no ſouldiers in pay, and the Caſtle of Maſſada (whither he pretended do flie) was too little to hold all the people: for which cauſe he ſent away many to the number of nine thouſand, willing them to diſperſe themſelues here and there in the countrey of Idumæa; and for the better diſpatch of their iourney, he furniſhed them with victuals. As for himſelfe, he tooke with him his moſt able ſouldiers and inward friends, and repaired to the Caſtle of Maſſada, in which place he left the women and their traine, to the number of eight hundreth or thereabouts: and furniſhing the place with corne, water and other prouiſions neceſſary, he went vnto Petra the chiefeſt City of Arabia. As ſoone as it was day, the Parthians ſacked all that which appertained to the Citizens of Ieruſalem; and among other things they ſpoyled

A ſpoiled the palace; notwithſtanding they medled not with Hircanus money, which amounted to ſome three hundreth talents. They left diuers other things behind them alſo that appertained to Herod, and eſpecially that which had been tranſported into Idumæa by his mature prouidence. Neither were the Parthians content with the ſpoile of the City, but they forraged all the countrey round about, and razed Mariſſa a very rich City. Thus Antigonus, brought backe into his countrey by the king of the Parthians, receiued Hircanus and Phaſælus that were priſoners: yet was he vehemently diſpleaſed, becauſe the women had eſcaped, whom according to his promiſe he intended to haue deliuered with the money: and fearing leſt Hircanus through the fauour of the people ſhould be reeſtabliſhed in his Kingdome (who then was priſoner in the cuſtody of the Parthians) he cut off both his eares, depriuing him by that meanes from enioying the Prieſthood any more, by reaſon of that maime, becauſe the law commandeth that they who are in that dignity, ſhould be ſound in all their members. But Phaſælus is to be admired for his great courage at that time: for vnderſtanding that hee muſt needly die, he was no waies diſmaied with death, but that which he held moſt miſerable and diſhonourable was, that he muſt needs die by the hands of his enemy. Seeing therefore that he could not diſpatch himſelfe by other meanes, (becauſe he was bound and chayned) he knockt out his owne braines againſt a ſtone, and ſo ended his life (with as great honour as may bee imagined in ſuch a deſperate eſtate) depriuing his enemy of that power which he intended to practiſe in tyrannizing ouer him at his pleaſure. It is ſaid that the wound being very deepe, Antigonus ſent priuily ſurgeons to cure him; and that vnder colour of healing him, they ſhould put poiſon into the ſame, where-through he might dye. But before Phaſælus gaue vp the ghoſt, he vnderſtood by a certaine woman, that his brother Herod had eſcaped from his enemies: for which cauſe he endured his death with far greater cheerefulneſſe and conſtancy, ſeeing that hee left behind him ſuch a man, as would reuenge his death, and puniſh his enemies. But Herod was no waies diſcomforted with the greatneſſe of thoſe aduerſities which enuironed him round about, but was the more whetted on to find out new inuentions, and to aduenture dangerous attempts. For he went vnto Malchus King of the Arabians (to whom beforetime hee had ſhewed much courteſie) hoping to receiue the like of him in this time of his great neceſſity, and to draw ſome money from him either by loane or gift, according as he had often and very bountifully pleaſured him. For being ignorant of his brothers death, hee endeuoured himſelfe to ranſome him ſpeedily from his enemies, by paying his ranſome (which amounted to three hundreth talents) and for that cauſe he led with him the ſon of Phaſelus, who was onely ſeuen yeeres old, to leaue him in pledge amongſt the Arabians for the ſumme that was demanded. But certaine meſſengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the kings behalfe to retire backe againe, for that the Parthians had enioyned him that he ſhould neither receiue nor retaine Herod. And this colourable pretence vſed he, becauſe he would not pay his debts: and hereunto was he perſwaded by the aduice of the greateſt in authority among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themſelues maſters of that treaſure that Antipater had committed to their cuſtody. Herod anſwered them, that hee repaired not into their countrey to giue them cauſe of any trouble, but onely to conſult with him about certaine matters of great importance touching his owne eſtate, and that afterwards he was reſolued to depart, and withdraw himſelfe into Ægypt as ſecretly as might be poſſible. He returned therefore to a certaine temple, where he had left diuers of his followers; and the next day he came to Rhinocura, in which place he heard tydings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himſelfe of his ingratitude, and ſpeedily ſent after Herod, but he could not ouertake him: for he had gotten farre onward of his way, and was already arriued in poaſt neere to Peluſium: where being denied his paſſage to Alexandria in thoſe ſhips that were there, he addreſſed himſelfe to the magiſtrates of the place, who highly reſpected and honoured him, and ſent him to the City where Cleopatra was; who entertained him kindly: yet notwithſtanding could ſhe not perſwade him to remaine with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithſtanding the winter and thoſe grieuous troubles that at the very ſame time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himſelfe therefore to ſaile into Pamphilia, he was toſſed with a moſt cruell ſtorme; ſo that with great danger at laſt he arriued in Rhodes, hauing beene inforced in the tempeſt to caſt into the ſea a good part of his ſubſtance. There met he with Sappinas and Ptolomey two of his indeared friends. Hee found alſo that the City of Rhodes had ſuffered much miſery by Caſsius warres: and although his meanes were very ſcant, yet profited he them in what he might, and cauſed their walles to be repaired, notwithſtanding that by ſo doing, hee greatly hindred himſelfe. After that, he cauſed a little frigote to be built, and embarked himſelfe with

CHAP. XXVI.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 23. al. 25.

ANTONIVS hearing all those alterations that had befallen Herod, had compassion of his misery (bethinking himselfe of the estate and condition of great men, who are likewise subiect to no lesse casualties) and the rather was hee induced to doe him good, both in remembrance of the friendship he had with Antipater his father, as also by reason of Herods promises of certaine summes of money, if so be he were made King by his means, as he had beene beforetime declared Tetrarch. But that which most mooued him hereunto, was the hatred which he bare to Antigonus, whom he accounted to be a mutinous man, and an enemy to the Romans fortune. On the other side, Cæsar was well inclined to succour him, both in regard of those armies which Antipater had brought into Ægypt in his fathers seruice, as also because of the good hospitality & kindnes that he had shewed him in all things; as in especiall to gratifie Antonius, who was well affected towards Herod. Whereupon the Senate being assembled, Messala and Atratinus brought foorth Herod, and after they had praised him, and recited the benefits which the Romans had receiued by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accused and declared Antigonus for the Romans enemy, not onely for his ancient crimes, but also for that in contempt of the Romans he had receiued the kingdome from the Parthians. Whilest the Senate was sore displeased at the report of these things, Antonius arose, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian warre, it were not amisse that Herod should be made King: which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principall demonstration of the loue and affection which Antonius bare vnto Herod, was, that he not only obtained him the kingdome, beyond all hope: for neuer thought he that the Romans would grant that dignity vnto him, who were wont to reserue that honour to those of the kings blood; and therefore he intended to haue demanded it for his wiues brother Alexander, and nephew to Aristobulus by the fathers side, and to Hircanus by the mother (which Alexander Herod afterward put to death, as it shall bee declared in place conuenient) but also for that within the tearme of seuen daies, he sent him out of Italy with the vnexpected titles of his felicity.

As soone as the Senate was risen, Antonius and Cæsar issued foorth, leading Herod betweene them, and being accompanied by the Consuls and other magistrates, went vp into the capitoll to doe sacrifice, and to place there this decree the Senate had made as touching this matter. The first day of Herods raigne Antonius feasted him; and after this sort was he established King in the hundreth eighty and fourth Olympiade, in the yeere wherein C. Domitius Caluinus twice Consul, and Caius Asinius Pollio were Consuls. Meane while Antigonus besieged those that were in the castle of Massada, who were plentifully furnished with all things necessary (except it were water) for which cause Ioseph Herods brother that was within, and two hundreth of his friends, had concluded to flie vnto the Arabians: for that they vnderstood that Malchus had repented himselfe of the fault he had committed against Herod. But whilest they stood vpon these tearmes, God powred downe a huge raine on a certaine night, that in short time filled their cesternes in such sort, as that they had no more necessity to flie; and from that time forward they waxed confident: and for that this abundance of water befell them by Gods prouidence, they made a sally vpon their enemies, in which they charged Antigonus soldiers after such a maner, sometime in open field, sometime by couert assault, that they slue a great number of them. At that time Ventidius a Roman captaine was sent into Syria to driue the Parthians from thence, & after their departure he arriued in Iury, making shew that he would assist Ioseph: but in effect al his pretẽce was to draw

Being therfore encamped neere vnto Ieruſalem, and hauing drawn ſufficient money from Antigonus, he retired himſelfe with the greater part of his forces: and to the intent his deceitfull dealing might not be diſcouered, he left Silo with a company of his ſouldiers: who likewiſe was honoured by Antigonus, for feare leſt he ſhould be cauſe of ſome new trouble, before ſuch time as the Parthians, whoſe comming he expected, ſhould yeeld him aide.

CHAP. XXVII.

HEROD returneth from Rome by ſea, and fighteth againſt ANTIGONVS.

AFTER that Herod was come from Italy by ſea to Ptolemais, and that he had aſſembled no ſmal number of ſouldiers both ſtrangers & his own countrimen, he marched forward againſt Antigonus, and paſſed thorow Galilee. Silo and Ventidius alſo gaue him aſſiſtance in this action, hauing receiued direction by Gellius from Antonius, that they ſhould aſſiſt Herod to recouer his countrey. But Ventidius was employed in appeaſing the troubles that were raiſed in the Cities by the Parthians: and as touching Silo hee kept in Iudæa, hauing beene corrupted by Antigonus. But the further that Herod daily marched into the country, the more and more increaſed his forces; and all Galilee (except a very fewe) ſubmitted themſelues vnto him. Whileſt therefore hee marched forward toward Maſſada, (beeing vrged thereunto in that hee was to releeue his parents that were beſieged therein) the City of Ioppe would not grant him paſſage: for the Citizens thereof were his enemies: ſo that it behooued him firſt of all to ruinate the ſame, to the end he might leaue no retreat or place of reſcous for his enemy on his backe, if ſo bee he made toward Ieruſalem. Vpon which occaſion Silo laying hold, diſlodged his army and made thitherward: whom when the Iewes did purſue, Herod ſallied out with a ſmall company, and put them to flight, and ſaued Silo, notwithſtanding hee fought very coldly & cowardly. Afterwards being ſeized of Ioppe, he haſted onwards to deliuer his friends that were beſieged in Maſſada; but part of the inhabitants ſubmitted themſelues vnto him for the friendſhip they had borne vnto his father: another ſort of them, for the honour that they bare vnto him: the reſt admitted his gouernment, in acknowledgement of thoſe benefits they had receiued from them both. But the greateſt part was thereunto mooued by the hope they had conceiued of their new elected King, and the confirmation of his gouernment. Thus by theſe meanes was his army mightily increaſed.

Herod returning backe out of Italy, leadeth forth his army againſt Antigonus.

Herod aſſaulteth Ioppe, & taketh it.

Many ſubmit themſelues to Herod.

Whileſt thus he marched forward, Antigonus ſeized thoſe places that were fitteſt to lay ambuſhes in, or to fight at aduantages by the way (notwithſtanding that by thoſe meanes and ſtratagems he did but ſmall or no hurt at all to his enemie;) ſo that Herod raiſed the ſiege, & diſcharged his friends out of the Caſtle of Maſſada: & after he had taken the fort of Reſſa, he approched Ieruſalem, being attended by Siloes army, & by diuers Citizens of the City, who were afraid of his power. And when as he had pitched his campe to the weſtward of the City, thoſe that kept the watch and guard on that ſide, ſhot their arrowes and caſt ſtones againſt him: diuers likewiſe trouped foorth, and fought, hand to hand againſt thoſe that were planted there: For which cauſe firſt of all Herod cauſed proclamation to be made round about the walles, ſignifying vnto them that he reſorted thither for the common profit of the people, and for the cõſeruation of the city, without intent of reuenge or memory of any wrongs that his priuate enemies had offered him, promiſing his moſt free pardon to all thoſe whoſoeuer had hainouſly offended him. Hereunto Antigonus made this anſwer (turning his ſpeech to Silo and the Roman ſoldiers) that contrary to all iuſtice they gaue the Kingdome to Herod, who was a priuate man, and an Idumæan (that is to ſay, a halfe Iewe,) whereas it hath beene a cuſtome to beſtow the ſame on them that are of the line of the Prieſts. For albeit at that preſent they were diſpleaſed with him, for that he was ſeized of the Kingdome by the meanes of the Parthians, and had reſolued with themſelues to diſpoſſeſſe him; yet that there were diuers others of that royall race, who might be made Kings according to the law, who haue no waies miſdemeaned themſelues towards the Romanes; and moreouer there are Prieſts, who ſhould not be iuſtly and vprightly dealt withall, if they ſhould be depriued of that honour which appertaineth vnto them. Whileſt they debated the matter after this manner between them, and grew to hot and iniurious taunts the one againſt the other, Antigonus commanded his men to aſſayle thoſe that were neere vnto the wall: who ſhooting many arrowes with great courage againſt them, draue them eaſily from the Tower they kept.

The yeere of the world, 3927. before Christs Nativitie, 37.

At that time Silon gaue manifeſt proofe that he had beene corrupted by money: for he ſubor- G ned diuers of his ſouldiers, who cried out that they had want of victuals, and demanded greater pay for their maintenance, and requeſted that they might be placed in ſome conuenient garriſons to winter in, for that the places round about the Citie were deſolate; becauſe all neceſſaries for maintenance of life had bin taken away and waſted by Antigonus ſouldiers. Thus was the whole army troubled; ſo that each of them prepared themſelues to diſlodge. But Herod importuned and cryed out vpon the Captaines and Souldiers that were vnder Silons charge, telling them that it concerned them not to abandon him, whom Cæſar, Anthony and the Senate of Rome had ſent thither: That for his owne part he would giue order that they ſhould haue abundance & foiſon of whatſoeuer they demanded; and incontinently departing from them (after he had pre- H ſented them with this requeſt) he depriued Silon of all colour and pretext of flight: for he cauſed an incredible quantitie of victuals to bee brought them; and commanded his friends that inhabited the confines of Samaria, to bring them corne, wine, oyle, cattell, and all other ſuch prouiſion from Iericho, to the end that from that time forward the ſouldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof; ſo that he incontinently ſent men thorowout the countrey, who might intercept and ſurprize the purueiours and victualers. Who following Antigonus commandement, aſſembled a great number of ſouldiers neere vnto Iericho, and encamping in the mountaines, eſpied and watched thoſe that brought the victuals. Meane while Herod lay not ſtill, but tooke with him ten companies, fiue of Romane ſouldiers, and fiue of Iewes, with whom he intermixed ſome forraine ſouldiers, with ſome few horſemen, and came to Iericho; where being arriued, hee ſeized the towne, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, of whom fiue hundred with their wiues and children were retired into the tops of the mountaines, whom hee tooke, and afterwards ſet at libertie: but the Romane ſouldiers, entring into their houſes, and finding them full of all ſorts of mooueables, they ſpoiled the ſame. And the King hauing left a garriſon in Iericho, returned to his owne place, diſmiſſing the Romane armie to goe and winter in the countries lately ſurrendred vnto him; namely, in Idumæa, Galilee, & Samaria. Antigonus alſo purchaſed this fauour at Silons hands by ſtore of bribes, that part of his army was lodged in Lydda, all which he did to currie fauour with Anthony.

Silon ſuborneth ſome of his ſouldiers, to take an occaſion to depart from Ieruſalem.

Herod procured and furniſhed the army with victuals and abundant munition.

Antigonus ſendeth out ſouldiers to ſurprize Herods victualers.

The Romans ſent to their garriſons to winter.

Whileſt thus the Romans liued in all abundance & bare no armes; Herod would not be ſtill, but ſent his brother Ioſeph into Idumæa, with one thouſand footmen, and foure hundreth horſe; and himſelfe reſorted to Samaria, where his mother and his other parents kept, who beforetime were departed out of Maſſada. After this hee went into Galilee to ſurprize certaine caſtles which were held by Antigonus garriſons, and beeing arriued at Sephoris (during a great ſnow) after that Antigonus garriſons were departed out of the foreſaid caſtles, hee found a great aboundance of all ſorts of neceſſarie munition. And there hauing notice of certaine theeues, who inhabited in caues, he ſent a troupe of horſemen, with three companies of footmen, againſt them: whom he commanded to doe iuſtice on thoſe robbers (now the place where they kept, was not farre from a borough called Arbela:) and fortie daies after, he himſelfe with all his armie reſorted thither. Now whereas the enemies iſſued out againſt him with a hardy reſolution, the left wing of his ſquadron retired and fainted; but hee comming on with his maine battell, put them to flight, who were already almoſt maſters of the field, & made thoſe of his followers that fled, to turne their faces, and to purſue their enemies as farre as the floud Iordan: who fled ſome of them by one way, ſome by another; ſo that hee drew all Galilee vnder his ſubiection, except thoſe that inhabited and held the caues. He diſtributed money alſo amongſt his ſouldiers, and gaue each ſouldier a hundreth and fiftie drachmes, and far more vnto their chieftaines, and afterwards ſent them to winter in garriſons neere at hand.

Robbers.

Herod fighteth with his enemies in Galilee, and ouercommeth them, and bringeth all Galilee vnder his ſubiection.

About this time Silon and his Captaines, who had paſſed the winter in the ſaid garriſons, came vnto him (for that Antigonus would no more furniſh them with victuals:) for he gaue them maintenance for no more time then a moneth, commanding thoſe that dwelt round about them, to ſpoile the countrey, and afterwards to retire themſelues into the mountaines, to the end that the Romans might be deſtitute of neceſſary maintenance, and by that meanes might bee conſumed with famine. Herod gaue Phæroras his yongeſt brother the charge of that prouiſion, commanding him to incloſe the fort of Alexandrion with a wall; who ſpeedily brought to paſſe that the ſouldiers had all ſorts of neceſſaries at commandement: he reedified alſo the fort of Alexandrion which had beene laide deſolate. About that time Anthony ſoiourned in Athens, and Ventidius was in Syria, who hauing ſent for Silon to accompany him againſt the Parthians, did firſt of all charge him to aſſiſt Herod in that warre: & afterwards to excite the prouinciall confederates to further his warre. But Herod diſmiſſing Silon and his company to follow their deſtinated wars with Ventidius, did in his owne perſon lead out his ſouldiers againſt thoſe theeues that liued in dens. Now theſe caues were ſituate in the moſt higheſt and inacceſſible mountaines, impregnable through narrow paths, enuironed with ſharpe rocks, wherin the robbers inhabited ſecretly, with all their families, King Herod cauſed a certaine number of coffers to be made, faſtned to yron chaines, which he cauſed to be let downe by an engine from the top of the mountaine (becauſe it was neither poſſible by reaſon of the ſteepineſſe of the hill to aſcend the ſame from beneath, neither from aboue to creepe downward againſt them.) Theſe cheſts were filled with ſoldiers, armed with great hookes to draw theſe theeues vnto them, and to breake their necks headlong from the height to the bottome. But the vſe of theſe coffers was dangerous, for it was neceſſary to let them downe an infinite depth into the caues, eſpecially for that the theeues had neceſſarie munition among them: notwithſtanding when they had gotten downe, none of the theeues durſt peepe out of the mouthes of their caues, but feare conſtrained them to hold themſelues quiet. But a certain ſoldier, hauing girt his ſword by his ſide, and taken hold of the chaine with both his hands whereto the coffer was faſtned, ſlid downe as far as the entry of the caue: and being diſpleaſed that no one iſſued out, he ſhot diuers arrowes at thoſe that were within, & wounded them; and after that, with his hooke hee drew thoſe vnto him who reſiſted him, and tumbled them downe headlong from the ſteepy rocke: which done, he ruſhed in vpon thoſe that were within the caue, and ſlew many of them, and afterwards returned and reſted himſelfe in his coffer. Diuers hearing the grones of thoſe that were wounded, were ſurprized with feare & deſpaire of their life: but the nights approach was the cauſe that the matter was not fully atchieued, and many of them (receiuing noitce of the Kings free pardon by a Herauld) ſubmitted themſelues. The next day they renued & continued the ſame manner of fight, and diuers iſſued out of their coffers to fight vpon the outward entrances of the caues, into which they caſt fire, which (for that there was great quantity of wood in the caues) did quickly burne. Within theſe caues there was a certaine old man apprehended, with his wife and ſeuen ſonnes: who being required by them that hee would ſuffer them to goe and ſubmit themſelues to their enemies, tooke vp the entry of the caue, and as his ſonnes aduanced themſelues to iſſue out, he ſlew them, vntill ſuch time as he had maſſacred them all, and after them his wife; and finally, when hee had caſt their dead bodies downe the rockes, he threw himſelfe downe headlong after them, preferring death before ſeruitude. Yet before his death, he reuiled Herod in bitter words, and vpbraided him of his obſcuritie & ignoble race: & although Herod (who ſaw all that which had happened) ſtretched out his hand vnto him & promiſed him pardon; yet would he not reſpect him; and by this meanes were all theſe caues entered, and the theeues therein taken.

Now when the King had eſtabliſhed Ptolomey Captaine ouer the ſouldiers in that region, hee retired himſelfe into Samaria, with ſixe hundreth horſemen, and three thouſand footmen, with a reſolution to fight with Antigonus, and to end their quarrell. But Ptolomey had but very ſlender ſucceſſe in his gouernment: for they that before-time had troubled the country of Galilee, ſallied out vpon him, and ouerthrew him. After which execution they fled into the Mariſhes and vnacceſſible places, where they robbed and ſpoiled all the countrey. But Herod returning and ſetting vpon them, puniſhed them: for he ſlew ſome of them, and the reſt were conſtrained to flie into ſtrong places, where he beſieging them and entring their fortreſſes perforce, ſlew the men, and deſtroyed their fortifications: and hauing brought this rebellion to an end, he condemned the Cities to pay him the ſumme of one hundreth talents. Meane while, Pacorus was ſlaine in warre, and the Parthians were diſcomfited with him; which was the cauſe that Ventidius ſent Macharas to ſuccour Herod with two legions and 1000. horſe, aud that by the commandement of Antonius. But Macharas was drawne by Antigonus, who corrupted him with money: and notwithſtanding Herods contradiction & diſſwaſion; yet reſorted he vnto him, alledging that he did it to looke into his actions. But Antigonus ſuſpecting his ſudden approach, entertained him not, but cauſed him to be darted at and driuen thence; giuing him to vnderſtand by his entertainment, what opinion he had of him, and how he was affected towards him: who at that time perceiued plainly that Herod had giuen him good counſell; and that himſelfe had miſdone in misbeleeuing his aduice: for which cauſe he returned to the City Emaus, and ſlew all thoſe Iewes whom he met withal in the way, whether friends or enemies: ſo highly diſpleaſed was he at that which had hapned. Herod ſore mooued hereat, came to Samaria, reſoluing with himſelfe to poſte vnto Antonius to complaine of theſe aggrieuances; conſidering that he had no need of ſuch aſſociates, who did him more harme then his enemies; whereas of himſelfe he was able to make good his warre against Antigonus. But Macheras hasted after him, requiring him to stay, and to trauell no further on that iourney; or if he might not be deliuered, he prayed him to leaue his brother Ioseph behind him, who might with them make warre against Antigonus. By these perswasions and instant intreaties of Macheras, he was somewhat appeased: so that he left his brother Ioseph behinde him, with an army; charging him no way to hazzard his fortune, or to fall at oddes with Macheras. As for himselfe hee hasted toward Antony, who at that time besieged Samosata (a Citie situate neere vnto Euphrates) hauing with him an armie of his associates, both horsemen and footmen. When Herod was arriued in Antioch, he found diuers men assembled there, who were desirous to goe and seeke out Antony: but they durst not set forward on the way, for feare lest certaine Barbarians should set vpon them, and kill them in their iourney: these did Herod assure, and offered himselfe to be their guide vpon the way. Now when they came to their second baite, some two daies iourney off Samosata, the Barbarians laid an ambush for them, and had barred vp the way with hurdles, and had likewise hidden certaine horsemen thereabouts, who should lie in couert vntill such time as the passengers had recouered the Plaine. Now when the foremost were past, the ambush consisting of about some fiue hundreth horsemen, sodainly charged Herod who was in his rereward; when as therefore they had broken the former ranks whom they had met, Herod with his troupe that was about him, incontinently repulsed them; and after he had encouraged his followers and whetted them on to the fight, hee wrought so much, that he made those that fled to turne their faces, and to fight; so that the Barbarians were put to the sword on all sides. The King also pursued them so long, vntill at last hee recouered that which had beene taken by them, which was a certaine number of sumpter-horses and slaues. But being charged afresh by others, and they in greater number then those who encountred him at first, he likewise (rallying his forces together) charged and ouercame them; and killing diuers of them, he secured the way to those that followed after, who all of them acknowledged him for their preseruer and guide.

Herod was honourably entertained by Antonius and his host.

When hee drew neere vnto Samosata, Anthony sent out his armie in goodly array to meete and honour him, and withall to succour him, in that he had heard that the Barbarians had assailed him. As soone as he came to Anthonies presence, he entertained him kindly; and after hee had heard that which had befallen him in the way, he embraced him in admiration of his vertue, and did him great honor, as to him whom a little before he had raised to a royall dignitie. Not long after this, Antiochus surrendered the fort of Samosata to Anthony, and vpon this occasion the warre was ended. Whereupon Anthony committed the prouince with the armie to Sosius: and after he had commanded him to succour Herod, hee departed into Ægypt. Sosius therefore sent tow legions of souldiers before into Iudæa to succour Herod, and afterwards hee followed with the rest of his army.

Ioseph Herods brother is slaine by Antigonus.

In the meane while Ioseph died in Iewry on this occasion that ensueth: For forgetting his brother Herods commandement, which hee gaue him at such time as he repaired to Anthony, hee tooke to him fiue companies of souldiers which Macheras had left him; and marching towards Iericho to gather in the fruites of the field, he pitched his tents vpon the mountains: And for that the Romane troups were but newly leuied, & consisted of those men who were vntrained in the warres, and for the most part were gathered out of the countrey of Cœlosyria: the enemies hauing aduertisement hereof, assayled and surprized him in certaine places of disaduantage, where there was a hot skirmish betweene them, in which Ioseph died, fighting valiantly; and all his army was discomfited: for sixe companies of them were slaine. After that the dead bodies were at Antigonus command, he cut off Iosephs head, which Pheroras his brother ransomed for the price of fiftie talents. Which done, the Galileans reuolting from their Gouernours, drowned Herods partakers in the lake; so that diuers commotions and troubles were raised in Iewry. Macheras he fortifieth the Castle of Geth. This misfortune of Iosephs was reported to the King, in a certen suburb of Antioch called Daphne, who before the tidings, had already conceiued some suspicion and feare, grounded vpon certaine dreames, which gaue him certaine intelligence of his brothers death. Departing therefore from thence with all expedition, he arriued neere to the mount Libanus, where he tooke about 800. men with him, and the Romane legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolemais; from whence he departed with his army by night, and crossed Galilee with them. Whereupon the enemies came forth against him, and were ouercome by him, and shut vp in a fort, from whence they were departed but the day before; where Herod assayled them by breake of day: But being vnable to offer them any preiudice, by reason of the indisposition of the weather, he led his men into the villages neer adioyning. But when Antonius ſecond legion was come, and annexed to his forces; they that were within the fort were diſmayed, and forſooke the ſame by night. So that Herod marched with all diligence to Iericho, with an intent to reuenge his brothers death; and being encamped neere vnto the ſame, hee banqueted and entertained the Chiefetaines of his army; and after the feaſt was ended, and he had diſmiſſed his company, he withdrew himſelfe into his lodging. In which place it appeared, how much God loued the King: for the roofe of the houſe where hee had ſolemnized his feaſt, fell downe without hurt to any one whomſoeuer: for no man was left within it. Whence it came to paſſe, that each one perſwaded himſelfe that Herod was beloued by God; conſidering he had auoyded ſo great and vnexpected a perill.

The houſe wherein Herod ſolemnized his feaſt, fell downe when the gueſts were gone, without any mans detriment.

The next day, ſixe thouſand of his enemies came downe from the toppe of the mountaines to fight with him, who affrighted the Romanes, and their forlorne hope chaſed Herods ſouldiers with darts, and ſtones, who was himſelfe alſo hurt in the thigh with an arrow. Antigonus ſent a Captaine to Samaria, whoſe name was Pappus, with ſome ſouldiers, intending therby to ſignifie vnto his enemies, that he had more men of warre then hee needed. Pappus drew neere to Machæras the Romane Captaine: and as touching Herod, he tooke fiue Cities by force, and put ſome two thouſand of them that were in garriſon to the ſword; and afterwards (hauing ſet the houſes on fire) hee went out to encounter Pappus; who was encamped in a borough called Iſanas. Diuers that came from Iericho and Iury, ſubmitted themſelues to Herod, who drawing neere the enemy (who marched forward with great hardineſſe) fought with him and ouercame him, and being inflamed with a great deſire he had to reuenge his brothers death, he purſued them that fled, and ſlew them euen within their borough. Theſe houſes were incontinently filled with men of war, and diuers fled and hid themſelues vpon the tops thereof, who were at laſt taken; for the roofes of the houſes were beaten downe, and he ſaw that all was filled with ſouldiers, whereby diuers were ſlaine by ſtones that were darted at them from aboue, and afterwards caſt and killed them by heapes: which was the moſt grieuous ſpectacle of all thoſe that had hapned in thoſe wars, to ſee an infinite number of bodies hidden one vnder another amidſt the roomes of the houſes.

Fight in the houſes.

This exploite of Herod did very much abate the courage of his enemy, who hereafter expected farre more worſe fortunes at his hands: For a man might haue ſeene them flie away in heapes: and had not a ſudden and forcible tempeſt falne vpon them, the triumphant army of Herod had incontinently entred Ieruſalem with aſſurance of victory, which had made a finall end of all that warre. For, Antigonus each day bethought him how to flie away, and to forſake the Citie. But for that it was already growne darke, Herod commanded his ſouldiers to refreſh themſelues; and for that he himſelfe was weary, he entred into his lodging to bathe himſelfe: in which place he ouerwent a mighty misfortune, from which he eſcaped by Gods prouidence. For (whereas he was naked and accompanied with one only ſeruant to attend him) at ſuch time as he bathed, there were a certaine number of armed enemies hidden in that lodging, who were fled thither for the feare they had: and during the time that Herod bathed, the firſt amongſt them iſſued with his naked ſword and got the doore; and after him the ſecond; and the third no leſſe armed, without offending the King, for the feare that they had of his preſence: and content to eſcape in their owne perſons, without the preiudice of other men. The next day he ſent Pappus head to his brother Pheroras, who was ſlaine by his owne ſword in reuenge of the iniury offered to Ioſeph. When the tempeſt was done, hee departed from thence, and approched neere to Ieruſalem, and encamped neere vnto the Citie. This was about the third yeere ſince he was created King at Rome: and encamping himſelfe in the place which was (as he thought) fitteſt for battery; hee addreſſed himſelfe towards the Temple ſide, reſoluing to batter and make breach in that place in like manner as Pompey had done before him. Hauing therefore erected three bulwarkes in three places, he builded towers thereon by the aſſiſtance of many workemen; and by meanes of a great quantity of wood, which he cauſed to be cut downe round about the place; and hauing pointed ſuch men as were of ripe iudgement to ouerſee theſe works, he left his army well prouided, and reſorted to Samaria, to marry with the daughter of Alexander, who was Ariſtobulus ſonne to whom he was betrothed, according as I haue heretofore declared.

ANTIGONVS is discomfited by SOSIVS and HEROD.

The yeere of the world, 3929. before Christs Nativitie. 35.

Hedio & Rhefinus, chap. 26. al. 27.

Sosius and Herod lead a mighty army against Ierusalem.

AFTER this marriage was solemnized, Sosius repaired thither thorow the countrey of Phœnicia, and hauing first of all sent his army thorow the continent, he himselfe also resorted thither with many as well footmen as horsemen: thither also repaired the King from Samaria, with no small army, to annexe himselfe with the old bands: for he had about thirty thousand men. All these assembled themselues together neere vnto the wals of Ierusalem, and planted their siege nigh vnto the wall of the citie that extendeth towards the northward. The army contained eleuen legions of footmen, with sixe thousand horsemen: besides the succours that came from Syria. Of this army there were two Generals, namely Sosius, who was sent by Antonius to succour Herod: and Herod himselfe, who made war for himselfe, with an intent that hauing dispossessed Antigonus (whom he had proclaimed enemy to Rome) he himselfe might be King in his place, according to the Senates decree. Those Iewes that were within the enclosure of the walles (that is to say, almost all the nation) resisted the Herodians with great courage and affection, vaunting and boasting much of the Temple of the Lord, and wishing all good hap & successe to the people, namely, that God would deliuer them from all dangers: and spoiling all prouision without the Citie, that was either behouefull for the vse of man or beast, by their secret thefts and excursions also they made the very besiegers destitute of reliefe and victuals. Which inconuenience Herod so well preuented, that he forestalled their meanes of theft, and laid ambushes in place conuenient to cut them off. As for victuals, he sent his footmen to fetch his prouision from farre; so that within a very little space they had aboundance of all that which was necessary in the campe. He erected also with no lesse carefulnesse three bulwarkes, by the diligent labour of a great number of workemen: for it was summer time, and neither was the aire incommodious, or negligence of the workemen such, but that they presently furnished and finished them. Afterwards hauing raised their engines vpon them, they battered the wall, with as much violence and diligence as was possible: notwithstanding all this, they did no waies amate those that were within; who for their parts vsed all the cunning that might be possible to defend themselues, and by diuers sallies set fire vpon the enemies engines; and burnt not onely those that were halfe made, but those that were wholly perfected: and when necessitie draue them to handy strokes, they shewed no lesse valour then the Romanes courage; but they were inferiour vnto them in skill and martiall discipline. And when as the first wall was beaten down, they builded vp a new, & countermined against those mines that were made by the enemy; so that they fought vnder ground hand to hand. Thus vsing despaire rather then courage, they sustained the war to the vttermost; yea notwithstanding they were besieged by a great army, and pressed by famine and want of victuals: for the yeere wherein the siege was continued, was the seuenth, in which the earth was vnmanured, which by vs is called the yeere of rest. But finally twenty chosen souldiers first of all mounted vpon the wall; and after them one of Sosius Centurions: for the first wall was taken in the fortieth day after the siege, and the second on the fiftieth, and some galleries were burned, which were neere vnto the Temple: which (as Herod said) were burned by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among the Iewes. When the outward part of the Temple, and the lower part of the City were taken, the Iewes fled into the Temple, and into the higher towne, for feare they had, lest the Romanes should hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary sacrifices vnto God: and they sent Embassadours to their enemies, to require that it might be lawfull for them onely to bring in certaine beasts to offer them for sacrifices. Which Herod their King granted them, hoping by this meanes that they would submit themselues and yeeld vp the places. But perceiuing that his opinion failed him herein, and that they obstinately resisted him, to continue the soueraignty in Antigonus; he gaue the assault, and tooke the Citie by force: where all things were incontinently filled with murthers, in that the Romans were displeased, because they had so long time continued the siege; and the Iewes that were on Herods side, enforced themselues vtterly to exterminate all those that were of the contrary party: so that continuall slaughters ranged and raigned euery where, both in porches, and in the houses whereinto they entred: Neither did the religious reuerence of the Temple saue those suppliants that resorted thither for safetie, but that without all compassion both old and young were slaughtered: Neither did their murthering hand spare or refraine from women; nay not so much as from young infants. And although the King besought and requested them to forbeare them, yet no man gaue ouer, but all sorts of per-persons were murthered by them, without respect either of sexe or age. Antigonus inconsiderate of that estate wherein he had beene, or the fortune and disaster that at that present attended him, came downe from the tower and humbled himselfe on his knees before Sosius feet; who hauing no compassion of the change of that estate wherein he saw him, outragiously scorned him, calling him Madame Antigona: yet left he him not without guard after the manner of a Woman, but fast bound for his further assurance. But Herod was busied in deuising how hee might moderate his associates and strangers, after he had had the vpper hand ouer his enemies: For the strangers swarmed into the Citie by heapes, and not onely into the Temple, but also into the Sanctuary. Hee therefore exhorted some, and threatned other some, and restrained the rest by force of armes; and he was more troubled at that present in being a Conquerour, then if he had beene conquered: for that those things that were not lawfull to bee seene, were beheld by prophane men. He preuented likewise the spoile of the Citie, as much as in him lay: Beseeching Sosius most instantly, to preserue it to the vtmost, asking him if the Romanes would leaue him King of a desart, after they had voided the Citie of men and goods? Alleadging furthermore, that he esteemed the gouernment of the whole world of no value, in regard of the life of one of his Citizens. Sosius answered, that it was reason that the pillage should be giuen to the Souldier, who had borne the hazzard of the siege: whereunto Herod answered, that he would satisfie euery man out of his owne treasury: and by this meanes, hee ransomed the rest of the Citie by fulfilling those promises: For he gaue many mightie gifts vnto euery one of the souldiers, and by proportion vnto the Captaines: but aboue all, hee royally rewarded Sosius; so that euery one of them departed very rich in siluer.

The spoile of the Citie hindred.

These calamities hapned in the Citie of Ierusalem, in the yeere wherein Marcus Agrippa and Canidius Gallus were Consuls, which was in the hundreth, fourescore and fift Olympiade, in the third moneth, on the dayes wherein the solemne fast was celebrated; as if this affliction had iumpt together in one issue and instant with that of Pompeys: for on the same day had the same Citie beene taken twentie and seuen yeeres before. Sosius offered a crowne of gold vnto God, and afterwards departed from Ierusalem, leading Antigonus prisoner with him vnto Anthony. But Herod fearing lest if Antigonus should be kept by Anthony, and sent to Rome, hee should debate his title with him before the Senate by protest that he was descended of the royall Line; whereas Herod was but a Plebeian and common person: and that although he had offended the Romanes, and thereby might not deserue to be King; yet at least his children, who were of the Princely Line, were not to be denied their title: Herod, I say, fearing these things, wrought so much by force of his money with Anthony, that he caused him to put Antigonus to death, so that at that time Herod was truly deliuered from all feare. Thus ended the estate of the Asmoneans, after 120. and sixe yeeres. This Family was famous both for their nobilitie, and also by reason of their Sacerdotall dignitie, and for the noble actions and exploits, which their ancestors had atchieued for our nation; but they lost their authoritie through their mutuall factions: which soueraignte was deriued to Herod Antipaters sonne, who was ignoble by birth, and of meane friends; who were subiects and vassals to Kings. See here what we haue receiued from our ancestors, as touching the end of the race of the Asmoneans.

IN the former booke I haue declared how Soſius and Herod tooke the Citie of Ieruſalem by force, and with it Antigonus priſoner: now will we alſo declare that which hath ſubſequently followed: for after that Herod had obtained the abſolute gouernment ouer the whole land of Iudæa, he aduanced all thoſe among the common people, who fauoured his proceedings: as for thoſe who were oppoſed againſt him, there paſſed not a day wherein ſome one or other of them ſuffered not puniſhment. But amongſt the reſt, Pollio the Phariſee, and Sameas his Diſciple, were highly honoured by him: For during the time of the ſiege of Ieruſalem, they counſelled the inhabitants to receiue and entertaine Herod: for which cauſe he reſpected them accordingly. This Pollio in times paſt (when Herod was found guiltie of death) foretold Hircanus and the reſt of the Iudges in way of exprobration, that being abſolued by them, he ſhould one day inflict puniſhment on them all. Which prediction God in proceſſe of time approoued by the euent: no ſooner therefore became he maſter of Ieruſalem, but he gathered together all the rich houſhold ſtuffe that was in the Palace; and furthermore hauing ſpoiled the rich men of their goods, and by this meanes leuied a great ſum of gold and ſiluer, he ſent great preſents to Anthony and his friends. Moreouer, he condemned fiue and fortie of Antigonus principall and nobleſt fauourites to death, ſetting ſtraight watch about their doores, that none of them might be carried out vnder colour of being dead. The dead bodies likewiſe were troden vnder foot: and all the gold, ſiluer, or iewels that was to be found amongſt them, was carried to the King, and conuerted to his vſe, ſo that there was no end of theſe miſeries. For the couetouſneſſe of the Conquerour (whoſe greedy and thirſty deſire could hardly be quenched) laid hold on on whatſoeuer was theirs. And for that it was the ſeuenth yeere, it neceſſarily came to paſſe that the land was left vnmanured: for we are forbidden to ſow in this yeere. Anthony hauing taken Antigonus priſoner, reſolued to keepe him in priſon vntill the time of his triumph: But after he had receiued tidings that the nation of the Iewes were ready to innouate and rebell, & continued their good affection toward Antigonus, in regard of the hatred they conceiued againſt Herod; he concluded with himſelfe to take his head from him at Antioch: For the Iewes could ſcarcely containe themſelues. Strabo of Cappadocia teſtifieth no leſſe in theſe words: Anthony hauing brought Antigonus the Iew to Antioch, cauſed his head to be cut off; and was the firſt among the Romanes that hath cauſed a King to bee beheaded in this manner: ſuppoſing that the Iewes might neuer otherwiſe be induced to change their opinions, and receiue Herod: yet this opinion of his was not anſwerable to equity. For notwithſtanding whatſoeuer impulſion hee might deuiſe, yet could they not be induced to call him King: in ſo high eſtimate and account held they their former King. But Anthony ſuppoſed that that infamy would obſcure his renowne, and leſſen the generall hate that they bare to Herod. See here what Strabo writeth.

As ſoone as the high Prieſt Hircanus (who was priſoner among the Parthians) heard that Herod had taken poſſeſſion of the Kingdome, hee returned backe vnto him, being deliuered after this manner following: Barzaphares, & Pacorus Princes of the Parthians had taken Hircanus, who was firſt high Prieſt, and afterwards king, and with him Phaſælus Herods brother, and ledde them away priſoners with them into their owne countrey: Phaſælus not able to endure the diſ-honour of impriſonment, and preferring an honourable death before a reprochfull and ignominious life, murthered himſelfe, as I haue heretofore declared.

CHAP. II.

How HIRCANVS diſmiſſed by the Parthians, returned vnto HEROD.

PHRAATES King of Parthia, vnderſtanding how nobly Hircanus was deſcended, who was brought priſoner vnto him, entertained him graciouſly: and for this cauſe drew him out of priſon, permitting him to conuerſe in Babylon, in which place there were a great number of Iewes, who honoured Hircanus very much; and no leſſe then their high Prieſt and King. The like alſo did all they of that nation inhabiting as farre as Euphrates, which did not a little content Hircanus. But after that hee was aduertiſed that Herod was poſſeſſed of the kingdome; hee transferred his hopes another way, beeing of his owne nature tenderly affected toward his friends, expecting that one day Herod would requite him, for that he had deliuered him from death whereunto hee was condemned, and in danger likewiſe of the penalty and puniſhment. He began therefore to conſult with the Iewes as touching his iourney, who in way of duty and loue came to viſit him, and who beſought him, and importuned him to abide with them, offering him all ſeruice and honour; aſſuring him that he ſhould in no leſſe manner be reſpected among them, then their high Prieſt and King; yea in farre higher regard then he might any waies be in his owne countrey, by reaſon of the maime he had in his body through Antigonus tyranny: alleadging that Kings doe not ordinarily call to their remembrance thoſe pleaſures that they haue receiued in their infant fortunes, becauſe that with their eſtates they change both their manners and inclinations. But notwithſtanding all theſe or ſuch like allegations, yet could not Hircanus be withdrawne from the deſire he had to repaire homeward. Herod alſo wrote vnto him, that he ſhould require Phraates and the Iewes that inhabited his kingdome, in no ſort to enuie his felicity, in that he ſhould partake with him both in dignitie and royalty, alleadging that the time was now come, wherein he might acknowledge the benefits he had receiued, by being heretofore nouriſhed & preſerued by him. With theſe letters he ſent Samaralla likewiſe on an Embaſſage to Phraates furniſhed with great and rich preſents, endeuouring by that meanes to winne him, that he in no ſort ſhould hinder his gratulation and good intent towards one that had ſo highly deſerued at his hands: yet were not his proteſtations anſwerable to his pretence. For inſomuch as he gouerned not with that vprightnes which became a iuſt king; he feared leaſt ſome alteration might befall him, according to his demerits: for which cauſe he ſought to get Hircanus vnder his power, or at leaſtwiſe to diſpatch him out of his life, which he afterwards performed. When as therefore Herod had perſwaded the Parthian to diſmiſſe Hircanus, and the Iewes to furniſh him with money ſufficient to beare his expence in his iourney, he receiued him with all honour. In common aſſemblies he gaue him alwaies the higheſt place, and in the time of

of festiuals, he made him alwaies sit downe before him;and the more closely to deceiue him,he called him brother, endeuouring himselfe by all means wholly to extinguish in him all colour and cause of suspicion of treachery: neither intermitted he any other stratagems, whereby in his opinion he might any waies further or promote his cause;and yet by these meanes occasioned he no small sedition in his owne family. For carefully prouiding lest any one among the nobility should be established high Priest,he sent to Babylon for a certaine man of base condition,called Ananel, and gaue him the Priesthood. For which cause Alexandra grew sodainely displeased, not being able to endure that outrage.This woman was Hircanus daughter,and Alexanders wife, who was King Aristobulus son, who had two children by her husband, the one wondrous beautifull,who was called Aristobulus: the other was Mariamme, who was likewise faire,and married to Herod.She was sore mooued and highly displeased to see her sonne so much indignified, for that during his life another was called to the honour of high Priesthood:for which cause she wrote vnto Cleopatra by the meanes ofa certaine Musicion,beseeching her to beg the high priesthood at Antonius hands for her sonne. But for that Antonius made little reckoning of those suits, a certaine friend of his called Gellius, who was come into Iury about certaine of his affaires,and who had seen Aristobulus,fell in loue with him by reason of his beauty: & being abashed likewise at his great and goodly stature, and allured by Mariammes admirable beauty, he openly protested, that he accounted Alexandra a happy mother in her children: and deuising to this effect with her, hee perswaded her to send the pictures of her two children to Antonius, for that if he should but behold them, he would refuse him in nothing, wherein he should request his friendship. Alexandra perswaded by these words, sent their pictures vnto Antonius.Gellius also made the matter more wonderfull, telling him that the children seemed rather to be ingendered of no mortall straine, but by some diuine power,labouring as much as in him lay,that Antonius might be allured to affection them. Who supposing it to be a matter ill beseeming him to send for Mariamme,who was married to Herod,and desirous likewise to auoid Cleopatras suspicions, wrote vnto Herod,that vnder some honest pretext he should send Alexandras sonne vnto him(with this addition, if it might not seeme troublesome vnto him.) Which matter when Herod vnderstood, he thought it no waies incident to his security to send Aristobulus, (who was a faire yong man, and little more at that time then sixteene yeeres old, and so nobly borne: considering that Antonius was at that present in such authority,that no one in Rome was in greater credit then he; and who besides that,was very much addicted to his pleasures, which he openly hunted after without feare of punishment in regard of his greatnesse and power. He therefore wrote him this answer,that if the yong man should but onely depart out of the countrey, all the land would incontinently be filled with warre and troubles,for that the Iewes pretended alteration in gouernment, and sought to innouate by preferring a new King. When as therefore he had in this sort excused himselfe vnto Antonius; he resolued to entertaine both the yonger Aristobulus and his mother Alexandra,with more respect. Moreouer his wife Mariamme did continually importune him to giue the Priesthood to her brother, alleadging that by that honour he might preuent the occasion of his trauell.For which cause assembling his friends together in counsell,he grieuously accused Alexandra before them, protesting that shee secretly conspired against the Kingdome, and that by the mediation of Cleopatra, she laboured to dispossesse him of the soueraignty, to the intent that her sonnes by Antonius meanes might gouerne in his stead. Which practice of hers was so much the more vniust, because she depriued her owne daughter of that honour wherein she was inseated, and raised vp troubles likewise in that kingdome which hee had conquered with great trauell, and extreme danger: Yet notwithstanding that he willingly forgat that which was past,and forgaue those wrongs she had vrged against him, & was ready notwithstanding to shew all kindnesse and courtesie both to her and hers. Furthermore, he gaue the high Priesthood to young Aristobulus, alleadging that heretofore he had established Ananel in that place for no other respect, then for that Aristobulus was vnder yeeres.

HEREVPON Herod tooke away the Prieſthood inſtantly from Ananel, who was not that countryman borne (as we haue heretofore declared) but was borne amongſt thoſe Iewes that inhabit and were planted beyond Euphrates by the Aſſyrians. For diuers thouſand Iewes inhabit the countrey of Babylon, and from thence tooke he his originall alſo, being otherwiſe of the race of the Prieſts, and intirely affected toward Herod for a long time before, with whom hee had familiar acquaintance. Hee had preferred him to his honour at ſuch C time, as he was made King; and degraded him likewiſe to appeaſe the troubles of his family; demeaning himſelfe herein contrary to the law of the countrey: for whereas any one hath once bin inſtalled in that degree, he is neuer to be diſplaced. The firſt that tranſgreſſed this ordinance, was Antiochus Epiphanes, who diſpoſſeſſed Ioſuah, and preferred his brother Onias to his place. The ſecond was Ariſtobulus, who tooke it away from his brother Hircanus, and vſurped himſelfe. Herod was the third, who gaue the Prieſthood to Ariſtobulus, eſtabliſhing him in Ananels place before he was dead: and by this meanes ſuppoſing that he had found out a remedy to appeaſe the diſcords of his family, he notwithſtanding all this, liued not without ſuſpicion what euent would follow after this reconciliation: for he feared Alexandra, leſt demeaning her ſelfe in ſuch ſort as before-time ſhe had done, ſhe ſhould ſeeke occaſion hereafter to raiſe new troubles. D He commanded her therefore to containe her ſelfe within the royall palace, and to do nothing of her owne authoritie. Beſides that he had appointed certaine intelligencers, who ſhould diligently obſerue that nothing ſhould be done without his knowledge, no not concerning her particular expences and table. All which things exaſperated her hate, and increaſed the ſame againſt Herod; for being full of feminine pride, ſhe diſdained to ſee her ſelfe thus wrongfully ſuſpected, deſiring rather to ſuffer any thing, then to be depriued of the libertie of free ſpeech; and vnder colour to be honoured, to liue continually in ſeruitude and feare. Whereupon ſhee ſent certaine of her truſtie friends to Cleopatra to complaine, and lament vnto her the importable miſeries of her preſent eſtate, requiring her, according to her power, to giue ready and ſpeedy reliefe. Whereupon Cleopatra ſent her word, that both ſhee and her ſonne ſhould reſort vnto her into Ægypt, E with as great ſecrecy as might be poſſible. Vpon which aduice and the allowance thereof, ſhee practiſed this policie. Shee cauſed two coffins to be made, ſuch as men were wont to bury the dead in, in which ſhee hid both her ſelfe and her ſonne, commanding thoſe ſeruants of hers that were priuy to her deliberation to carry them out in the night time, and to bend their courſe directly towards the Sea, where there was a barke in readineſſe prepared to ſhape their courſe and conuey them into Ægypt. But Eſop one of her houſhold ſeruants declared vnto this enterprize of hers to Sabbion one of Alexandras friends, ſuppoſing that he had beene made priuy thereunto: who had no ſooner inkling thereof, but (for that before-times he was Herods enemy, by reaſon he was ſuſpected to haue beene one of thoſe that ſought to poyſon Antipater) he determined by diſcouery of this ſecret flight, to conuert Herods hate into aſſured friendſhip: and preſently diſcouered Alexandras ſecret enterprize to the King. Who diſſembling the matter vntill it was vp- F on the point of execution, ſurprized her at ſuch time as ſhe thought to flie, and yet notwithſtanding he pardoned her that fault (in that he durſt not decree any puniſhment againſt her, though he could haue found in his heart to haue vſed ſeueritie) for that Cleopatra would not haue contained her ſelfe, had ſhe but had ſuch an occaſion offered her to expreſſe her hatred againſt Herod. For which cauſe, vnder the colour of a high and magnanimous ſpirit, he made ſhew to pardon her of his meere clemency: yet inwardly reſolued he to make young Ariſtobulus away: yet not raſhly vpon the inſtant, leſt the act ſhould grow apparant and palpable.

Herod contriueth Ariſtobulus death.

The yeere of the world, 3931. before Christs Natiuitie, 33.

Now the feaſt of Tabernacles was at hand, which was one of thoſe that was ceremoniouſly and ſolemnely celebrated among vs; for which cauſe he concealed his intents during the feſtiuall daies, intending both in himſelfe, and in the preſence and company of the people, to follow all kinde of pleaſure and delight; yet did his enuy incite him to haſten the execution of his will. Ariſtobulus was at that time ſome ſeuenteene yeeres old, who at ſuch time as he approached the Altar to offer ſacrifices, according to the law, apparelled in the high Prieſts ornaments to performe the ceremonies, he (who for amiable countenance and goodly ſtature, ſurpaſſed the youngneſſe and tenderneſſe of his yeeres) expreſſing in his countenance the dignitie and nobilitie of his race, drew the eies and good affection of all the people vnto him; ſo that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Ariſtobulus his grandfather. All the people therefore being ſurmounted by thoſe their affections, and at that preſent time being all of them troubled with the ioy they conceiued, they brake out by little and little into happy acclamations, mixed with wiſhes and prayers: ſo that the good will the people bare to Ariſtobulus, diſcouered it ſelfe openly, and they manifeſtly (although too haſtily in ſuch a kingdom) declared what euils they generally endured: For all which cauſes Herod concluded to execute that which he had heretofore complotted, and conceited againſt Ariſtobulus. As ſoone therefore as the feaſt was ouer-paſſed, he ſoiourned in Iericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he vſed Ariſtobulus with all kindneſſe, to the end to draw him vnto ſome place, where he feared nothing, playing alſo with him, and counterfeiting to ſport, after the faſhion of the young men, to gratifie him. Now, for that the place where they diſported themſelues, was by nature too hot, they quickly wearied, left their ſport, and went out together to take freſh ayre, and recouering a pleaſant ſhade vnder certaine arbors, and neere certaine fiſh-pooles, which were largely ſpred round about, they beheld certaine of their ſeruants and friends that ſwomme therein, with whom not long after Ariſtobulus began to ſwim, being perſwaded thereunto by Herod. Whereupon Herods confederates (who were deputed to execute the murther) laid hands on him and thruſt him vnder the water, pretending to ducke him in ſport, and neuer gaue him ouer, vntill ſuch time as they had ſtifled him in the water. This hapned about the euening, and after this manner dyed Ariſtobulus, after he had liued in all for the ſpace of eighteene yeeres, and adminiſtred the Prieſthood one whole yeere: and after this, Ananel preſently recouered his former dignitie.

Ariſtobulus is drowned by Herods direction, Ananell reſtored to the Prieſthood.

Now when this accident was reported to the women, all of them were ſuddenly deuoured in teares, and tranſported with ſtrange lamentations, which they ſpent ouer the dead body. All the citie alſo was maruellouſly amated, neither was there any priuate family that thought not it ſelfe touched by this inconuenient, but imagined the loſſe in particular to concerne himſelfe, and no other. But aboue all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deed, ſhe was more paſſionate and perplexed then any other, being ſo much the more diſcomfited, for that ſhe knew how all things had hapned. But the feare of a farre greater miſchiefe conſtrained her to repreſſe her paſſion, in ſuch ſort, that diuers times ſhe was ready to bereaue her of her owne life, and diſpatch her ſelfe out of miſery with her owne hands. But ſhe contained her ſelfe, to the end, that ſuruiuing (and liuing after her ſonne, who was ſo traiterouſly and fraudulently ſlaine, and prolonging her owne life without giuing any ſuſpicion or ſhadow, that ſhe ſuppoſed her ſonne to be thus curſedly murthered) ſhe might with more opportunitie expect the occaſion to reuenge her ſelfe: For which cauſe, ſhee diſſembled all things, gouerned her griefe, and made ſhew that ſhe knew nothing of that which was either intended, or had hapned. As for Herod, he laboured by all meanes to perſwade the ſtrangers, that this death had befalne Ariſtobulus without his knowledge; and did not only prepare that which was requiſite for the funerall, but vext himſelfe likewiſe, and made ſhew of a man truly deuoured in this ſorrow: and it may be, that in remembrance of Ariſtobulus beauty and flouriſhing young yeeres, he was truly touched with compaſſion, notwithſtanding that he imagined that this death of his, ſhould be a meanes of his intire ſecurity, demeaning himſelfe in all things very circumſpectly, with intent to purge himſelfe of that crime. But eſpecially he ſhewed his great magnificence in the interring of his body, both in the furniſhing and preparation of the herſe, as in the perfumes and other things thereunto belonging, in ſuch ſort, as the griefe which the Ladies had conceiued, was pacified after this manner of conſolation.

CHAP. IIII.

The yeere of the world, 3931. before Christs Natiuitie, 33.

CLEOPATRA thirsting after the Kingdome of Arabia and Iewry, laboureth to beg a part of them at ANTHONIES hands.

BVT none of all these things could either mooue or mollifie Alexandra, but that daily more and more shee increased her sorrow, and in the heart of her teares kindled her wrath and heate with a desire of reuenge. Shee therefore certified Cleopatra by her priuate letters of Herods treasons, and her sonnes most miserable and vntimely death, Cleopatra long before that time desirous to assist her, and hauing compassion of her miserie, vndertooke the matter, and ceased not to incite Anthony to reuenge Aristobulus death, telling him that it was an vnpardonable errour, that Herod being created King in such a state, whereunto he had no right, should bee suffered to practise such conspiracies against the true and lawfull Kings. Anthony perswaded by these her words (as soone as he came vnto Laodicea) sent for Herod, to the end that making his appearance, he might answer that which might be obiected against him, as touching Aristobulus death: for hee disliked the act, notwithstanding that Herod himselfe had attempted it. But although Herod was affraid of this accusation, and did not a little suspect Cleopatras displeasure (for that shee ceased not continually to prouoke Anthony against him) yet obeyed he this commandement, & transported himselfe thither (the rather for that he durst not otherwise doe) notwithstanding he left his vncle Ioseph behind him, committing the gouernment both of the Kingdome and his priuate estate vnto him, giuing him secret instructions to kill Mariamme, if so bee that Anthony should happen to doe him any mischiefe. For he loued her so extremely by reason of her beautie, that he supposed himselfe iniured, if after his decease she should be beloued by any other; and he openly declared that all that misery which befell him, proceeded from Anthonies passion, and intire affection, and admiration of her beautie, whereof he had beforetime heard some report. As soone therefore as hee had in this sort disposed his affaires, notwithstanding he had little hope of good hap, yet repaired he to Anthony.

Herod ready to repaire vnto Anthony, commandeth Ioseph, to whose charge he committed the kingdome to kil his wife.

But Ioseph gouerning that kingdome that was committed to his hands, conuersed diuers times vpon this occasion with Mariamme, and communicated oftentimes with her, not onely for publique profit sake, but also to doe her that honour which so great a Princesse deserued. At such time therefore as hee secretly deuised with her, as touching the friendship and ardent affection which Herod bare vnto her, his speeches were iested at after the manner of Ladies, but especially flouted at by Alexandra. For which cause Ioseph, being ouer-forward to expresse the Kings good will towards her, proceeded so farre, that he discouered the commandement that was giuen him; thereby to make manifest, that it was not possible for Herod to liue without her, and that if any inconuenient should happen vnto him, he would not in death also bee diuioyned from her. This discourse of Iosephs was not interpreted by the Ladies, as a demonstration of his good will, but rather as a manifestation of Herods malignitie; who dying, desired also that they should perish, and interpreted that which he had spoken, as the testimonie of his tyrannous & malicious heart. At that time there was a rumour spred in the citie of Ierusalem by Herods maligners, that Anthony had in such sort tormented him, that he was dead. Whereupon all those of the Kings house were troubled, & in especiall the Ladies; so that Alexandra incited Ioseph to forsake the palace, and take the Ladies, and to retire himselfe vnder the ensignes of the Romane legion, who at that time were about the citie for the security of the kingdome, vnder the conduct of the Tribune Iulius, to the end first of all, that if any trouble should happen in the Kings house, they might be by this meanes in safetie, hauing the Romanes to friend; and afterwards, for that they hoped that if Anthony should see Mariamme, shee might obtaine all things at his hands whatsoeuer shee desired, assuring him that he would restore the Kingdome vnto her, and depriue her of nothing that concerned, or was answerable to her royall estate.

A fooliſh rumour of Herods death.

But whilest they were distracted with these deliberations, there came letters from Herod, contrarie to some few mens report, and all mens expectation. For as soone as hee came vnto Anthony, he compassed his fauour by his many presents, which he had brought with him to that intent from Ierusalem, and sodainly debating the matter with him, he appeased him in such sort, as hee was no more displeased against him: and from that time forward, Cleopatras speeches were but coldly conceited of in regard of his so ample satisfaction. For Anthony said, that there was no reason that a King should be answerable for that which he had done in his kingdome; for that in so doing, he should no more be King: but that when the honour is once giuen him, he hath the authoritie likewise left him, to vse his regall power. Vrging further, that it concerned Cleopatra likewise her selfe, not to search too curiously into the affaires and gouernment of kingdomes. Herod certified all this by his letters, and signified further what other honours hee had receiued at Anthonies hands in assemblies and feasts, to which he inuited him alwaies; notwithstanding that Cleopatra seemed to be displeased therewith, detracting him; and being desirous to get the kingdome of Iewry into her hands, stroue by all meanes possible to put him to death: but that he had found Anthony alwaies an vpright man, & feared not henceforward that any euill should befall him: and returning presently vpon this, he brought with him a more ample testimony of Anthonies most assured affection, both in respect of his owne Kingdome, as of his particular affaires. And as touching Cleopatra, she pretended not to seeke any further then that which she had, because that Anthony had giuen her Cœlosyria in stead of that which shee had demanded, forbearing thence-forward to mention Iewry any more, because that Anthony wholly reiected those suites.

After these letters came vnto their hands, the trouble and disturbance wherein they were, & their desire to retire vnto the Romans, as if Herod had beene dead, was wholly extinguished. Yet was not this their resolution hidden from the King; but that Herod, after he had brought Anthony on his way (who at that time set forward in his warres against the Parthians) he returned into Iewry. Vpon his arriuall, his sister Salome, and his mother certified him exactly of Alexandras intent, and the determination of her friends. Salome likewise spake against Ioseph her husband, and slandered him, obiecting against him that hee had Mariammes company. All which she spake through the malice she had long time conceiued against him, for that in a certaine debate Mariamme had in her rage despitefully hit them in the teeth with their obscure birth. Herod (who was alwaies inflamed with the earnest affection which he bare vnto his wife Mariamme) was sodainly troubled hereat: and although iealousie pressed him forward, yet loue restrained him and kept him from doing any thing rashly, through passion or affection: for which cause hee called Mariamme aside, & demanded of her in secret, what familiar company she had kept with Ioseph? Shee by solemne oathes and by all possible allegations in her owne defence appeased the King by little and little, and pacified his choler. For in such sort was he transported with the loue that he bare vnto his wife, that he beleeued she had sufficiently purged her selfe of those slanders, that had beene inforced against her; yeelding her most heartie thankes for her honest affection towards him, and declaring vnto her openly the great esteeme and loue that he bare vnto her. Finally (as it often falleth out amongst louers) they fell to teares, and embraced each other with great affection: for that she gaue him no credit, hee endeuoured the more to draw her to beliefe. Whereupon Mariamme said vnto him: It is not the act of a louer to haue giuen commandement, that if any thing should befall thee otherwaies then well with Anthony, I should presently be done to death with thee; notwithstanding I haue no waies offended thee. No sooner were these words out of her mouth, but the King entred into a strange passion, and giuing ouer his embraces, hee cried out with a loud voice and tore his haire, saying, that hee had a most euident proofe that Ioseph had committed adultery with her: for that he would not haue discouered those things which had beene spoken to him in secret, except they had greatly trusted the one the other: & in this emotion or rage of iealousie hardly contained he himselfe from killing his wife. But the force of loue ouercame him so much, that hee bridled his rage, notwithstanding it were irkesome and grieuous vnto him. Yet gaue hee order that Ioseph should bee slaine, without either audience or iustification of his innocency: and as touching Alexandra, who was the cause of all these troubles, he kept her prisoner.

Medio & Rufinus, chap. 4.

About the same time there grew certaine troubles and alterations in Syria: for that Cleopatra continually sollicited and importuned Anthony, and whetted on his displeasure against all, perswading him to remoone all from their gouernements, and to bestow the same on her selfe. And for that Anthony loued her extremely, she was in great estimation and credit with him: and being in her owne nature inclined to couetousnesse, shee abstained from no kinde of corrupt dealing and wickednesse. For knowing that the kingdome should descend vnto her brother, shee caused him to be poisoned, when as hee was but fifteene yeres olde: as for her sister Arsinoe, she caused her to be slaine by Anthonies meanes at such time, as shee made her praiers in the Temple of Diana in Ephesus. Moreouer, in what place soeuer shee vnderstood that there was any hope to get money, whether it were in robbing of Temples, or in breaking open sepulchres; she would be possessed thereof: neither was there any religious place so sacred, from whence she tooke not away the ornaments. Furthermore, there was not any thing so prophane and interdicted, which

A she laid not hands on to satisfie her vnbridled auarice. Neither was the whole world sufficient enough to content this magnificent Lady, who was made slaue to her owne desires; and her disordinate appetite was such, that all the riches in the world were not able to satiate and fill the same. For this cause she incessantly importuned Antonius to take from others, to be liberall towards her: and therefore entring into Syria with him, shee presently bethought her selfe how shee might get it into her possession. For she caused Lysanias Ptolomies sonne to be put to death, obiecting against him that he had priuate intelligence with the Parthians. Shee begged Iury also at Antonius hands, and required him besides that, to dispossesse the Kings of Arabia. He was in such sort possessed by this woman, that he seemed not only to be bewitched with her words, B but also inchanted by her poysons, to obey her in whatsoeuer she thought meet: yet was hee ashamed to commit so manifest an iniquitie, for feare lest being so farre ouer-ruled by her, hee should happen to offend in matters of more consequence. Lest therfore either by denying her, he should draw her to discontent; or by condiscending to her demands, he should seeme to bee the wickedest man aliue, he deducted a seuerall portion of both their dominions, and presented her with the same. He gaue her likewise those Cities that are situate betweene the flood Eleutherius and Ægypt, except Tyre and Sidon, which he knew to be free Cities of long continuance: although by earnest sollicitation shee thought to be seized of these also.

C After that Cleopatra had obtained all these things, and had accompanied Antonius as farre as Euphrates, who at that time went to make warre in Armenia: she returned back againe, and by the way visited Apamea and Damasco, and at last tooke her progresse into Iury: Where King Herod met with her, and assured that portion which had beene giuen vnto her in Arabia, with all the reuenewes of Iericho vnto her. This countrey bringeth forth that balme, which of all other oyntments is the most precious, & onely groweth in that place, and no other, to the bignesse of great Dates. Being arriued in that place, and growne inwardly familiar with Herod, she sought to allure and draw him to her lust, being of her selfe naturally addicted to such pleasures and intemperance; and haply also being somewhat touched with loue, or rather (as it D seemeth most likely) shee in this sort laid the foundation to intrap him, vnder colour to reuenge her selfe of some outrage by that meanes. But in effect she generally manifested, that she was ouercome by her desire and sensuall lust. But Herod was not ouer-kindly bent towards Cleopatra; knowing of long time how badly she was inclined towards all men; and at that time he conceiued the greater hatred against her, because by that intemperance of hers she pretended to destroy him: and although that from the beginning he had reiected her sollicitations; yet determined he to reuenge himselfe on her, if so bee by these her subtill vnderminings she should prosecute and continue her subtill policies to betray him. He asked counsell also of his friends, whether hauing her in his possession, hee should put her to death. For in so doing, all those should be deliuered from diuers euils, whom either in time past shee had molested, or hereafter should bring in trouE ble. Moreouer, that it should be profitable for Antonius also, whom without all doubt she would forsake, if any occasion or necessitie should enforce him to make triall of her friendship. But whilest he debated and discoursed vpon this resolution, his friends restrained and disswaded him; assuring him that it was a great indignity for him, who was a Prince of high thoughts and haughtie resolutions, to cast himselfe into manifest perill, beseeching him to attempt nothing rashly: For that Antonius would not endure the same, notwithstanding it might be approoued that it stood with his profit: nay, rather that by this meanes he should increase his desire, for that by force and subtiltie he might seeme to haue lost her. Further, that no one colour of excuse should be left him, in that shee was the woman of greatest note and nobilitie of that time; and that whatsoeuer profit might redound vnto him by her death, should be annexed with Antonius iniury. F Whereby it most euidently appeared, how great and remedilesse damages would befall both to the kingdome and the Kings family also; whereas nothing letted him by repulsing her vnlawfull demand, to dispose all things for the present state with great discretion. By these and such like reasons and probable coniectures, they deterred and disswaded him from aduenturing vpon his apparant danger, and attempting so hainous an act: so that contrariwise they induced him to offer Cleopatra many rich presents, and to conduct her onward on her way towards Ægypt.

As soone therefore as Antonius was seized of Armenia, hee sent Artabazes, Tigranes sonne, with all his children, who were great Princes, prisoners into Ægypt, & presented them to Cleopa- tra, with all those precious Iewels likewise, which were taken by him, or found in the kingdome. But Artaxias his elder sonne (who at that time had saued himselfe by flight) raigned in Armenia: whom Archelaus and Nero the Emperour draue out of his kingdome, and placed his yonger brother Tigranes in his roome, as it shall be declared hereafter. As for the tributes of the countries which Herod was bound to pay vnto Cleopatra, for the lands bestowed on her by Antonius, hee without deceit iustly paid them, supposing it to be very incident to his security, to continue himselfe in her good fauor. As for the Arabians, they seeing that Herod had the leuying of such a tribute, paied him for some little time two hundreth talents a yeere; but afterwards they grew slow and negligent in their payments, and scarcely satisfied the halfe, and that also very negligently.

CHAP. VI.

HEROD maketh warre with ARETAS at the same time that ANTONIVS is ouerthrowne by AVGVSTVS CÆSAR in the Actian warre.

ARETAS demeaning himselfe thus vngratefully, and refusing to doe that which in right he ought to performe; Herod made a shew to take armes against him, but deferred his reuenge in regard of the contentions amongst the Romanes. For at that time nought else was expected then the Actian warre (which fell in the hundreth, eighty and seuenth Olympiade) in which Augustus Cæsar determined to try his title with Antonius for the Monarchie. In the meane while Herod, who had already for many yeeres beene Master of a peaceable and fruitfull countrey, from whence he drew rich reuenewes and many forces, gathered diuers companies of men, with the greatest expedition that he might, to succour Antonius. But he by Letters signified vnto him, that he had no need of his assistance: notwithstanding he commanded him to make a road vpon the Arabian, whose perfidious dealing Antonius had not onely vnderstood by Herod himselfe, but also by Cleopatras aduertisements. For shee very cunningly conceiued, that it would redound vnto her profit, if one of these two should ouerthrow the other. Herod according to these instructions from Antonius, returned backe into his countrey, and retained his armie alwaies ready about him, and incontinently with the same inuaded Arabia, and with his forces both horsemen and footmen came directly to Diospolis, where the Arabians (hauing notice of his intended warre against them) came out to meete him. In this place fought they a most cruell battell, wherein at the last the Iewes had the vpper hand. After this, a great army of Arabians assembled themselues at Cana, a certaine place in Cœlosyria. Whereof when Herod was fore-aduertised, he marched foorth against them, accompanied with the greater part of his forces. As soone as hee drew neere to Cana, he determined to incampe in that place, and after he had well fortified and entrenched his forces, to set on the enemy vpon the first opportunitie: but whilest he imployed himselfe in the execution hereof, all the armie of the Iewes cryed out, requiring him without delay, to lead them forward against the Arabians. And thus highly were they incouraged, both in respect of the confidence they had in the good administration and ordering of their army, as in regard of their forwardnesse, who had bin actors in the former warre, and partakers of the victory; so that they scarce gaue their enemy leisure to settle themselues to their weapons. When as therefore Herod perceiued that the heat and forwardnes of the souldier could hardly be appeased; he thought good to make vse of the readines of his army, and arming himself he marched foremost, being seconded by his souldiers in battell ray, with a soldier-like march. This sudden approach of his wonderfully abashed the Arabians: For although for a while they made head against them; yet perceiuing their enemies full of heart, and themselues vnable to resist them, diuers of them retreated and betooke themselues to flight; so that all of them had beene vtterly defeated, had not Athenio endamaged Herod and the Iewes. For he hauing the command of that army which Cleopatra had in that place; and besides that, bearing a priuy grudge towards Herod, disposed his army in a readines, and expecting the euent of the battell, resolued with himselfe to containe his forces if the Arabians ouercame the Iewes; and if so be they had the worst (as indeed it came to passe) to set vpon the Iewes, who should be spent by that time; and surprizing them at vnawares euen in the height of their hope of good hap, to massacre and slaughter them with his fresh supplies. When as therefore the Iewes had spent all their strength against their professed enemies, and expected nothing lesse then the assurance of the victory, he charged and ouercame them who had retreated into certaine rough and difficult places (wherunto their enemies were better accustomed then themselues (where being grieuously wounded and ill intreated by the Arabians, who returned backe and set vpon them,

From that time forward, Herod began to make certain incurſions and roades into Arabia, preying the country, and doing them much miſchiefe: He incamped himſelfe likewiſe vpon the mountaines, forbearing to draw his whole forces into the field; notwithſtanding by his

Of the Earthquake that hapned in Iewry.

AT ſuch time as Cæſar and Anthony made triall of their titles in the Actian warre, and in the ſeuenth yeere of the raigne of King Herod, there hapned ſuch an earthquake in the C countrey of Iudæa, that neuer the like was ſeene in any other place: ſo that diuers beaſts were ſlaine thereby, and many men were ouerwhelmed with the ruines of their houſes, and periſhed to the number of ten thouſand. Onely the men of warre receiued no damage, becauſe they encamped in the open field. The Arabians hearing tidings hereof (which were farre greater by report, then they were in effect, by ſuch, who in fauour of the Arabians, and hate of the Iewes, reported the ſame) waxed proud: yea ſo much was their courage increaſed hereof, as if all the Cities of Iewry had beene already ouerthrowne, and the men thereof extinguiſhed; and as if they had no aduerſaries remaining aliue to contradict them. For which cauſe laying hold of thoſe Embaſſadours of the Iewes, who came vnto them to intreat of peace in their deſperate eſtates, they ſlew them, and afterwards in the heate of their ſpleene, ſet vpon their enemies campe.
D But the Iewes not daring to expect or preuent their aſſault, for their preſent miſeries had deiected their minds, ſeemed to neglect their Common-weale, and in maner to deſpaire of their ſafety. Theſe thus affected did the King incourage, and called vnto him their Captains, and (as much as in him lay) awaking and reuiuing their drouping ſpirits; and when he had reſtored thoſe of better hope, to more ſucceſſefull good hap, at length he attempted to ſpeake vnto all the armie, who in the former ouerthrowes, would yeeld no reſpect or allowance to perſwaſion. Theſe did heboth to comfort and exhort in ſuch manner, as followeth;

HERODS Oration to his army.

E FRIENDS and fellow ſouldiers, there is not one of you but knoweth at this time, there are ſo many preſent and impendent misfortunes attending our eſtates, as are able to wearie and amaze thoſe men, that are of the greateſt reſolution. But ſith we muſt needly fight, and that all thoſe things that haue befallen vs vnto this preſent, are of that kinde, that by your owne vertue & magnanimitie they may be recouered; I haue reſolued to informe, and confirme you in thoſe meanes, whereby you may retaine and continue your accuſtomed valour and noble courage. Firſt of all therefore I will approoue vnto you (as touching our warre) that it conſiſteth on iuſt grounds, for that we are inforced thereunto through the outrage of our enemies: the knowledge whereof ſhould chiefely make you recouer your courage. Secondly, I will apparently approue vnto you, that our eſtates are not ſo deſperate, but that we haue great and aſſured hopes to
F obtaine the victorie. Firſt of all therefore, I will diſcourſe of that which formerly I propoſed, and will make your ſelues Iudges of thoſe things which I will diſcourſe vpon. For your ſelues are priuy to the Arabians vniuſtice, and how perfidious they are to their friends, and impious and barbarous towards all men; but in eſpeciall, they haue alwaies troubled vs, prouoking vs through their extreme auarice and malignant enuie, with perpetuall iniuries. And yet to let ſlip all other our benefits to that nation, who is hee that deliuered them from their imminent perill and thraldome, that was hazzarded by Cleopatras meanes, but our ſelues? For the friendſhip I had with Anthony, and his beneuolence towards me, was the cauſe that their burthen of miſerie

Beſides, after ſhe had wrought him by her ſollicitation to cut off certaine portions of the two kingdomes to be giuen vnto her, the matter was ſo handled by me, that by diuers preſents particularly beſtowed vpon him by my hands, I haue obtained ſecurity for vs both, and by disburſing two hundreth talents of mine owne, and giuing my word for two hundreth more for others, for » the reuenewes of that very land which in times paſt was ours, and theſe now poſſeſſe and enioy.
» Notwithſtanding, reaſon it were in my opinion, that we that are Iewes ſhould not be tributaries,
» or giue any portion of our country to any man; and if we muſt needly doe it, it ill becommeth vs
» to pay it for theſe, who enioy their liues by our meanes. It ſhould not be reaſonable for the Ara-
» bians, who after they had confeſſed with many plauſible proteſtations and thankeſgiuings, that H » they enioy their liberty by our benefit, to haue depriued and thruſt vs from our owne, and to » haue vniuſtly dealt with vs; yea euen with vs, I ſay, who were not their enemies, but rather on » men by a iuſt warre? ſith both God commandeth no leſſe, and enioyneth vs alwaies to hate our-» rage, and reuenge iniuſtice, eſpecially in that war, which is not onely iuſt, but neceſſary? For that » which both in the confeſſion of the Græcians, and opinion of the Barbarians is moſt hateful and I » hainous, this haue they perpetrated in murthering our Embaſſadours. For the Greekes ſay, that » Embaſſadours are ſacred and inuiolable, and we our ſelues haue receiued our moſt wholeſome Legates inuiolable. and holieſt precepts of the Law of God by Angels, that is, from his Heraulds and meſſengers:

» for this name can both bring God to mans knowledge, and reconcile enemy to enemy.
» What impietie therefore is more vnpardonable, then to put thoſe Embaſſadours to death,
» who bring tidings of right and iuſtice? or what proſperity can they expect either in their wars, » or felicity in their whole liues, after ſo hainous a crime? Truely I cannot imagine any: But per» haps ſome man will ſay, that right and equitie is on our ſide; but that the greater number of men
» and meanes are with them: but this their ſpeech is vnworthy of my followers. For with thoſe, With whomſoeuer iuſtice is, there is God alſo. with whom iuſtice is, with thoſe alſo is God; and where God is, there neither wanteth multi- K tude nor fortitude. But let vs wade further, and weigh our own forces by themſelues. In the firſt battell we had the victory: in the ſecond, vpon the firſt charge we put them to flight, and found » them vnable to make their partie good againſt vs. Afterwards, when the victory was ours, be» hold, Athenio, not by lawfull warre, but by ſubtill treacherie aſſaulted vs. But ſhall this be called » their fortitude, or rather their fraud and ſecond iniquity? why therefore ſhould we haue leſſe » courage, who ought to haue the greater confidence? or why ſhould we feare them, who are al» waies inferiours, if they fight openly, and without fraud; and when they ſeeme to ouercome, » they doe it by vniuſtice?
» Moreouer, if any man ſuppoſe them to be valiant, this ſhould the rather incite them more
» and more vnto vertue; for it is no honour for a generous and noble mind to ouercome his inferi- L » our, but to haue meanes and might to conquer his ſuperiour. And if any one be terrified by our » domeſtick and homebred miſeries, and by our late earthquake, firſt of all let him think with him-» ſelfe, that he erreth in that wch deceiueth the Arabians, by ſuppoſing the ſame to be more grie-» uous and terrible then indeed it was. And afterwards let him think, that it becommeth them not » to draw matter of feare from thence, whence the other tooke occaſion of courage. For as tou» ching themſelues, they conceiue not any hope thorow any good that is in themſelues, but onely
» in the truſt they haue that we are already deiected by our calamities. But when they ſhall ſee vs
» march forth againſt them, their courage will be weakned, and our confidence by this means ſhall

» we ouermuch afflicted; neither (as ſome thinke) hath this miſerie befallen vs thorow Gods diſ- M

» not ſatisfie his diſpleaſure. But that this preſent war is approued by him for iuſt, he himſelfe hath » euidently declared. For whereas diuers thorow the whole region, haue beene oppreſſed by the » earthquake, none of you that beare armes haue incurred any miſchiefe; but all of you haue beene

fore

A fore you ſhal haue bethought your ſelues of theſe things, and moreouer in regard that God hath at all times an eſpeciall care ouer you: faile not to purſue this iniurious nation with a iuſt war, that neither reſpecteth the lawes of friendſhip, nor keepeth the league of couenant; valiant in murthering ſacred Embaſſadors; and abiect and villanous, where things are to be attempted by valour. The yeere of the world, 3935. before Chriſts Nativitie, 29.

Theſe perſwaſions of his did not a little encourage the Iewes to the battell, and made them more forward then before. As for Herod, after he had offred ſacrifice, according to the cuſtome, he drew his army foorth, and led them with great confidence againſt the Arabians; and paſſing Iordan, he encamped neer vnto the enemy, with an intent to ſurprize a fort ſituate between them both: making this account that it would further him much, either if vpon the preſent he ſhould
B be drawne forth to fight, or if it concerned him to march onward, for that this place ſhould ſerue him to encampe in with more ſecurity. The ſame reſolution alſo had the Arabians, for which cauſe they fell to skirmiſh in that place, wherein the firſt on both ſides that gaue the charge, and afterwards ſome other followers were ſlaine: ſo that thoſe of the Arabians ſide being ouercome, betooke them to retreat. This ſucceſſe of theirs bred no little hope in the Iewes, who ſeeing the enemies army addreſſed to attempt any thing rather then to fight, waxed the more hardy to aſſaile the Arabian in his trenches, and beate him from his campe. They being forced by theſe aſſaults, drew forward to their defence in great diſorder, bringing neither courage nor hope of victory with them: yet notwithſtanding they defended themſelues, both in regard of their great number, as alſo in reſpect of that neceſſity wherunto they were inforced by the Iewes. The skir-
C miſh on both ſides was hot, and diuers on either party were put to the ſword: but in the end, the Arabians being put to the worſt, turned their backs. The ſlaughter was ſo great, that they not onely periſhed by their enemies ſwords, but they themſelues alſo murthered one another in the preaſe, and diſorderly flight, in which they were trodden vnder foot, and lay ſlaughtered in a manner by their owne weapons. So that in that diſcomfiture there died ſome fiue thouſand: the reſt haſtily fled on the other ſide of the rampire: but being ouerpreſſed with want of victuals, and in eſpeciall with lacke of water, they had not any ground or aſſurance to eſcape. After them poſted the Iewes, and being vnable to recouer the fortreſſe with them, they begirt the campe with a ſiege, and ſhut vp all the paſſages that no ſuccour could come vnto them, and tooke from them all opportunity to eſcape, although they ſhould affect flight.

The Arabians are ouercome by Herod.

D When as therefore they ſaw themſelues reduced into ſuch extremity, they ſent Embaſſadors vnto Herod, firſt of al to demand a truce: and afterwards for that they were oppreſſed with thirſt, to craue ſome remedy for their preſent neceſſities. But he neither reſpected the Embaſſadours, neither the proffered ranſome for the captiues, nor any other whatſoeuer reaſonable demand, deſiring earneſtly to reuenge himſelfe of thoſe iniurious treacheries they had practiſed againſt his Embaſſadors. Being therefore inforced by thirſt (which amongſt other plagues moſt grieuouſly afflicted them) many of them forſooke their trenches, and offred themſelues to bonds, and to be led away captiues; ſo that within fiue daies ſpace foure thouſand of them yeelded themſelues priſoners. On the ſixt day, all the reſt determined to ſally out, and aſſaile the enemy; rather making choice of aſſured death, then thus lingeringly and ignominiouſly to pine away. When as there-
E fore they had all concluded hereupon, they incontinently brake out of their trenches, but like vnapt ſouldiers for a skirmiſh, decaied not onely in body, but in mind; reputing their death for aduantage, to eſcape thereby their extreme misfortunes. For which cauſe vpon the firſt onſet, about ſome ſeuen thouſand of them were ſlaine: and thus the fierceneſſe of this nation being alaied by this ouerthrow, they ſubmitted themſelues to Herod, whom to their owne ſorrow they had approoued to be a valiant ſouldier.

The Arabians enforced by thirſt, require truce at Herods hands.

HEROD conſtrained to repaire vnto AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, putteth F HIRCANVS to death.

HEROD puffed vp with his ſucceſſefull good fortune, returned back into his own countrey, hauing obtained great eſtimation and reputation by his valour and vertue. But at ſuch time as he ſuppoſed his ſtate to be moſt aſſured, he grew in danger both to loſe his dignity and life, by reaſon of that victory that Cæſar obtained againſt Antony in the Actian war. For at that time he not onely ſuppoſed himſelfe to be vtterly ouerthrowne, but both his friends and enemies that were round about him loſt their hopes, for that it was vnlikely that he ſhould eſcape escape vnpunished, who had been so inwardly vnited in friendshippe with Anthony. Whereby it came to passe, that his friends in no sort concealed their despaire, and his enemies vnder their colourable and dissembled griefes, couered their ioy, promising themselues thereafter a better and more pleasing administration of the common-weale. Hereupon Herod perceiuing, that except Hircanus, there was not any one of the bloud roiall aliue, determined to cut him off, resoluing with himselfe, that if he hapned to escape the danger, that a man who at that time was more worthier the Kingdome then himselfe, should not entermeddle amongst his affaires: and if any misfortune should behold him in regard of Cæsar, he desired to dispossesse Hircanus of the Kingdome, in regard of the enuy which he bare him, for that he was the onely man who deserued to be aduanced to that dignitie. Whilst thus he was tormented and trauelled in his thoughts, he had an occasion offered him by Hircanus owne followers to execute his intention. For Hircanus being of a mild & gentle nature, during all his life-time forbare to entermeddle with state affaires, committing all things to fortune, and contenting himselfe with whatsoeuer condition it pleased her to allot him.

Herod determineth to make away Hircanus.

But Alexandra being an ambitious woman, & vnable to conceale with modestie the hope she conceiued of change, sollicited her father that he should not any longer endure the subiection of Herod, who was the very scourge of their familie, but rather that he should stand vpon his owne guard, and reserue himselfe to his better hoped fortunes. She furthermore gaue him counsaile to write vnto Malchus, who had the gouernment of Arabia, requesting him to grant him both protection and entertainment; for that if Herod should chance to bee cut off by Cæsars displeasure, doubtlesse the Kingdome would returne vnto him, both in regard of his nobilitie, as also of the peoples fauour. These perswasions of hers Hircanus at the first repulsed, but afterwards being ouercome by the importunitie of the woman, who ceased not day & night to sing the same song of future hope, and of Herods treasons, he gaue certaine letters to a friend of his, written to the Arabian, wherin he required him to send him certaine horsemen, who might conduct him to the Asphaltite lake, which lieth distant from the confines of Ierusalem some three hundred furlongs. And therefore especially committed he these letters to Dositheus trust, both for that he fauoured Hircanus and his daughter, and seemed likely for diuers causes to hate Herod: for he was Iosephs Kinsman, who was slaine by Herod; and not long before, certaine of his brothers were slaine amongst others at Tyre by Anthonies command: yet for none of these occasions continued hee faithful to Hircanus. For he setting more by the present fauour of the King that then raigned, then the rest, discouered the letter vnto the King: who first of all giuing him thanks, required one office of friendshippe more at his hands; which was, that folding vp the letter, & sealing it, hee should conueigh and deliuer the same to Malchus, & returne his answere, for that it meerely concerned him, if he knew his resolution also. Which when Dositheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this answer, that he was ready to entertaine both himselfe and his whole family, & all those Iewes likewise which were of his faction, promising to send him a band of souldiers, who should be able to conduct him safely thither, & should be obedient to his command in all things. Now as soone as Herod was seized of these letters, he called for Hircanus, and demanded of him whether he had any confederacie with Malchus: who denied the same. But Herod protesting and bringing forth his letter in an open assembly, commanded him afterwards to bee put to death. Thus are these matters registred in Herods commentaries: for by some are they deliuered otherwise, namely, that he was executed, not for this crime which hee had committed, but for some treasons against the King. For they write to this effect, that Herod at a certaine banquet (dissembling his suspicion) demanded of Hircanus, whether he had receiued any letters from Malchus: and that he answered, that he had receiued letters, but such as contained nothing else but officious salutations. Further, that another asked him, whether he had receiued any present therewithall: and when he had answered, that hee had receiued nothing but foure coursers for his saddle, the King wrested this to a capitall offence of corruption and treason: and commanded him presently to be led to death. Now that he died guiltles, they alledge this for a most approued argument; namely, his gentle disposition, who euen in his youthfull yeeres neuer gaue signe or appearance of rashnesse, or pride, or signification of audaciousnesse, no not euen then when hee had the roiall gouernment in his hands, but in that freedome of authoritie, disposed the most things by Antipaters aduice. But at that time he was more then fourescore yeeres old, and knew that Herods estate was secured: & passing Euphrates also, & liuing on the other side of the riuer, he left such as held him in great honour, and returned home into his owne countrey, to the end hee might, liue vnder Herods gouerument. Whereby it is lesse likely, that he would attempt any alteration

A so farre different from his nature; so that all these things seeme to be fained by Herod.

Thus ended Hircanus life, after his variable and aduerse fortune, wherewith during all his life time he was afflicted. For at such time as his mother Alexandra liued, he was created high Priest of the Iewes, and obtained that honour for the space of nine yeeres: and after his mothers death, he had scarcely gouerned the kingdome for the space of three moneths, but that he was expulsed by his brother Aristobulus; and afterwards restored by Pompeyes assistance, and receiuing all his former honours, he liued in full possession of them for the space of forty yeeres. After this he was once more distasted by Antigonus; and being maimed in his body, liued certaine yeeres in captiuity among the Parthians: from whence not long after he returned home; and though hee B had many things promised him by Herod, yet after so many alterations of fortune, he obtained nothing at his hands, and that which amongst all the rest is most of all to be lamented, as we haue said, he was vniustly put to death, an innocent, and in his old age. For he was a louer of iustice, and an obseruer of perpetuall modestie, and gouerned his kingdome for the most part by other mens direction, being onely guilty in himselfe of ignorance and the loue of idlenesse. Truely, Antipater and Herod by this mans goodnesse obtained their so great riches: for which deserts of his, against all law and right, he was cruelly put to death.

The yeere of the world, 3935. before Christs Natiuitie, 29.

But Herod after Hircanus death, addressed himselfe to performe his iourney towards Cæsar: and hauing little hope of any good fortune, in regard of his friendship with Antonius, he grew desperately iealous of Alexandra, for feare lest she taking opportunity of the time, should incite the C people to rebell, and fill the kingdome with domesticall sedition: for which cause, committing the gouernment of the estate to his brother Pheroras, he left his mother Cypros, his sister, and all his kindred in the Castle of Masada, and commanded his brother, that if any misfortune should befall him, he should retaine the kingdome in his owne hands and maintaine it. As for his wife Mariamme, for that by reason of certaine dislikes betwixt her, his mother, and sister, they might not liue together, he left her with her mother Alexandra in the Castle of Alexandrion, and committed them to the custody of his Treasurer Ioseph, and Sohemus the Iturian, and with her the keeping of his Castles, both which had alwaies beene his faithfull friends, and to whom in way of honour, he committed the custody of these princely Ladies. But he gaue them also this commandement, that if they should be certified that any sinister mishap had befallen him, they should D presently kill them both, and to the vtmost of their power, continue the kingdome in his children, and his brother Pheroras.

Herods disposition of his affaires before he repaired to Cæsar.

CHAP. X.

AFTER he had in this sort giuen order for all his affaires, he withdrew himselfe vnto Rhodes, intending there to meet with Cæsar. And as soone as hee arriued in that City, E hee tooke the Diadem from his head, and laid it apart, but as for his other princely ornaments, hee changed them in no sort; and being admitted to Cæsars presence, hee at that time gaue a more ample testimony of the greatnesse of his magnanimity and courage: for neither addressed he his speech to intreat his fauour (according to the custome of suppliants) neither presented he any request, as if he had in any sort offended him, but gaue account of all that which he had done, without concealing or mistrusting any thing. For he freely confessed before Cæsar, that he had intirely loued Antonius, and that to the vtmost of his power he had done him seruice, to the end that he might obtaine the soueraignty and monarchy; not by annexing his forces vnto his, in that he was otherwise imployed in the Arabian warre; but in furnishing him both with wheat and money, and that this was the least office which it behooued him to performe towards Antonius; for that being once his professed friend, it behooued him not only to imploy his best endeauours on his so princely benefactor, but also to hazzard both his head and happines to deliuer him from perils. All which (said he) I haue not performed according as I ought to haue done; yet notwithstanding I know, that at such time as he was ouercome in the Actian battell, I did not alter my affection with his fortune: neither did I restraine my selfe: for although I befriended not Antonius with my presence and assistance in his Actian war, yet at least wise I assisted him with my counsell, certifying him that he had but one onely means left him for his security, and preuention of his vtter ruine, which was, to put Cleopatra to death, for that by cutting her off, he might enioy her eſtate, and might more eaſily obtaine his peace, and pacifie thy diſpleaſure againſt him. And for that he gaue but ſlender regard to theſe mine admonitions by his owne ſottiſhneſſe and indiſcretion, he hath hurt himſelfe and profited you, becauſe, as I ſaid, he did not follow my counſell. Now therefore (O Cæſar) in regard of the hate which you beare vnto Anthony, you condemne my friendſhip alſo. I will not deny that which I haue done; neither am I affraid freely and publikely to proteſt how much I haue loued him: but if without regard of perſons, you conſider how kindly I am affected towards my benefactors, and how reſolute and conſtant a friend I am, and how mindfull of kindneſſe, the effect of that which I haue done, may make me knowne vnto thee. For if the name be onely changed, the friendſhip notwithſtanding may remaine, and deſerue a due praiſe.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. Cæſar confirmeth Herods authority.

By theſe words (which were manifeſt teſtimonies of his reſolute and noble courage) he ſo inwardly indeared himſelfe vnto Cæſar, who was a magnificent and worthy Monarch, that he conuerted this his accuſation into an occaſion to win and work him to be his friend: for which cauſe Cæſar, in ſetting the Diademe vpon his head, exhorted him that he ſhould no leſſe reſpect his friendſhip, then he had in former time Anthonies: and withall, did him much honour; certifying him moreouer, that Capidius had written vnto him, how much Herod had aſſiſted him in his wars that he had with the Monarches of Syria. Herod ſeeing that he was thus entertained, and that contrary to his expectation, the kingdome was more ſurely confirmed vnto him, then beforetime, both by Cæſars bounty, and alſo by the decree of the Senate, which he had practiſed to obtaine for his greater aſſurance, accompanied Cæſar as far as Egypt, preſenting both himſelfe and his friends with many rich gifts, beyond the proportion of his eſtate: endeauouring by theſe meanes both to win their fauours, and to ſhew alſo the greatneſſe of his courage; requiring moreouer at Cæſars hands, that Alexander, who was one of Anthonies deareſt friends, might not bee ſought out to be puniſhed: yet notwithſtanding he could not obtaine the ſame, by reaſon of an oath that Cæſar had paſt before he ſollicited him. That done, he returned backe again into Iewry, with more greater honour and aſſurance, then before; wherby he ſtrooke them with wonderfull amazement, who expected his contrary ſucceſſe, as if by Gods eſpeciall prouidence he alwaies ouerwent his dangers, to his great honour. Incontinently therefore, he prepared himſelfe to entertaine Cæſar, who returned out of Syria to take his iourney into Egypt, and receiued him at Ptolemais, with all royall honour, and gaue his army preſents with all abundance of munition: ſo that he was accounted for one of Cæſars moſt affectionate friends, and rode about with him, at ſuch time as he tooke the view of his army: he entertained him alſo and his friends with one hundreth and fifty men, adorned with moſt rich and ſumptuous apparell. And for that they were to paſſe thorow a countrey, wherein there was great ſcarcity of water, he furniſhed them both with water and wine; ſo that they needed neither of them. He gaue Cæſar alſo eight hundreth talents, and ſo royally ſatisfied he all men, that they confeſſed themſelues to haue had farre greater entertainment, then the reuenues and profits of his kingdome could affoord them. By which meanes he gaue the more ample teſtimony of his forward friendſhip, and free affection to deſerue well: and making vſe of the opportunity of the time, he obtained the reputation of a Prince of an heroicke and noble ſpirit; ſo that he was held inferiour vnto no man, for the good entertainment that he gaue to the chiefeſt Romans in their returne out of Egypt.

Herod conducteth Cæſar toward Egypt, and preſenteth him with many ſumptuous gifts.

Herod entertaineth both Cæſar and his army very heroically.

CHAP. IX.

HEROD being incenſed by falſe accuſations, putteth his wife MARIAMME to death.

Mariamme & Alexandra diſpleaſed with Herod.

BVT as ſoone as he returned into his kingdome, hee found all his houſhold troubled, and both his wife Mariamme and her mother Alexandra grieuouſly diſpleaſed with him. For they ſuppoſed (and not without cauſe) that they were not ſhutte vp in that Caſtle for their ſecurities ſake, but as it were in a priſon; ſo that, in as much as they neither might make vſe of other mens, nor enioy their own goods, they were highly diſcontented. Mariamme alſo ſuppoſed that her husband did but diſſemble his loue, rather for his owne profit and commodity, then for any intire affection he bare towards her. But nothing more grieued her, then that ſhe had not any hope to liue after him, if ſo be he ſhould happen to die, eſpecially for the order he had left concerning her: neither could ſhe euer forget what commandement before that time he had left with Ioſeph; ſo that by all meanes poſſible, ſhe laboured to winne the affections of thoſe that had the the charge of her, & especially Sohemus, knowing very well that her safety depended wholly on his hands. Who in the beginning behaued himselfe very wisely and faithfully, containing himselfe very circumspectly within the bounds of his commission; but after these Ladies had with pretty presents and feminine flatteries mollified and wrought him by little and little, at last hee blabbed out all that which the King had commanded him; especially, for that he hoped not that he should returne with the same power and authority, which before he had: and for that cause he thought thus in himself, that without incurring any danger in regard of Herod, he might greatly gratifie the Ladies; who in all likelihood should not be depriued of that dignity wherin they were at that time; but would returne them the like kindnesse when Mariamme should bee Queene, or next vnto the King. Furthermore, he hoped that if Herod also should returne with all things answerable to his desires, that he would performe nothing without his wiues consent; or vpbraid him with the act, if she contradicted: for he knew too well that the King loued her in such sort, as it was impossible to equal or expresse his affections; and for these causes he disclosed the trust that was committed vnto him. But Mariamme was very sore displeased to heare that there was no end of her miseries, but they were altogether vnited and tied to the dangers of Herod; and shee oftentimes wished that hee might neuer more returne againe in safety, supposing that her life with him should be very intolerable: all which she afterwards dissembled not, but openly confessed that which afflicted her with discontent. For when as Herod beyond all expectation arriued in his countrey, being adorned with mighty fortune, he first of all, as it became him, certified his wife of his good tidings and happy successe, whom onely amongst all other his friends and wiues, he embraced and saluted, for the pleasing conuersation and affection that was in her. But she, whilest he repeated vnto her these fortunate euents of his affaires, rather entertained the same with a displeasant attention, then applauding ioy: and these affections of hers likewise she could not conceale. For at such time as he folded his armes about her necke, she vnfolded her sorrow in her sighes; so simple and vnfained were her affections; and seemed rather to be displeased then appeased by his narrations. Whereupon Herod was sore troubled, perceiuing these things not onely suspected, but also fully manifest: but aboue all things he was distracted, when he considered the incredible and apparent hatred that his wife had conceiued against him, which in such sort incensed him, that he could not resist the loue that had attainted him, so that he neither could continue in wrath, nor listen long to peace; and being vnresolued in himselfe, he now was attempted by this; straight distracted by a contrary affection: so much was his minde trauailed betweene loue and hatred, that when as oftentimes he desired to punish the womans pride, his heart by loues mediation failed him in the enterprize. For nothing did more torment him then this feare, lest executing his displeasure against her, hee should by this meanes more grieuously wound himselfe, through the desire he bare vnto his deceased delight. Whilest thus he was sweltered and deuoured in his passions, and conceiued sinister opinions against Mariamme his wife; Salome his sister, and his mother hauing an inkling of his discontents, thought that they had gotten a fit opportunity to expresse and execute their hatred towards Mariamme: for which cause they conferred with Herod, and whetted his spleene and displeasure with variety of slanders, sufficient at one assault to engender hatred, and kindle his iealousie against her. To these reproches of theirs, he lent no vnwilling eares; yet had he not the heart to attempt any thing against his wife, or to giue free credit to their report; notwithstanding his displeasure increased and was inflamed more and more against her, for that neither she could colour her cares and discontents, nor he contain himselfe from exchanging his loue into hatred: and perhaps at that time he had published some fatall doome against her, had not a happy messenger brought him word, that Anthony and Cleopatra being dead, Cæsar was become Lord of Ægypt: for which cause hasting forward to meet and entertaine him, hee left his family in that present estate. Vpon his departure he recommended Mariamme to Sohemus, giuing him great thanks for the care he had had of her, and granted him in way of gratuitie a part of Iewry to gouerne.

When Herod was arriued in Egypt, and had friendly and familiarly conferred with Cæsar, he was highly honoured by him: for Cæsar gaue him those foure hundreth Frenchmen that were of Cleopatras guard; and restored that part of his countrey vnto him againe, which was taken away and spoyled by her. He annexed also vnto his kingdome Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, and on the sea coasts the Cities of Gaza, Anthedon, Ioppe, with the tower of Straton: which when hee had obtained, he grew more mighty then before: and after he had accompanied Cæsar as farre as Antioch, he returned into his owne countrey. Vpon his arriuall, he found that fortune which was fauourable vnto him abroad, too forward at home, especially in regard of his wife, in whose full loue of Mariamme, as any other of whom the Hiſtories make report: and as touching her, ſhe was both chaſte and faithfull vnto him; yet had ſhe a certaine womanly imperfection and naturall frowardneſſe, which was the cauſe that ſhee preſumed too much vpon the intire affection wherewith her husband was intangled; ſo that without regard of his perſon, who had power and authority ouer others, ſhe entertained him oftentimes very outragiouſly: All which he endured patiently, without any ſhew of diſcontent. But Mariamme vpbraided and publikely approached both the Kings mother and ſiſter, telling them that they were but abiectly and baſely borne.

Mariamme a froward woman.

Whereupon there grew a great enmity and vnrecouerable hatred betweene the Ladies; and from thence alſo there aroſe an occaſion of greater accuſations and calumniation then before. H Theſe ſuſpicions were nouriſhed amongſt them, for the ſpace of one whole yeere after Herods returne from Cæſar; and finally this long contriued and fore-imagined hatred at laſt brake out violently vpon this occaſion that enſueth: When as about mid-day the King had withdrawne himſelfe into his chamber to take his reſt, he called Mariamme vnto him to ſport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that hee bare vnto her. Vpon this his command ſhee came in vnto him; yet would ſhe not lie with him, nor entertaine his courtings with friendly acceptance, but vpbraided him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The King tooke theſe reproachfull words in very euill part, and was almoſt ready to ſtrike her: but his ſiſter hearing a greater ſtir and noiſe within then was vſuall, ſent in the Butler, who long before that time was ſuborned by her, whom ſhe commanded to tell the King, that Mariamme had prepared a drinke I for him to incite and quicken him vnto loue; willing him that if the King ſhould be mooued thereat, and ſhould demand what he meant, he ſhould certifie him, that Mariamme hauing prepared a poyſon for his grace, had dealt with him to deliuer it to his Maieſtie. Charging him moreouer, that if the King in hearing him ſpeake of this potion, ſhould ſeeme to be mooued therewith, that then he ſhould proceed no further in his diſcourſe. Hee therefore (being in this manner before-hand inſtructed what he ought to doe) at that very inſtant was ſent to diſcouer his treachery vnto the King; for which cauſe with a ſober and ſtayed countenance he entred in vnto him, being ſeriouſly and well prepared to diſcourſe, and told him that Mariamme had bribed him to preſent his Maieſtie with an amorous cup of drinke. Now when he perceiued that the King was troubled with theſe words, he proſecuted his diſcourſe, alleadging that the potion K was a certaine medicine which Mariamme had giuen him, the vertue whereof he knew not, which he had receiued according as he had told him, knowing that it concerned both his owne ſecuritie, and the Kings ſafetie.

Herod, who before this was highly diſpleaſed, hearing theſe words, was ſo much the more incenſed: for which cauſe he preſently commanded Mariammes moſt faithfull ſeruant to be examined by torments, as concerning the poiſon, ſuppoſing that it was impoſſible for her to vndertake any thing whatſoeuer, without his priuity. He being tried and tormented after this cruell manner, confeſſed nothing of that for which he was tortured; but declared vnto the King, that the hatred which his wife had conceiued againſt him, proceeded from certaine words that Sohemus had told her. Scarcely had he finiſhed theſe words, but that the King cryed out with a loud L voice, ſaying, that Sohemus, who beforetime had beene moſt faithful both to him and his kingdome, would not haue declared theſe his priuy commands, except there had beene ſome more inward familiaritie and ſecrecy betwixt him and Mariamme: for which cauſe he preſently commanded his miniſters to lay hands on Sohemus, and to put him to death. As for his wife, he drew her to her triall, and to this effect he aſſembled his moſt familiar friends, before whom he began to accuſe her with great ſpight and ſpleene, as touching theſe potions and poyſons aforeſaid; wherein he vſed intemperate and vnſeemely ſpeeches, and ſuch as for their bitterneſſe did ill become him in cauſe of iuſtice; ſo that in the end, the aſſiſtants, ſeeing the butt and bent of his deſire, pronounced ſentence of death againſt her: which being paſt, both he, and all other the aſſiſtants were of this opinion, that ſhe ſhould not ſo ſpeedily be executed, but that ſhee ſhould be M kept cloſe priſoner in ſome ſure place of the Palace. But by Salomes ſollicitations Herod was incited to haſten her death, for that ſhe alleadged that the King ought to feare, leſt ſome ſedition ſhould be raiſed amongſt the people, if he ſhould keepe her aliue in priſon. And by this meanes Mariamme was led vnto her death.

Alexandra her mother conſidering the eſtate of the time, and fearing no leſſe miſchiefe from Herods hands, then her daughter was aſſured of; ſhee vndecently changed her minde, and abiectedly laid aſide her former courage and magnanimitie. For intending to make it knowne, that ſhee

A She was neither partie nor priuy to those crimes, wherewith Mariamme was charged, shee went out to meete her daughter, and entertained her iniuriously, protesting publikely that shee was a wicked woman, and vngratefull towards her husband; and that shee well deserued the punishment that was adiudged her, for that she durst be so bold to attempt so hainous a fact, neglecting to requite her husbands entire loue, with her vnfained loyaltie. Whilest thus dishonestly shee counterfeited her displeasure, and was ready to pull Mariamme by the haire, the assistants according to her desert, condemned her generally for her shamefull hypocrisie: but shee that was led to be punished, conuicted her by her milde behauiour. For first of all, she gaue her no answer, neither was any waies altered by her reproaches; neither would so much as cast her eye vpon her; B making it appeare, that she discreetly concealed and couered her mothers imperfections, and was aggrieued that she had so openly shewed so great indignitie: expressing for her owne part a constant behauiour; and going to her death without change of colour, so that those that beheld her, perceiued in her a kinde of manifest courage and nobilitie, euen in her vtmost extremitie. Thus dyed Mariamme, hauing beene a woman that excelled both in continence and courage: notwithstanding that shee defaulted somewhat in affabilitie and impatience of nature: for the rest of her parts, shee was of an admirable and pleasing beautie, and of such a carriage in those companies wherein she was intertained, that it was impossible to expresse the same, in that shee surpassed all those of her time; which was the principall cause that shee liued not graciously and contentedly with the King. For being entertained by him, who intirely loued her, and from C whom she receiued nothing that might discontent her, she presumed vpon a great and intemperate libertie in her discourse. Shee digested also the losse of her friends very hardly, according as in open tearmes shee made it knowne vnto the King: whereby also it came to passe, that both Herods mother, and sister, and himselfe likewise grew at oddes with her, and in especiall her husband, from whom onely shee expected no hard measure.

After her death the King began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections; who beforetimes, as we haue declared, was already miserably distracted. For neither did hee loue after the common manner of married folke: but whereas almost euen vnto madnes he nourished this his desire, he could not be induced by the too vnbridled manners of his wife, to alay the heat of his affection, but that daily more and more by doting on her, he increased the same. And all that D time especially he supposed that God was displeased with him, for the death of Mariamme his wife. Oftentimes did he inuocate her name, and more often vndecently lamented he her. And notwithstanding he deuised all kinde of delights and sports that might be imagined, by preparing banquets, and inuiting guests with princely hospitalitie, to passe away the time; yet all those profited him nothing. For which cause he gaue ouer the charge and administration of his kingdome. And in such sort was he ouerwhelmed with griefe, that oftentimes hee commanded his ministers to call his wife Mariamme, as if as yet she had beene aliue. Whilest thus he was affected; there befell a pestilence within the citie, that consumed a great sort of the people, and the better part of the nobilitie, and each man interpreted that this punishment was inflicted by God vpon men, for the vniust death of the Queene. Thus the Kings discontents being by this meanes E increased, he at last hid himselfe in a solitary wildernesse, vnder pretext of hunting; where afflicting himselfe incessantly, at last he fell into a most grieuous sickenesse. This disease of his was an inflammation or paine in the necke: he seemed also in some sort to raue and waxe mad; neither could any remedies relieue him of his agonie; but when as the sickenesse seemed rather to increase, all men at last grew almost desperate of his recouery. For which cause his Physician, partly in respect of the contumacie of his disease, partly, because in so great a danger there was not any free election of dyet, they gaue him leaue to taste whatsoeuer best pleased his appetite, committing the vncertaine euent of his health to the hands of fortune.

Herods miserable estate, and moane after the death of his wife.

A plague inuadeth Ierusalem.

Herod falleth grieuously sicke.

Whilest thus he soiourned in Samaria, which now is called Sebaste, Alexandra inhabiting at that time in Ierusalem, hauing notice of this his estate, sought to reduce all the strong for- F tresses that were within the Citie, vnder her subiection: the one of which abutted vpon the Temple; the other was situate within the Citie: for they that are Lords of these, keepe all the rest of the nation vnder their awe; because that without these, neither the vsuall and daily sacrifices may be performed, neither may the Iewes liue without such sacrifices and oblations, who had rather lose their liues then contemne their religion. Shee therefore laboured those that had the gouernment thereof, to surrender them vp to her and Herods children begotten of her daughter Mariamme, for feare lest he being dead, they should be seized by others: and if it should fortune him to recouer his health, in the meane while they might be kept and held by no man more securely, then such as were his domesticall friends. This suite and sollicitation of hers was but coldly conceited of: and the Captains who at other times shewed themselues alwaies faithfull, at that time were the rather farre more constant in their duty, both for that they hated Alexandra, as also for that they thought it a great offence to despaire of the health of their Prince. For these were the Kings old friends, and one of them was Herods owne nephew, whose name was Achiabus. For which cause they sent present messengers vnto him, to certifie him of Alexandras intent: who hauing heard these newes, presently commanded her to be slaine: and at length ouercommiug his sicknes, he grew so badly affected both in body and mind, that he waxed hatefull vnto all men; so that all those who offended him for how little cause soeuer, were readily sought for to be punished. In this his intēperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of diuers of his inward friends, as Costabarus, Lysimachus, Antipater surnamed Gadias, and Dositheus, for this occasion that ensueth. Costabarus was an Idumæan, and one of the greatest account amongst his countrymen, who was descended from the Priests of Cozas, whom the Idumæans esteeme for a god. Now after that Hircanus had drawne the policy of the Idumæans to the reformed customes of the Iewes, Herod was made King of the Iewes, and appointed Costabarus to be Gouernour in Idumæa and Gaza, giuing him Salome his sister to wife, after he had put Ioseph to death, to whom she had bin married beforetime, as we haue heretofore declared. Costabarus seeing himself in this estate beyond his expectation, grew more elate and proud then his good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himselfe so far, that he thought himselfe dishonoured, if he should performe that which Herod commanded him, and scorned that the Idumæans should be vnder the Iewes subiection, notwithstanding they had receiued their maner of gouernment from them. He therfore sent messengers vnto Cleopatra, giuing her to vnderstand, that Idumæa had alwaies beene vnder her ancestors subiection; and for that cause she ought vpon iust cause to demand and beg that country at Antonius hands, and that in respect of himselfe he was ready to become her seruant. All which he practised, not to gratifie Cleopatra in any sort whatsoeuer, but to the intent, that if Herods fortunes should be any waies weakned, he might more easily by this meanes both inlarge and obtaine the kingdome of Idumæa. And with these fooliſh hopes was he transported, in regard of his birth and riches, which he had heaped together by such dishoneſt meanes as he continually practised, as he that intended no small matters. But notwithstanding Cleopatras often and earnest petition to obtaine this soueraignty; yet could she not obtaine it at Antonius hands. When Herod had notice of these couert and cunning practices, he was ready to kill Costabarus. But vpon the earnest supplications of his sister and her mother, he dismissed and pardoned him; yet held him alwaies in suspicion, by reason of this his practice. Not long after it happned, that Salome fell at debate with Costabarus, for which cause shee sent a libell of diuorce to her husband, notwithstanding it were against the lawes and ordinary customes of the Iewes. For according to our ordinances, it is onely lawfull for the husband to do the same; and as touching the wife, notwithstanding she were separated, yet it is not lawfull for her to marry againe, except her husband first giue her licence. But Salome without respect of the lawes of the country, grounding her selfe too much vpon her owne authoritie, forsooke her husband, saying, that she separated her self from her husband, by reason of the great friendship which she bare vnto her brother, for that she had receiued some notice that Costabarus practised some innouation with Antipater, Lysimachus and Dositheus. And this accusation of hers confirmed she by Babas children, whom he had already kept with him in all securitie for the space of twelue yeeres. All which was true, and at that time beyond all mens expectation wonderfully troubled Herod, as soone as he heard it. For as touching Babas sonnes, he had heretofore resolued to cut them off, for that they had been alwaies badly affected towards him and all his enterprizes; but all that time he had let them passe, because by continuance they were growne out of his remembrance. Now the cause of this enmitie and hatred which he bare towards them, was gathered from this ground: At such time as Antigonus enioyed the soueraignty, and Herod besieged the citie of Ierusalem with an armie: now those incommodities and necessities that ordinarily happen vnto those that are besieged, were the cause that diuers acknowledged Herod, and fixed their hopes vpon him. But Babas sons being in authoritie, and besides that, attended by a great number of men, perseuered in their faithfull obseruation of Antigonus, and blamed Herod continually, encouraging the inhabitants to continue the kingdome in those to whom it appertained by descent: and they themselues followed that course, which in their opinion was most profitable for the Common-weale. But after that the citie was surprized by Herod, and he grew master of the estate, Costabarus, who was appointed to keepe the citie gates, and to lie in wait that none of those who were accused to haue

B Now when the King had notice hereof by his ſiſters report, hee ſent certaine meſſengers to the place where they were hidden, and ſlew them, and all thoſe that were partakers of the ſame crime: ſo that no one of Hircanus kinred was now left aliue; but all of them being ſlaine, who excelled in nobility and dignitie, hee did what himſelfe liſted without any contradiction or controulement: for which cauſe he by little & little forſooke the ceremonies and ordinances of his countrey, and corrupted the decrees and inſtitutions of their anceſtors, which he ought to haue kept inuiolable, by his new and ſtrange inuentions. In whoſe time there was a very great change and alteration of the ancient and good manner of liuing; for all fell from bad to worſe: and the politike order, whereby the people ought to be gouerned and kept within compaſſe of their duty, went to decay. For firſt of all, he ordained certaine wreſtlings from fiue yeeres to fiue yeeres, C in honour of Cæſar; and builded a Theater for that purpoſe within Ieruſalem. He erected alſo a moſt huge Amphitheater within the Plaine, which were two piles worthy the regard & beholding, by reaſon of the ſumptuouſnes therof; but wholly eſtranged from the faſhions of the Iewes. For neither the vſe, nor the preſentation of theſe ſpectacles, hath euer been practiſed or taught by our anceſtors: yet was it his pleaſure to ennoble this aſſembly, to the end it might be continued from fiue to fiue yeeres, and this proclaimed he publikely in the countries round about him, and to this ſpectacle aſſembled he all the Nations. The wraſtlers alſo, and all that which concerned their exerciſe, were ſought out from all corners of the world, vnder the hope to obtaine the propoſed palme and victorie; and all the moſt excellent in thoſe exerciſes that were to bee found, were inuited to that aſſembly. For he propoſed moſt huge rewards, not onely to thoſe that exD erciſed wraſtling, but alſo vnto thoſe who are called Muſicians, & to all ſorts of plaiers on inſtruments, labouring to his vtmoſt power, that all the moſt famous in thoſe profeſſions ſhould bee aſſiſtant in thoſe paſtimes. Hee appointed alſo a reward of great value for ſuch as ranne vpon chariots of three, foure or of one horſe; and all that which was both ſumptuous and magnificent to behold, for euery one was moſt carefully prouided, in that he ſtroue to haue the honour of a moſt magnificent preparation for his games. The Theater was hung all about with Cæſars titles, and the trophees of thoſe nations, which were ouercome by him, altogether ſet out and ſhining with gold and ſiluer. As for the inſtruments thereof, there wanted neither furniture, coſtly veſtments, or precious ſtones. Thither alſo were drawne certaine ſauage beaſts, as Lyons and other wilde beaſts, which were worthy to bee placed in this famous ſhew, being admirable E both for their force and rareneſſe of nature, who fought the one with the other, and againſt ſuch men likewiſe who were condemned to die: whereby the ſtrangers conceiued, together with the admiration of his expence, an vncomparable and vnaccuſtomed pleaſure. But his countrymen interpreted this thing for a manifeſt corruption of thoſe diſciplines and manners which beforetime they had entertained, and honoured amongſt them. For it was an act moſt manifeſtly impious, to hazzard men againſt wilde beaſts, to delight the eyes of other men: It was alſo a matter as impious, to change and prophane the ordinances of the country, for forraine exerciſes: But the moſt hated of all theſe, were the Trophees: for in that they were certaine Images attired in armour, the vſe and veneration whereof were forbidden by our lawes, this diſpleaſed and grieued them more then any thing whatſoeuer: neither was Herod ignorant of thoſe troubles, which they F procured. But hee thought it to bee a matter of danger to attempt the ſame for the preſent by force; and for that cauſe he familiarly debated the ſame with ſome few of them, and diſcourſed vnto them his occaſions, to the end to ridde them of their ſuperſtition, although herein he profited nothing. For all of them with one conſent, cried out againſt the indignitie which they ſaw him commit: telling him, that although all other things were to bee tolerated; yet the Trophees, which were images of men, were vnſupportable, becauſe they were vnuſuall in their countrey. Herod perceiuing that they were diſcontented, and that they would not eaſily bee wrought vpon, except they had ſome contentment, hee called the moſt worthieſt men amongſt them, and led them into the Theater, demanding of them what they thought these Trophees G were: & when they cried out that they were images of men: he incontinently caused all the ornaments to bee taken off from them, letting them see that they were nought els but naked stocks of wood; so that sodainly their displeasure was turned into a laughter, and their doubts were pleasantly discussed. Thus appeased he the people, and moderated the fury of their mislikes: so that diuers of them changed their opinions, & were no more displeased. Notwithstanding, there were some of these that persisted in the indignity they conceiued in those vnaccustomed exercises, supposing that the corruption of their ancient discipline was an inducemẽt to their grieuous calamities; & they imagined that it rather concerned them to vndertake all dangers, then to endure any alteration in their policy, by permitting that Herod should introduce new and extraordinary fashions, who onely in word was their King, but in effect an enemy of their whole na- H tion. For this cause there were ten men amongst them, who bound themselues by oath to hazard all extremities, and to this intent they hid certaine short swords vnder their garments: amongst these there was one that was blind, who vrged and egged on by the strangenesse of those things which he had heard, not for that he was of ability to execute any thing with his hand, but to testifie that he was ready to suffer with the rest, if any misfortune should befall them, by his example the rest of them were not a little confirmed. These hauing mutually vndertaken this their resolution, repaired to the Theater vnder hope that Herod should not escape them, for that they intended to assaile him vnawares: at leastwise if they failed of him, their hope was to fall foule on some of his fauourites and followers, accounting this to be some solace in their expected death, I if in regard of their violated religion, they might bring the King in hatred with the common people. And these intending to offer themselues as chiefetaines and leaders vnto the rest, resolued to execute these things. But one of those intelligencers that Herod had sent abroad to pry and search into such like actions, hauing discouered all this their conspiracy, signified the same vnto the King, at such time as he was ready to enter into the Theater. Hee knowing full well what hatred was continually hatched against him, betooke himselfe to his palace, and sent for the conspirators by their names: who being apprehended in the fact, and knowing that there was no way for them to escape, resolued to endure their present misfortunes with a valiant courage: for being no waies dismaide, with a constant countenance they drew out their weapons, protesting that their conspiracy was honest and holy, not attempted by them for priuate affection, or their owne profit sake, but in the behalfe of their publike discipline, which no good man would either see or K suffer to be violated, no though it cost him his life.

Herod hath intelligence of the conspiracie.

Now when with great confidence they had alleadged these things for their iustification, they were led away by the Kings ministers to be slaughtered by diuers sorts of torments. Not long after this, that intelligencer who had betraied them, growing hatefull in all mens eies, was slaine by certaine men, and chopt in pieces with their swords, & afterwards cast vnto the dogs in sight and presence of many men. Yet did no man discouer this act, vntill after long and wearisome inquisitions made by Herod, it was wrought out of certaine poore women (who were priuy to the fact) with diuers torments. Then were all the actors of that murther punished, with their whole families: and notwithstanding all this, the common people was in no sort dismaid, but L were ready to defend their lawes, except they were restrained by some greater power. Which when the King perceiued, he resisted their indeuors with all diligence, lest happely through these alterations in affaires, the people should be drawne to an open rebellion. Whereas therefore he had two strong castles within the City, one wherein his palace was, another called Antonia, that adioyned neere vnto the temple, fortified by him; he thought good to strengthen a third called Samaria, the name whereof he changed, and called it Sebaste (which was distant from Ierusalem some daies iourney) to containe those of the common sort that were abroad, vnder his obedience, and very fit to bridle any vproares that might be raised in the City and fields. And for the whole nation he builded a fort, which in times past was called Straton, and afterwards he named it Cæsarea. He builded also a fort in Galilee, which was called Gabala, in a large Plaine, M where by course he kept his horsemen. Besides these, he builded the fort of Esthmonites in the countrey of Peræa on the other side Iordan.

Now when he had fitly disposed all these Castles through his whole countrey, for the security and safety of his kingdome, the matter of rebellion was taken from the common people, who vpon euery light cause are subiect to commotions, in that hee had prepared a remedy against all priuy conspiracies, by planting such forces alwaies neere at hand, who might preuent and pacifie all alterations vpon their originall. After this, betaking himselfe to encompasse Samaria with a wall,

A wall, he brought to paſſe that diuers of thoſe, who had born armes with him againſt his enemies, and diuers of the people likewiſe that dwelt round about, came to inhabite it, both in regard of the Temple, which he intended to build in that place, as alſo for that he fortified the ſame for his owne ſecurity (although that beforetime it was not in the number of famous Cities.) He therefore changed the name thereof, and called it Sebaſte, and diſtributed the lands that confined the Citie among the inhabitants of the ſame (which was by nature a fruitfull and goodly countrey) to the intent that within a little ſpace they might inrich themſelues. He inuironed the Citie alſo with a ſtrong wall; being aſſiſted by the naturall ſtrength and ſteepineſſe of the place: & beſides the whole circuit, hee included ſo much ground, that it was no waies inferiour to any of the fa-
B mous Cities; for it contained the circuit of twenty furlongs or ſtadia. And in the midſt thereof there was a ſacred place, containing a furlong and a halfe, wonderfully adorned; in which there was a Temple builded, famous both for beauty and bigneſſe. And as for the other parts of the Citie, he decked them with all ſorts of ornaments. And ſeeing how neerely it concerned him to prouide for the ſecurity of his perſon in this walled Citie, hee erected a fortreſſe for himſelfe. And as touching the beauty thereof, his intent was that it ſhould remaine for a monument to poſterity, of his magnificence and liberalitie.

CHAP. XII.

A famine inuaded the land of Iudæa.

C THAT very yeere, which was the thirteenth yeere of Herods raigne, very great calamities hapned in that countrey (either through Gods diſpleaſure, or for that the reuolution of time would haue it ſo.) For firſt of all, there were ſuch continuall droughts, that by reaſon thereof the earth grew barren, & produced not thoſe fruits, which of it ſelfe it was accuſtomed to beare. And after this, the ordinarie courſe of mens diets beeing altered by reaſon of the want of corne, the want of ſuſtenance was accompanied with a bodily ſickneſſe (for that by cuſtome theſe two plagues doe ordinarily entertaine one another:) For this made the plague and ſickneſſe more vehement, for that the ſicke in this great penury, could neither haue care of themſelues as was expedient, nor get conuenient nouriſhment for preſeruation of life: And many died daily; and thoſe alſo that remained aliue were in deſpaire, becauſe they could not relieue their
D want and neceſſities, what diligence ſoeuer they vſed. For which cauſe, after the old fruits of that yeere were wholly conſumed, and all the reſt of their ſtore was vtterly ſpent, there appeared not any meanes whereupon they might hope, namely, for that the miſery increaſed more then was expected; yea and extended it ſelfe beyond that yeere: ſo that they had nothing remaining by them, & the ſeeds they ſowed at that time mouldred away, and the earth for all their labours afforded them no intereſt. The neceſſitie therefore being thus great, conſtrained men to ſearch out many new inuentions to maintaine their life: and the King likewiſe was in no leſſe perplexitie, in that he was depriued of thoſe ordinarie reuenues which he receiued by the fruits of the earth; & the rather, for that he had ſpent his mony in repairing his cities, according as before this we haue declared: & in ſuch ſort were all things waſted by diuers calamities, that a man could conceiue
E no hope of remedy. Beſides this, the people grew in hatred of their king, for that it is their cuſtom ordinarily to accuſe their gouernors, as if they were the authors of al their euils. Yet did the king bethink himſelfe how he might remedy theſe incõueniences, but hardly could he find the means, for that their neighbours had no meanes to ſel them victuals, becauſe they were no leſſe afflicted then themſelues: & although he might haue recouered ſome little meanes for a great ſumme of money, yet wanted he it alſo to defray the charges: notwithſtanding in that he knew, that it behooued him to imploy his vttermoſt indeauours in yeelding a generall remedy to ſuch and ſo violent an oppreſſion, he melted downe all thoſe moueables he had either of gold or ſiluer within his palace, and ſpared nothing either for the matter, the excellencie, or the faſhion; no not ſo much as the veſſels wherein hee was ordinarily ſerued. This money ſent he into Ægypt, where F at that time vnder Cæſar, Petronius held the gouernment. This man being Herods friend, in that he deſired the ſafetie of his ſubiects, at ſuch time as diuers of them retired themſelues vnto him, by reaſon of that their neceſſitie, he permitted them to buy vp corne; and aſſiſted them in all things, both in their bargaines, & in their carriages; ſo that the greater or the whole ſumme of their ſuccours was attributed to him. But after their returne, Herod wrought ſo much, that the care that was taken by him, did not onely change the affections of thoſe, which beforetime were his enemies, but beſide all this, hee purchaſed great praiſe and commendation for his liberalitie and ſingular prouidence. For firſt of all hee diſtributed a certaine quantitie of corne to all thoſe, who were were not able of themselues to supply their owne wants, vsing herein both great care and diligence. After this, for that there were a great number of such, who in regard of their age, or some other infirmitie, were vnable to prepare their victuals, he tooke order for their relieſe, & appointed them certaine bakers, who should furnish them with bread, both sufficient and meet for their sustenance. Hee gaue order also, that they should not passe the winter disfurnished of cloathing, but prouided for such as were naked sufficient raiment, considering that the sheepe were partly dead, and partly deuoured, & that there was no wooll to set them awork, or other stuffe to make garments of. Now after he had furnished his subiects with these things, he thought good also to shew kindnesse to the neighbouring cities, and stored the Syrians with seede-corne to sowe their lands; which yeelded him no little profit: for the earth incontinently gaue him a large & plenti- H full tribute for that she had receiued; so that all of them had aboundance of victuals: and as soone as the harueſt was ready, he sent fiftie thousand men into that countrey which hee had relieued: and by this meanes hee with all diligence restored his afflicted Kingdome, and comforted his neighbours, who were oppressed with the like calamity. For there was not any man in necessity, that according to his qualitie was not assisted and succoured.

The villages likewise and the cities, & those of the common sort who entertained great households, and were in want, hauing their recourse vnto him, receiued that which they had neede of; so that to reckon vp all the corne which he gaue vnto those, who were not his subiects, it appeareth that hee imployed ten thousand Cores of wheate: now the Core containeth ten Athenian bushels: and within the compasse of his Realme he imploied eighty thousand: which care of his, I and discreetly imployed fauour, wrought so much in the hearts of the Iewes, and was so highly renowned amongst other nations, that the ancient hatred which they had conceiued against him, for that he had altered certaine customes of their Kingdome, was wholly forgotten, and hee was supposed by them to haue made a sufficient recompence, by the diligence hee had shewed in assisting them in their necessities; and no lesse either grace or glory obtained he among strangers: so that by these miseries the Kings honour was not a little magnified, and whatsoeuer damage hee receiued at home, so much honour and reputation atchieued he abroad. For whereas in strangers necessities he had shewed himselfe so full of magnanimitie, each man did not respect what hee had beene before, but such as they lately found him to be.

The Iewes fauour Herod for his bounty

About the same time also he sent Cæsar certaine supplies, namely, fiue hundreth chosen men of K his guard, whom Elius Gallus led into the wars in Arabia, and had often vse of them in his most dangerous attempts. When as therefore his Kingdome was restored to his former felicitie, hee builded a roial palace in the higher part of the citie, furnished with many large buildings, & decked with gold and marble seates; so as they might receiue a great number of men: hee named also each room of the house according to their seuerall names, & called one the lodging of Cæsar, and another of Agrippa. After this, being intangled with loue, he married a wife, lest he should be distracted by vaine desires; and the cause of this his new mariage was this: There was amongst those that dwelt in Ierusalem, a certaine citizen called Simon, the son of Bœthas the Alexandrine, who was a Priest, and one of the chiefest in nobility amongst them: this man had a daughter, the faireſt and comliest creature of that age, whose beauty renowned by the common voice, it came L to passe, that with her fame Herod at one time entertained a good affection towards her, and afterwards obtaining the sight of her, he grew in loue with her; yet would not vse his authoritie, lest hee should seeme to behaue himselfe tyrannically, but chose rather to accept her for his betrothed wife. Whereas therefore Simon seemed vnworthy his affinitie, and yet too worthy to bee blasted by contempt, he made election of a conuenient meanes to obtaine the fulnesse of his desire, which was, to raise both Simon and his to higher dignities. For which cause he presently deposed the high Priest Iesus the sonne of Phabetes, and established Simon in his place; and that done, he contracted affinitie with him. After the marriage was consummate, he builded a new castle in that place wherein he had ouercome the Iewes, vpon the time and incontinently after the ouerthrow of Antigonus, and when he had taken vpon him the gouernment. Herod remoueth Iesus from his priesthood, & placeth Simon in his roome, and marrieth his daughter.

This place is distant from Ierusalem some sixtie furlongs or stades, strong by nature, and fit for defence and good fortification. For neere vnto the same there is a certen steepy hill made by art, after the manner of a round dugge, enuironed with round towers, with a steepy ascent of two hundreth steppes cut out of hewed stone. Within the same there are diuers places, builded with great & sumptuous workmanship, made both for defence & delight. At the foot of this hil there are two houses worthy the sight, for diuers their singularities, & namely, by reason of those conduits of water, which although they spring not in that place, yet notwithstāding are they brought from

A from farre with great coſt and expence. The Plaine that adioyneth vpon it, is all full of buildings after the manner of a city, and the top of the caſtle commandeth all the Plaine. As ſoone as therefore he had diſpoſed all his affaires, according to his hearts deſire, he poſſeſſed the kingdome in great quietnes, for that he made his ſubiects obedient vnto him, both by feare, in ſhewing himſelfe inexorable when it concerned him to puniſh; and by liberality, whereby he prouided for their publike neceſſities: he therefore tooke an eſpeciall care of himſelfe, as if the life and ſafetie of his perſon had beene the ſecuritie of his people. He behaued himſelfe officiouſly and fauourably towards all forraine cities: he entertained the Princes by preſents, which according to his occaſions he ſent vnto them, to inſinuate himſelfe into their fauours, being in his owne nature B magnificent and fit to gouerne: ſo that all his fortunes increaſed, and all things fell out happily according to his hearts deſire. True it is, that the care which he imployed in honouring Cæſar, and other mighty Magiſtrates of Rome, cauſed him to outſtrip his cuſtomes, and to falſifie diuers ordinances of his countrey, in building Cities, and erecting Temples in honour of them, although he builded them not in the land of Iury: for the Iewes would not haue endured it, becauſe we are forbidden to honour images and figures, formed according to the likeneſſe of a man, as the Greekes are accuſtomed to doe, but hee did this in the countrey and forraine cities, and excuſed himſelfe to the Iewes, ſaying, that hee did it not of his owne head, but performed that according to the charge and commandement which he had from others, who were greater then himſelfe: and in the meane-while gratified Cæſar and the Romanes, in that hee reſpected C their honour more then he did the ordinances of his countrey; although in all things he had reſpect to his particular aduantage, and determined with himſelfe to leaue behind him after his death, large and ample teſtimonies of his power and greatneſſe: which was the cauſe that hee builded cities with great charge and expence.

CHAP. XIII.

The building of the Citie by CÆSAREA.

WHEN as therefore he had found out a fit and conuenient place vpon the Sea coaſt, to build a city on, which of long time had bin called the tower of Straton, he both magD nificently deſigned and ſet downe the module and forme thereof, and made many ſumptuons buildings, both of royall places, and of other priuate lodgings, not builded after a ſlight manner, or of weake and fading matter, but of marble ſtone. But the greateſt and buſieſt worke of all, was the hauen which he made exempt and free from ſtormes and tempeſts, that in greatneſſe reſembled that of Piræus, and was ſo ſpacious, that it was able to receiue many great ſhips into the road, and had diuers roomes & warehouſes to lay vp the merchandize therein. And the more admirable was this pile, becauſe the ſtuffe that was fit to finiſh this ſo great worke, was not gathered or gotten in that place, but muſt needly be brought from another place, vpon great charge & expence. This city is ſeated in Phœnicia vpon the coaſt, in the way to Egypt, betweene Ioppa and Dora, certaine villages ſituate vpon the ſea coaſts, vnfit either for landing or harbour, E by reaſon of the Affricke wind, that driuing the ſand of the Sea vpon the ſhore, giueth not any quiet road vnto the ſhips, but that the Merchants are enforced for a long time to ride at anchor. To correct this incommodity of the place, he made the circuit round about the port ſo ſpacious, that it was able to receiue a great Fleet: and he caſt downe to the bottome thereof, which was about ſome twenty fathoms deepe, certaine huge ſtones, that for the moſt part were fiftie foot long, eight foot broad, and nine foot high, ſome more and ſome leſſe. The pile that was erected vpon this to affront the Sea, was a pane of two hundreth foot, the halfe whereof was oppoſed againſt the waues to break the fury of the ſtreame, & for this cauſe was called in the Greek tongue Procymation, that is to ſay, Before floud: The other halfe ſerued as a foundation to beare vp a wall of ſtone fortified with diuers towers, the chiefeſt whereof was a faire pile or building, F which was called Druſus, in memory of Druſus, Cæſars ſonne in law, who died very yong: it had alſo diuers retreats or hoſtries in the ſame, into which the Mariners were receiued and lodged.

The deſcent being hard by, incompaſſed all the port like a round platforme, that ſerued for a pleaſant walking place for whomſoeuer liſted. The entrance and mouth of the hauen was toward the north, which is a wind that of all other moſt purifieth & cleanſeth. The ſupporter & ſtrength of all the circuit on the left hand vpon the entrance to the port, was an ample and huge tower to faſten it the more ſtrongly; and on the right hand, were two huge pillars of ſtone, more higher then the Tower that ſtood oppoſite againſt them, erected and faſtned together. All round about the

the hauen there were certaine buildings, abutting one vpon another of poliſhed marble, and in the midſt there was a little hillocke, on which there was a certaine monument placed in honour of Cæſar, which preſented it ſelfe to their ſight who ſailed to the port, in which there were the figures of the City of Rome and of Cæſar. This City alſo was called Cæſarea, as much to be wondred at for the matter whereof it was built, as for the art whereby it was erected: and no leſſe cunning was there ſhewed in the vaults and conduits vnder ground, then in thoſe buildings that were about them; ſome of them were conuaied toward the port, and diſcharged themſelues into the Sea by certaine compaſſed ſpaces: but there was one that went athwarts, that comprehended all the reſt, to the end that thereby the raine-water, and the cleanſings of the Citie might be conuayed into the Sea, and that when the Sea ſhould flow, it might waſh and cleanſe all the Citie.

The Theater and Amphitheater.

He erected alſo a Theater of ſtone, and behind the ſame to the Southward, an Amphitheater, that was able to receiue a great number of men; and ſo pleaſantly and fitly ſituated, that from the ſame a man might diſcouer the ſea. This City was finiſhed at the end of 12. yeeres, during which time, the King was neither wearied by intending the worke, nor negligent in furniſhing the neceſſary charges. After this, perceiuing that the Citie of Sebaſta was already inhabited alſo, he reſolued to ſend his two ſonnes Alexander and Ariſtobulus to Rome, to preſent them vnto the Emperour Cæſar; who no ſooner reſorted thither, but they were lodged in Pollios houſe, who amongſt all the reſt was an intire friend of Herods. They might haue lien alſo at Cæſars houſe, who entertained them with as great familiaritie and kindneſſe, as might be poſſible: and gaue Herod licence in like manner to confirme the kingdome in one of his children, which ſo euer beſt liked him, annexing to his gouernment, the countries of Trachona, Baranea, and Auranita for the occaſion which enſueth. A certaine man called Zenodorus, had hired Lyſanias demaines or Lordſhip: and not contenting himſelfe with thoſe reuenewes which he gathered, but deſirous to gather more, he liued vpon ſpoiles and robberies in Trachona, which is a countrey, the inhabitants whereof commonly liue by pillage and ſpoile, which they purchaſe from the Citizens and Merchants of Damaſco. And ſo farre was Zenodorus from prohibiting theſe robberies, that he himſelfe alſo was partaker of the booty; ſo that the nations neighbouring round about, ſeeing themſelues thus abuſed, ſought for remedy at Varus hands, who was their Gouernour, requiring him to certifie Cæſar, of Zenodorus wrongs and outrages. Which when he vnderſtood, he commanded that ſuch lawleſſe ryoters ſhould be puniſhed, and that the countrey ſhould be added vnto the iuriſdiction of Herod, to the intent, that by his vigilancy the inhabitants of Trachona ſhould no more moleſt their neighbours. For it was hard to reſtraine them, conſidering that they were accuſtomed and traded in ſuch theft, and could not liue otherwaies. For they neither had townes nor lands, neither heritages nor any poſſeſſions, but onely certaine retraits and caues vnder ground, and liued pell mell like beaſts: and hauing made abundant prouiſion of water and victuals, they might eaſily endure warre a long time, and maintaine themſelues in their caues, when their enemies aſſailed them without.

Zenodorus liueth by ſpoile.

The doores of theſe dennes were ſo narrow, that they could be entred but by one at once; but within it was incredible ſpacious and large: the vpper part thereof was not ſteepie, but plaine, and in forme of a ſmooth earth: for the whole place naturally conſiſteth of a ſharpe and ragged rock, with a hard and difficult paſſage thereon, vnleſſe a man be guided thorow the paths. For the way was not direct and ſtraight, but full of windles and many turnings. At ſuch time as they wanted opportunitie to ſpoile their neighbors, they robbed one another; and omitted no kind of wickedneſſe. Herod hauing receiued the gift of this countrey at Cæſars hands, reſorted thither vnder the conduct of certaine guides that knew the waies, and hauing brought their power and prolling to an end, he left the neighbour nations in aſſured peace. But Zenodorus being partly whetted on with enuy, partly incited by the griefe which he conceiued through the loſſe of his poſſeſſions, reſorted to Rome to accuſe Herod; yet could effect nothing of that which he intended.

Agrippa is ſent into Aſia.

When Agrippa was ſent into Aſia by Cæſar to gouerne the prouinces beyond the Seas, Herod, becauſe hee was his very friend and familiar, went to ſalute him at Mitylene where hee wintered, for that he was one of his inward friends, and afterwards returned into Iewry. But certaine Gadareans came vnto Agrippa with an intent to accuſe Herod: but he ſent them bound vnto the King, and vouchſafed them no audience. On the other ſide, the Auranites, who of long time hated Herods gouernment, ſtirred vp commotions, and laboured to draw the countrey into rebellion, and that vpon a iuſt ground, as it ſeemed, at that time: for Zenodorus deſpairing of his affaires, went and ſold them a certaine part of the Lordſhip in Auranita (which was comprehended within Cæſars donation to Herod) for the ſumme of fifty talents of yeerly reuenue, wherewith Agrippa ſendeth the Gadareans bound vnto Herod, who came to accuſe him.

Zenodorus ſignory ſold to the Auranites, and beſtowed on Herod by Cæſar, is the cauſe of the warres.

A with they grew diſcontented, for that they were vniuſtly depriued of their eſtates: and hereupon they made often incurſions, indeuouring themſelues ſometimes to recouer the ſame by force; and otherwhile contending for the right of their poſſeſſion by courſe of iuſtice. They drew alſo vnto them certaine needy ſouldiers; who according to the cuſtome of wretched men, expected their better fortunes by change and innouation: which though Herod knew, and could haue prouidently preuented them, yet exhorted hee them to maintaine their titles rather by good meanes then open violence, being loth to giue any occaſion of new trouble or diſquiet. At length in the ſeuenteenth yeere of his raigne, Cæſar came into Syria: vpon whoſe arriuall diuers of the Gadareans began to exclaime againſt Herod, accuſing him of his ſeuerity and tyranny: which accu-

B ſation they the rather attempted, becauſe they were chiefely incited thereunto by the inſtigations and falſe ſuggeſtions of Zenodorus, who bound himſelfe by an oath, that he would neuer giue ouer, vntill that deliuering them from Herods tyranny, they were reduced vnder Cæſars protection. The Gadareans, perſwaded by theſe his proteſtations, began to continue their exclamations, and that ſomewhat the more audaciouſly, for that they perceiued that they liued as yet vnpuniſhed whom Agrippa had deliuered into Herods hands: for Herod had ſet them at liberty without any puniſhment, notwithſtanding that in regard of his owne ſubiects he was inexorable, as euer man was; and moſt patient in induring thoſe iniuries that were offered him by ſtrangers, whom he alwaies diſmiſſed without reuenge. When as therefore they accuſed him of violence and rapine, and for violating and razing downe their Temples, Herod being nothing diſmaid

C thereat, preſented himſelfe before the Emperour to iuſtifie his actions. But Cæſar entertained him very kindly, and diminiſhed nothing of the good affection which hee bare vnto him, notwithſtanding all the vprores and inſolent tumults of the people. Thus was the firſt day ſpent in audience of their complaints, and in thoſe daies that followed there were no further obiections to be heard of: for the Gadareans perceiuing both Cæſars diſpoſition and the inclination of his councell, and fearing (as it was moſt likely) to be deliuered into Herods hands, the next night after ſome of them ſlew themſelues; other ſome for feare of torments brake their owne necks; and ſome of them alſo drowned themſelues in the riuer. And thus whereas they ſeemed to foreiudge themſelues, Cæſar preſently abſolued Herod.

And this felicitie of his, was ſeconded with another of ſmall conſequence. For Zenodorus

D hauing his bowels broken through an extreme fluxe of blood, finiſhed his life at Antioch in Syria. Whereupon Cæſar gaue Herod his countrey, which was a large and ample ſignory, and was ſituate betweene Trachonita and Galilee, containing Vlatha, Paneas, and the countries thereabouts. Hee made him one of the Gouernours of Syria alſo, commanding them to execute nothing without his aduice. At this time attained he to the height of all worldly felicity: For whereas within the huge and ample Romane Empire, all things were diſpoſed by Cæſar, and Agrippa, Cæſar honoured no man more then Herod next to Agrippa; and Agrippa reſpected him aboue all men next to Cæſar. Whereupon he grew to be ſo confident, that he begged a Tetrarchy at Cæſars hands, for his brother Phæroras: on whom hee beſtowed one hundreth talents of his reuenue out of his owne kingdome, to the intent that if he ſhould happen to die, Phæroras eſtate

Vlatha, Paneas, and other regions are giuen to Herod.

Herod highly eſteemed by Cæſar, and Cæſar maketh Phæroras a Tetrarch.

As ſoone as therefore he had conducted Cæſar as farre as the ſea, vpon his returne he builded a goodly Temple of white marble in honour of his name, in the country which belonged to Zenodorus, neere to a place which is called Panion, which is a goodly caue in the heart of a mountain, and a place of great pleaſure, vnder which there is a wide poole of immeaſurable depth, which is full of ſtanding water, and the vpper part of the mountaine is very high. From vnder this caue ſpring the fountaine heads of the floud Iordan. This place of it ſelfe ſo famous & delightfull, was choſen out by Herod, and adorned alſo with a Temple which he built in honour of Cæſar. At that time alſo he releaſed the third part of thoſe tributes which his ſubiects paid vnto him, to the end (as he ſaid) that he might relieue his ſubiects after the penury they had endured. But the truth of

F his intention was, that he did it to that end to win their fauours, who were ſiniſterly affected towards him. For they had conceiued an hatred againſt him, becauſe all piety was in a manner aboliſhed, & the ordinances of the country in a ſort diſanulled by the meanes of thoſe temples, which he had built, & each man priuily muttered with bitternes againſt him; ſo that welny they were addreſſed to mutiny. But Herod with great diſcretion preuented the ſame, & cut off all occaſions of inſurrection, commanding euery one to intend his labour; forbidding them to make any aſſemblies in the city, or to talk one with another vnder colour of walking abroad for pleaſure or feaſts ſake. Moreouer, hee had ſent out certaine Intelligencers to diſcouer all that which was done, appointing pointing grieuous punishments for those that misliked, or maligned his gouernment. For diuers of them were led vnto the Castle of Hircania, some openly, some priuately; where they were no sooner imprisoned, but they were put to death; and both in the citie and in the countrey; there were certaine men appointed to take note of all such that vsed any assemblies vpon any occasion whatsoeuer. And so inwardly was he tormented with their dislikes, that as it is reported of him, he tooke vpon him the habit of a priuate man, and thrust himselfe in the night time into the company of the people, to vnderstand and gather what they thought of his gouernment; and those whom he found to be vntractable and obstinate, and would not be conformed to his will, he dispatched them by one meanes or other, binding the rest of the people by an oath to serue him faithfully, and constrained them to keepe the oath they had sworne, and to acknowledge his soueraignetie: whereunto diuers through the feare they conceiued, easily condescended. But they who had a more greater courage, and were discontented to see themselues constrained, hee cut them short by all the meanes that he might. He required also an oath of diuers of those sectaries, who followed the Pharisees Pollio and Sameas: and notwithstanding they denied to take the oath, yet he did not punish them as he did the other for their refusall, in respect and reuerence of Pollio their master. From this rigour also were they exempt, who amongst vs are called Esseans, which is a sort of men that liue after that manner that Pithagoras did among the Græcians, of whom I haue more expressely discoursed in another place.

Herod bindeth the people by an oath.

Herod excuseth the Pharisees from swearing for Polias and Sameas sakes. The Esseans not much vnlike the Pythagoristes.

At this present I thinke it not a matter to be ouerslipt, neither estranged from the ayme of my history, to report for what cause the King had so religious an opinion of those men. There was a certaine Essean called Manahem, who in his sect was accounted an vpright and iust man, and one that had obtained from God the knowledge of things to come. He seeing Herod one day at such time as he was very young and went to schoole, saluted him and called him King of the Iewes. Herod supposing that Manahem knew him not, or that he mocked him, reproued him sharpely for that his speech, saying, that he acknowledged himselfe to be one of the common sort. Manahem smiling, hit him gently with his hand vpon the back, and said vnto him, Thou shalt be King, and shalt haue a happy raigne. For such is Gods pleasure; and at that time remember thy selfe of the words that Manahem spake vnto thee, which shall serue for a testimony to put thee in minde of thy mutable estate. For it becommeth thee nothing more, then by iustice, pietie, and equity, to winne the hearts of thy subiects: yet know I by reuelation from God, that thou wilt not follow these instructions; for thou shalt forget and neglect both diuine and humane lawes: though in other respects thou shalt be most fortunate and purchase eternall glory. Yet shalt thou not escape Gods hands: for he shall chastise thee in the latter time of thy life, with a grieuous punishment.

Manahem foretelleth Herods gouernment.

At that time Herod gaue small regard to those his words, in that he had no hope that any such thing should happen: but not long after, as soone as he had obtained the kingdome to the fulnesse of his felicitie, he in the greatnesse of his power sent for Manahem, and asked him how long hee should raigne. But he returned him a doubtfull answer. Which when Herod perceiued, hee asked him anew if he should raigne ten yeeres. Whereunto Manahem answered, and twentie, and thirtie, without setting him downe any prefixed terme. Herod contenting himselfe herewith, embraced Manahem, and gaue him licence to depart, and continued his affections towards the Esseans for his sake. I haue thought good to register these things, notwithstanding they may seeme vncredible, to declare that diuers of our nation haue had communication with God by reason of their holinesse.

CHAP. XIIII.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 14. al. 11.

IN the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, Herod, after he had finished these many and admirable actions, conceited in his minde no meane, but a mightie proiect, which was to reedifie Gods Temple of greater bignesse and answerable height, hoping that this worke which was the most admirable of all those he had vndertaken (as indeed it was) in being finished, would eternize his memory. But fearing lest the people, in regard of the greatnesse of the enterprize, would be hardly drawne thereunto, hee determined to sound their intents by his discourse, and for that cause assembling them together, he spake after this manner:

Herod intendeth to reedifie Gods temple.

Herod certifieth the people, that he will reedifie the Temple.

Men and brethren, I hold it to be a matter both vaine & superfluous, to recount vnto you what things I haue performed, during the time of my gouernment. For they haue beene of that nature, that

A that they haue returned me but little honour; and your ſelfe great profit and ſecurity. For you your ſelues know, that in thoſe aduerſities that haue befallen you, I haue bin no waies negligent in that which concerned your profit; and in thoſe buildings I haue erected by Gods aſſiſtance, I haue not ſo much regarded my ſelfe, as that which concerneth you all: and my hope is by the will of God, that I haue brought the eſtate of the Iewes to that degree of felicity, that they neuer had or expected before this time. As for that which I haue particularly exploited in the heart of the country, & in the cities which I haue augmented, as well with ornament & beauty, as with a number of inhabitants; ſince you your ſelues know, I think it a ridiculous matter to reduce them to your memory. But I muſt at this time aſſure you that the deſign which I will pre-
B ſently enterprize, is far more holy & more excellent, then may be performed by vs. For our predeceſſors, after they were returned from the captiuity of Babylon, builded a temple in honour of our great and mighty God, which in height wanted ſixty cubits of that which Salomon firſt built: yet ought we not to obiect as a blame, or aſcribe this action to any impiety in our anceſtors. For the temple was not at their diſpoſition, but the meaſure of their building was ſet them down by Cyrus and Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes, to whom & their ſucceſſors they haue firſt of all been ſlaues, as after their time they haue been vnder the ſubiection of the Macedonians: ſo that they had not the meanes & opportunity to raiſe this religious monument, according to his firſt pattern, to that requiſite and conuenient height. But ſince at this preſent by Gods permiſ-
C ſion, I haue obtained the kingdom; and that for a long time hitherto we haue enioyed a happy peace; and that neither mony nor great reuenewes are wanting; and that which is our greateſt good, we are made happy by the fauor of the Romans, who in a ſort are the Lords of the whole world, & in effect are our entire friends: I will enforce my ſelfe to repaire that defect, which hapned in times paſt through the miſeries, and weak means of our noble predeceſſors, reſoluing with my ſelfe to perfect that which is requiſite for the ſeruice of God, in acknowledgement of the benefits which I haue receiued from him, by whoſe mercy and meanes I haue obtained my Kingdome.

This ſudden and vnexpected ſpeech of Herods, filled all mens eares with wonder, and hearts with expectation, in that he ſeemed to promiſe ſuch a thing, as was beyond their hope, & as they thought far greater then his power: & that which moſt diſtracted them was, for that they had
D conceiued a feare, leſt after he had pulled down the old, he ſhould not bee of ability to erect a new. For which cauſe his counſell ſeemed to bee dangerous, and attempt ouer difficult. But the King perceiuing with what doubts they were detained, encouraged them, promiſing in no ſort to deface the old temple, before all that was prepared & poliſhed which was requiſite for the building of the new. And in this he kept his word. For hee appointed a thouſand chariots to draw ſtones vnto the place, & choſe out amongſt the reſt ten thouſand cunning & expert wotkmen. Hee apparelled alſo at his owne charge one thouſand Prieſts in their accuſtomed veſtments, whereof ſome gaue the maſons inſtructions how they ſhould worke, and the reſt aſſiſted the carpenters. This done, after he had fitly & readily performed & prepared all things requiſite, he cauſed them to fall to their building. As ſoon as therefore the former foundations were E taken away, & other meer new were planted in their place, the temple was erected vpon them, in length one hundreth cubits, and twenty cubits in height, aboue thoſe hundreth cubits which the former contained, which twenty cubits were in ſome ſort ſcantled, after that by ſucceſſion of time the foundations began to bee ſettled, and during Neroes raigne our countrimen had thought to haue raiſed it to the firſt height. The building was of white & ſtrong marble ſtones, which were each of them twenty and fiue cubits long, eight cubits high, & about ſome twelue cubits broad. All the ſtructure of the ſame was made after the manner of a princely palace on all ſides, & the middle part thereof was higher then the reſt: ſo that it might eaſily be diſcouered by the inhabitants of the country many furlongs off; and eſpecially it was moſt apparant & ſubiect to their ſight, who dwelt oppoſite againſt it, or repaired vnto the citie. The doores there-F of and their tranſomes were correſpondent to the reſt of the magnificence of the temple, garniſhed with diuers tapeſtries, and azured flowers, which inueſted & adorned the pillers: vnder whoſe chapters a golden vine ſpred it ſelfe on each ſide, repleniſhed with many goodly cluſters of grapes hanging down; which was an admirable work to behold, both in reſpect of the greatneſſe, as alſo for the workemanſhip and matter whereof it was made. Hee encompaſſed all the temple with moſt goodly galleries, & porches correſpondent to the magnificence of the ſame, and ſurpaſſing thoſe in times paſt for the coſt; ſo that neuer any man before him ſo magnificently adorned the temple. Two of which were vnder-propped with very ſtrong wals, whoſe workmanship was so exquisite, as it is incredible to be reported amongst men. There was a ston- G ny rising or hillocke, and very streight & high, the top whereof towards the eastermost part of the city was somewhat smooth & vpright. The first that incompassed it with a wall, was Salomon our King, who by Gods fauour & the mediation and labour of diuers workmen, did first of all build the higher part: Herod also inuested the lower part therof with another wall; vnder which to the southward there lieth a most deep valley. This wall was made of huge stones, close fastned the one vnto the other with lead, shutting all within his enclosure, & extending it selfe very deep; so that the greatnes & height of this foure square building was an incredible thing to bee imagined. The greatnes of the stones appeared in the front, but on the inside they were fastned together with claspes of iron, which fortified & strengthned the building for euer against al iniuries of times. This worke hauing been thus continued to the top, and the void space between H the wall and the rising hillocke filling vp the floore aboue, was made plaine & equall. The whole circuit of the tower contained about foure stades or furlongs, a stade or furlong in length to euery pane from angle to angle. On the inside and neer vnto the top there was another wall of stone extended along the easterne side; hauing a double porch of equall greatnes with that of the wall, and placed in the midst of the temple, and openeth right vpon the gates thereof, which the Kings beforetime had adorned. Round about the temple were planted those spoiles which were taken from the Barbarians, which King Herod had placed there, with al those spoiles which he had taken from the Arabians. In a corner on the north side there stood a very strong and de- I fenced fortresse, builded by the Asmonians, who were Herods predecessors, and had been both Kings and high Priests, and had imposed a name on that tower which was Baris, in which they kept the priestly vesture, wherewith the high Priest was wont to bee adorned at that time onely when he was to offer sacrifice. King Herod kept the same in that place, & there remained it after his death, vntill the time of Tiberius Cæsar: vnder whom Vitellius gouernour of Syria came vnto Ierusalem; where he was entertained by all the people with as great magnificence as was possible: & being desirous to acknowledge the fauours that he had receiued at their hands, being requested by them that they might haue the keeping of the high Priests ornaments, he wrote vnto Tiberius Cæsar to grant them that fauor; & till the death of King Agrippa the Iewes had the same in their possession. But after that Agrippa was dead, Cassius Longinus that gouerned Syria, & K Cuspius Fadus Lieutenant of Iudæa, commanded the Iewes to returne the same into the fortresse Antonia, saying that the Romans ought to be Lords thereof, as they had bin in times past. For which cause the Iewes sent Embassadors to Claudius Cæsar, to request his fauour therein, who arriuing at Rome, found the young King Agrippa there, who besought the Emperor that it might be lawfull for him to haue the keeping of the habit: who commanded Vitellius the gouernour of Syria, to deliuer it vnto his hands. Beforetime it was kept vnder the seale of the high Priest, and the custody of the Treasurers, and on the eeue of a certain solemne feast the Treasurers went vp to the captain, who kept the fortresse for the Romans, and after they had opened their seale, they took the habit: and after the feast was past, they returned it back againe vnto the same place, & shut it vp vnder the same seale in the presence of the captain. All which we haue thought good to lay open, to make the diuersity knowne that was vsed in that care. L

The Tower of Antonia.

After that Herod had in this sort builded this strong tower for the security and guard of the temple, he called it Antonia, for the loue of Antonius his friend, and one of the chiefest men in Rome. In the westerne part of this porch, there were foure gates, whereof the one opened vpon the Kings palace, to which there was a direct way thorow the midst of the valley; the two others led vnto the suburbes: and the fourth opened vpon the rest of the city, and gaue open passage vnto the same, by the meanes of a number of staires, by which men might descend to the foot of the valley; and from thence there was an ascent by other staires to ascend vpwards. For the citie was situate neere vnto the temple, after the manner of a theater; and was bended to the southward by a deep valley. As touching the fourth side turned toward the south, it had likewise certaine gates in the midst thereof; and vpon the same there was a triple gallery very M royall and princely, the length whereof extended from the orientall valley as farre as the westerne. For it was impossible to extend it any further. This worke was one of the most famous peeces that was euer seen vnder the sunne: For the depth of the valley was so great, that it was impossible for a man to see the bottom, if he looked downward from the higher part: and notwithstanding on the same he erected this porch of so great a height, that but to looke from the top therof, & to consider the depth as wel of the valley as the height of the porch, it would make a man giddy, & his eye could not pierce vnto the immeasurable bottome of the same. It had in length

The porch builded aloft aboue the valley.

A length foure ranks of pillars oppoſed the one right ouer againſt the other (for the fourth pane of the wall was fortified with a wall of hewne ſtone) the thickneſſe of the pillars was ſuch, that it was as much as three men could fadome holding one another by the hand, and the length was of twentie and ſeuen foot, with a double baſe at the bottome. The whole number of them was one hundreth, ſixtie and two, and they had Chapters engrauen and damaskt with Corinthian worke. All this building was ſo huge, that it mooued admiration in thoſe that beheld the ſame. Betwixt theſe foure ranks there were three porches, whereof two were on either ſide, containing in breadth each of them thirty foot, and in length a ſtade or furlong: and more then fiftie foot in height. That in the midſt was in bredth once and a halfe as much as theſe two; and in B height twice as much. For it ſurpaſſed the reſt by farre. The floore was made of goodly planks, engrauen with diuers figures; and the roofe thereof was farre higher then any of the reſt, in which certaine huge beames were morteiſed, on which there were certaine pillars builded, vnited and annexed ſo fitly together, that it is a matter incredible to thoſe that haue not ſeene the ſame, and admirable to him that beholdeth it. Such was the faſhion of the circuit of the firſt porch. In the midſt, and not farre off from the other, ſtood the ſecond; whereunto there was an aſcent made with few ſteps. It was incloſed with a ſeparation of ſtone, with an inſcription, forbidding any ſtranger to enter the ſame vpon paine of death. This inward porch both to the ſouthward and the northward had three gates, in ranke equidiſtant the one from the other; and toward the eaſtward had one great gate, by which thoſe men entred who were cleanſed with C their wiues. For beyond that place it was not lawfull for the women to haue acceſſe. But the third inward ſpace was only acceſſible by the Prieſts. In it was the Temple, and before the ſame the Altar; on which they were wont to offer burnt ſacrifices vnto God. But Herod durſt not enter the interiour ſanctuary, from whence profane men were excluded by the law: but by the mediation of the Prieſts he intended the ſtructure and building of the inward porch, and finiſhing in eight yeeres ſpace the reſt of the edifice, at length alſo he finiſhed the Temple it ſelfe by the endeuours of the ſame Prieſts, within the terme of one yeere and ſixe moneths. By which meanes the people were repleniſhed with the fulneſſe of ioy, and euery one gaue thankes vnto God for that the whole worke was finiſhed ſo ſpeedily, and wiſhed all happineſſe to the King for his coſt and diligence in the execution and finiſhing thereof: and they celebrated a great D feaſt in honour of the reſtauration of the Temple. Then did the King offer vp three hundreth oxen vnto God, and the reſt of them each one according to his abilitie offered ſo many ſacrifices, as that ſcarcely they may be comprehended in number, for that their multitude exceedeth their eſtimate.

The dedication of the Temple.

About the very time of the celebration of this feaſt, in the honour of the reedification of the Temple, the Kings day of Coronation fell out, which he was wont to ſolemnize euery yeere with great ioy: and for this twofold occaſion the ſolemnitie and ioy was farre more ſumptuous and compleat. The King alſo cauſed a conduit of water to be made, and conuayed by pipes vnder ground, drawing it from the Caſtle Antonia vnto the Orientall gate of the Temple; neere to which hee builded another Tower alſo, to the end, that by the conduits hee might E aſcend priuily vnto the Temple, if haply the people ſhould practiſe any inſurrections againſt his royaltie. It is reported, that during the building of this Temple, it neuer rained by day time, but only by night, to the intent the worke might not be interrupted: and our predeceſſors haue teſtified no leſſe vnto vs. Neither is this thing vncredible, if we attentiuely conſider thoſe other effects of Gods prouidence. Hitherto concerning the reedification of the Temple.

How Alexander and Aristobulus, being returned vnto their father, were assailed and calumniated by Salome and Pheroras.

The yeere of the world, 3955. before Christs Nativity, 9.

AMONGST the rest of the affaires of the Common-wealth, the King thought it behooued him to redresse and hinder priuate iniuries, both in the citie and countrey: for the which purpose he made a new law vnlike to the former, that it should be lawfull for such as were wall-breakers, to bee sold for slaues out of the limits of his kingdome: which law did not seeme so much to intend the punishment of malefactors, as the dissolution of his owne countrey customes. For to serue forraine nations, who liued not after the manner of the Iewes, and to do whatsoeuer they commanded them, was more preiudiciall vnto religion then vnto the parties conuicted of that fact. Wherefore it was sufficiently already in the old ancient lawes prouided for the punishment of such people, to wit, that a thiefe should restore foure times as much as he stole: which if hee was not able to doe, that then hee was to be sold; not vnto strangers, nor into perpetuall bondage, but only for seuen yeeres: at which time he should againe be set free. So that the common people did interpret this new law to set downe an vniust punishment, and rather to sauour of tyranny, then of princely dignitie, and to be enacted not without contempt of their ancient lawes: so that for this cause all men spake very ill of the King.

At the same time Herod sayled into Italy to salute Cæsar, and to see his children liuing at Rome. Where, Cæsar receiuing him very courteously, permitted him to take his sons home with him, as being now sufficiently instructed in the liberall arts. So taking hereby occaſion, they began alſo falſely to accuſe them, as miſliking their father, who had cauſed their mother to be ſlaine; and as though they had an auerſion from him, whoſe hands were imbrued in their mothers blood. For they well perceiued that by ſuch calumniation they might draw them into hatred, and auert their fathers good will from them. Yet did they not carry theſe their inuentions to the Kings eares, but contented themſelues to bruit them abroad amongſt the common people; which ſo in the end B comming to his hearing, would cauſe in him ſuch enmity and hatred againſt his ſonnes, as that it would ouercome in him all naturall affection.

How Herod gaue wiues vnto Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

BVT the King as yet miſtruſting nothing, mooued with a fatherly care ouer them, had them in ſuch eſtimation as reaſon did require, and for that they were now come vnto mans eſtate, he married them both: and vnto Ariſtobulus hee gaue Bernice the daughter of Salome; and vnto Alexander, Graphyra the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. Which done, C vnderſtanding that Marcus Agrippa was returned out of Italy into Aſia, hee went vnto him thither, and inuited him into his kingdome, requeſting him to accept of his friends entertainment. Which Agrippa yeelding vnto, Herod omitted nothing that might delight him: for hee receiued him in his Cities newly built, ſhewing him the faire houſes and goodly edifices, entertaining him and the reſt of his friends and followers with all ſorts of delights, pompe and magnificence, as well at Sebaſte, as at the hauen of Cæſarea, and in the Caſtles he built, to wit, Alexandrium, Herodium, and Hircania. He alſo brought him to Ieruſalem, where all the people met him apparelled in ſuch goodly and braue attire, as they were accuſtomed to adorne themſelues withall, when as they celebrate their feſtiuals, and with many ioyfull acclamations receiued and ſaluted him. Agrippa offered a hundreth head of fat oxen to God, and feaſted all the people; and al- D though he would willingly haue made a longer abode there, yet winter drawing nigh, fearing tempeſtuous weather, hee was forced to ſaile away with all ſpeed into Ionia, both hee and his friends being honoured with very great preſents.

CHAP. III.

How Herod ſailed vnto Agrippa.

HEROD hauing paſt the winter at home, and hearing that Agrippa was now with an armie minded to goe to Boſphorus, the ſpring time being now at hand, he ſailed vnto him againe, and taking his courſe by Rhodes and Cous, he came towards Lesbus, thinking E there to finde Agrippa: but by a contrary wind he was driuen from thence, and forced a while to ſtay at Chius; where many priuately comming to ſalute him, he rewarded them with princely rewards: and perceiuing that the Citie gate, deſtroyed in the warres againſt Mithridates, was not yet repaired, but lay ſtill ruinated for want of money to repaire it, he gaue them ſo much money as largely ſufficed to reſtore it to the former beautie and bigneſſe; exhorting them with all expedition to reedifie and adorne the Citie as it was in times paſt. At laſt the wind changing, he ſailed firſt to Mitylene, and then to Byzantium; and there vnderſtanding that Agrippa had already paſt the rocks of Cyanes, he followed him with all ſpeed, and ouertooke him at Synope a Citie of Pontus: who contrary to Agrippas expectation arriued there with his nauy: Herods comming was very gratefull vnto Agrippa, and with eſpeciall affection they embraced one another. It was an euident ſigne of friendſhip, that the King omitting his owne priuate buſines, would now come vnto him in ſo conuenient a time. Wherefore Herod ſtill abode with him in the army, alwaies preſent either to aſſiſt him with counſell, or to beare part of the labour with him. He was alſo preſent with him at ſuch times as he meant to be merry, being his only counſellor in difficult matters, for the beneuolence he bare vnto him, and alſo in all his mirth, as being one whom he honoured. Agrippa hauing diſpatcht the buſineſſe in Pontus for which he came, it pleaſed him not to returne by Sea, but to goe by Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, and ſo they came by land to Epheſus: and there taking ſhip they came to Samos. And in all that whole iourney, almost in euery citie he gratified Herod, at his intreatie relieuing many of their necessities. And Herod did in the way helpe many with money that wanted, and spent much vpon his guests: and moreouer if any one had any suit vnto Agrippa, Herod was the onely man that might obtaine his suit for him. And although Agrippa also was both nobly minded and easily intreated to grant all such things as were not preiudiciall to any man; yet was it a matter of no small moment and importance in King Herod, to incite him to vse beneficence, being euen of his owne accord forward enough to put the same in practice. For first of all hee reconciled Agrippa being angry against the Ilienſians, and himselfe paid the money that the people of Chius were indebted vnto Cæsars receiuers, obtaining for them an immunitie: and he also assisted and pleasured others in whatsoeuer they needed.

CHAP. IIII.

How the Iewes of Ionia accused those countreymen for offering to take from them their priuiledges, granted vnto them by the Romanes.

WHEN they came into Ionia, a great multitude of the Iewes inhabiting that countrey being gathered together, expected him to speake vnto him; and finding opportunitie, they complained vnto him of the wrongs that those countreymen offered them, not permitting them to liue according vnto their lawes; and that vpon festiuall daies they pulled and haled them before their tribunall: and that they would not permit them to send sacred money vnto Ierusalem, and that they compelled them to doe publike businesse, and to spend the holy money in those affaires, contrary to the priuiledges granted vnto them by the Romanes. Herod laboured to haue the Iewes complaints heard by Agrippa, & willed one of his friends and followers called Nicholaus, to plead the Iewes cause: who made a speech vnto Agrippa, sitting with the rest of the Romans nobilitie, and other Kings & Princes, in their behalfe after this manner: Most worthy Agrippa, true it is, that all men that suffer iniury, are constrained to flie for redresse to the higher powers, and we, ouer and aboue, hope to obtaine our suit. For we aske nothing but that which your beneficence hath already granted, and that which they endeauour to take from vs that are, as we also are, your subiects. And although that your benefit bestowed vpon vs was great, yet are we worthy still to enioy it, onely for that you your selfe iudged vs worthy thereof. And suppose it was a small matter, it is a discredit for you not to grant so small a trifle. Wherefore it is euident, that the iniury done vnto vs, doth also redound vnto you, whose decrees those that haue iniuried vs, feare not to contemne, and to disanull your beneficence towards vs. For if any one should aske any of them whether they had rather lose their liues, then be depriued of their country lawes, rites, sacrifices, & festiuities, wherwith they honor their gods; I know well they would rather endure any calamity, then to be forced to forsake their countrey customes. For many wars arise only for defence of religion: and the greatest reward and content that we reape by this happy peace, which through your means we enioy, is this, that we are euery one permitted to liue according to the custome of his country, and to continue in piety. Wherefore they endeuour to take from others that, which by no meanes they would permit to be taken from themselues; as who would say, it was not as great an offence to hinder other mens piety and deuotion, as neglect their own. Let vs consider whether there be any city or nation, that doth not account their felicity to be situate in your dominion, and the power of the Romanes? or is there any that desireth your honour & power to decay & be of no force? Truly none that is wise: for there is none, whom either publikely or priuately it cōcerneth not: but these people endeuouring to take from vs your liberty, do also as it were depriue themselues of all benefits which they haue receiued at your hands, which are infinite. For what a benefit is it, that whereas other nations liuing vnder the dominion of rigorous Kings cōstituted ouer thē; these do only obey the Romans, and liue in happy peace & tranquillity? But as for our affaires, were no man troublesome vnto vs, yet are they not such as deserue to be enuied. For enioying the common felicity, which others your subiects do, we desire nothing of high estimate or worth, but only request that we may liue according to the religion of our country, which of it selfe is not to be enuied at, but may be profitable for them that permit it. For God doth alwaies loue them, who honour him, & them who do not hinder his honor. What is there in our religion offensiue to any man? nay, what is there that is not according to all piety and iustice: whereby all things continue and are preserued? For neither doe we conceale what life we follow, nor the labours and exercise we vse, but resting the seuenth Nicholaus did make a speech vnto Agrippa in the behalfe of the Iewes.

A seuenth day from all labors,we spend that day in learning our religion,and the lawes & customs thereof, esteeming this custome not to be of small force to correct and amend our manners. These our customes hauing in them nothing that any that searcheth them,can iustly reprehend, they are now also, though many are perswaded the contrary, consecrated & confirmed by their antiquity: So that we must needs make a conscience of it to forsake our lawes, that haue endured so many ages. These are the iniuries that these people by violence offer vs; they sacrilegiously take from vs the money dedicated to God:they impose tributes vpon vs,who are free:they vpon festiuall daies force vs to their tribunals,to law and other profane busines, without any necessity,but onely in contumely and disgrace of our religion,which they know well in the meane B while that they persecute with vniust and vnlawfull hatred.For your Empire,equally prouiding for the good of all your subiects, doth not onely nourish the mutuall concord of them all, but also resisteth hatred and malice. These are the iniuries, most worthy Agrippa, whereof we seeke redresse at thy hands, requesting thee that hereafter we may liue according to our religion as beforetimes,and that our aduersaries may haue no more authority ouer vs then we ouer them: which is not onely iustice and equity,but already also granted by your clemency. And there are yet extant to be seen in the Capitoll many decrees and ordinances of the Senate concerning this matter, engrauen in brasse, which are read vnto this day: doubtlesse for our truth and fidelitie so oftentimes tried: or at least, though we not deseruing it,yet holy and inuiolate. For you doe not onely not withdraw from vs and all other nations your former benefits granted vnto vs, but C you doe rather euery day beside all hope and expectation increase them: all which,time will not suffer me to recount. And that we may not seeme vainly to boast of our duties and officiousnesse towards you, and also omitting other things that are past; our King now sitting with you can sufficiently testifie it so to be.For what kind of loue and good will hath he omitted to shew vnto your nation? where was he not proued trusty? what hath he not deuised to honour you? where stood you in need,when he was not the first man to helpe you? Why therefore should not we receiue some fauour for his deserts? I will not omit to put you in minde of the fortitude of his father Antipater, who came with two thousand souldiers to assist Cæsar in the Egyptian warres, wherein he so valiantly behaued himselfe, that neither by sea nor land any one in those warres deserued more commendations then himselfe. I will not recount at this time how much good D he did Cæsar in those warres,and what and how great rewards he therefore receiued: but rather I should first of all put you in remembrance of the letters that the Emperour writ vnto the Senate concerning this matter, wherewith he obtained for Antipater the honours and priuiledges of the City. For this onely argument had beene sufficient to haue declared that we did not obtaine such fauour without desert,and request thee now to confirme the same,of whom we might iustly hope for new benefits, seeing such friendship and familiarity betweene thee and our King. For we haue vnderstood by our nation that dwell in Iudæa,how many offerings thou didst there sacrifice vnto our God, and with what vowes thou honouredst him: how thou feastedst the people,and wast delighted in that mutuall hospitality. All which are as it were an argument of the friendship confirmed betweene so great a Romane Prince, and the nation of the Iewes, euen in E Herods house. By all these,we humbly request in the presence of the King nothing but this only, that thou wouldest not permit vs deceitfully to bee defrauded of that, which you your selues haue already granted vnto the nation of the Iewes.

The yeres of the world, 3956. before Christs Natiuity, 8.

Now no one of the Greeks offred to oppose himselfe against that which Nicholaus did speake: for this was no contention to a Iudge concerning their right,but onely a deprication and supplication to auoid iniurie. Neither did they denie it: onely thus they excused themselues,that the Iewes dwelling amongst them,were troublesome vnto them. But the Iewes shewed themselues to be free citizens,and to liue according to their religion and lawes of their country,without any mans molestation or iniury. Wherefore Agrippa vnderstanding that they were wronged,answered thus; that he would not onely gratifie them for his friend Herods sake, but also for that they F seemed to him to demand a reasonable matter. Wherefore though they had demanded a greater thing of him, he would haue granted them whatsoeuer he might, without preiudicing the people of Rome. And now seeing they onely demand of him that which already the Romanes had granted vnto them,he would ratifie and confirme vnto them the benefit which they had already receiued at the Romanes hands, and prouide that henceforth no man should molest them for liuing according to the institution and ordinances of their countrey. Hauing thus spoken,he dismissed the assembly. Then Herod arising,thanked him in all their names. And then after mutuall embracing one another,they departed, taking their leaues from Lesbus.

Agrippa confirmeth the Iewes priuiledge.

Agrippa departed from Lesbus.

How HEROD returned into Iudæa.

Herod returned to Ierusalem, and made a speech vnto the people, & let them vnderstand the cause of his iniury, and remitted the fourth part of his tribute.

THE King hauing a prosperous winde, within a few dayes after arriued at Cæsarea; and from thence he went to Ierusalem; and calling together all the people, as well the citizens as also the countrey people there present, there he told them the cause of his iourney, and how he had obtained immunities for the Iewes liuing in Asia, that they might conuerse there among the Gentiles, without molestation. Then he recounted vnto them, what felicitie they had receiued and enioyed by his raigne, seeing that his greatest care was so to prouide for his subiects, that they might want nothing. And to gratifie them the more, he told them, that he would freely remit the fourth part of the taxes and tribute they were to pay for the yeere past. The people greatly comforted as well with the Kings speech vnto them, as with his liberality, departed ioyfully, wishing the King all happinesse.

CHAP. VI.

Of the discord in HERODS house, betweene him and his sonnes.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 3. al. 7. Salome persecuteth Mariammes children with naturall hatred.

IN the meane time, the discord of his house was daily increased; for Salome greatly maligned the two young men, as hauing an hereditary hatred rooted in her heart; and presumed by reason of her good successe in her exploit practised against their mother, to labour all waies possible not to leaue any aliue, that might reuenge her death, who died, not deseruing it. And she wanted no occasion, for that it seemed the young men were not very well affected toward their father, partly for the memory of their mothers death, and partly also for that they desired the Kingdome. So that they vpbraiding Salome and Pheroras, did renew their old hatred against them, who daily practised, by all meanes they could, to ouerthrow them: the young men also hated them, but not with like hatred that they were hated of them. For they for their ingenuous manners and noble race dissembled not their anger, but with lauish tongues declared their mindes. But Salome and Pheroras contrariwise enuiously and craftily prepared themselues a way by calumniations, alwaies prouoking the magnanimous spirits of these young men, whose fierceneſſe might soone bring them into suspicion with their father, to the intent that he might gather hereby, that they wanted not will to reuenge their mothers death, yea euen with their owne hands, forasmuch as they were not ashamed to be the children of such a mother, and would contend that she was vniustly put to death. And now all the whole city talked of them, euery one pittying the young mens simplicity: Salome not ceasing to gather by their owne speeches probable arguments of suspicion, that they did not onely take their mothers death impatiently, but also raging like young men, did both bewaile her death, and their owne case, who were cõpeld to liue with the murtherers of their vnfortunate mother, & as it were contaminate themselues with liuing amongst them. And the absence of the King greatly increased this their dissension; who being returned, and hauing made a speech vnto the people, he presently was admonished both by Pheroras and Salome his sister, that he was in great danger, by reason of the two yong men, who did openly boast that they would be reuenged of them that killed their mother: feining moreouer, that they were incouraged, for that they hoped that Archelaus King of Cappadocia would help them, to accuse their father vnto Cæsar. Herod hearing this, was greatly troubled; and so much the more, for that he heard the same also reported vnto him by others: And hereby he was put in memory of that which was past, how that for the dissension of his house, he could not long enioy his friends and deerest wife. And as it were foreseeing by that that was past what would ensue, and fearing some greater calamity would befall him, he was altogether amazed. And truly as abroad he was most fortunate aboue all hope; so at home he was most vnhappy and infortunate beyond mens opinion: So that one may well doubt whether his fortunate successe abroad did counteruaile his misfortunes at home; or whether it had beene more expedient for him to haue had neither the one nor the other, but to haue had onely a common and ordinary fauour at fortunes hands. Deliberating thus with himselfe, he thought it good to call vnto the Court another sonne of his, whom he begat when he was a priuate man, and to grace him with honours, and to oppose him against the other two brethren, to the end, to bring downe and represse their fierce and hauty minds: (this sonne of his was called Antipater) not minded (which after ouercome by affection hee did) to make him sole heire of all, but thinking ing hereby to bridle Mariammes children, and to diminish their arrogancy by letting them see that it was not needfull to keepe the inheritance of so flourishing a kingdome onely for them: wherefore he introduced Antipater, one opposed against them, that therby the young men laying their pride aside, might shew themselues more tractable to their father: and so now he thought he had by this meanes prouided for the safetie of these young men. But it fell out far otherwise then he expected; for the young men esteemed this fact as an iniury done vnto them: And Antipater was of that nature, that hauing gotten promotion contrary to his expectation, he did endeauour all waies possible to be in greater account with his father then the two young men, who was now through false accusations alienated from them, and euery day (as he also desired) ready to beleeue any thing that might incense him against them.

Antipater inciteth his father against his brothers.

Wherefore this was all his labour: yet had he an especiall care not to be thought an accuser of his brethren, but he vsed others of his accomplices, whom the King nothing suspected; who for the trust the King put in them, might also haue better credit giuen vnto their words. For now this man had many followers and fauourers, as it were gaping after preferment by his meanes, who with a kinde of counterfeit good will made a shew of loue and good will towards Herod. And being many in number and trusty one to another, the young men were euery day entrapped more and more: for many times they shed teares for very griefe of the contumelies and iniuries that they suffered; and many times they mentioned their mother, and complained vnto those whom they thought to be their friends, of their father, as one that dealt not wel with them: all which Antipaters partakers maliciously noting, and adding thereunto something of their own inuention, they did presently tell it vnto Herod; and so did nourish the dissension of his house. For the King being moued hereat, and purposing to humble Mariammes children, did daily encrease and augment Antipaters honors, and at his entreaties at last brought his mother into the Court; and many times writing secretly vnto Cæsar in fauour of Antipater, he especially commended him in particular vnto him: and being to saile to salute Agrippa, who was now to depart out of Asia, hauing gouerned that prouince ten yeers, he only tooke with him Antipater of all his sonnes, whom also he committed vnto Agrippa with many gifts, to goe with him to Rome, and to be brought into fauour with Cæsar; so that now all things seemed to be done, as it were by this mans becke, and the young men to be already disinherited.

Herod brought Antipaters mother into his Palace.

Herod deliuereth Antipater to Agrippa, to be carried to Rome.

CHAP. VII.

How ANTIPATER liuing at Rome, HEROD brought ALEXANDER and his brothers thither, and accused them before CÆSAR.

THis iourney did greatly aduantage Antipater, and increase his honour and preeminence aboue his brethren: for he became famous at Rome, being by his fathers letters commended vnto all his friends there: yet this was a great griefe vnto him, that hee could not daily calumniate his brethren; for he feared lest his fathers mind should change, and so hee should affect Mariammes children most. This was his daily cogitation: but though he were absent, yet he ceased not by letters to incite his father against them, as hauing care of his safety; but indeed for that he thereby through his bad practices hoped to obtaine the kingdom: so that hee so increased Herods wrath against them, that he now was become a deadly enemy vnto the young men. But indeuouring to resist this affection, and fearing rashly in his anger to commit any thing to preiudice them, he determined to saile againe to Rome, and there accuse his sonnes before Cæsar, lest he being led away through indignation and displeasure conceiued against the young men, should seeme to cast off all loue and fatherly affection towards them. And repairing to Rome, and not finding Cæsar there, he followed him vnto Aquileia: and comming to speech of him, and requesting him to take notice of his misfortunes, he presented his two sons, and accused them before Cæsar of insolency, and for hauing attempted to poyson him, complaining their hatred to be gone so farre, that now by any wicked and execrable way whatsoeuer they sought their fathers kingdome; notwithstanding that Cæsar had giuen him full power & liberty to leaue the kingdome to him, whom he found most dutifull and obedient vnto him. And that they, though therby they might not gaine the kingdom, yet they could be contented with their fathers death, and that they sought it with danger of their owne liues, and that this horrible and detestable hatred was now rooted in their hearts. And that he hauing long endured this calamity, was now forced to open it vnto Cæsar, and trouble his eares with these complaints. And spake after this manner: Haue I deserued this at their hands? what wrong haue I done them? or how Antipater was honoured at Rome.

Antipater whē he was present incited his father against his brethren by lies, & being absent, he did the same by letters.

how can they thinke it reason, that I who haue exposed my selfe to so many dangers, and vnder- G gone so difficult labours for a long time to obtaine the kingdome, should not peaceably enioy the same, and suffer me to be Lord of mine owne dominion, and permit me the libertie to leaue it vnto him who shall deserue such honour in the best performance of a son-like duty? So that the beholders hereof seeing pietie so rewarded, might hereby be the more incited thereunto, especially seeing that without violating the law of nature, it is not lawfull to thinke any such thought: for no man can affect his fathers kingdome, but he doth also desire his fathers death, seeing that it is not permitted men to succeed those in the kingdome who are yet aliue. Hee alleadged moreouer, that for his part he had had a care that they should want nothing conuenient for a kind father to prouide for princely children, neither ornaments, nor followers, nor delights: H that also he had prouided for them wiues of noble race, and had married one of them vnto his sisters daughter; and the other vnto Archelaus his daughter King of Cappadocia: and which was the greatest matter of all, he had not vsed the authoritie of a father against them after these their enterprizes, but brought them vnto Cæsar their common benefactor; and that forsaking his owne right of a father, who had beene iniured, or of a King, against whom treason had beene wrought, hee was now content to debate his matter with them before such a Iudge, as well knew how to decide the thing in question according to right and equitie: yet requested he him that the offence of theirs might not be left vnpunished, nor he forced to lead the rest of his life still in perpetuall feare: seeing that it was expedient that they should neuer see light againe after such haynous offences, and to escape vnpunished, after the violating of all lawes of God and na- I ture. Herod hauing with a vehement voyce obiected these accusations against his sonnes before Cæsar; the young men were not able to abstaine from teares whilest he was yet speaking, and hauing ended his speech, they wholly resolued into teares: not for that they were guiltie of those impieties laid vnto their charge, but for that they were accused by their father, against whom it was not decent to speake freely for themselues, nor expedient to refuse to defend their owne cause. Wherein they remained doubtfull what to doe, mooving the auditors to pitie them by their teares and lamentations, and carefull withall lest it should be thought that their guiltie conscience did so trouble them, that they were not able to speake in their owne defence, seeing that indeed it was their want of skill and tender yeeres, by reason whereof they were so amazed. Which also Cæsar well perceiued, and all that were present were so mooued to compassion, that K neither their father who was their accuser could long refraine from being mooued hereat to compassion.

Alias, chap. 9. Alexander & Aristobulus moue all that were present, euen their father and accuser to teares and compassion.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Alexanders defence, and how the two brethren were reconciled vnto their father Herod.

Alexander speaketh in his owne, and his brothers defence.

THEN the young men perceiuing both their father and Cæsar to relent, and the rest that were present partly to pitie them, partly to shead teares of compassion: the one of them named Alexander, who was the elder, framing his speech vnto his father, began thus to purge himselfe of the crimes obiected against them: My father, how well and friendly min- I ded thou art towards vs, this present iudgement declareth: for hadst thou determined any heauy sentence against vs, thou wouldst not haue brought vs before him, who is the preseruer of vs all: for thou mightest being a King, or for thy authority ouer vs as a father, haue punished vs for our offence according to thy power; but in that thou hast brought vs to Rome, and made Cæsar our Iudge, it is an argument that thou seekest to saue vs: for no man brings any one to the Temple whom he purposeth to destroy: which greatly aggrauateth our cause, who doe censure our selues vnworthy to liue, rather then to incurre an opinion of impiety committed against thee such a father. How farre more expedient is it to die guiltlesse, then to liue suspected of such offences? Wherefore, if truth be our patrone, we shall be happy either by thy owne iudgement, or for that we haue escaped danger: but if calumniations do preuaile against vs, it is superfluous M and to no purpose that we liue. For what good would it doe vs, if we liue in continuall suspicion? It is a probable accusation to accuse our yeeres, as hauing affected the kingdome; and our vnfortunate mothers calamity maketh it seeme more probable. But consider I beseech thee, if the same crime may not as well be framed against any one whomsoeuer, as against vs. For any King hauing children by a wife that is now dead, may if it please him suspect them, as practising treason against him their father. But suspicion is not sufficient to proue a man impious and guiltie: wherefore bring any one forth that can tell any argument of this crime by vs to haue beene attemp-attempted, which may adde credit to this calumniation; Can any man shew that poison was prepared by vs for you; or that we conspired with any; or that we corrupted any seruants with mony and gifts; or that we writ any letters against thee? yet may calumniation faine euery one of these vpon no occasion. It is a grieuous matter for discord to be in a Princes court; & the hope of dominion, which your Maiesty affirmed to be the reward of piety, doth often impell mens minds vnto hainous offences. But although it bee most certaine that we cannot be conuicted of any crime; yet how can we cleare our selues from accusations forged against vs, before them that will not heare vs? But did we speak some insolent words; yet were they not against thee, O my father (for that had been impiety) but against them who tell all they heare. We bewayled our mothers misfortunes. It is true: but not because she is dead, but because after her death she is euill spoken of by those, who ought not to doe it. We affect the Kingdome of our father, he being yet aliue. Wherein? Is not that purpose of ours vaine and friuolous, we hauing alreadie beene graced with kingly honours? And suppose we were not; yet might we hope for them. But could we expect them by killing of thee, whom both earth and seas would disdaine after so execrable an offence? Or could we haue expected that the loyalty of thy subiects, and the lawes of our nation would haue permitted vs, hauing gotten the Kingdom by murthering our father, to haue enioyed the same, and entred into the holy temple, which thou didst repaire? Or suppose we despised them all; yet could any one that murthered thee escape, Cæsar being liuing? Thy children by thee begotten are not so impious nor foolish, though more infortunate then thy estate requireth. And seeing thou hast nothing to accuse vs of, or nothing to proue any accusation laid vnto our charge, how canst thou bee perswaded that wee are guilty of such inhumane acts? Is it because our mother was put to death? But her death ought rather to haue made vs more wary then insolent and rash. We could speake more in our owne defence, then this, but what need is it to excuse that which was neuer done? Wherfore we beseech Cæsar (who is Lord of all, and now our Iudge) only this, that if thou canst, O my father, put away out of thy mind all suspicion of vs, to suffer vs to liue hereafter, how vnhappy and vnfortunate soeuer: for what is more miserable than to be rashly accused without cause? But if thou canst not, we liuing, liue without feare of vs, let vs dye condemned by our owne censure. For our liues are not so deare vnto vs, that we desire to keepe them to his molestation that bestowed them vpon vs.

Cæsar with these words, though before not greatly crediting such accusations and slanders laid against them, was now more moued to beleeue that they were guiltlesse; and the rather, for that fixing his eyes vpon Herod, he perceiued him also to be much moued, and all that were present were sorrowfull for the young men: so that all courtiers present thought hardly of the King, for the absurd and friuolous accusation framed against them; and the flower of their age, wherin they were now indangered, moued all mens minds what they could to assist them: And much more were they incited, after that Alexander had ingenuously refuted his fathers accusations, the accused remaining still in the same habit and place, and for griefe fixing their eyes vpon the ground. At last some hope appeared, so that the King himselfe seemed to need some excuse, for hauing so rashly accused his sonnes, without any certaine proofe of his accusations. At last, Cæsar hauing a while deliberated with himselfe, pronounced that the young men were innocent, and guiltlesse of the crimes laid vnto their charge: yet herein they were culpable, in that they had so behaued themselues, that they gaue their father occasion herein to suspect them. And as for Herod, he requested him to lay aside all suspicion, and to bee reconciled vnto his children. For it was vniustly done of him to beleeue such forged accusations against those whom he had begotten, and that one might recompence another in time to come for their former offences, and renew the good will betweene them in times past, if to abolish all suspicions, either did hereafter shew himselfe more friendly to other then before. Cæsar hauing thus admonished the young men, they prepared themselues to intreat their fathers wonted fauour: he not expecting so long, came and embraced each of them one after another, they weeping exceedingly; and all those that were present, both seruants and others did the like.

All men doe pity the young men.

Cæsar pronounceth the young men herin to haue offended, that they gaue occasion of suspicion, and he exhorteth the father to bee reconciled to his children.

Herod is reconciled to his children.

Then giuing humble thanks vnto Cæsar, they departed together; and Antipater with them, counterfaiting himselfe to congratulate their good hap, for that they were now reconciled vnto his father. Within a few daies after, Herod gaue Cæsar three hundred talents, who was now bestowing his gifts & presents at Rome, and exercising his liberality vpon the people. And Cæsar againe bestowed vpon him halfe of the reuenues out of the mines of the metall in Cyprus; and the other halfe vnto the ouerseer thereof; and gracing him otherwise also, he gaue him leaue to chuse which of his sonnes he pleased for to succeed him in his Kingdome; or if he had rather to distribute it amongst them all: which Herod presently would haue done, but Cæsar would not permit him, affirming, that during his life he should keepe it all whole and vndiuided, and his sonnes should be subiect vnto him.

Cæsar gaue Herod halfe his reuennes out of the mines of Cyprus.

After this, Herod returned againe into Iudæa, in whose absence the Trachonites that were no small part of his Kingdome, were reuolted: yet by the industry of the captaines he left to ouersee all in his absence, they were conquered againe, and forced to do as they were commanded. As Herod and his sonnes were sailing towards home, arriuing at Eleusa a City of Cilicia, which is now called Sebaste, he found Archelaus there, who was King of Cappadocia. Archelaus did courteously entertain Herod, and was very ioyfull that his sonnes and he were made friends, and that Alaxander his son in law had so well cleered himselfe and his brother of the crimes laid vnto their charge. And so each one bestowing vpon the other princely gifts, they departed taking their leaue one of the other. After this, Herod being newly returned into Iudæa, and calling the people together into the temple, told them all that had past in his absence from them, and the courtesie of Cæsar: and told them also of other affaires that he thought meet for them to know; and turning the latter end of his speech vnto his sonnes, & exhorting the courtiers and common people to concord, he told them that his sonnes should raigne after him, and first of all Antipater: & after him his sonnes that he had by Mariamme, Alexander & Aristobulus; in the meane time euery one of them should honour him as King and Lord, notwithstanding his old age, which for long experience was the fitter to gouerne, seeing there was nothing in him wanting to keep both his subiects & children in their obedience; & that the souldiers also if they only respected him, should liue in all happinesse & felicitie without molestation. Hauing thus spoken, he dismissed the people; some thinking he had spoken according to equity; others thinking cleane contrary: For hauing now as it were caused an emulation amongst his children, there was as it were already a shew of some mutation.

The rebels are cõquered.

How Herod hauing finished Cæsarea, for ioy thereof did celebrate euery first yeere certaine sports.

The yeere of the world, 3957. before the birth of Christ, 7.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. al. 10.

Cæsarea is finished.

Quinquennale certamen.

ABOVT this time Cæsarea was finished, the tenth yeere after it was begun to be built, the 28. yeere of Herods raigne, in the 192. Olympiade. In the dedication heereof there was great pompe and sumptuous preparations: for all musicians were brought thither to striue one with another, who was most excellent in their art; and champions that wrastled being naked and anointed with oyle: there was also a great many that fought with swords, and a great numbet of sauage beasts; and all things else that at such times were vsed, and in accouut, either at Rome or in other countries. These sports were also consecrated vnto Cæsar, and were to be renewed euery fift yeere. All this prouision the King at his owne cost and charges prouided to be brought from any place whatsoeuer, to shew the gratnesse of his magnificence. Iulia, Cæsars wife also bestowed much of her owne to the furnishing hereof, and sent many precious things out of Italy; so that the worth of them all amounted vnto fiue hundred talents. And a great company being gathered together to behold these sports, he receiued all Embassadours sent vnto him from other nations, to thanke him for the benefits he had bestowed on them; and he lodged, feasted and sported them: and being all day long amongst the people to see those sports, at night hee receiued them with banquets, and shewing them his magnificence; and gained great praise and commendations for a worthy King. For, he in all things so prouided, that the last was more pleasing and gratefull then the first, and caused him to bee more admired. And it is reported, that Cæsar himselfe and Agrippa often did say, that Herods magnanimity was greater then his present reuenewes could beare, and that he well deserued an Empire, as big as all Syria and Egypt. These sports being ended, he builded another towne in a field, called Capharsaba, chusing for it a watery soyle fit for plants: the citie was compassed with a riuer; and hee also planted round about it a wood full of most goodly trees. This towne he called Antipatris, after his fathers name Antipater. After which he also builded a castle about Iericho, called after his mothers name, Cypron, which was very strongly defenced, and adorned within with rare and sumptuous edifices. And not forgetting his brothers, he dedicated vnto him most goodly buildings: for first he built a tower as bigge as Pharo in the city, in remembrance of his dead brother, and called it by his name Phasaelus, which also was the strongest hold and defence in all the city. After this, he builded a towne neere vnto the vally of Iericho, as one goes toward the north, wherby the fields that before almost lay desart, were now tilled tilled and inhabited by the towneſmen; ſo that of them it was named Phaſaelus field. It were hard to recount all his liberalitie in particular ſhewed both vnto the cities of Syria and Grecia, and all other places whereſoeuer he came: for he helped many either by building publike places; or if there were any new works begun, and not finiſhed for want of money, by giuing them money to finiſh them: the chiefeſt amongſt all which were, that he builded at his owne coſt and charge the temple of Apollo at Rhodes; and gaue them many talents of ſiluer to build their ſhips. He alſo builded the greateſt part of the publike houſes and places in the City by Actium, which Cæſar built for the Nicopolitanes there inhabiting, and that with his own proper coſts and charges. Hee alſo for the Antiochians inhabiting the greateſt Citie of Syria, builded porches on each ſide of the greater ſtreet, that goeth quite thorow the midſt of the Citie, and doth as it were part it into two: and the ſtreet it ſelfe that lay open, he paued with poliſhed ſtone: which worke was as great a commodity to the inhabitants, as a beauty vnto their Citie. He alſo helped to maintaine the ſports at Olympus with yeerely reuenewes, that now for want of maintenance began to decay: ſo that by his meanes there were more ſolemne ſacrifices, and all things more ſumptuous to pleaſe them that came to behold them: for which his liberalitie he was declared perpetuall maſter and maintainer of thoſe ſports. It is admirable to ſee in one man ſuch diuerſity of minds: for on the one ſide if we reſpect his liberalitie and beneficence towards all men, we muſt needs ſay, he was of a moſt free and bountifull nature; contrariwiſe, if we conſider the iniuries and crueltie he ſhewed againſt his ſubiects and deareſt friends, we muſt confeſſe him to haue beene a hard man, and intractable, and who paſſed all bounds of modeſty; ſo that we would thinke him to haue bin of two contrary diſpoſitions. But I am otherwiſe perſwaded, and thinke that both theſe did proceed from one matter: for becauſe he thirſted after glory and honour, and wholly applyed himſelfe thereunto, he became liberall whereſoeuer he was, in hope either to reape preſent thankes for his labour, or a future remembrance. Wherefore ſpending aboue his reuenewes for this matter, hee was forced to be chargeable vnto his ſubiects: for it was neceſſary that hee that ſo lauiſhly beſtowed ſuch huge ſummes of money vpon others, ſhould ſome where get it, though with euill meanes. Laſtly, ſeeing himſelfe for ſuch like iniuries hated of his ſubiects, he thought it a hard matter to get their good wils; which he could do no waies elſe, but by remitting the tribute they paid him. Wherefore he abuſed the hatred of his people for his owne commodity: for if any one of them did not tolerate that ſlauery wherein they liued, or did endeauour to ſhake off the yoke of his dominion, againſt ſuch he vſed a maruailous cruelty; and outraged them no leſſe, then as if they had beene his enemies, neither reſpecting friendſhip nor kinred; for that he deſired alone to be honoured of all men. And how greedy of honour he was, we may gueſſe by the honours he did vnto Cæſar, Agrippa, and others of their friends: for he deſired to be an example to his ſubiects, that as he himſelfe honoured men better then himſelfe; ſo they ſhould all honor him likewiſe: thereby declaring what thing he did naturally moſt deſire. But the Iewes religion doth not permit them licence to honour Potentates, who of neceſſity ought to haue greater care and reſpect of right and equity, then of ſuch officiouſneſſe towards ſuperiours: for it was diſprofit enough vnto the Iewes, that they could not with ſtatuaes and Temples obtaine the Kings fauour, and with ſuch like flatteries ſatisfie the fond appetites of a vaine-glorious man. And this ſeemeth to me to be the reaſon that Herod was vniuſt, and hard towards his friends, and to thoſe whom he made partakers of his counſels and enterprizes; and franke and bountifull towards ſtrangers.

Of the Embaſſage of the Cyrenian and Aſian Iewes vnto CÆSAR.

THE Aſian and Cyrenian Iewes were greatly afflicted by the citizens of thoſe countries, who hauing had the ſame priuiledges granted vnto them by the ancient Kings that the citizens had, were now greatly iniured by the Greeks: as though they carried money out of the countrey, and were preiudiciall vnto the reſt of the inhabitants. And the Greeks making no end of theſe their iniuries, they were conſtrained by Embaſſadors to complaine of them vnto Cæſar: who wrote vnto euery Prouince, that it was his pleaſure that the Iewes ſhould enioy like priuiledges with the other inhabitants of the countrey. The copy of which writing we haue here ſet downe, that it may the better appeare, how the Romane Emperours of ancient times were affected vnto our nation.

Cæſar Auguſtus Pont. Max. Trib. poteſtatis, thus decreeth. For as much as the Nation of the Iewes hath alwaies beene truſty vnto the Romans, not onely at this day, but alſo in all former ages, and eſpecially in the time of our father Cæſar the Emperor, vnder Hircanus their High Prieſt: I haue ordained, that according to the common ſentence of the Senate, they ſhall liue after their countrey lawes, vnder which they liued in the time of Hircanus the High Prieſt of God: and that their Temple ſhall retaine the right of a ſanctuary, and that it ſhall be lawfull for them to ſend votiue money vnto Ieruſalem by certaine perſons: and that they ſhall not be compelled to appeare before any Iudge vpon their Sabbath daies, or the day before their Sabbaths, after nine of the clocke vpon the preparation day. And if any one be knowne to ſteale the holy bookes, or holy money laid vp in their places appointed for religion, he ſhal be guilty of ſacriledge: and his goods ſhall be confiſcate vnto the treaſurie of the people of Rome. I alſo decree for the good will I beare vnto all men, that their memoriall or requeſt offred vnto me by C. Marcus Cenſorinus, ſhall together with this my edict be publiſhed in that famous place, which all Aſia hath dedicated vnto my name, to wit, Argyra. And if any ſhall be ſo hardie as to doe contrary to our decree; he ſhall be puniſhed extraordinarily. This was engrauen in a pillar in Cæſars Temple. Cæſar wiſheth health vnto Norbanus Flaccus: Let it be lawfull for all Iewes whereſoeuer liuing, to carrie their ſacred money vnto Ieruſalem, according to their ancient cuſtome, and that no man ſhould forbid them ſo to doe: and this did Cæſar write in fauour of the Iewes.

Agrippa writ vnto the Rulers of Epheſus, in the Iewes behalfe, and to Syllanus and the Magiſtrates of Cyrenia.

Agrippa alſo wrote in the Iewes behalfe, as followeth: Agrippa wiſheth health vnto the magiſtrates, Senate, and people of Epheſus: I will that the Iewes liuing in Aſia keepe their ſacred money, which according to the cuſtome of their countrey, they are wont to ſend vnto Ieruſalem: and if any one ſhall ſteale their holy money, that the ſame perſon, if he flie to a ſanctuary, ſhall be violently taken away from thence, as a ſacrilegious perſon, and deliuered vnto the Iewes to be puniſhed. He alſo wrote vnto Syllanus the Magiſtrate, that the Iewes might not bee conſtrained vpon their Sabbaths to appeare before a Iudge. M. Agrippa wiſheth health to the Cyrenian Magiſtrates and Senate. The Iewes inhabiting amongſt you, for whom Auguſtus hath already written vnto Flauius the Preſident of Libya, and vnto other Magiſtrates of that Prouince, are not to be hindred from ſending their holy money to Ieruſalem, as their cuſtome is: and they haue now complained vnto me, that they are moleſted by the falſe accuſations of ſome bad people, and forbidden to doe it vnder pretence of a certaine tribute, which notwithſtanding they are not to pay. Wherefore I command that they may be permitted to liue after their cuſtome, and free from all ſuch matters: and if in any of your Cities any ſacred money of theirs be intercepted, that by certaine perſons which you know to be fit for that purpoſe, yee make choice of them, to ſend it againe vnto the Iewes. Item C. Norbanus Flaccus proconſull: Health vnto the Magiſtrates of Sardinia: Cæſar hath written vnto me, commanding that no man hinder the Iewes, according to their cuſtome, to ſend ſacred money vnto Ieruſalem: wherefore I alſo write vnto you of the ſame, that you may not be ignorant both of my will and Cæſars alſo. Moreouer, Iulius Antonius proconſull did alſo write to this effect; Health vnto the Magiſtrates, Senate and people of Epheſus. The Iewes of Aſia in the Ides of February, I ſitting in the iudiciall ſeat at Epheſus, ſignified vnto me that Cæſar Auguſtus and Agrippa haue permitted them to vſe their countrey cuſtomes; and euery one, according as he thinketh good, to contribute his firſt fruits for religion ſake, to be carried without let or hinderance vnto the Temple of the moſt mighty God: and they deſired me to ratifie by my conſent, that which they had already granted them by the abouenamed Emperours. Wherefore I would haue you to know, that I alſo, according vnto Cæſars and Agrippas decrees and ordinances, doe permit and grant them alſo to doe all things they pleaſe, according vnto their countrey cuſtomes, forbidding any man to hinder them therein.

Caius Norbanus Flaccus writeth in the Iewes behalfe. Iulius Antonius proconſul.

I haue thought good to annexe theſe decrees, for that I know that theſe my writings will come vnto the Grecians hands, that I may ſhew them, that in former ages we were ſo eſteemed of the publike Magiſtrates, that none were permitted to hinder vs from vſing our countrey rites and ceremonies, and that by their conſent we worſhipped God in our owne religion: which I doe inculcate the oftner, that I may mooue ſtrange and forrain nations, and take away their hatred conceiued againſt vs, which is without all reaſonable cauſe. For no nation doth alwaies vſe the ſame cuſtoms, but almoſt whole townes amongſt them do ſometimes alter and differ from the reſt; yet is iuſtice equally to be diſtributed vnto all men: which is moſt profitable, as well to the Greeks as to other barbarous nations, which is greatly obſerued in our lawes; which if we follow and violate not, are able to make all narions loue vs. Wherfore we requeſt all men not to deſpiſe vs, for that we differ from them in religion, but fauour vs in that we follow vertue. For this is common to all nations: and without this, mans life cannot ſtand. But I will now returne vnto my hiſtory.

CHAP. XI.

How HEROD, hauing need of money, opened DAVIDS Sepulchre.

HEROD ſpending lauiſhly much and many ſummes of money, both at home and abroad, hearing that Hircanus who raigned before him, opened Dauids Sepulchre, and tooke out of it three thouſand talents of ſiluer, and that there was left yet farre more, able to defray any great charges whatſoeuer, he long time purpoſed to doe the like. And at this time in the night ſeaſon accompanied onely with his moſt truſty friends, being very wary that none of the people ſhould know of it, he entred into the Sepulchre: but he found no money there, as Hircanus did; but he tooke from thence a great company of precious attires and ornaments of gold; whereby he was enticed to make a more diligent ſearch: and he ſent two of his company for the nonce into the inner part of the Sepulcher, where the bodies of Salomon and Dauid were intombed; who were there loſt, and as it is reported, fire came out of thoſe ſecret places and conſumed them. Whereat Herod being terrified, departed out of it; and mooued with religion to make ſatisfaction, he builded a moſt ſumptuous monument of white marble, at the entrance into the Sepulchre: of which building Nicholaus alſo a writer of that time, maketh mention; but he ſpeaketh not how they went into the Sepulchre of Dauid, thinking that therein he ſhould not keepe decorum, if he ſhould make mention thereof. Wherein he followed this accuſtomed order: for his writings were to come to the eares of the King yet liuing, wherein he did onely curry fauor, mentioning onely that, that might redound vnto the Kings credit: ſo that many of his open and wicked pranks, he doth either colour vnder ſome other pretence, or elſe all waies poſſible he endeoureth to hide them. For he doth as it were tell a tale of Herods cruelty againſt Mariamme and his ſonnes; as though he did thereby deſerue credit and praiſe, accuſing her of adultery, and them as Traitors vnto their father: and this he doth cleane through his works, too much extolling the Kings good deeds, and too diligently excuſing his bad deeds and iniquities. But as I haue ſaid, we muſt pardon him, who did not ſo much write to leaue a memory of things done vnto after-ages, as to gratifie and pleaſe his King. But I, who come of the linage of the Aſamonian Kings, and execute the office of a Prieſt, account it a ſhame to lye: and doe intend truely to recount the hiſtory of all things that were acted and done, yet with a reuerence of the poſterity of that King, who doe alſo now beare ſway and rule; yet with their pardon and leaue, hauing a greater care to the verity of our hiſtory, then to them.

A diſcord in Herods houſe.

After the Sepulchre was thus violated, Herods houſe began to decay, whether reuenge lighting vpon that part which was already ſcarce ſound, or whether by meere chance ſuch calamity at that time befell him, as might iuſtly be thought the reward of impiety. For there was a diſcord in the court not vnlike vnto ciuill warres, euery one ſtriuing againſt other with hatred and forged accuſations: but eſpecially Antipaters politicke practice againſt his brethren was to be noted, who intangling them by other mens forged accuſations, himſelfe oftentimes ſeemed to take vpon him their defence, that making a ſhew of good will vnto them, he might ſecretly oppreſſe them the ſooner; and he did ſo craftily circumuent his father, that his father deemed him to be his onely conſeruer. Wherefore the King commended Ptolomeus his procurator vnto Antipater his ſonne, and did communicate all his ſecrets vnto his mother, ſo that all things were done according as they pleaſed, and they made him diſpleaſed with thoſe, againſt whom they knew the Kings diſpleaſure might redound vnto their profit.

Antipaters crafty plotting againſt his brethren.

But Mariammes children did euery day ſtomacke the matter more and more, diſdaining to giue place vnto their inferiour: and for their nobility not enduring to be remooued from their places, and not to keepe their dignity alſo, their wiues did the like, and Alexanders wife Glaphyra, who was the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, did greatly enuy and diſdaine Salome; and ſhe alſo her againe, both for the loue that ſhe bare vnto her husband, and for that ſhe diſdained (as women are wont) that her daughter married vnto Ariſtobulus, ſhould be in equall honour with her. Pheroras alſo the Kings brother had a hand in this other contention about a priuate cauſe of ſuſpicion and hatred. For he fell ſo farre in loue with one of his maids, that he refuſed the Kings daughter offered vnto him, rather making choice of his maide. Herod tooke this in very ill part, ſeeing his brother (who had receiued ſo many benefits at his hands, and was almost his fellow in his kingdome by his means)not to shew the like brotherly affection to G him againe as he then ought, and himselfe to be an vnhappy brother. And seeing he could not disswade him from that madnesse,hee married his daughter vnto Phasaelus his sonne: and afterward thinking that now his brothers minde towards his maid was satisfied, he complaining of his iniurious dealing,in repulsing his daughter, offered vnto him to wife, he now offered him another of his daughters named Cypros. Then Ptolomeus aduised Pheroras not still to contemne his brothers offer, and persist in such folly; telling him it was meere folly therefore to incurre the Kings displeasure and hatred, and losse of tranquillity. Pheroras vnderstanding this counsell profitable for him,hauing bin once before iniuriously accused,and obtained pardon at the Kings hands,sent away his maid, by whom he now had a son,and promised the King to marry this his other daughter, and appointed the thirtieth day after to celebrate his marriage;making a solemn oath vnto the King, neuer after that time to vse the company of that woman whom he had put away. The time appointed being expired,he fell so farre in loue with the former woman, that he would not stand to his promise, but againe companied with his maid.

Then Herod,not able any longer to contain himselfe,vsed many speeches,whereby he euidently shewed his mind to be alienated from his brother. And there were many who taking hereat opportunity,did by forged calumniations encrease his alienation: so that now there was no day nor houre past, wherein he did not still heare some new alterations and stirs amongst his dearest friends;whom nature willed to combine themselues to maintain concord and amity. For Salome being now offended at Mariammes children,did not permit her daughter married vnto Aristobulus,one of the yong men,to enioy mutuall loue and comfort of her husband, enticing her to bewray her husbands secret talke: and if she heard any small occasions of offence (as often it falleth out) she should the more aggrauate them with suspicions,whereby she also learned all their secrets,and made the young woman hate her husband. And she to please her mother,recounted how that often when her husband and Alexander were alone, that then they were wont to talke of Mariamme their mother,and vse reprochfull words against their father;and threatning,that if they euer did obtaine the kingdome,they would make the sonnes of the King,whom he had by other wiues,notaries and towne clerkes: and so they might reape profit of their learning which they now studied for:and whensoeuer they saw any of the Kings wiues weare any of Mariammes apparell, that then they vowed in stead of that attire, to cloath them with sackcloth, and shut them vp where they should neuer see sun. Salome presently told all this to the King: who though he were much grieued hereat,yet he chose rather to seeke to amend it, then to punish them: for he was greatly incited against them by suspicion,and euery day waxing worse and worse, at last he beleeued all the reports of any whomsoeuer. But he then contented onely sharpely to chide his sonnes, and pacified with their excuses and answers, he for that time was quiet.

Salome intised her daughter to bewray her husbands secrets.

But presently the mischiefe was againe set on foot: for Pheroras the Kings brother, meeting Alexander, who (as we haue said) was Glaphyra her husband,who was daughter to Archelaus: he told him that he heard by Salome, that Herod was far in loue with Glaphyra: so that he could not shake off this affection. The young man hearing this,became iealous,and was in a great rage: and now what honour soeuer or gifts Herod for the loue of his son gaue her, Alexander did interpret it in the worst sense, being now made iealous by that which he had heard of Pheroras; and not able to put vp such iniuries,as he thought;he went vnto his father,& with teares recounted vnto him what Pheroras had told him. But Herod was hereat the more enflamed, not enduring himselfe falsly to be accused of so shamefull a fact,inueighing against the great malice of his friends, who for his great good turnes he did them, so rewarded him. And presently sending for Pheroras,very sharply he began to chide him, saying: O most impious that liueth amongst men! art thou become so vngratefull,either to speake or thinke such a matter of vs? Thinkest thou that I doe not perceiue thy drift; that thou spakest not these words vnto my sonne to discredit mee, but also to the intent by this means thou mightest worke some treason against me, and cause me to be poisoned? For who but a good sonne,as this is,would suffer his father, suspected for such a matter,to liue,and not to be reuenged of him for such offence? Whether dost thou thinke that thou didst put these speeches into his minde, or by them a sword into his hand to kill his father withall? or what was thy intent,seeing thou hatest both him and his brother;and onely counterfeiting good will towards me,to belie me,and to report that of me,that without impiety could not be thought: get thee hence, thou wretched imp, seeing thou hast thus abused thy brother, who hath well deserued at thy hands;and do as thou wilt all thy life time,my selfe wil endeuour to be better vnto my children,then I haue beene; and neither will I punish them as they deserue, but

Herod greatly mouedagainst Pheroras,for affirming that he was in loue with Glaphyra

A but I will honor them aboue their merits. The King hauing diſcharged his choler againſt his brother Pheroras; and hee being taken in a manifeſt fault, anſwered, that that report was firſt deuiſed by Salome, of whom he heard it: which ſhe (being then preſent) hearing, began to exclaim, ſaying, it was not her deuice, & that they all laboured to make the King hate her, and put her to death, being one who did eſpecially wiſh him well; and what in her lay, ſeeking his ſafety, & that now he was in danger of more treaſon then euer before: for (ſaid ſhe) I was the only cauſe that you did put away the woman, whom you ſo doated after, perſwading you to marry the Kings daughter: and this is the cauſe that you hate me. With theſe ſpeeches tearing her haire, and ſtriking her breſt, ſhe made a ſhew of innocency: but this her geſture was a colour to hide her B bad intent. So Pheroras was left in great perplexity, not knowing what to ſay or do; and finding no pretence to excuſe his fact: for on the one ſide he confeſſed, that he told it vnto Alexander, & on the other, he could not make Herod beleeue, that he heard it of Salome. This contention endured a good while: at laſt the King being wearied, ſent away his brother and his ſiſter: and greatly commending his ſons moderate mind, and that he had giuen him intelligence of thoſe ſpeeches, very late in the night, he went to ſupper.

Salome excuſeth her ſelfe.

After this contention, Salome was hardly thought of, becauſe ſhe was iudged to be the author of this ill report, & the Kings wiues wiſhed euil vnto her, becauſe they knew her to be of ſtrange qualities & hard to pleaſe, and ſo variable, that according to the time, one while ſhe would profeſſe friendſhip, and preſently after hatred. Wherfore they ſtill had ſomthing to informe Herod C of againſt her, taking occaſion hapning by chance, which was this: There was a King of the Arabians, named Obodas, a ſlothfull man, and one giuen to idleneſſe: and there was one Syllæus that did gouern all his affaires; this man was a crafty fellow, & in the prime of his youth, and very beautifull. This Syllæus comming vnto Herod about ſome buſineſſe, & viewing Salome, who then ſate at ſupper with him, began to ſet his mind vpon her: & finding ſhe was a widow, he entred into talke with her: and ſhe finding her brother now not ſo friendly vnto her as before he had been, and alſo entangled with the beauty of this young man, did not greatly deny to marry him; and many feaſts being made at that time, they ſhewed euident ſignes of their mutuall conſent, and loue one vnto another. The Kings wiues told the King of this in ſcoffing ſort. Herod herewith not contented, demanded of Pheroras how the matter ſtood, & willed him at ſupper time D to note if he could eſpy any tokens of familiarity betwixt them: And Pheroras told him that by ſignes and mutuall viewing one another, they ſufficiently ſhewed their intents. After this the Arabian being ſuſpected, departed into his own countrey. But two or three moneths after he came againe into Iudæa, only for this purpoſe, & talked with Herod touching this matter, requeſting him to let Salome be his wife: affirming that that affinity would be profitable vnto him for the traffick between his people & the Arabians, whoſe Prince he was to bee, and did already enioy a great part of the dominion. Herod told all this vnto his ſiſter, and asked her if ſhee would marry him; and ſhee anſwered, ſhe would. Then they requeſted that Syllæus ſhould become a Iew in a religion, or elſe it was not lawful for him to marry her. He would not condeſcend hereE unto, affirming that he ſhould bee ſtoned to death by his people, if he did it; and ſo he departed without obtaining his purpoſe. From that time forth, Pheroras, and eſpecially the Kings wiues accuſed Salome of intemperancy, affirming that ſhe had had the company of the Arabian. Now Herod determined to marry his daughter vnto Salomes ſon, whom Pheroras refuſed for the loue of his maid, which ſon of Salomes was her eldeſt that ſhe had by Coſtabarus; and that to ſhew his good will toward Salome his ſiſter. But he was diſſwaded by Pheroras, who told him that the yong man would neuer loue ſuch a father in law, becauſe of his fathers death, perſwading him rather to marry her to his eldeſt ſon, who was to ſucceed him in his Tetrarchy: which he eaſily perſwaded the King vnto, & ſo obtained pardon for his former offence. Wherefore the ſpouſals being changed, the maid was married vnto the yong man, who had an hundred talents in dowry with her, more then otherwiſe ſhould haue been giuen with her.

The effect of calumniation.

Syllæus the Arabian deſiring Salome to wife, was denied.

Herod married his daughter to Pheroras ſonne.

But all this while the diſſenſion of Herods houſe did not ceaſe, but rather increaſed, he hauing a ſhamefull beginning, and comming to a ſorrowfull end. Herod had three Eunuches, whom he greatly eſteemed for their beauty: one of them was his butler; the other his cook; and the third his chamberlaine; whom alſo he was wont to employ in ſerious affaires of his Kingdome. Some one or other informed the King, that theſe three Eunuches were corrupted by his ſon Alexander with great ſummes of money, and being vpon tortures examined if they had accompanied with him, they confeſſed all: yet they affirmed that they knew no practice of his attempted againſt his father. But their torments being increaſed by Antipaters fauourites, they were forced to confeſſe that Alexander ſecretly hated his father, and hee exhorted them to forſake Herod, who G

The yeere of the world, 3957. before Chriſts birth, was now good for nothing; who diſſembled his age by painting his face to make himſelfe ſeem younger then he was, and colouring his head & beard black, which were already growne very white through age: but rather ſet their mindes vpon him, who would in deſpite of his father enioy his Kingdome due vnto him, and that then he would aduance them to the higheſt honours of the Kingdome: for he had not only title vnto it by his birth, but alſo was now prepared likewiſe to inuade it; and that he had many of the captaines, of the ſouldiers, and many of the Kings friends on his ſide, who were prepared to do or endure any thing for his ſake.

Herod hearing this, feare and anger did inuade him, by reaſon that his ſonnes words ſeemed both contumelious & threatning: & being for both theſe cauſes in a rage, he feared ſome greater matter to bee put in practice againſt him, which he could not ſuddenly, and hauing ſo little warning, auoid; and not daring to make open inquiry, he ſet ſecret ſpies awork, to tell him how all matters ſtood, himſelfe now muſtruſting all men, and accounting it his ſecurity to miſtruſt all, euen them that deſerued it not: and not moderating his ſuſpicious mind, now whoſoeuer was the neereſt vnto him, was the more ſuſpected, as of moſt power to iniure him. As for others that were but only named by his ſpies, he preſently eſteemed it his ſafety to put them to death.

Herod crediteth all tales, and ſo putteth many to death vniuſtly.

Then they of his houſehold, euery one being carefull to ſaue himſelfe, were one turned againſt another, euery one deeming it his owne ſafety to preuent others, by accuſing them vnto Herod: which done, preſently they incited other mens enuy againſt them, and euery one of them to deſire ſuch meaſure as they had meaſured vnto others: and thus they alſo reuenged their priuate quarrels; and preſently after, they themſelues were taken, and did by other mens meanes ſuffer the like, being entrapped in the ſame trappe they ſet for their enemies. For the King did quickly repent himſelfe, becauſe he had put very many to death, who were not conuicted: yet for all that, hee was not hereby admoniſhed to beware of the like hereafter; but on his repentance for their death, raged ſo farre, as to cauſe him to inflict the ſame puniſhment vpon their accuſers, which he had done vpon them. So great trouble and feare then fell vpon all the whole Court. Hee then commanded many of his deareſt friends, and them eſpecially whoſe fidelity he had beforetimes experienced, not to come in his ſight, nor within his court gates. For hee did now ſhake off the friendſhip between Andromachus and Gemellus and himſelfe, who were his ancient friends, and oftentimes had gone Embaſſadours for him, & alwaies been of his counſell, and had been tutors vnto his children, in whom he had alwaies repoſed more truſt then in any others: the one of them, for that his ſon Demetrius was familiar with Alexander; and Gemellus, for that he knew him to wiſh well vnto Alexander: for he was one of them who had brought him vp, and had aboad with him at his being at Rome. And no doubt but he had cenſured them with ſome more heauy ſentence, had it not been that they were ſo eminent perſons. Wherfore at that time he was contented to haue baniſhed them, and depriued them of all their authority, to the end, that hauing now diſgraced theſe good men, he might the more freely play the Tyrant. Antipater was the cauſe of all this miſchiefe, who from the firſt time that he perceiued his father to be fearefull and ſuſpicious, ſtill after that ioyned with him as counſellor, & as it were increaſed his rage and cruelty; and then he gallantly played his part, endeuouring, that whoſoeuer would reſiſt him, ſhould be made away. Wherefore Andromachus & the reſt of his friends being now baniſhed the court; the King preſently tortured all that he imagined any way to fauour Alexander, to ſee if they were guilty; or if they knew of any treaſon to be practiſed againſt him: but they knowing nothing to inform him of, died amidſt their torments. Where he ſo much more tortured others, for that contrary to his opinion, he found not ſo much as an euill thought againſt him; Antipater craftily interpreting it, that they had rather in torments conceale the truth, then to ſhew themſelues not truſty to their maſters and friends: wherefore many being taken, he cauſed them to be tortured to get ſome thing out of ſome of them. At laſt one amongſt the reſt, not able to indure thoſe torments impoſed vpon him, ſaid; that he had often heard Alexander ſay, ſo often as any one commended his goodly ſtature, or skilfull ſhooting, & the reſt of his vertues, that theſe qualities nature beſtowed vpon him rather then other benefits; for his father for enuy hereat was offended: ſo that when he talked with him, he did vpon purpoſe draw his body together, leſt his father ſhould perceiue the taleneſſe of his ſtature; and that when he went a hunting with him, he vpon purpoſe did miſſe the mark he could haue hit, becauſe he knew his father could not endure that he ſhould be cõmended. And whilſt theſe his words were conſidered, & pondred, and his torments intermitted; he again accuſed Alexander to haue conſpired with his brother Ariſtobulus, to kil his father when he was hunting, & then to flie with ſpeed vnto Rome,

Antipater the cauſe of all miſchiefe.

Many were tortured and examined for Alexanders cauſe.

A Rome, and beg the Kingdome of Cæsar. There were also found some of this young mans letters written vnto his brother, complaining of the iniurious dealing of his father, who had giuen certaine grounds vnto Antipater, the yeerly reuenues wherof amounted vnto two hundreth talents. Then Herod thinking himselfe to haue probability enough, his former suspicion was now confirmed, & so he tooke Alexander and cast him in prison: and againe he began to rage; notwithstanding that himselfe did scarcely beleeue the informations against him: neither could he himselfe deuise any cause wherefore they should seek to worke treason against him. And those complaints seemed childish: neither was it probable that hauing openly killed his father, he would afterwards haue gone to Rome. Wherefore endeuouring to finde some stronger argument of
B his sonnes impiety, and because he would not bee thought rashly to haue committed his son to prison, he caused the most noble and eminent of all Alexanders well-willers to be tortured, and they confessing no such matter as he expected, he put them to death.

The yeere of the world, 3957. before Christs Nativitie, 7.

Alexander being in prison, his friends were tortured.

Whilest thus all the Court did resound with feare, torments, and contentions, a certaine man accused Alexander to haue sent letters to his friends at Rome, to entreat them to cause him to be sent for by Cæsar thither, that he might accuse his father of certaine conspiracies against Cæsar, and how he more esteemed the friendship of Mithridates King of the Parthians, then the friendship of the Romans: affirming also, that he had poison ready prepared at Ascalon. Herod hearing this, was comforted by the parasites about him, as hauing not done any thing rashly; and so he gaue now full credit vnto all: yet the poyson was diligently sought for, but could not be found.

One accused Alexander to haue sent letters to Rome against his father.

C Alexander being now oppressed with this calamity, he yet took courage, and because he would more incite his fathers displeasure against him, he did not deny it: perhaps meaning to make his father ashamed of himselfe, for giuing credit so easily vnto forged tales; or at least, if he could not effect that, entangle all the court and him too in calamity and misery: Which that he might the better do, he writ foure little bookes, and sent them vnto his father, telling him that it was needlesse to vse any more torments, for indeed treason was intended against him, and that Pheroras and his most trusty friends were herein conspirators: And that in the night time Salome came secretly vnto him, and as it were forced him to lie with her; and that all of them aymed at this mark, to haue him made away, that so they might enioy their wished liberty. He also accused Ptolomeus & Sapinnius of this conspiracy, who were more faithfull vnto their King, then all
D others: so that now these men, who before were most friendly one to another, began like mad men to rage one against another: and punishment so hastily pursued euery one, that they had no leasure giuen them to speake in their owne defence: neither was their punishment deferred till their cause was tryed, and the truth know, that some were bound and imprisoned, other some presently put to death, other laughed in their sleeues to see that day, yet discontented for that any delay was vsed for their punishment: so that the Kings Court was now greatly defaced with sorrow, and heauinesse, wherewith the wonted felicity thereof was destroyed. Herod himselfe amidst these calamites, could not but be weary of his life, who not daring trust himselfe in any bodies hand, he was tormented with a daily and hourely feare of some vntimely death, that would befall him: and many times perswaded himselfe, that he did see his sons before him with E a drawne sword, ready to kill him; and this was his cogitation night and day, so that herewith he almost ran mad.

WHilest Herod was thus troubled in his mind, Archelaus King of Cappadocia carefull for his daughter, and the young man his sonne in lawe, and pitying his friend Herod entangled in such calamities; hee thought it his duty to make a iourney vnto him. And F finding him so affected as it was reported vnto him before his comming, he thought it an vnfit way to argue him of too much credulity and rashnesse; perceiuing that thereby he would be rather exasperated, so much the more labouring to excuse himselfe. Wherefore Archelaus deuised another way to appease these troubles. Wherefore hee counterfeited indignation against the young man, approuing all the Kings actions for good; affirming that he would breake the band of wedlock between his daughter and Alexander, and that if she knew of the conspiracy, and did not informe the King thereof, himselfe would punish her. Then Herod, contrary to his expectation, seeing Archelaus so angry for the offence committed against him, began to remit his anger:

anger: and now with iuſt conſideration waighing what he had done, by little & little, he began to haue a fatherly affection, & to be hereby moued to compaſſion; yet ſo oft as any one ſought to excuſe the young man, he grew to be very angry thereat: but when Archelaus alſo began to accuſe him, then Herods heart relented, and he with tearts beſought Archelaus not to yeeld too much to anger, nor for the yong mans offence breake off the marriage. Then Archelaus perceiuing him to relent, began to turn the matter againſt Herods friends, as the cauſers of all this miſchiefe, who had corrupted the yong man, who of himſelfe was void of malice; and eſpecially he aggrauated the matter againſt Pheroras the Kings brother. Pheroras hauing now incurd the Kings diſpleaſure, perceiued that none could ſo ſoon reconcile him vnto the King, as Archelaus; wherefore cloathed in black, and making other ſignes as though he deſpaired of his life, he went vnto him; who did not deny to help him what he could: yet he told him that it was no eaſie matter for him to pacifie the King ſo highly offended, perſwading him rather himſelfe to go vnto the King his brother, and craue pardon of him; confeſſing himſelfe to haue beene cauſe of all this miſchief; by which confeſſion of his the Kings wrath would be greatly appeaſed, & ſo he alſo ſhould haue better occaſion to entreat for him. Pheroras followed his counſell, which fell out happily for them both: for the young man, contrary to any ones expectation, was freed from all his troubles; & Archelaus made Pheroras & Herod friends; & he himſelf hauing now gotten great friendſhip of the King in thoſe his aduerſe and troublous times of his, he returned ioyfully into Cappadocia, being rewarded with rich gifts, and being accounted of as Herods chiefeſt friend. They alſo agreed amongſt themſelues, that Herod ſhould goe to Rome, becauſe he had already written vnto Cæſar, concerning this matter: & they both went together vnto Antiochia, & there Herod reconciled Titus the Preſident of Syria vnto Archelaus, and ſo he returned into Iudæa.

The yeere of the world, 3958. before the birth of Chriſt, 6.

WHileſt Herod going to Rome was abſent from his Kingdome, the Arabian warres began, hereby taking an occaſion: The inhabitants of Trachon, whoſe country Cæſar taking from Zenodorus, gaue it vnto Herod, being forbidden & hindred from ſtealing, were now forced to frame themſelues to liue like husbandmen in more ciuility then before: but this kind of life pleaſed them not; neither did their country yeeld fruits worth their labours; yet at firſt Herod compelling them thereunto, they abſtained from iniuring the inhabitants bordring vpon them, which did greatly redound vnto Herods credit, by whoſe diligence they were brought vnto it. But when Herod was ſayled into Italy to accuſe Alexander, and to commend Antipater vnto Cæſar, the Trachonites hearing a bruit of his death, reuolted and turned to their accuſtomed robberies: Yet were they at that time again ſubdued in the Kings abſence by the captains that he left at home; and forty of the chiefeſt of the theeues amongſt them being taken, the reſt terrified by their example left their own country, and fled into Arabia, where Syllæus receiued them, in reuenge that he could not obtaine Salome for his wife; and receiuing of him a ſtrong hold to dwell in, they did not only make incurſions, and rob & ſpoile the borders of Iudæa, but alſo of Cœloſyria, and draue away the preyes they got, into the place allotted them, Syllæus protecting them and their villanies. Herod returning from Rome, found that his people were greatly endamaged by theſe theeues: and ſeeing he could not ſubdue them, by reaſon the Arabians did protect them, not enduring that iniury, and entring into Trachon, hee killed all their families: whereby they were ſo much the more enraged againſt his country, for they had a law amongſt them, whereby they were commanded to reuenge the death of their families, and ſo contemning all dangers, they came and waſted all Herods country with continuall incurſions. Then the King complained hereof vnto Saturninus and Volumnius then Preſidents ſent thither by Cæſar, requeſting that he might haue the theeues to puniſh them. They hearing this newes, with as much ſpeede as they might, gathered their forces together, and making themſelues ſtronger then they were before, with ſudden incurſions waſted all where they came, deſtroying both the fields and villages, & killing all they could finde; ſo that now this reſembled a war, rather then a robbery: for now they were a thouſand in number. Wherefore Herod required theſe theeues and robbers to bee deliuered vnto him, and required the debt that Obodas ought him, for Herod had lent Obodas threeſcore talents, and ſent them vnto him by Syllæus, and now the time was expired wherein the money was to bee repayed. But Syllæus, who had taken all the rule from Obodas, and himſelfe now gouerned all, denyed that thoſe theeues were in Arabia,

How HEROD went into Arabia with an army.

B WHEN the day was come that was appointed, Syllæus not minded to ſtand vnto the agreement made, went in the meane time to Rome: But Herod exacted his money, & the theeues to be reſtored vnto him, Saturnius & Volumnius permitting him with force of armes to perſecute thoſe obſtinate people: ſo he leuying an armie, went into Arabia, in three daies ſpace going as farre as ordinarily men are wont to march in ſeuen, and comming vnto the caſtle wherein the theeues kept, at the firſt onſet he tooke it and deſtroyed it, being called Repta, and did no other harme vnto the inhabitants. And a Captaine of the Arabians, named Nacebus, came to ſuccour the theeues, and ſo fought with Herods armie, in which battell a few of Herods men were ſlaine, but of the Arabians were ſlaine fiue and twentie, with their Generall, and the C reſt were put to flight. Being thus reuenged vpon the theeues, hee led 3000. Idumæans into Trachon to keepe the inhabitants from robbing, and ſent Letters vnto the Romane Gouernours, who aboad in Phœnicia, that he had only vſed the authoritie which they gaue him againſt the rebellious Arabians that reſiſted him, and nothing elſe: which afterward alſo, they making inquiry, they found true.

CHAP. XV.

How SYLLÆVS accuſed HEROD vnto CÆSAR.

D BVt then were meſſengers haſtily ſent vnto Syllæus at Rome, and informed him otherwiſe, aggrauating euery thing according to their faſhion. Syllæus being new before inſinuated into Cæſars acquaintance, by chance was then alſo about the Palace; and hearing theſe newes, he preſently changed his apparell, and cloathing himſelfe in black, he went in this manner vnto Cæſar, informing him how Arabia was afflicted with wars, and that the whole kingdome was waſted by Herod, who had entred into the countrey with an army, and with teares complained that 2000 and 500 of the Arabian nobility were ſlaine, and amongſt them his friend & kinſman Nacebus, and great riches were taken away, which were laid vp at Repta, and that all this was done in contempt of Obodes who had no army ready, nor a fit Captaine for his forces, he being not there. Syllæus hauing thus ſpoken, adding moreouer, that he would not haue come to Rome, but that he was perſwaded that Cæſar would haue had a care of the common peace, and tranquil- E lity of his ſubiects, and that had he bin at home, Herod to his coſt ſhould haue violated that peace: Cæſar hereat was greatly mooued, and inquired of ſome of Herods friends, who were then preſent, and of certaine men that were lately come out of Syria alſo, whither Herod had led an army out of the limits of his owne kingdome. Which they not denying, and Cæſar not vouchſafing to heare the cauſe why, his diſpleaſure againſt Herod was greatly increaſed, ſo that he writ threatning Letters vnto him; telling him that hitherto he had vſed him as a friend, but hereafter hee would vſe him as a ſubiect; which alſo Syllæus ſignified vnto the Arabians. By which letters of his they were made proud, and would neither render vnto him the theeues that were eſcaped, nor reſtore the money he lent their King; nor pay him rent for the paſture ground that they hired of him; boulſtering themſelues herewith, that the King had offended Cæſar. Moreouer, the F Trachonites hearing this, rebelled againſt the garriſon of the Idumæans; and ioyning with the Arabian theeues, who waſted their countrey, not ſo much reſpecting their owne gaine as their reuenge and particular profit, they did many miſchiefs, and exerciſed great crueltie againſt them. Herod did put vp all iniuries, and durſt not once mutter, Cæſar being offended at him; for the which cauſe he was not ſo couragious nor valiant as before: For firſt of all, Cæſar would not admit his Embaſſadours, whom he ſent to plead his cauſe before Cæſar; and Herod againe ſending other Embaſſadours, Cæſar ſent them backe againe, their buſineſſe vndone.

did easily perswade Cæsar any thing; for that Cæsar was now very credulous; and Syllæus aymed at some greater matter. For Obodas dying, Æneas succeeded him in the kingdome of Arabia, who changing his name, called himselfe Aretas: whom Syllæus by forged calumniations did seeke to depose from the crowne, and vsurpe the kingdome vnto himselfe; giuing great summes of money vnto the courtiers, and promising great summes vnto Cæsar; whom he now perceiued to be angry against Aretas, for that without his consent he presumed to take vpon him the gouernment of the kingdome. But at last he also sent letters & gifts vnto Cæsar, and amongst the rest a crowne of gold worth many talents, and in those letters he accused Syllæus, who as an impious and disloyall seruant, had poysoned his King Obodas; in whose life-time hee had also inuaded the gouernment of the kingdome, committing adultery with the Arabians wiues, getting together other mens money, thereby to obtaine the kingdome. Cæsar would not permit these Embassadors to haue audience; but refusing their gifts, suffered them to depart without obtaining that they came for. In the meane time the affaires of Iudæa and Arabia euery day became worse and worse, euery one seeking to trouble the estate of both kingdomes, and no man endeuouring to quiet them. For the King of Arabia was not yet established in his kingdome, and therefore could not controule his subiects. And Herod feared that if he did defend himselfe, he should so much the more incite Cæsar against him; and so was forced to put vp all iniuries that were done vnto him: and finding no end of his miseries, he finally determined to send againe to Rome Embassadors, to see if by the helpe of his friends, Cæsar might be perswaded to thinke better of him, and so committed that Embassage vnto Nicholaus of Damasco, and sent him to Rome.

CHAP. XVI.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 11. al. 17.

Eurycles a Lacedemonian insinuateth himselfe into Herods familiaritie.

Eurycles insinuated himselfe into Alexanders friendship.

AT this time the dissension of Herods house was much increased; and although at all other times his Court was neuer voide of suspicion, which is a pernicious euill to Kings and Princes, yet at that time especially this mischiefe was in his principall vigor & force. For one Eurycles a Lacedemonian and a noble man of his country, but hauing a turbulent wit giuen ouer to flattery and pleasure, yet cunningly dissembling both vices, comming vnto Herod and giuing him gifts, and receiuing greater gifts at his hands, was by him courteously entertained; and familiarly conuersing with him, brought it so to passe that he was receiued amongst his especiall friends. This Eurycles lodged at Antipaters house, being also familiar with Alexander for their often meeting one another: for he said that Archelaus King of Cappadocia and himselfe were great friends, & therefore he counterfeited himselfe to reuerence Glaphyra very much; and all men iudging him indifferent vnto all parties, he diligently noted whatsoeuer past, and euery word that was spoken, seeking by all meanes he could, matter to gratifie others by carrying of tales; and with such flattering faire speeches he insinuated himselfe into euery mans friendship, that he seemed as Alexanders sole trusty friend, and to vse other men as it behooued a friend. And by this his deceit, he so insinuated himselfe into Alexanders fauour, that the young man thought him to be his only friend, vnto whom he might impart his secrets; so that Alexander opened vnto him his griefe, for that his father was something alienated from him, and recounted vnto him his mothers misfortune, and that Antipater had now gotten all authoritie and dignitie from him and his brother, and was the onely man that could doe all; and that these iniuries were no longer tolerable, their father being now so incited against them, that now hee would neither admit them vnto his counsels, nor banquets. And he committed his griefes (as he then thought) into his friends bosome. But Eurycles told Antipater all, affirming that though it nothing concerned him, yet he could not but speake of it for the greatnesse of the danger then imminent, willing him to beware of Alexander, who did not sticke openly to shew what minde he bare, but did as it were manifestly shew that he desired to make away his father. Which done, he receiued of Antipater most rich gifts, as pledges of his good will towards him; and finally he was by him perswaded to relate his newes himselfe vnto Herod. The King lent a greedy eare whilest he recounted Alexanders malice; and was so mooued with the circumstances of his speeches, that he conceiued a deadly hatred against his son, which also without further delay he did make manifest: for he rewarded Eurycles for his paines with 50. talents. Which he hauing receiued, went vnto Archelaus, and talking and speaking well of Alexander, recounted vnto him in what stead he had stood him in reconciling him vnto his father: and receiuing of him also a summe of money, he departed before his malice was discouered; and returned into his countrey, and vsing the

Eurycles by craft got money of Archelaus.

A the like ſhifts there alſo, he was finally by his countreymen baniſhed from Lacedemonia. Furthermore, Herod not content now, as before he was, to heare onely that which was told him of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, did now himſelfe alſo conceiue a proper hatred againſt them, himſelfe obſeruing all things, and making diligent inquiry though no man accuſed them, and permitting all men to ſpeake what they liſt againſt them. And amongſt the reſt, Euaratus of Cous had conſpired with Alexander, and he ſeemed now to heare no talke more willingly then this, and ſuch like. But then greater misfortunes then all the reſt befell the yong men; falſe accuſations neuer ceaſing to be forged againſt them, and euery one as it were, ſtriuing to accuſe them of ſome crime or other vnto the King; pretending the care they bare of his ſafetie. Herod had two Champions, B Iucundus and Tyrannus; both acceptable and gratefull vnto him, for their ſtrength and tall ſtature and bigneſſe of body: theſe two for ſome offence were baniſhed the Court, and receiued into Alexanders ſeruice, and placed amongſt his ſtipendary horſmen, and for that they were very actiue, he beſtowed many gifts and much money vpon them. Whereat the King preſently conceiuing ſuſpicion, began to torture them, and after many torments they confeſſed that Alexander had hired them to kill Herod as he was a hunting wilde beaſts: for ſo it might eaſily be bruited abroad, that he falling off his horſe, fell vpon his owne lance, and ſo was ſlaine: which once before had almoſt hapned vnto him. They alſo declared vnto him, that certaine gold was hidden and buried in the ſtable: and they alſo accuſed Herods chiefe Huntſman, that at Alexanders command he had giuen Alexanders ſeruants the Kings launces and his armour. After them the Prefect of C the Caſtle of Alexandrium, was taken and examined vpon tortures, and it was obiected againſt him, that he promiſed to receiue them into the Caſtle, and to deliuer vnto them the Kings treaſure there. But hee denying it, his owne ſonne affirmed all to bee true, and brought forth Letters to teſtifie the ſame, reſembling Alexanders hand, written to this effect: So ſoone as by Gods aſſiſtance we haue done that which we intend to doe, we will preſently come vnto you: be carefull therefore, that according to your promiſe you doe receiue vs into your Caſtle. Herod hauing had a view of theſe Letters, did now without any heſitation beleeue, that indeed ſome treacherous practice was plotted againſt him by his ſonnes. But Alexander affirmed, that Diophantus the ſcribe had counterfeited his hand, and that the Letter was Antipaters deuice. For Diophantus was accounted cunning in ſuch matters, and afterward being taken with the like, he was D therefore put to death. And the King produced them that had beene tortured at Iericho before the people to accuſe his ſonnes, where they were ſtoned to death, and the people hereat mooued, would alſo haue killed Alexander and Ariſtobulus with the ſame death. But Herod, by the meanes of Ptolomeus and Pheroras did reſtraine them, and commanded the young men to be caſt into priſon, and there to be kept ſo ſtreight that no man was admitted vnto them; but many ſpies were ſet, who ſhould narrowly marke all their actions and words: and now they were accounted as condemned men, both by other mens opinions, and alſo by their owne. One of them, to wit, Ariſtobulus, for griefe inuiting his aunt, and mother in law to compaſſionate his preſent calamitie, and to hate him that was the author hereof, affirmed that ſhee alſo was in great danger, being accuſed, in hope to marry with Syllæus, to haue ſignified vnto him by Letters all that E paſt in Herods Court. Which words the woman preſently came and recounted vnto her brother Herod. The King no longer able to bridle his fury, commanded them both to be bound and kept in ſeuerall places one from another, & each of them to write what they had plotted againſt their father: and being thus cõmanded, they wrote that they neither prepared treaſon, nor yet thought of any treaſon againſt him, only they purpoſed to flye, becauſe they perceiued that they could no longer liue here, becauſe they were ſo ſuſpected and in continuall care. At that time a Prince of Cappadocia came Embaſſador from Archelaus, named Mela, who was one of the greateſt Lords of the country: and Herod willing to ſhew his ſons malice, he ſent for Alexander out of priſon, commanding him to recount how & after what order, or whither they meant to flie: he anſwered vnto Archelaus, who had alſo promiſed them to ſend them to Rome; but that they had no further F intent or purpoſe to effect any vnlawfull practice againſt their father, and that all other accuſations were falſe. And that he requeſted that Tyrannus and the reſt might haue beene better examined; But Antipater preuented that, who by his owne forged rumors ſpred amongſt the people, did cauſe them to haſten their deaths. Which being ſaid, Herod commanded both him and Mela to be led vnto Glaphyra, that ſhee might be asked whether ſhee were any way priuy to the conſpiracie againſt Herod: and comming vnto her, the woman ſeeing her husband bound, preſently tore her haire, and beeing amazed, with great compaſſion, cryed out amaine. The young mans cheekes were alſo bedewed with teares; ſo that a long time after, thoſe that were preſent amazed amazed and mooued to compaſſion at this miſerable ſight, could neither ſpeake nor do the Kings command. At laſt Ptolomeus, to whoſe charge Alexander was committed, willing him to ſpeake whether his wife was priuy to his intent: he anſwered, How could it be otherwiſe, who is dearer vnto me then mine owne life, being mother of her and my children? then ſhe anſwered, crying out aloud, that ſhe was priuy to nothing that was any harme; yet (quoth ſhe) if it will auaile you any thing, or helpe to ſaue your life, I am ready to tell any lye whatſoeuer ſeeing I muſt dye, and will deny nothing you would haue mee to ſay. Alexander anſwered, Neither did I purpoſe any impietie againſt my father, as ſome ſuppoſe, who ought not to thinke ſo: neither doeſt thou know of any one: this thou knoweſt, that thou and I purpoſed to flie vnto Archelaus thy father, and that he promiſed to conuay vs to Rome; which ſhe alſo affirmed.

Archelaus excuſeth himſelf to Herod. Cæſar and Herod made friends.

Herod now thinking that Archelaus was conuicted of euill will towards him, deliuered letters vnto Olympus and Volumnius, commanding them in the way as they went, to paſſe by Eleuſa a towne of Cilicia, and deliuer certaine letters vnto Archelaus himſelfe to the ſame effect: and that from thence they ſhould goe to Rome; and if ſo be when they came there they found that Cæſar had bin reconciled vnto him by Nicholaus his meanes, that then they ſhould alſo deliuer certaine letters vnto him, declaring all that was paſt betweene him and his ſonnes, and the proofes alleaged to conuince the young men. Archelaus writ againe vnto Herod, that indeed he would haue entertained the young men, for feare that any greater miſchance ſhould befall them or their father, by reaſon of the ſuſpicion againſt them; yet was he not minded to ſend them to Cæſar, nor to haue confirmed them in any malicious courſe. The meſſengers comming to Rome, found Cæſar reconciled to Herod, and deliuered the letters vnto him. For Nicholaus his embaſſage was to this effect: So ſoone as he came vnto Rome and had entred the Palace, beſide the charge hee had giuen him, he did alſo vndertake to accuſe Syllæus. For he perceiued the Arabians at variance amongſt themſelues, and that ſome of them had declared all Syllæus his bad practices, and that by his meanes and procurement many of Obodas kinſmen were murthered, as his aduerſaries manifeſtly prooued, by certaine of his letters which they intercepted.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 12. al. 18. Nicholaus accuſeth Syllæus, and excuſeth Herod.

Now Nicholaus deſirous to reconcile Herod vnto Cæſar, omitted not this occaſion by chance offered him; for he well knew that if he began with the Kings defence, he ſhould then find a hard and heauy Iudge againſt him; but if he began to accuſe Syllæus, he ſhould find alſo fit occaſion to plead his Kings cauſe. Wherefore Nicholaus taking vpon him to prooue the accuſation againſt him at the day appointed, he accompanied with the King Aretas Embaſſadors, accuſed Syllæus as a murtherer of his Lord and King, and many other Arabians; and that he had borrowed much money to trouble the peace of the Common-wealth; and that he had corrupted many women, and honeſt matrons both at Rome and in Arabia. Hee added hereunto a moſt grieuous crime, to wit, that he by his lies and falſe reports had deceiued Cæſar, whom in all things he had miſinformed concerning that which Herod had done. Which when hee once mentioned, Cæſar commanded him to omit the reſt; and only to recount the matter concerning Herod, whether Herod did not enter into Arabia with an army, and did ſlay two thouſand and fiue hundreth men, and carry away captiues and robbe and ſpoile the countrey? Nicholaus anſwered, that to theſe demands himſelfe was able to anſwer, that Herod did none of theſe, or at leaſt very little hereof, which hee did recount; and that hee did not deſerue any diſpleaſure. Cæſar, contrary to his expectation, hearing this, began to giue diligent eare to what Nicholaus ſaid: and hereupon Nicholaus recounted vnto Cæſar, how Herod had lent 500. talents, and that hee had a writing in pawne, wherein he was permitted after the day appointed, if then it were not repayed him againe, to prey vpon all the whole countrey, and ſatisfie himſelfe: and that this was no hoſtile inuaſion, but according to law & equity, a requiring of his right and debt due vnto him. And that this was not raſhly done, though by the writing he was ſo permitted to doe, but by the conſent of Saturninus and Volumnius Preſidents of Syria, in whoſe preſence Syllæus ſwore by Cæſars good fortune at Berytum, that within 30. daies after both the debt & alſo certaine fugitiues from the King, ſhould be reſtored vnto him, and that Syllæus performed none of theſe: and ſo Herod went againe vnto the Preſidents, and they permitted him to go and take pledges for his mony; and that ſo by their permiſſion he went into Arabia. And this (quoth he) is the warre that his aduerſaries haue ſo tragically exaggerated, and yet (quoth he) how can it be called a war? ſeeing that it was done by the conſent of the Preſidents, and that by couenant after periury, wherewith both other gods and alſo Cæſars name was violated. It now (quoth he) remaineth that I ſpeake ſomething concerning the captiues. There were fortie theeues of Trachon, and afterward more that fled from Herod for feare of puniſhment, and fled vnto Arabia, whom Syllæus protected and ſuccoured

A to the iniury of all men, and gaue them ground to inhabit; and was partaker of their preyes; notwithstanding that by his foresaid oath, he was bound to restore them together with the borrowed money; neither can he name any man beside them taken in Arabia, and carried away captiue, and some of them also escaped. This his forged tale concerning the captiues being thus refuted, heare, O Soueraigne Cæsar, the lying inuention, which to prouoke thee to wrath, himselfe deuised. For I am well able to affirme this, that when the Arabian army assaulted vs, and one or two of our men were slaine; then at last Herod forced to make resistance, hee slew Nacebus and with him fiue and twentie, and no more: for euery one of which Syllæus falsely recounted vnto Cæsar a hundreth, and so told him that two thousand and fiue hundred were slaine. Cæsar hereat B greatly mooued, with an angry countenance looking vpon Syllæus, he asked him how many Arabians were slaine in the fight? He amazed and knowing not what to reply, answered, that he erred in the number. Presently Cæsar commanded the writings to be read, containing the conditions betweene them, and the writings of the Presidents, and the letters of the Cities containing the complaints of the robberies. And so the matter was brought to passe, that Cæsar was reconciled vnto Herod, and condemned Syllæus to dye; and repenting himselfe to haue written so threatning letters vnto Herod, he obiected that also vnto Syllæus, affirming, that by his false informations he had caused him to passe the limits of friendship, in vsing his friend so hardly. And so he sent Syllæus into his countrey, that after he had satisfied his creditors, he might be punished according to C the sentence. But he still continued angry with Aretas, for that without his authoritie he had vsurped the crowne and kingdome, and he was minded also to bestow Arabia vpon Herod: but the letters which Herod sent him changed his minde. For Olympus and Volumnius, so soone as they vnderstood that Cæsars wrath towards Herod was pacified, presently they deliuered vnto him the letters as they were commanded: wherein were contained the arguments whereby his sonnes were conuicted of treason against him. Which Cæsar hauing read, he thought it not conuenient to trouble the old man (infortunate with his sonnes) with another kingdome; and so hee admitted Aretas Embassadours: and chiding them that their King had rashly vsurped the kingdome without his authoritie and knowledge, not expecting his pleasure: he receiued their gifts, and confirmed him in the kingdome by his authoritie. This done, being now reconciled vnto D Herod, he writ vnto him that he was sorrowfull for him, that had such children; and that hee should, if they had attempted any treason against him, punish them as men that sought to murther their father: for he gaue him free and full authoritie; but if they onely attempted to flye, he should also be sufficed with a lesse punishment. Wherefore he counselled him to call a Consistory at Berytum; and together with the Romane Presidents, and Archelaus King of Cappadocia, and the rest of his friends, and the nobilitie thereabout, according as they should aduise him, so to doe. And this was the effect of Cæsars letters.

CHAP. XVII.

How HERODS sonnes were condemned in the councell at Berytum.

E HEROD receiuing this letter, reioyced aboue measure, both for that he had againe obtained Cæsars fauour; and also for that Cæsar had giuen him full authoritie to doe what he pleased vnto his sonnes. And yet I know not how it came to passe, that he who in his prosperitie was a hard father, did yet shew himselfe not rash in putting his sonnes to death: and now his estate being better then it was, and he recouering his wonted assurance; he now began a new hatred. Wherefore by letters he called together all those whom Cæsar appointed, only Archelaus excepted, either for that he hated the man, or else for that he feared he would haue withstood that his purpose: and when they were all come together, as well the Presidents as the rest who were called out of diuers Cities, he would not bring his sonnes into the councell, but kept them in a village of the Sidonians, named Platan, not farre distant from the Citie, to the intent, F that if they were called for, he might bring them forth. Then Herod himselfe alone entring into the councell before an hundreth and fiftie men there assembled for that purpose, began to accuse his sonnes before them, and vsed a speech not only pitifull for his own calamities, but also little becomming a father. For he was very vehement and vnheedy in inueying against their offence; neither did he sufficiently expresse his minde, shewing many signes of fury, and anger; neither did he deliuer in writing any proofes of the accusations vnto the Iudges: but vndecently himselfe alledged there the father against the sonne, himselfe also reading before them certaine letters written by them, wherein was contained no impietie nor treason, but onely a consultation to flie away,& certaine hard ſpeeches whereby they ſhewed themſelues offended. Which when he came vnto,he exclaimed as though hereby they confeſſed their treacherous practices,greatly exaggerating the matter,and proteſting that he had rather die then heare ſuch ſpeeches. Laſtly, affirming that both nature and Cæſar permitted him authoritie againſt them; and his countrey lawes ſo commanded,that if any one being accuſed,his father or mother ſhould lay their hands vpon his head,and the ſtanders by muſt preſently ſtone him to death:which though he might eaſily do in his owne country & kingdome;yet he thought good alſo to expect their cenſures.Yet hee came vnto them, not for that they were to iudge his ſonnes, who were taken in a manifeſt crime,but that by this occaſion they might adde their ſuffrages to the iuſt indignation of a father offended,and that they might leaue an example vnto al poſteritie,that ſuch treaſons ought not to be left vnpuniſhed.The king hauing thus ſpoken,& not permitting the young men to be brought vnto their anſwer,all ſeeing what the king intended,and that there was now no hope to reconcile the young men vnto their father,or ſaue their liues,they all confirmed his authority. And firſt of all Saturninus,one that had bin Conſull, and had bin graced with many honours,pronounced an indifferent ſentence, limited with circumſtances,to wit, that he condemned Herods ſons, yet not to die: for (quoth he) my ſelfe haue ſons, and I would not adde this calamitie to Herods misfortune paſt. After him alſo his three ſonnes, who were their fathers Legats,pronounced the ſame ſentence. But Volumnius pronounced, that they had deſerued death, who were ſo impious towards their father;whoſe ſentence after him the moſt part followed: ſo that it ſeemed that they were now ordained to be put to death.Preſently Herod carried them with him to Tyre,where he met Nicholaus, who was now there arriued, returning from Rome:vnto whom the king firſt recounting what was done at Berytum, he asked of him,what his friends at Rome thought of his ſonnes.He anſwered that they iudged the young mens intents impious,and that they alſo iudged that they ought to be bound & impriſoned; & then after due conſideration,if it were ſo thought expedient, to be put to death,leſt the king might be thought rather to haue giuen place vnto his choler then vnto reaſon: yet if it might ſo pleaſe him, they thought it beſt to acquit them,leſt otherwiſe he do that which hereafter he may repent when it is too late. And this was the opinion of moſt of his friends at Rome.Then the king a long time pondred theſe his words,and made no reply, but commanded him to ſaile along in his company. At his arriuall at Cæſarea all men were carefull what ſhould become of his ſons,expecting an end of that tragedy,for they greatly feared that by reaſon of the old diſcord he would now cut them off; yet notwithſtanding they were ſorrowfull for them:yet it was dangerous either to ſpeake raſhly,or to heare any thing ſpoken freely cõcerning them,but in their hearts cõpaſſionating them, they concealed their griefes. Only one amongſt all the reſt, an ancient ſouldier of the Kings named Tyro, others diſſembling their griefe,ſpake freely what he thought: this Tyro had a ſon of Alexanders age, and beloued of him, whom Alexander much accounted of. This fellow many times amidſt the multitudes exclaimed,that truth and equitie was now baniſhed from out of the world, and that in their ſtead, malice & vntruth raigned: whereby there was ſuch a miſt & a fog cauſed ouer the whole world, that no man could ſee his owne errors. This his free ſpeech though it was not without danger, yet all men hereat were moued,for that he had ſome reaſon to ſhew his fortitude in ſo dangerous a time,& euery one was willing to heare his ſpeech: and though themſelues for feare were ſilent, yet did they not reprehend him for ſpeaking freely. For the expectation of the euent of ſo great miſchiefe was able to haue wreſted from euery one of them words of commiſeration. Tyro with great audacity alſo came vnto the king, and beſought him that he might talke with him alone: which the king granting, hee vſed theſe words with great lamentation: I can no longer, O my king, ſuppreſſe this my griefe, which cauſeth me ſo boldly to ſpeake,though with my owne perill; yet if it pleaſe thee my king, that which I intend to ſpeake ſhall be for thine aduantage.

Saturninus doth pronounce an indifferent ſentence.

Volumnius & other of Herods friends pronounce Herods ſons to be beheaded.

Tyro ſpeaketh to Herod, and not obſeruing modeſtie, he and the Captaines were impriſoned.

Where now my Lord are thy wits? where is that thy couragious minde euer hitherto able to match all difficult buſineſſes whatſoeuer? how hapneth it that thou haſt ſo few friends & kinred? for I account not them kinſmen or friends, that permit ſuch wickednes and hatred in thy Court, which earſt was moſt happy & fortunate.And what art thou vnto thy ſelfe? wilt thou not looke & ſee what is done? wilt thou put to death the two yong men born vnto thee by the Queene thy wife,who abound in all vertue;and commit thy ſelfe now in thy old age vnto one only ſon,who nouriſheth impious hopes & deſſeignes? and to thy kindred, who by thy own cenſure haue often deſerued death? Doeſt thou not perceiue,that the people keeping themſelues quiet and ſtill, doe both condemne the errour of thy friends, and alſo pitie and compaſſionate the two young men? Moreouer,all thy ſouldiers & the Captaines themſelues haue compaſſion on them, and curſe the authors of this infortunate calamity. The King at firſt tooke theſe words of Tyro in good part, as being admoniſhed of the perfidious dealing of them about him, and his owne calamitie. But Tyro immodeſtly & ſouldier-like vrging the King, & for his owne ſimplicity not able to diſcerne what fitted that time, the King at laſt thought this rather a turbulent vpbraiding him, then a friendly admonition: and asking who thoſe Captaines & ſoldiers were, he commanded them all and Tyro alſo to be bound & kept in priſon. Then one Tripho the Kings Barber, taking hereat occaſion, told the king that Tyro had often ſollicited him, as he ſhaued the king, to cut his throat with his razor, promiſing him for a recompence great rewards, and that he ſhould be one of Alexanders chiefe friends. Hauing ſpoken theſe words, the king cõmanded him to be apprehended, & the Barber, and Tyro & his ſon to be tortured. Tyro his ſon ſeeing his father in moſt miſerable torments, and that he ſtill perſiſted in them (and by the kings diſpleaſure, coniecturing that there was no hope of life) told them that tortured his father, that he would confeſſe all the truth, conditionally that his father & himſelfe might be no more tormented: and hauing his requeſt granted, he told them that it was agreed, that Tyro with his owne hand ſhould haue killed the king: for he could get opportunity to come vnto the king when no man elſe was with him, & ſo he would kill him, & for Alexanders ſake endure any torments whatſoeuer. This ſpoken, he deliuered himſelfe and his father from further tortures: but it is incertaine whether the tale he told was true, or whether he deuiſed it to free them both from torments. Then Herod now laying all doubt aſide (if before he were in any) thought what death his ſons ſhould die, & leauing no place to repentance & mercy, he haſtned to execute his purpoſe: and producing 300. captains, & Tyro & his ſon, and the Barber his accuſer, he accuſed them all before the people, and the people throwing any thing that came to their hands at them, they ſlew them euery one. And Alexander & Ariſtobulus were carried vnto Sebaſte, and there by their fathers command were ſtrangled: and their bodies carried by night into the caſtle Alexandrium, where their grandfather by their mothers ſide, and many of their progenitors lay buried. But perhaps ſome will nothing maruell, that a hatred ſo long a breeding ſhould in the end ſo preuaile, that it ouercame naturall affection. But one may iuſtly doubt whether the fault were in the young men, who exaſperated by a hard father ſo long time, fell into ſuch hatred of him: or whether it is to be imputed vnto his vnkindnes and immoderate deſire of honor and rule, who could not abide any to be his equall, but rather chuſing to do all at his own pleaſure: Or rather vnto fortune, whoſe power the wiſeſt liuing is not able to reſiſt. Wherefore I am perſwaded, Fortune hath predeſtinated all humane actions ſo, that they muſt haue a neceſſary euent. And this ineuitable force we call fate or fatall deſtiny, for that there is nothing which it effecteth not. But it ſufficeth briefely to haue touched this high matter, which is of it ſelfe very difficult, which attributeth ſomething vnto our actions, & examineth the cauſes of the variety of our actions, which ſpeculation is already cõprized in the two volumes of our law. Furthermore, touching the yong mens fault, we may accuſe their youthfull arrogancy, and their free king-like pride, who did giue too great eare to their fathers accuſers, & for that they were vniuſt ſearchers into his life and actions, and that they maliciouſly ſuſpected him, & could not rule their tongues: but hereby gaue double occaſion vnto their aduerſaries, and matter vnto thoſe tale-bearers that ſought to get the kings fauour. But their fathers ſhamefull fault cannot be excuſed, who ſuffered himſelfe ſo to be ouer-ruled with paſſion, that he put them to death that were begotten of his owne body, without any proofe or argument of the crimes laid vnto their charge: yea two yong men of excellent feature of body, not onely beloued of their owne nation, but alſo of ſtrangers, not ſlothfull in hunting, & commendable in military affaires, & eloquent in ciuill diſcourſes. For in all theſe things they were excellent, and eſpecially Alexander the eldeſt of them. It had beene enough for him, ſuppoſe he had condemned them, either to haue kept them in perpetuall priſon, or baniſhed them into ſome far country; ſeeing that he was aſſured of the Romane power, vnder whoſe protection he neither needed to haue feared inuaſion; nor ſecret treaſon againſt him. For ſo ſoone to put them to death, only to ſatisfie his own furious will, what elſe doth it betoken, but only an impious liberty caſting off all fatherly humanity and kindneſſe? eſpecially, ſeeing that he was aged, whoſe yeeres could neither plead ignorance, nor that he was deceiued. For neither was he the more excuſed by the delay he vſed: nay, it had bin leſſe offence, if amazed with ſome ſudden newes, he had bin incited to ſo hainous an offence; but after ſo long delay and deliberation at laſt to effect ſuch a matter, betokens a bloody mind and obdurate in wickedneſſe, as he well ſhewed himſelfe afterward to haue, not ſparing the reſt, whom before he held moſt deare: who though they were leſſe to be pitied in that they iuſtly ſuffered, yet was it an argument of his like cruelty, in that he abſtained not from their deaths alſo: but we will ſpeake hereof hereafter.

The yeere of the world, 3961. before chriſts Natiuitie, 3.

AFTER that Antipater had made away his brothers through the extreme impietie and vnbridled fury, wherewith Herod their father was incenſed and whetted againſt them; yet incontinently obtained he not that which vndoubtedly he hoped for. For being deliuered and diſcharged of that feare he conceiued, leſt his brethren ſhould be partakers with him in the kingdome, he found a difficult and dangerous matter for himſelfe to finde the meanes how hee might obtaine the kingdome: ſo ſtrange and haynous a hatred had all the nation conceiued againſt him. On the other ſide, in ſhewing himſelfe proud and loftie, he more and more whetted and increaſed that hatred which the ſouldiers had foreconceiued againſt him, in whom notwithſtanding, the ſecuritie of the kingdome conſiſted, if it ſhould fortune ſo to fall out that the people ſhould attempt any alteration. All which miſchiefes were begotten by his owne ſinnes, and the vnnaturall murther of his brothers. Nathelеſſe he gouerned the kingdome with his father, liuing in no leſſe authoritie then himſelfe: Herod alſo repoſed more confidence in him euen in thoſe things, for which hee was worthy to loſe his head. For the King conceiued that in confirmation of his good affection towards him, Antipater had accuſed his brethren, as vnder reſolution to continue his father in ſecuritie, and not for any hatred he bore as well vnto them, as to his father; though indeed he hated them for his fathers ſake, being tranſported with fury. But all theſe were but as ſo many ſubtill ſtratagemes to inſinuate himſelfe into Herods counſels & fauours: and theſe did he craftily make vſe of, to cut off the occaſion leſt any ſhould preuent or accuſe him of that which he pretended to doe, and that Herod might be depriued of all meanes and manner of reliefe, if ſo be Antipater ſhould bend his forces againſt him. For the treaſon he complotted againſt his brothers, proceeded from the hatred he bare vnto his father: but at that time he was the more egged on to proſecute his intended purpoſes, without any delay or procraſtination. For if Herod ſhould happen to die, it was a matter moſt aſſured that the kingdome ſhould be his; and ſhould his life continue any longer time, time, and the practice Antipater went about ſhould be diſcouered, ſeeing himſelfe inuironed with theſe dangers, he ſhould be inforced to make his father his enemy. For which cauſe he vſed very great bounty & liberality to all thoſe that were about his father: and through the great largeſſe he beſtowed vpon them, hee ſtrangled and extinguiſhed that hatred which all of them bare vnto him: and aboue all things he continued himſelfe in credit with thoſe friends, which Herod had at Rome, by ſending them diuers preſents, and namely to Saturninus, who was gouernor of Syria. He hoped alſo by bribes and rewards to draw his fathers brother into his faction, and to corrupt the Kings ſiſter alſo, who was married to one of the kings moſt eſteem'd friends in court. Furthermore, he was a ſubtill and politike man in entertaining thoſe men with colourable and cloaking ſhew of friendſhip, with whom he conuerſed, and to draw himſelfe into credit with them: contrariwiſe, he was ſufficiently practiſed to diſſemble his malice and diſcontents, which he had conceiued againſt any man. Notwithſtanding all this, he could not deceiue Salome his aunt, who of long time before had ſounded his inclination, and who was not ſo ſimple as to ſuffer her ſelfe to be deceiued; but had already by all cunning means that might be, preuented his malice, although ſhe had a daughter married vnto his vncle, by the mothers ſide. This daughter was firſt of all wedded to Ariſtobulus, and afterwards by Antipaters means eſpouſed to his vncle. For Callæas her husbands ſon had married the other. But neither could this affinity colour the matter ſo much, but that his malice was diſcouered; neither could that former conſanguinitie extinguiſh the deſerued hatred conceiued againſt him. Herod conſtrained Salome (who through amorous paſſion had thought to haue married her ſelfe to Syllæus the Arabian) to marrie with Alexas, and that by the mediation and perſwaſion of Iulia Cæſars wife, who aduiſed Salome not to refuſe that marriage, for feare leſt he ſhould proue her vtter enemy; for that Herod had made an oath, that if Salome condeſcended not to marry Alexas, hee would neuer make account of her: For which cauſe ſhe followed Iulias aduice, who was Cæſars wife, and counſelled her alſo to her profit and preferment.

Antipater ſpared no coſt to winne his fathers friends.

Antipater could not deceiue his aunt.

Herod compelleth Salome to marry Alexas.

At the ſame time Herod ſent his daughter to King Archelaus, who had beene married to Alexander, preſenting him a dowrie out of his owne treaſury, leſt there ſhould any difference ariſe betweene them, and he himſelfe moſt carefully brought vp his ſonnes children. For Alexander had two ſonnes by Glaphyra; and Ariſtobulus begat on Bernice, Salomes daughter, three ſonnes and two daughters. Theſe ſometimes would he preſent and commend vnto his friends, and bewailing the misfortune of his ſons, would beſeech God that no ſuch ill fortune might befall their children, but rather that they might encreaſe in vertue, and acknowledge their education and bringing vp, with all dutifull reſpects vnto their parents. He prouided them alſo each of them with a wife, at ſuch time as they were ready for marriage, namely, the daughter of Pheroras for the eldeſt of Alexanders ſonnes; and the daughter of Antipater for Ariſtobulus eldeſt ſon: and one of Ariſtobulus daughters was married to Antipaters ſonne; and the other he eſpouſed to Herod his owne ſonne, whom he had begotten of the daughter of the High Prieſt. For it is lawfull in our countrey, and according to our cuſtome, to haue diuers wiues at one time. The King procured theſe marriages through the compaſſion hee had of thoſe Orphelins, thinking by theſe mutuall alliances to cauſe Antipater to be their friend. But Antipater conceiued no leſſe hatred toward the children, then he had done malice towards their father. For the care that Herod had of them, increaſed his hatred, in that he pretended to be the greateſt among the brethren; and he eſpecially feared leſt when they ſhould grow to mans eſtate, they would reſiſt his power, being aſſiſted by King Archelaus, as his ſons in law; and Pheroras who was a Tetrarch ſhould do the like, for that he had married his ſonne to Alexanders daughter. And ſo much the more was hee incited, becauſe all the people had compaſſion of theſe Orphanes, and had conceiued a hatred againſt him, who neuer ceaſed to expreſſe his malice againſt his brethren. He therefore deuiſed all the meanes that were poſſible to diſannull the decrees which his father had reſolued vpon to this effect, being very loth that they ſhould euer liue to be partners with him in the kingdome. So that at laſt Herod condeſcended to Antipaters demand, which was, that he might marry Ariſtobulus daughter, and his ſonne he eſpouſed to Pheroras daughter: and thus were the promiſed and forementioned marriages wholly cut off; yea euen againſt Herods former decree. At that time Herod had nine wiues, namely Antipaters mother, the High Prieſts daughter, by whom he had a ſonne that bare his name, and a daughter of his brothers, and a couſin of his owne, by whom he had no children. He had another wife alſo, that by nation was a Samaritane, by whom he had two ſonnes, Antipas, and Archelaus, and a daughter called Olimpias, who was afterwards married to Ioſeph the Kings couſin. As for Archelaus and Antipas, they were brought vp at Rome, with a certaine priuate friend of his. Moreouer, he eſpouſed one that was called Cleopatra, that was borne in Ieruſalem, by whom he had Herod and Philip, which Philip was brought vp at Rome. By Pallas he had Phaſaelus: by Phedra and Helpia he had two daughters, Roxana and Salome. As touching his eldeſt daughters, Alexanders ſiſters by the mothers ſide, whom Pheroras had refuſed to take in marriage, he matcht the one with Antipater his ſiſters ſonne, and the other he wedded to Phaſaelus his brothers ſonne, and this was Herods progeny.

CHAP. II.

Of ZAMARIS the Babylonian Iew.

Herod buildeth a Caſtle in the region of the Trachonites, and maketh Zamaris the Iew that came frō Babylon Gouernor therin.

AFTER this, intending to aſſure his eſtate in the countrey of Trachonite, hee reſolued to build a borough of the bigneſſe of a City in the midſt of the country, as well to warrantize his country, as to be in better readineſſe to repulſe his enemies, and to repulſe them with more expedition. And hauing intelligence that a certaine Iew was come from Babylon with 500. Archers on horſebacke, and about one hundreth of his kinſmen, and had aduentured to paſſe Euphrates, and was in the countrey adioyning to Antioch neere vnto Daphne in Syria, where Saturnine Generall of the Romane army had giuen him a Caſtle, called Valatha to inhabit, he ſent for him and his followers, promiſing to giue him both lands and Lordſhips in the ſigniory of Batanea, which confineth on Trachonite, intending that he ſhould make head againſt thoſe that would aſſaile him, and promiſing him that both his land and his ſouldiers ſhould be exempt from all tributes, and paiments of cuſtomes. This Babylonian Iew was induced by theſe offers of his to come, and take poſſeſſion of the place, where he builded a borough, called Bathyra. This man oppoſing himſelfe againſt the Trachonites, defended them of the countrey, and thoſe Iewes that came from Babylon to Ieruſalem to offer ſacrifice, from all incurſions and robberies of the Trachonites: and diuers that obſerued the religion of the Iewes, reſorted vnto him from all places, ſo that this countrey was very well peopled, by reaſon of the enfranchiſement of the Tribute, which continued during Herods life time.

But Philip, who ſucceeded him, exacted afterward ſome ſmall tribute of them, and that but for a little while. But Agrippa the great, and his ſon of the ſame name, vexed them very grieuouſly with taxations; yet permitted them to enioy their liberty, whoſe ſucceſſors the Romans impoſed many grieuous tributes vpon them, yet continued their freedome, of whom hereafter wee will more particularly and largely diſcourſe in due place, and in proceſſe of my hiſtory. Now this Iew Zamaris, to whom Herod had giuen the poſſeſſion of his countrey, died, after he had liued vertuouſly, and left a vertuous off-ſpring behind him, amongſt whom was Iacim renowned for his dexterity on horſebacke, who with his troupe of horſe was of the King of Babylons guard. This Iacim died when he was very old, and left his ſon Philip to ſucceede him, a man valiant in armes, and addicted to all ſorts of vertue, as much as any one that hath bin renowned in writing: for which cauſe King Agrippa loued him and put his truſt in him, and committed the truſt and trayning of his ſouldiers vnto him, who led them alſo foorth if any occaſion of ſeruice was proffered.

CHAP. III.

ANTIPATER conſpireth againſt HEROD.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 3.

WHil'ſt the eſtate and affaires of Herod were thus diſpoſed, all mens eies were fixed vpon Antipater, after that Herod had permitted him to intend his particular profit. This permiſſion was granted him vnder the hope that his father had, that he would behaue himſelfe faithfully, and affectionately towards him: but he abuſed his authority more audaciouſly then could be expected; for he traiterouſly coloured his conceiued malice, and eaſily drew his father to beleeue him in whatſoeuer he ſaid. He was feared by all men, not onely for his force and authority, but for his ſubtilties and policies. But aboue all the reſt, Pheroras reſpected him moſt, and was in like manner as greatly eſteemed by him. For Antipater had circumuented him by the meanes of certaine women, who fauoured his faction: for Pheroras was commanded by his wife, his mother and ſiſter in law, notwithſtanding that he hated them, by reaſon of the outrage they had offered to his daughters who were Virgins; natheleſſe hee was enforced to diſſemble all things, becauſe he could doe nothing but that they were alwaies round about him, and had ſuch maſtery of his affaires, that they wrought him to performe whatſoeuer they pleaſed. To theſe likewiſe was Antipater neerely tied, both of himſelfe and by his mother: for Pheroras deceiued by women.

A for theſe foure women were of one mind and affection in all things, and ſpak as it were by one mouth: yet was Pheroras at ods with Antipater vpon ſome ſlight miſlikes, and ſhe that wrought this debate betwixt them, was the King ſiſter, who had of long time eſpied all their drifts, know- ing well, that their mutuall friendſhip tended to the ouerthrow of Herod: neither refuſed ſhe to expreſſe what her opinion was therein. And they knowing well that the King diſliked this their inward familiarity, and that he was priuy to that which they pretended, which was his vtter ru- ine, reſolued between themſelues to refraine their publike familiarity, and to make a ſhew that they were at ods one with another: to which intent they reproched one another, eſpecially at ſuch time as they were either in Herods preſence, or there was any one with them, who (as they B thought) would certify him therof. But in ſecret they intermitted not their accuſtomed friend- ſhip, and continued their intercourſes with more priuy affability; and ſuch was their ordinary de- meanor and behauiour: yet was not Salome ignorant hereof, neither when they firſt deuiſed this drift, neither afterwards when they put it in execution: for ſhe diligently noted all things, and aggrauated the ſame in their reports to her brother, whō ſhe informed of their ſecret aſſemblies and banquetting, vrging their ſecret conſultations, which (as we ſaid) had no other iſſue but his ruine, except vpon their diſcouery he ſought to repreſſe them in time. Further, that for the pre- ſent they behaued themſelues like enemies in outward ſhew, and all their ſpeeches tended to diſ- grace one another; but that in ſecret they were friends, and that in priuate they entertained their amity, and promiſed each other their mutuall aſſiſtance to ſtrength themſelues againſt thoſe to C whom they were loth their friendſhip ſhould be diſcouered. Theſe things obſerued, ſhe with all diligence ſignified the ſame vnto her brother, who of himſelfe had already many probabilities thereof. But he durſt not make ſhew thereof, becauſe hee knew that his ſiſter was a woman too much addicted to reproachfull accuſation. There was amongſt the Iewes a ſect of people that were called Phariſes, who were too much addicted to ſelfe opinion, and boaſted themſelues to be the exacteſt obſeruers of the law in all the countrey, to whom theſe women were very much addicted, as to thoſe who were much beloued of God, as in outward appearance they made ſhew for. Theſe were ſuch as durſt oppoſe themſelues againſt Kings, full of fraud, arrogancy, and rebellion, preſuming to raiſe war vpon their motions, and to rebell and offend their princes at their pleaſures: whereas therfore all the nation of the Iewes had ſworne to be faithfull to Cæſar, D and to the eſtate of the King; theſe onely refuſed to take oath, and of this ſect there were to the number of ſix thouſand. For which cauſe the King hauing impoſed an amercement vpon them, Pheroras wife paid it for them; for which cauſe they pretending to gratifie her, and being eſteemed for ſuch as were skilfull in forelling ſuch things as were to come, by reaſon of their often communication with God, foretold her that God had decreed to bring the Kingdome of Herod and his poſteritie to an end, and would bring to paſſe that the crowne ſhould deſcend to Pheroras and his ſonnes. Salome, had got an inkling hereof, and had told Herod no leſſe: and how they likewiſe corrupted euery one of his Courtiers; for which cauſe he put thoſe to death amongſt the Phariſes, who were the principall authors of this aduice, and with them alſo the E Eunuch Bagoas, and Carus who was his darling, and one of the goodlieſt men of that time. He af- terwards cut off all thoſe amongſt his houſhold ſeruants, who were of the Phariſees faction: For Bagoas was bewitched with that hope by them, that he ſuffered himſelfe to be called the father and benefactor of the King, who ſhould be eſtabliſhed according to their prediction, and haue the gouernment of all things, and ſhould be ſtrengthned by marriages, and deſcent of his lawful and naturall children.

But after that Herod had puniſhed thoſe amongſt the Phariſes, who were conuicted to haue beene of the conſpiracie, hee aſſembled a councell of his friends, before whom he accuſed Phe- roras wife, & ripped vp the outrage that was done vnto his daughters, as it hath beene declared, aſcribing the ſame to the pride of this woman, obiecting it for a crime againſt her, for thereby ſhe had iniuried his honour. Beſides this, he accuſed her that ſhe had of ſet purpoſe ſtird vp mu- F tinies, and by all meanes poſſible both in word and in effect, contrarie to all law of nature, ſhee ſtirred vp debate betwixt him and his brother; & that the fine that he had impoſed vpon his ad- uerſaries, was ſatisfied at her charge: ſo that no iot of that conſpiracie was contriued without her priuitie and conſent. For which cauſes (ſaid hee) brother Pheroras, it ſhall not bee amiſſe for you of your owne accord to driue ſuch a wretched woman from you, before you be requeſted, and the ſentence be pronounced againſt her, otherwiſe we will be the cauſe to kindle a warre be- twixt you and me. For if at this preſent you will continue the friendſhip and brotherhood be- twixt you and me, ſeparate your ſelfe from her: inſo doing I will account you for my brother, and you shall lose nothing by the affection which I bea re vnto you. For the bond of brotherly loue cannot continue safe and vnuiolate, vnlesse you put her away. Now although Pheroras was moued with the importance & waight of this discourse; yet said he, that for the loue he bare vnto his wife, he would forget nothing of that dutie which consanguinitie required at his hands in regard of his brother: but that he had rather die then liue without her company, whom he loued more dearly then his life. Herod, although he tooke this answer of his brothers for a most grieuous iniurie, yet forbare he to discouer his displeasure towards him: hee onely forbad Antipater and his mother, and in like manner Pheroras, to frequent the one with the other any more. Hee commanded the women likewise that they should giue ouer their familiar entertainements the one with the other, which all of them promised to performe. Yet this notwithstanding vpon fit opportunities and occasions, they visited one another, and Antipater and Pheroras feasted one another by night. The report also went that Antipater had the company of Pheroras wife, and that his mother was the meanes and minister of their priuie meetings.

Pheroras refuseth to put away his wife.

Herod interdicteth Pheroras and Antipater their priuie meetings, and forbiddeth the Ladies no lesse.

Chap. IIII.

Herod sendeth Antipater vnto Cæsar.

Antipater suspecting his fathers dislikes, and fearing lest his hatred should by increase bring him into hazard, hee wrote vnto his frends in Rome, requiring them to write their letters vnto Herod, requesting him to send Antipater vnto Cæsar, with all expedition as was possible. Which beeing brought to passe, Herod sent him thither with diuers royall presents, and gaue him his testament & will with him; wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdome to Antipater. And if it should happen that Antipater should die before him, then bequeathed he the same to his sonne Herod, whom he had by the high Priests daughter. About the same time Syllæus the Arabian repaired to Rome, notwithstanding hee had neglected those things that Cæsar had giuen him in charge. Him did Antipater accuse before Cæsar, for the same defaults wherewith he was charged by Nicholaus. Syllæus also was accused by Aretas, for murthering diuers of the best account in the citie of Petra, contrarie to his mind: amongst the which was Sohemus (a man of much vertue and honour) and Phabatus, Cæsars seruant, of which crimes Syllæus was accused vpon that occasion which ensueth: There was a certaine man of Corinthus, who was one of the Kings guard, and such a one as he put very great trust in: him did Syllæus perswade by store of money and bribes, to kill Herod; which hee promised to performe. Phabatus made priuie to Syllæus mind, he presently told it to the King, who caused him to be apprehended and tortured; who confessed the whole matter. He laid hands also on two Arabians, perswaded by this Corinthians confession; one of which was a man of command in his countrey, and the other was Syllæus chiefest friend. They being examined, confessed that they came thither to sollicite and egge forward with many exhortations the Corinthian to execute the murther, and to assist him if he stood in need of them. Which being fully approued by Herod before Saturnine, he sent them to Rome, there more amply to be proceeded against, and so to be punished.

Chap. V.

Pheroras death.

Herod perceiuing that his brother Pheroras did constantly continue his affection towards his wife, hee commaunded him to retire himselfe into his owne dominion: whereupon he willingly departed to his Tetrarchy, protesting by many solemne othes, that he would neuer more returne into the Citie, vnlesse hee were assured that Herod was dead. Not long after it hapned, that the King falling sick, hee was sent for to receiue certaine secret instructions, as from the mouth of a dying man; but Pheroras would not obey him in regard of his oath. This notwithstanding, Herod dealt more kindly with him, and continued his loue and affection towards him: for hee came vnto Pheroras as soone as hee heard of his first sickness, and beeing vnsent for also; and after hee was deceased, hee sent his body to Ierusalem, and honourably entombed him in that place, and grieuously lamented his death. This was the beginning of Antipaters mis-haps, who at that time was departed to Rome. For it was Gods pleasure that at last hee should bee punished for the murther of his brethren. This matter will I discourse of at large, that it may serue for an example vnto many Kings, how they ought to practise and follow vertue in all their actions.

CHAP. VI.

Pheroras wife is accuſed, and Herod is aduertiſed of Antipaters conſpiracies.

The yeere of the world, 3961. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 3.

AFTER Pheroras death, two of his freemen, who were Taphnites by birth, and ſuch as Pheroras in his lifetime both inly truſted, and dearely loued, came vnto Herod, requiring him not to ſuffer his brothers death to paſſe vnpuniſhed, but to make diligent enquiry of that vnfortunate and vnexpected miſaduenture. Herod lent a willing eare to their ſuite, perceiuing that the matters they importuned him in, were likely & very credible. Whereupon they told him, that Pheroras, the day before his vnexpected ſicknes, had ſupt with his wife, and that hauing receiued an vnaccuſtomed poyſon with his meat, he was dead. That this poiſon had been brought thither by a woman of Arabia, who in her ſpeech proteſted that it was ſome potion to increaſe loue, but in effect it was to bring Pheroras to his end. For the women of Arabia amongſt all others are skilfull in poiſons, & are great ſorcerers, and ſhe that was charged with this fact, was eſteemed a great friend and fauourer of Syllæus beſt beloued. That Pheroras mother & his wiues ſiſter went into thoſe quarters vpon purpoſe to buy that poyſon, and returned backe, and brought this woman with them the day before the ſupper. The King moued by theſe words of theirs, tortured both thoſe maid ſeruants of theirs, who were their bondwomen; as alſo certaine other of their free ſeruants. Now when the fact could not be extorted, by reaſon that none of them confeſſed the ſame; at length, ſhe that was laſt of all put to her tryall, ouercome by the paines ſhe endured, ſaid nought elſe, but that ſhe prayed God that Antipaters mother might feele the like torments, ſith ſhee was the cauſe of all thoſe miſchiefes which they endured.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 5. Pheroras freemen accuſe his wife for poyſoning him.

Herod torturreth the Ladies bondwomen, & ſoundeth out Antipaters and their ſecrets.

Theſe words of hers made Herod the more eager & inquiſitiue, ſo that by force of tortures he wrought out all the ſecrets of theſe women, their banquets, their ſecret aſſemblies, & thoſe very words that Herod had ſpoken apart betwixt his ſon and himſelfe, which had been reported vnto the women that Pheroras entertained: namely, that hee would giue him one hundreth talents, prouided he would vſe no conference with Pheroras. Moreouer, they reckoned vp the hatred that Antipater bare vnto his father, the complaints that he made vnto his mother, of the too long life and continuance of his father: for that in regard of himſelfe hee was already waxen old; ſo that although the Kingdome ſhould fall into his hands preſently, yet could he receiue but very little contentment thereby. Moreouer he alleadged, that diuers brothers and brothers children were brought vp together with him, ſo that he might not ſecurely hope for any thing, for that already if he ſhould fortune to die, the Kingdome was to deſcend not to his ſon, but to his brother: beſides this, he was accuſtomed to accuſe the King of diuers cruelties committed by him, and of that murther which he executed vpon the perſons of his children. That for feare leſt hee ſhould practiſe his tyranny againſt thoſe that remained, Antipater had found out the deuice to be ſummoned to Rome, and Pheroras withdrew himſelfe into his Tetrarchy.

Theſe words, which as he knew had reference to that which his ſiſter had often informed him of, were not by him held incredible; ſo that being preſſed with the malice of Antipater, he ſequeſtred Doris his mother from his preſence, ſpoiling her before her departure of all her iewels, which were valued at many talents: and from that time forward he ſhewed himſelfe more fauorable towards thoſe women of Pheroras houſhold. But nothing did more whet Herods diſpleaſure againſt Antipater, then did a certain Samaritane, who was alſo called Antipater, who had the ordering of the affaires of Antipater the Kings ſon. For he being brought in queſtion and tortured, declared amongſt other things, that Antipater had mixed a mortall poyſon, and deliuered the ſame to Pheroras his vncle, commanding him to practiſe the Kings death in his abſence, and by that meanes leaſt ſuſpected. That this poyſon was brought out of Egypt by one called Antiphilus, Antipaters friend. That it was ſent to Pheroras by one called Theudion, Antipaters mothers brother. That this poyſon was kept by Pheroras wife, & was committed by her husband to her cuſtody. She being examined by the King hereupon, confeſſed no leſſe, and haſtning forth as if ſhe intended to fetch the ſame, ſhe caſt her ſelfe down headlong from the top of the houſe: yet did ſhe not murther her ſelfe, becauſe ſhe fel vpon her feet. Now after ſhee was recouered out of her ſwoune, and the King had promiſed all ſecurity both to her ſelf & her family, if ſo be ſhe would diſcouer the truth; & contrariwiſe threatned her with extreme torments, if ſhe obſtinately continued in concealing theſe treaſons, ſhe ſware ſhe would diſcouer all things according as they were acted, and as many men thought at that time, she told nothing but the truth. That poyson (said she) was brought by Antiphilus out of Egypt, and bought there by the meanes of a brother of his, who was a Physician. After this, Theudion brought it to our house: and I hauing receiued it from Pheroras hands, kept the same, but bought by your son Antipater to poyson you that are his father. Now therefore after that my husband fell sicke, and you in kindnesse came to visit and comfort him, he being moued with compassion, and conquered by your brotherly kindnesse, by your good affection and louing care in giuing order for his health, called me vnto him, and said; O wife, Antipater hath circumuented me, whil'st by his pestilent counsels and poysoning practices he desireth to cut off his father, and depriue me of a kinde brother. Now therefore, sith as I perceiue there is no part of my brothers louing and naturall affection diminished towards me, wherwith he was wont to entertaine me, and that my latest houre of life approacheth, » God forbid, that being ready to sleep with my forefathers, I should present them with a ghost » soiled and sweltred in my brothers blood: Dispatch therefore, and burne this poison before » mine eies. Hereupon said she, I presently brought it forth according as my husband comman- » ded me, and burnt the greatest part of the poison, and the rest I reserued, that if after my husbands » death your Grace should vse me vnkindly, it might serue me to escape those extremities that » would betide me.

Pheroras wife cõfesseth that she hath the poison, & casts her selfe down headlong frõ the roofe.

» After she had spoken thus, she brought forth before them all the poison, and the boxe wherin it was kept. After her, another of Antiphilus brothers, and the mother to them both, confessed no lesse, being constrained thereunto by force and violence of torture, and acknowledged the boxe. The Kings wife also, who was the daughter of the High Priest, was accused for confederacy and concealement of all these treasons. For which cause Herod put her away from him, and razed his sons name out of his testament, wherein he had bequeathed him the kingdome after his decease. He displaced also his father in law Simon the sonne of Boethus from the Priesthood, and placed Matthias the son of Theophilus, who was borne in Ierusalem, in his stead. In the meane space Bathillus, Antipaters freeman returned from Rome; who being tortured, confessed that he brought a poison with him to deliuer it to Antipaters mother, and Pheroras, to the end that if the first poison were not effectuall enough to dispatch the King, they might make vse of this other, to cut him off speedily. There came letters also to Herods hands from his friends in Rome, written and deuised by Antipaters meanes, to accuse Archelaus and Philip, for very often they had refreshed the memory of Alexander and Aristobulus death, contriued by their father; and for that they lamented the miserable fate of them, who were innocently betrayed, and that now also they themselues were called backe into their country for no other cause, but vpon their arriuall to be made partakers of their brothers miserable destiny. These things did Antipaters friends certifie Herod of, in that by many and mighty presents he wrought them thereunto. He himselfe also wrote vnto his father colourably, after a manner excusing the young men, and imputing their words to their indiscretion and young yeers. Meane-while, he busied himselfe in accusing Syllæus, and courted the chiefest Romans, buying diuers ornaments and iewels to present them with, to the value of two hundreth talents. And it is to be wondred at, that so great matters being brought on foot against him, seuen moneths at least before his returne into the country of Iudæa, that no inkling thereof came vnto his eares. But the cause partly was, the diligent search and watch that was kept vpon the high-waies, and partly the hatred that all men had conceiued against Antipater. For there was not any that would put themselues in hazzard to procure his security.

ANTIPATER is condemned, and cast into prison.

HEROD concealing his displeasure, answered Antipater his sons letters (wherein he gaue him to vnderstand, that as soone as he had dispatched his affaires as it behoued him, he should returne) charging him to hasten homeward, for feare lest during his absence, some vnexpected inconuenience might betide him. He likewise after a temperate manner complained vnto him of his mother, promising notwithstanding to remit the fault vpon his returne, and by all meanes hee made shew vnto him of much kindnesse, fearing lest he, apprehending any suspicion, should deferre to hasten his returne homeward, and lingring too long at Rome, should contriue some traiterous stratageme, to the preiudice of himselfe, and the ouerthrow of his kingdome. These letters did Antipater receiue in Cilicia, and already had he receiued others at Tarentum, rentum, by whom he vnderstood of Pheroras his vncles death, whereat he was sore grieued; not for the loue he bare to Pheroras, but for that he died before he had murthered his father; according as he had promised him. As soone as he came to Celenderis a City of Cilicia, hee grew doubtfull whether he should returne or no, and grieuously was he distracted by his mothers disgraces, who was banished from the Court. Sundry also were the opinions of his friends in this behalfe: for some of them counselled him to stay, and expect the euent of these troubles in some place: other some, on the other side, aduised him to delay no longer his returne into his country, for that vpon his arriuall he might easily satisfie all those obiections and accusations that were inforced against him, because his accusers had nought else to strengthen their cause with, but his absence: This latter aduice liked him best; so that he betooke himselfe to sea, and at last arriued in the port of Sebaste, so called, and builded by Herod, to his great charge in honour of Cæsar.

And now already it manifestly appeared that Antipater was vpon his downfall: For no man came out to salute him, no man entertained him, as they did vpon his departure, when as all of them accompanied him with prayers and happy acclamations: but contrariwise they boldly and openly spake against him, and bitterly cursed him, telling him that he was iustly punished for the wickednesse he had committed against his brothers.

Antipater vpon his returne is saluted by no man.

About the same time Quintilius Varus, who was sent to succeed Saturnine in the gouernment of Syria, was at Ierusalem, and drew thither at that instant vpon Herods request, to assist him with his counsailes in his present and weighty occasions. Now whil'st these two sate and consulted together, Antipater came in before any man expected him, and in that purple garment and royalty that he was accustomed to vse, entered the Palace. The guard of the gates suffered him to enter in, but they excluded all those that were with him. This first of all affrighted and appauled his spirits, in that he already perceiued into what calamities he was fallen; and now also when he drew neere his father, he thrust him from him, accusing him of the murther of his brethren, and reproaching him with that intent he had to poison him, telling him that the next day Varus should both heare and iudge all his misdemeanours.

He altogether amated at the greatnesse of that vnexpected mischiefe, which he both heard and saw, departed presently from them wholly amazed, and in the way met with his mother and his wife (which was Antigonus daughter, who had beene King of the Iewes before Herod) by whom he was aduertised of all that which had hapned, and for that cause more diligently prepared himselfe for his triall. The next day Varus and Herod sate in iudgement, accompanied by their friends on both sides; thither also were cited the Kings kinred and his sister Salome, and certaine others, who could discouer his secret practices; some of which had beene tortured, and namely Antipaters mothers seruants, who a little before his arriuall, had beene apprehended with a letter to this effect: That he should take heed that he returned not into the country, because his father was made priuy to all his practices, and that for the present he had no other refuge but onely to Cæsar, and to take care likewise lest he should fall into his fathers hands.

Hereupon Antipater humbling himselfe on his knees before the King his father, besought him not to condemne him before his cause were heard, but to suspend his iudgement vntill such time as he had heard his iustifications. But Herod, after he had commanded him to withdraw himselfe into the midst of the court and assembly, deplored his infelicity in begetting such children, and bewailed his mis-hap, that in his old age he was reserued for an Antipater. After this he reckoned vp the cares he had spent in their education and institution, and how bountifully he had bestowed vpon him as much riches as he required: he furthermore alleadged, that none of all these fauors could preserue him from falling into the lapse of the losse of his life by their policy, to the intent that they might iniuriously possesse the kingdom, before either the law of nature, or the will of their father, or their owne rights could challenge the same. But aboue all the rest, he wondred at Antipater, with what hope he could possibly be puffed vp to attempt so audacious and wicked an enterprize. For by his testament he had made him the heire of his kingdome, and in his life time also had made him equall partaker of his dignity, glory and power: that he receiued annually fifty talents of reuenue, and to furnish his voyage for Rome, had three hundred talents giuen him. Moreouer, he accused him for his slanderous accusations against his murthered and slaughtered brothers: who if they had beene wicked, why did he imitate them? but if they were innocent; why without cause produced hee his slanderous accusations against those, who were his naturall brethren? For in his owne respect he had neuer found any thing against them, but by his report: neither had he giuen sentence against them, but by Antipaters aduice, aduice, who for the preſent were abſolued by him, becauſe he was become the heire of their patricide. In vttering theſe words he began to weepe, being vnable to vrge his griefes any further; for which cauſe he beſought Nicholas Damaſcene, who was his deare friend, and conuerſed ordinarily with him, and was priuy to all that which had paſſed, to proſecute the reſt that appertained to the inqueſt and approbation of his crime.

Antipaters anſwer to his fathers obiection.

But Antipater turning himſelfe towards his father, began to iuſtifie himſelfe, vrging the ſame teſtimonies and fauours that his father had ſhewed vnto him, and the honors he had receiued at his hands, which he would neuer haue ſhewed him, if he had bin vnworthy of the ſame, and had not by his vertue deſerued theſe fauours. He alleadged alſo, that by his vertue he had preuented all that which might haue hapned, and that where the cauſe required his labour or diligence, he diſpatched all things with his owne induſtry, that it was vnlikely that he, who had deliuered his father from thoſe treaſons, which were intended againſt him by other men, ſhould himſelfe attempt the like: and as far from probability that he ſhould goe about to extinguiſh that vertue (wherof euen vntill that day he had giuen teſtimony) to the end that alwaies hereafter he might be defamed for ſuch an indignity. For long before this time he was named and entitled to ſucceed him, and to enioy thoſe very honours whereof already he partooke no ſmall part; whereby he proteſted that it was vnlikely, that he, who might enioy the halfe of all that his father had, in all ſecurity, vertue and honour, ſhould deſire the whole with infamy and danger; yea and with incertitude to obtaine the ſame; conſidering in eſpeciall, that the puniſhment which had befallen his brothers (whom he had both diſcloſed and accuſed at ſuch time as they were hidden) was procured by him, who, if he had liſted, might haue concealed them in ſecret, and whoſe wickedneſſe toward their father (after it was approued) he himſelfe had reuenged vpon them: neither (as he ſaid) repented he himſelfe of that which he had done: for that action of his might be an argument to approoue how incorruptly he loued his father. And as touching that which he had dealt in at Rome, Cæſar himſelfe was witneſſe thereof; who could be no more deceiued then God himſelfe: whereof thoſe letters bore record, which were written by him; which in equity ſhould be of no leſſe force, then the ſlanders of thoſe who ſought to ſet them at oddes: the moſt part of which obiections and reproches had bin complotted and deuiſed by his enemies, who haue had the leiſure to purſue the ſame during his abſence, which they could not haue performed in his preſence. Finally, he auowed, that all thoſe confeſſions were falſe which were extorted by torture, in that it ordinarily falleth out, that ſuch as are put to the triall, confeſſe many things by force of torment that are vntrue, to ſatisfie them that put them thereto: briefly without all fauour, he offered himſelfe to the racke in iuſtification of his innocency. Vpon theſe his proteſtations, all the councell and aſſiſtants were confounded. For all of them had great compaſſion of Antipater, who was wholly drowned in his teares; ſo that his very enemies began to pitty him. And Herod himſelfe made it appeare, that he ſeemed in ſome ſort to be altered in his opinion: notwithſtanding he endeauoured to conceale the ſame.

But Nicholaus, according as he was requeſted, proſecuted that accuſation which the King had begun, vrging all things to the vttermoſt, and producing all the witneſſes, and thoſe manifeſt proofes, that were gathered from their examinations that were tortured. In eſpeciall, he amply diſcourſed of the Kings vertue, which he had fatherly expreſſed in the education and inſtruction of his children; for which he had beene ſo vnkindly and vnnaturally requited. Moreouer, that his firſt childrens fooliſh raſhneſſe was not ſo much to be wondred at, for that being young, they had bin corrupted by the malice of their counſellers, and had blotted out of their hearts all the lawes of nature, rather through ambition of rule, then deſire of riches: But that Antipaters boldneſſe was both wonderfull and wicked, who more cruell then the cruelleſt beaſts (who toward their benefactors acknowledge each good turne) was nothing mollified by his fathers ſo great indulgence; not terrified by his brothers calamity, but muſt needs emulate them in their crueltie. And thou thy ſelfe (ſaid he) O Antipater, wert the Iudge of their attempted treaſons, by thy inquiſition they were indited, thou didſt execute the iuſtice againſt them being conuicted. Neither doe wee diſallow that thou didſt proſecute them with iuſt indignation, but rather admire thee for that thou imitateſt their intemperance: and we eaſily gather that thoſe acts of thine were not attempted for thy fathers ſecurity, but intended for thy brothers ouerthrow, that by deteſting their malice, thou mighteſt inſinuate thy ſelf into the allowance & good liking of their father and thine, that afterwards thou mightſt more cunningly and ſecurely bring him to his end, which at length thou haſt attempted to perform. For whil'ſt thou adiudgeſt thy guilty brothers to death, and ſpareſt their confederats, thou mak'ſt it manifeſt in all mens eies, that thou art in good liking with

A liking with them, whoſe aſſiſtance thou mighteſt hereafter vſe in oppreſſing thy father. Thou haſt therefore taken a double pleaſure worthy thy manners; the one openly as if reioycing and glorying, that by thy brothers death thou haſt atchieued a matter of honour: the other ſecretly, with endeauouring by greater wickednes, but more ſecret fraud, to make an end of thy father; the reuenger of whoſe iniuries thou pretendedſt to be. For if thou hadſt truly deteſted their malice, thou hadſt neuer eſteemed the ſame to be worthy of thy imitation: For thou hadſt not cut them off for committing ſuch capitall offences, as were anſwerable vnto thine, but for that they had a more iuſt and rightfull title to ſucceed in the kingdome then thou haſt: And thou haſt thought good to mixe the murther of thy father with the ſlaughtered bodies of thy brothers, for feare B leſt thou ſhouldſt be ſuddenly conuinced in thy conſpiracies againſt them, and to the end that the puniſhment that thou well deſerueſt to ſuffer, ſhould light vpon thy infortunate father, proiecting with your ſelfe ſuch a paricide, and ſo rare and hainous a murther, that to this day the like thereof hath not beene heard of amongſt men. For thou being his ſonne haſt practiſed theſe treaſons, not only againſt thy father, but againſt him that loued thee aboue meaſure, and did thee good beyond hope, with whom thou haſt actuall participation of the gouernment of the kingdome, and who had appointed thee his heire in the ſame, being no waies hindred, either for the preſent, or in times paſt, to participate the pleaſure of ſoueraignty, and being aſſured of the hope of ſucceſſion both by the will and writings of thy father. But you haue meaſured the courſe of your affaires, not according to Herods vertue, but according to your owne appetite and malice, C intending to depriue ſuch a father of his part, who granted you the whole; and ſeeking in effect to murther him, whom in words you pretended heretofore to protect from iniury. And not content of your ſelfe to practiſe theſe treacheries, you haue poiſoned your mother alſo with no leſſe corruption, and in ſtead of loue that ſhould haue beene amongſt brethren, you haue filled your family with mutinies and hatreds: And after and beſides all theſe things, thou haſt been ſo audacious, as to call thy father beaſt, being of thy ſelfe more maliignant then thoſe beaſts that are moſt venemous, vſing thine owne venome againſt thy deareſt friends, and ſuch as haue beſt deſerued at thy hands, ſtrengthning thy ſelfe with his guard, and diuers treacheries both of men and women againſt one old man, as if thy curſed minde alone were not ſufficient to ſatisfie thy hatred. And now after ſo many men and women, ſlaues and free-men tortured for thy cauſe, af- D ter the open and manifeſt teſtimonies of thy parties in the conſpiracy, thou art ſo impudent as yet to contradict the truth: and thou that lately hopedſt to depriue thy father of his life, doeſt now as much as in thee lieth, endeauour to aboliſh that law that was inſtituted againſt malefactors in thy kind, herewithall Varus equity, and all whatſoeuer iuſtice is in the world. Doeſt thou therefore accuſe them of falſehood, who were examined in torments, to the end thou mighteſt endanger their credit, who were the preſeruers of thy fathers life? ſhall we beleeue thee more then them in their torments? Wilt thou not (O Varus) deliuer the King from the iniuries of thoſe, who are his owne fleſh and blood? wilt thou not put this wicked beaſt to death, who hath murdred his brothers, to pretend a loue towards his father, and who hath at laſt beene diſcouered to be the moſt mortall enemy of them all, to the intent that at one inſtant he might eſtabliſh the kingdome E in himſelfe? Thou knoweſt that Patricide is no priuate crime, but a publike iniury to life and nature, which is no leſſe loathſome in the thought, then it is in the act: which whoſo puniſheth not, is of himſelfe guilty of an iniury offered to our common mother nature.

Patricide that publike iniury of life and nature.

After theſe ſpeeches, he annexed certaine points as touching Antipaters mother, which through feminine frailty had beene blabbed out by her, to wit, that ſhee had asked counſell of ſoothſaiers and diuiners, to whom the Kingdome ſhould befall: And that ſhe had offered ſacrifices, and made prayers for the death of the King. And moreouer, he declared what laſciuious prankes Antipater had plaied with Pheroras women, in banquetting and amorous and wanton dalliances. The informations likewiſe that were preſented by ſuch as were tortured, with ſundry teſtimonies of diuers men, ſome ſuborned; the other found out to be incontinently produced and con- F firmed. For each man ſeeing that Antipater was expoſed to the accuſations of thoſe men, who had the gouernment in their hands, and that the good fortune that had long time accompanied him, had openly deliuered him into the hands of his enemies, they manifeſtly diſcouered the inſatiable hatred which they had conceiued againſt him, whereas beforetime the feare that they had of him inforced them to be ſilent: yet was he not ſo much burdened with other mens hatreds, as with his owne wickedneſſe, namely, his deadly hatred againſt his father, his breach of amity amongſt his brethren, whereby he filled the Kings houſhold with ſeditions and murthers, of ſome complotted, and acted by other ſome; neither giuing place to hatred according to iuſtice, nor to amity according to good affection, but according as it might ſtand with his profit. Which for that diuers men perceiued long before that time, they iudged of euents according as they had reaſon, and the rather becauſe that being void of hatred, they ſpake but their opinions. And whereas heretofore they had cried with a loud voice againſt him, at ſuch time as they were ſhut vp; at this time when they were depriued of their feare, they declared all things, that they knew. And whereas there were diuers produced of the miſchiefes committed by him, yet ſeemed there nothing to be fained, for that the accuſers neither ſpake in fauour of the King, neither concealed any thing for feare of perill, but condemned all Antipaters wicked actions, and iudged him worthy of death and puniſhment, not ſo much for his fathers ſecurity as of his own demerit. Neither did they onely accuſe him, who were by iuſtice tyed thereunto, but diuers voluntary witneſſes alſo brought in their euidence; ſo that although hee was a very cunning diſſembler, and colourer of his lies, and moſt impudent in his aſſertions, yet durſt he not once open his mouth or mutter againſt the ſame.

Antipater accuſed by all men.

Varus giueth Antipater licenſe to iuſtifie himſelfe.

As ſoon as Nicholas had finiſhed his diſcourſe and accuſations, Varus commanded Antipater to anſwer to thoſe crimes that were obiected againſt him, if he had any thing to alleadge, that he was not guilty of thoſe forfaits or hainous crimes that were laid vnto his charge. For of himſelf he deſired nothing more, and knew well that Herod his father deſired no leſſe, then that he ſhould iuſtifie himſelfe, and maintaine his innocency. But he humbling himſelfe vpon his face, and lowly bending his body to the ground, beſought God, who was the ſearcher of all hearts, to approue his innocency by ſome euident ſigne, how he had neuer attempted any thing to his fathers preiudice. For this is the cuſtome of all wicked men, that as often as they attempt any hainous act, they engage themſelues in all wickednes, without any reſpect of Gods iuſtice; and when as by their miſdeeds, they are fallen into perill, then call they God to their minds, by whoſe inuocation and teſtimony they deſire to be deliuered, making a ſhew that they commit al things to his determination. The like whereof in this time hapned in Antipater: who, whereas before time he diſpoſed all his actions in ſuch ſort, as if there had bin no God that had the ouerſway of humane affaires; at ſuch time as iuſtice ouertooke him, and he was diſfurniſhed of the benefit of the law, had his recourſe to Gods power, alleadging that he was reſerued by God to this end, that he might diligently intend his fathers ſafety. Hereupon Varus, when as by often queſtionings he could wreſt nothing from him, but that he only cried vpon God, ſeeing that otherwiſe there would be no end of theſe debates, he commanded the poyſon to be brought forth before them all, that he might make experience of what force it was: which being preſently brought vnto him, and miniſtred to one that was condemned to die, it preſently killed the man. Which done, he aroſe and departed out of the councell, and the next day went to Antioch, where for the moſt part he was wont to haue his reſidence, for that it was the chiefe citie of the Aſſyrians. But Herod preſently commanded his ſonne to be put in bonds, no man knowing what talke had beene betweene him and Varus vpon his departure, but all mens opinion was that the King did nothing in impriſoning him, but by his counſell. When as therefore he had faſt bound him, hee ſent vnto Cæſar, and wrote his letters vnto him, as touching Antipater, ſending certaine appointed meſſengers, who by word of mouth might certifie him of his curſed treaſons.

Antipater striueth by his proteſtations, and inuocations of God to iuſtifie himſelfe.

Herod impriſoned his ſon, and ſent Embaſſadors to Cæſar to certifie his abuſes

At the very ſame time there was a letter intercepted, ſent by Antiphilus to Antipater, which Antiphilus remained in Egypt: which letter being opened by the King, was written to this effect: I haue ſent you Acmes letter, hazzarding therby mine owne life: for you know that I am in danger of the diſpleaſure of two mighty families, if I ſhould be diſcouered. As for your ſelfe, bethinke you well of your affaires in this reſpect. Such were the contents of this letter. The King made diligent ſearch for others alſo, but he could finde none: for Antiphilus ſeruant, who had brought that which was read, denied that he had any other. But while the King was in this doubt, one of his ſeruants and friends perceiued that the inſide of the meſſengers vnder-coat was newly ſewed: for he had two garments the one vpon the other: and coniecturing that the letters might be hidden in the fould thereof, as indeed they were, he ripped the ſame, and found them. The tenour thereof was this: Acme to Antipater, Health: I haue written the letters to your father, according as you gaue me inſtructions, and I haue counterfeited the copy of my letter, as if it had been ſent by Salome my miſtris. I aſſure my ſelfe, that when he hath read the ſame, he will puniſh Salome as one that hath practiſed treaſon againſt him. But that letter that was ſuppoſed to haue beene written by Salome to Acme, was of Antipaters inuention, and written in Salomes name, according to his inuention, and in Acmes ſtile. The contents were theſe: Acme to King Herod, Health: Whereas I haue an eſpeciall care, that nothing be concealed from thee that concerneth thy

A the ſecurity, hauing found a letter of Salomes written againſt thee vnto my Lady, I haue not without danger taken the copy thereof, & ſent it vnto you, in which ſhe required that ſhe might haue licence to marry Syllæus. Teare this copy, leſt through the knowledge of the ſame, I grow in danger of my life. Now in that which ſhe had written to Antipater, ſhe had diſcouered that ſhe had written theſe words to Herod, according to that commandement he had giuen her, as if Salome had conſpired to work ſome treaſon againſt him. She ſent alſo the copy of thoſe counterfait letters in the name of Salome, and ſent them vnto her miſtris to worke treaſon.

Acmes letters to Herod.

This Acme was a Iew born, & chambermaid to Iulia, Cæſars wife, and did that which is aboue written for the loue which ſhe bare to Antipater, whom he had hired by great ſummes of mony, to the end, that ſhe ſhould aſſiſt him to execute the miſchiefe, which he practiſed againſt his father and againſt his aunt. Herod made almoſt deſperate by the great miſchiefes of Antipater, was ſtirred vp on the ſuden to ſhorten his daies, for that he was the only meanes that ſtirred vp theſe great tempeſts of ſedition in his Kingdom, and who not only practiſed againſt his father and his aunt, but againſt his ſiſter alſo; and had in like ſort corrupted Cæſars family. Salome alſo incenſed him the more, beating her breſts and offering her ſelfe to all deaths, if any ſuch like matter might be duely prooued againſt her. For which cauſe Herod ſent for Antipater, commanding him to ſpeake freely all that which he had to ſay without feare. But hee hauing not one word to anſwere for his defence, Herod ſaid vnto him: Since that on all ſides thou art conuicted, and ſurprized in thy wickednes, delay not, but diſcouer thoſe that are of thy confederacy. Whereupon he laid all the fault vpon Antiphilus, and named none other. At that time Herod being wounded by extreme griefe, would haue ſent Antipater to Rome vnto Cæſar, that he might receiue his iudgement from him, but afterwards he feared leſt by the intereſt of his friends he ſhould eſcape the danger, for which cauſe he kept him bound and fettered in priſon, as he had done before: And in the meane while ſent certain meſſengers with letters to Cæſar, to accuſe his ſonne, and to declare wherein Acme had been his confederate, producing the copy of the letters. Theſe Embaſſadors therefore reſorted to Rome, inſtructed in thoſe things they were to anſwere to thoſe interrogatories that ſhould be offered them, and with them he ſent theſe letters.

CHAP. VIII.

Herods ſickneſſe and the ſedition amongſt the Iewes.

MEANE-while Herod fell ſicke, and made his will, and appointed his yongeſt ſonne to ſucceed him in the Kingdom, for that through Antipaters inſtigations he had conceiued a hatred againſt Archelaus and Philip. He ſent alſo one thouſand talents vnto Cæſar, and fiue hundreth to his wife, and to his children, friends and freemen. Hee beſtowed alſo money, rents, and lands vpon his owne children: he gaue his ſiſter Salome an ample poſſeſſion, for that ſhe had alwaies perſeuered in louing him, and had neuer offended him. And hauing loſt all hope of recouery, for that he was about 70. yeeres old, he became very tutchie and froward in whatſoeuer his affaires. The cauſe hereof was, that opinion he had conceiued, that he waxed contemptible, & that the whole nation took pleaſure in thoſe miſ-haps which befortuned him: which ſome of thoſe who were fauoured by the people, made him the rather beleeue vpon this occaſion which enſueth: Amongſt thoſe that were moſt learned amongſt the Iewes, Iudas the ſon of Sariphæus, & Matthias the ſon of Margalothus, the moſt excellent interpreters of the lawes and ordinances of the country (and for this cauſe were in greateſt eſtimation among the people, by reaſon that they inſtructed and trained vp the youth; for all thoſe that deſired to obtaine vertue, ſpent all their time with them) vnderſtanding that the Kings ſickneſſe was dangerous, they incenſed the yonger ſort, counſelling them to ouerthrow all thoſe works that the King had cauſed to be made, contrary to the law and cuſtome of the countrey; to the end, that they fighting for piety, might obtaine the reward that attendeth the ſame. For in that the King had enterprized and done many things contrary to the law, diuers vnaccuſtomed miſeries had befallen him, and namely that ſickneſs wherewith he was detained. For Herod had done diuers things contrary to the ancient law; againſt which Iudas and Matthias exclaimed openly. For he had erected ouer the portall of the great temple, an Eagle of gold of great value. Now the law prohibiteth that they, who pretend to liue according to the ſame, ſhould in any ſort erect any image, or repreſent any figures of liuing creatures whatſoeuer. For this cauſe theſe doctors counſelled them to pull downe that Eagle: telling them, that although the matter ſeemed to want no

perill, yet ought they rather to prefer an honeſt death before a pleaſant life, if ſo be it be imploied for the defence of their countrey lawes and religion. For in ſo doing, they ſhould obtaine immortall praiſe for the preſent, and a memorable and eternall glory in time to come; neither that they ſhould protract the execution therof for feare of danger, ſince death was a thing that might not be auoided; ſo that ſince by the generall courſe of nature, they muſt needly die, it ſhould become them brauely to forſake their liues with praiſe and honor in imbracing vertue. For to die in the execution of ſome noble exploit (which cannot be atchieued without hazard or danger) their children ſhould be richly rewarded with the fruits therof, & their other parents that ſhould outliue them (of what ſex ſoeuer) ſhould reap the fruits of that glory which was honorably atchieued by them. In theſe or ſuch like words incouraged they the yong men.

The young men pulling downe the golden eagle, hew it in pieces with their axes. Iudas and Matthias with forty other young men being broght to the Kings preſence, iuſtifie their actions with ioy, & the King ſendeth them bound to Iericho.

About that time there was a rumour ſpred, that the King was dead, which gaue very great furtherance to the Doctors reſolution. For at high noon they went vp into the temple, they pulled and hewed down the Eagle with their axes, in the ſight and aſſembly of a great number of people that were in the temple. Now when the tydings hereof came vnto the eares of the Kings Captain, he fearing leſt ſome further and more fatall tumult might be raiſed, drew out a ſtrong company of ſouldiers with him, to repulſe thoſe that were aſſembled to hew downe the Eagle: and charging the rude and diſarmed multitude, who were gathered together, he eaſily ſlew and diſperſed the moſt; as for thoſe forty yong men that valiantly addreſſed themſelues to reſiſt, he apprehended them, and with them the authors of ſedition Iudas and Matthias, who thought ſcorne to ſubmit themſelues, & led them to the King; who demanding of them how they durſt deface the ſacred image? they anſwered, that long before that time they had reſolued it, and that now according as they had reſolued, they had like valiant men performed the ſame. For we (ſaid they) maintaine the honour of God and the doctrine of our law, whereof we are diſciples: neither ought you to admire that with contempt of your ordinances we haue preferred the lawes of our forefathers, which Moſes hath left vs in writting, according as he was ſuggeſted and taught them by God: neither doe we refuſe any death or puniſhment which thou ſhalt inflict vpon vs, being aſſured in our conſciences, that we ſuffer not for our impiety, but piety ſake. Thus ſpake they all of them, continuing the like conſtant boldnes in their anſweres, as they had ſhewed in their actions, being alſo ready, conſtantly to endure any puniſhment for that which they had attempted. Hereupon the King commanded them to be bound, & ſent them to Iericho: then calling before him thoſe principall Iewes, who had the gouernement vnder him; & being brought into their aſſembly vpon his pallat, by reaſon of his weaknes, he recited vnto them the numberleſs trauels he had endured for their ſakes: in like manner, how vpon his great charges he had repaired & reedified the temple: whereas the Aſmoneans for the ſpace of 125. yeeres, wherin they raigned, could not performe ſuch a building in the honour of God. Moreouer, he ſignified vnto them, how he had adorned the ſame with precious gifts, for which he hoped that after his death his memory & glory ſhould ſuruiue. After this, he expoſtulated with them for what cauſe they abſtained not from offering him that outrage during his life time? And why at noon daies & in the ſight of all the people, they had laid hands on thoſe preſents which hee had dedicated vnto God, and had taken thoſe things away violently which though in words they appertained to him, yet in the effect if the act were well examined, they had taken from God. The Gouernours ſuſpecting his cruelty, and fearing leſt his vnbridled paſſion ſhould vrge him further, by which meanes they might be aſſured of ſome ſeuere puniſhment, anſwered him: that thoſe things were not done by their conſents, and that in their opinion the iniury ought not to be let ſlip without puniſhment. At that time Herod ſhewed himſelfe more fauourable towards the reſt, but he cauſed Matthias to be depriued of the prieſthood, as one in part who had bin the cauſe of that which had hapned; and in his place ſubſtituted Iozar one of his wiues brethren. During the prieſthood of this Matthias it hapned alſo, that another high Prieſt was elected that very day, wherein the Iewes did vſually celebrate their faſt. For Matthias the night before the day of the faſt, ſeemed in his dream to haue had the company of his wife; and whereas for this cauſe he was vnfit to offer the diuine ſacrifice, he had Ioſeph the ſon of Ellemus, appointed him to be his aſſiſter and ſubſtitute, by reaſon of his alliance. Herod therefore depoſed Matthias: and as touching the other Matthias, who had mooued this trouble, both he & his companions were by his commandment conſumed with fire.

The Eclipſe.

This very night the moon was eclipſed, & Herods ſicknes grew more vehement. For God puniſhed thoſe ſins which he had cõmitted. For he was inflamed with a lent or ſlow fire, which to the outward ſenſe ſeemed not ſo vehement, but inwardly ſearched & afflicted all his entrails: he had

A had alſo a rauenous and vnnaturall appetite to his meate, which might no waies be ſatisfied. Beſides that, he had an vlcer in his bowels with a ſtrange and furious collicke. His feet were ſwolne with moiſt and ſhining flegme, and his ſtomacke was no leſſe affected alſo. His members rotted and were full of crawling wormes, with a filthy and no leſſe troubleſome Priapiſme, accompanied with an intolerable ſtench: beſides all this, he had a ſtrong convulſion of his nerues, and ſhortneſſe of breath. For which cauſe it was a generall opinion amongſt holy men, and ſuch as had the knowledge of prophecy, that the King was thus puniſhed for his infinite impieties and ſins committed againſt the Maieſtie of God. And although he was tormented with an vnſupportable ſickneſſe, yet had he hope to eſcape: and for that cauſe he ſent for Phyſicians from all places, and B refuſed none of thoſe remedies which they thought behouefull for him. He therefore paſt ouer Iordan and went into the hot bathes of Calliroes, the waters whereof are potable, beſides other vertues they haue againſt all other kinde of ſickeneſſe: this water diſchargeth it ſelfe into the lake called Aſphaltite. Being there, it was thought good by his Phyſicians, that he ſhould refreſh himſelfe in thoſe waters: There being ſet by them into a bathing tubbe filled with oyle, he waxed ſo ſicke, that they held him for dead. Whereupon all his houſhold ſeruants wept and grieuouſly lamented; and all his familiar friends crying out and bewailing him, with their great noiſe cauſed him to come to himſelfe: and ſeeing himſelfe wholly out of hope to eſcape, he gaue order that there ſhould a diſtribution be made to euery ſouldier the ſumme of fiftie drachmes, and he offered great preſents to their Captaines and his friends. Afterwards he returned to Ieri- C cho, where a melancholy humour poſſeſſed him, which made him vnſociable, and diſpleaſed againſt all men; ſo that ſeeing that he muſt needly dye, he bethought him of this facinorous action that followeth. For the nobleſt men among the nation of the Iewes, reſorting vnto him from all parts (vpon his commandement vnder the expreſſe penaltie of loſſe of life, to whoſoeuer ſhould neglect the ſame) the King ſhewed himſelfe to be diſpleaſed, as well againſt thoſe whom he thought guiltie, as againſt them who had giuen him no occaſion of diſcontent. For he cauſed them to be ſhut vp in a place called the Hippodrome, which was the tilt-yard to runne horſes in, and ſent for his ſiſter Salome, and Alexas her husband, telling them that his end was at hand, for that his griefes did inceſſantly torment him: which as he ſaid he ought to beare patiently, becauſe it was an end that ſhould happen to all men. But that which moſt grieued him was, D that he ſaw himſelfe depriued of thoſe mournings and lamentations, which a King deſerued. For he was not to ſeeke of the Iewes affections, neither how his death was deſired and longed for by them, ſince that in his life time they preſumed ſo farre as to reuolt, and diſhonour and deface thoſe gifts, which he had beſtowed vpon the Common-weale. It therefore behoued them to affoord him ſome ſolace in that his bitter anguiſh, for that if they refuſed not to performe that which he had contriued in his mind, the lamentation of his death ſhould be magnificent, and as great as any King euer had: and the pleaſure and laughter that might accompany his death, ſhould be abated by their ſorrow, who ſhould vnfainedly lament for the whole nation. Hee therefore willed them, that at ſuch time as he ſhould giue vp the ghoſt, they ſhould cauſe the Hippodrome to be inuironed by his ſouldiers, as yet vnaduertiſed of his death (which he would E not haue publiſhed before this execution were ended) and to command them to ſhoot their arrowes at thoſe that were ſhut vp therin. And that when they had ſlaine them all after this manner, they ſhould make him triumph and reioyce in a double ioy; firſt, for that in his death his commandement ſhould be ratified by effect: ſecondly, for that he ſhould be honoured by a memorable lamentation. Thus weeping, he beſought his kinſfolke for the loue they bare vnto him, and for the faith they bare vnto God, that they ſhould not ſuffer him to die fruſtrate of this laſt honour: and they proteſted that they would not tranſgreſſe any point of this his commandement. Hereby a man may coniecture what his nature was, who tooke pleaſure in theſe aboue-named impieties, and who through the deſire he had of long life, hath after this ſort dealt with thoſe of his blood: and it may be coniectured by theſe his laſt commandements, that F he had nothing in him that ſauoured any humanity: for that departing out of the world, he had ſuch a mind, that all the nation and all ſuch as were moſt affectionate towards him, ſhould be driuen to ſorrow and deſolation; commanding that in euery houſe one ſhould be ſlaine, yea ſuch as had not in any ſort offended him, and were not accuſed of any miſdeed committed againſt any other: whereas they that haue any vertue, finding themſelues at that ſtate, haue beene accuſtomed to lay aſide the hatred which they haue before-time borne vnto their enemies.

Chap. IX.

Antipaters death.

Letters are sent from Rome, that Acme was executed by Cæsars cõmand, and that he had authoritie to vse Antipater at his pleasure.

WHileſt he deliuered theſe inſtructions to his kinred, he receiued letters from thoſe Embaſſadors which he had ſent from Rome vnto Cæſar: the effect whereof was, that Acme was put to death by Cæſars command, who was diſpleaſed with her for that ſhe had bin of Antipaters conſpiracy, who was remitted to Herods pleaſure like a King and father to vſe him, as beſt pleaſed him; either to exile and baniſh him; or if it ſo pleaſed him, to put him to death. Herod receiuing theſe newes, recouered his ſpirits a little through the pleaſure he receiued in the contents of thoſe letters, both of Acmes death, as of the power that was granted him to puniſh his ſon. But being aſſailed afreſh with grieuous dolours, and vrged with a deſire to eate, he called for an apple and a knife: for before-time he was accuſtomed to pare his apples himſelfe, and to cut a little; and afterwards to eate it: when as therefore he had gotten hold of the knife, he looked round about him, determining to giue himſelfe a mortall wound therewith, and had ſurely done it, had not Achiabus his nephew haſtily ſtept within him, and ſtaid his hand, and called for aſſiſtance. At that time the ſorrow and lamentation was renewed in all the Palace, as if the King had beene already dead: and Antipater certainly beleeuing that his father was departed, began to hope (and confirmed no leſſe in his words) that being deliuered out of priſon, he ſhould obtaine the poſſeſſion of the kingdome without any difficulty: and deuiſed with the Gaoler as touching his deliuerance, offering him great preſents both in hand and hereafter, as if there had bin no other queſtion but of that. But ſo farre was the Gaoler from obeying that which Antipater demanded, that he went and certified the King what his intent was, and what offers he made him. Herod, who had already conceiued a ſiniſter opinion of his ſon, hearing what the Gaoler had ſaid, began to exclaime, and to beat his head, although he was at the vttermoſt gaſp: and lifting himſelfe vp vpon his elbowes, he commanded that one of his guard ſhould preſently haſte and kill him; and that done, he ſhould be buried in the Caſtle of Hircanion without any honour.

Herods Will, Death, and Buriall.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10.

AFter this, hauing changed his mind, he made a new Teſtament. For he appointed Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and of Peræa, whereas before that he had inſtituted him for his ſucceſſor in the Kingdome. He created Archelaus King; he gaue the Prouinces of Gaulonites, Trachonites, Batanea and Paneade to Philip his ſonne, and Archelaus brother by the mothers ſide, to be Tetrarch ouer thoſe places. He gaue his ſiſter Salome Iamnia, Azot and Phaſaelis, with fifty thouſand crownes of gold. He prouided alſo for his other kinſmen, all whom he left rich in money, which he gaue them, and reuenewes which he aſſigned them. He gaue Cæſar ten millions of drachmes in ſiluer, amounting to the ſumme of eleuen hundreth thouſand francs, beſides a great quantity of gold and ſiluer plate, and of precious moueables. To Iulia Cæſars wife, and to certaine others, he bequeathed fiue millions of drachmes, amounting to fiue hundreth and fifty thouſand francs, or thereabout. After he had in this manner diſpoſed all things, ſome fiue dayes after he had cauſed Antipater to be executed, he departed this life: hauing raigned after Antigonus death, for the ſpace of thirty and foure yeers, and thirty and ſeuen yeers after he was elected and approoued King by the Romans: a man without reſpect cruell, and ſeuere towards all men; ſlaue to his wrath; Lord of the lawes: yet ſo fauoured by fortune, as no man more, for from a priuate man he became a King, and being inuironed with many perils, he alwaies happily eſcaped, and he liued alſo a very long time. And as touching his family and children, in this alſo in his owne opinion was he happy, in that he ouercame his enemies and aduerſaries: but in my opinion, he was moſt vnfortunate.

Herods mutable & ſtrange fortune.

But before the Kings death was thorowly knowne, Salome and Alexas diſcharged thoſe that were locked vp in the Hippodrome, and ſent euery one of them home vnto his owne houſe, telling them that the King commanded them to depart and follow their houſhold affaires, and till their land: wherein they performed a moſt noble action, and benefited the whole nation with an eſpeciall good turne. After that the Kings death was bruted abroad, Salome and Alexas cauſed all the men of warre to be aſſembled in the Amphitheater in Iericho, and firſt of all they cauſed

A Herods letters to be read, which were addreſſed to the ſouldiers, in which he gaue them thankes for the fidelity and good will which they had expreſſed towards him, praying them to continue the ſame to Archelaus his ſonne, whom he had appointed to be their King after him. That done, Ptolomey, to whom the King had committed the cuſtody of his ſeale, recited his teſtament, which was to take no effect, except that Cæſar approoued the ſame. Thereupon all of them began to applaud and honour Archelaus for their King. The men of warre flocked about him in troupes, accompanied with their Captaines, promiſing him to ſerue him with no leſſe will and affection, then they had done his father, praying God to yeeld him his aſſiſtance.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. Herods thākſgiuing to his army, and teſtament read and Archelaus is applauded by the people.

At that time alſo the Kings Hearſe was prepared, and Archelaus gaue order that his obſequies B ſhould be moſt royally performed, and beſtowed all the furniture that was requiſite for that funerall and princely enterrement. He was carried out in a gilded litter, diſtinguiſhed with diuers precious ſtones, the couer thereof was of azure colour. The dead body was apparelled in a purple raiment, hauing a Diadem vpon his head, ouer which there was ſet a Crowne of gold, and a ſcepter was couched in his right hand. About this litter marched a great number of his children and kinsfolke; and after them followed the men of warre, diſpoſed in bands and troupes, according to the manners of euery nation. The firſt of theſe were the Archers of his guard: after them went the Thracians: and laſtly, marched the Germanes, and Galatians; all of them in their warlike abiliments and diſcipline. After them followed all the army, marching in order in like manner as when they were addreſſed to battell, each one vnder his Corporall and Cap- C taine. Next theſe followed fiue hundreth of his houſhold ſeruants, bearing perfumes, and all theſe in this equipage marched to the Caſtle Herodion, diſtant ſome eight ſtades or furlongs off. For there was he intombed, according to the tenour of his teſtament. Thus dyed Herod: Archelaus continued his mourning for ſeuen daies ſpace in honour of his father. (For the law of the countrey ordaineth no leſſe.) And after he had feaſted the people, and laid aſide his mourning apparell, he aſcended vp into the Temple. All the way as he went, all the people with ſhouts and acclamations, cryed, God ſaue the King; and with prayers and praiſes honoured him to their vttermoſt, and he being conducted vp to a high ſtation and ſtate, which was made for the purpoſe, and placed in a throne that was embeliſhed with gold, entertained the people very graciouſly, taking pleaſure in their acclamations and congratulations that they beſtowed D vpon him. He gaue them thankes alſo, for that they had blotted out of their remembrance the iniuries that his father had done vnto them; proteſting in his owne behalfe, that he would inforce himſelfe to requite their kindneſſe, with an intire affection. He likewiſe told them, that for the preſent he accepted not the ſtyle of King, becauſe the honour was bequeathed him with this condition, that Cæſar ſhould ratifie his fathers teſtament. For this cauſe, although the ſouldiers that were in Iericho inforced themſelues to ſet the Diadem vpon his head, yet would hee not accept that vncertaine honour, becauſe it was not reſolued whether Cæſar, who was the principall party in the gift, would grant him the gouernment or no.

Archelaus banquetteth the people.

He alleadged likewiſe, that if his affaires ſucceeded according to his deſire, he would not, according as his honour commanded him, forget their loue, or leaue their good affection vnre- E quited. And that in the meane-while, he would enforce himſelfe by all meanes to further thoſe things that concerned them, and entertaine them with more kindneſſe then his father had done. But they, according as it is the cuſtome of the common people, thinking that thoſe that enter into ſuch dignities, declare and open their minds at the firſt day, the more Archelaus ſpake kindly and courteouſly vnto them, the more they applauded him, and preſented him with diuers petitions, for certaine grants and donations from him. Some of them cryed out vnto him, that he ſhould cut off ſome part of their taxes and tallages, which they payed annually: Otherſome cryed vpon him, to deliuer thoſe priſoners that were commanded by Herod, of whom diuers had pyned a long time in priſon: Others inſtantly vrged him to cut off thoſe tributes which had beene impoſed by him vpon bargaines and ſales, which was to pay the halfe of the bar- F gaine. Whereunto Archelaus did not in any ſort contradict, ſtriuing to the vttermoſt of his power to pleaſe the people, for that hee knew full well that their good affection would bee no ſmall aduantage toward him in the confirmation of his kingdome. That done, he ſacrificed vnto God, and afterward fell to banquetting and entertainement of his friends.

Archelaus promiſes that with Cæſars approbation, he will carefully intend the deſires and profits of the people.

CHAP. XI.

The people mutine against ARCHELAVS.

The yeere of the world, 3963. after Christs birth, 1

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 12. al. 13.

MEane-while, certaine men among the Iewes that were desirous of innouation, in their priuate conuenticles bewailed Matthias & his confederates, whom Herod had put to death, and condemned for razing and defacing the golden Eagle: for that incontinently after their decease, they had neither beene publikely honoured, nor lamented for, by reason of the feare that the people had conceiued of Herod. For which cause at that time they required with lamentations and great cryes, that their obsequies might be solemnized; and as if the dead bodies had receiued some contentation by their teares & tempest of exclaimes, they vttered many hainous & disgracefull speeches against Herod; and assembling themselues together, they required Archelaus to doe them iustice against those, that during Herods life were in authoritie; and especially they demanded, that the high Priest, who was aduanced by his father, should be deposed, and that another more lawfull & vpright might be placed in his stead, to offer and exercise the hie Priests place. Now, though Archelaus was sore displeased at these their violent proceedings; yet notwithstanding, he conformed himselfe to their good likings, in that he was with all expedition to repaire vnto Rome, to vnderstand and attend Cæsars pleasure. Hee therefore called for the Generall of his army, willing him to perswade them not to seeke a reuenge for those men, who were dead, notwithstanding they were their friends; because whatsoeuer was done, was done according to law; and that no inquiry might be made thereof, except to the great preiudice of his reputation, and hazard of his state, in regard of the incertaintie of the time: that it was more expedient for him to study for the maintenance of peace, vntill such time as being established in the kingdome by Cæsars consent, he should returne backe againe vnto them, and that then he would consult with them for the common profit, according to their iust demands, wishing them for the present to containe themselues, and to take heed lest they stirred vp sedition.

The people bewaile Matthias, and those that were executed with them.

They would be reuenged on Herods friends, and would depose the high Priest.

The yeere of the world, 3964. after Christs Natiuitie, 2.

When he had thus instructed his Generall, he sent him vnto them. But they cryed out with a loud voyce, and would not suffer him to speake: but for feare of danger and death, they put him to silence. And if any other were so forward as to speake vnto them, and perswade them to some moderation, and to alter their sinister resolutions, he was also in danger: for that they had this perswasion, that all things ought rather to be ordered according to their pleasures, then by the authoritie of their superiours: supposing that although during Herods life-time they had beene depriued of their deerest friends, it should be now a matter vnworthy their courages, after his death to be cut off from the priuiledge to demand their reuenge. For they were transported with their owne opinions, and held all that for lawfull and vpright, which was in any sort conformable to their pleasures, without foreseeing the danger that might happen thereby: so much were they pleased to bee reuenged on those, whom they reputed to bee their enemies. Now, whereas diuers were sent by Archelaus, to consult with them; and diuers came vnto them, not as messengers from him, but as friends and louers of peace, of their owne motion, with an intent to pacifie them, they would not permit any of them to speake; and through their rage there arose a great tumult, which had growne to a further extremitie, if a greater number of people had ioyned themselues with them.

Sedition at the feast of the Passeouer.

At that time fell the feast of vnleauened bread, which is called Pascha, which is a memoriall of their deliuerance out of Ægypt, at which time all men doe most willingly present their sacrifices, and a greater number of beasts are slaine at that feast, then at any other time. To this solemnitie also an infinite number of people assembled from all parts, to honour God: whereby the seditious (supposing that they had gotten fit opportunitie) lamented Iudas and Matthias, who were the Expositors of the law, and kept themselues within the Temple, whither they had gathered good store of victuals, which they were not ashamed impudently to begge for. But Archelaus, fearing lest their rage should produce some more grieuous effect of mischiefe, sent out a band of armed men, with a Captaine, and a Regiment of a thousand men, to represse their headlong fury, before the rest of the people were infected with their follies; and to bring them likewise vnto him, whom they found to be the forwardest in that commotion. Against those the seditious cryed out, with great clamours, and incensed the people against them, so that all of them rushed in vpon the men of warre, and slew diuers of them. The rest of them escaped with their Captaine, yet not without diuers wounds. That done, they which were within the Temple, returned againe to their diuine seruice.

Now

A Now Archelaus ſuppoſing that his whole fortune was endangered, except hee repreſſed the rage of the multitude, he ſent out all his footmen with a certain number of horſemen, to preuent leſt they that were without ſhould yeeld aſſiſtance to thoſe, who had taken vp their lodging in the temple, and to put thoſe to the ſword, who hauing eſcaped the violence of the footmen, ſuppoſed themſelues to be in ſecurity. Theſe horſeman ſlew about three thouſand men, the reſt retired themſelues into the mountaines that were neer adioyning. Hereupon Archelaus made proclamation, that each one ſhould repaire vnto his owne houſe. For which cauſe they departed & abandoned the feaſt, for feare of greater miſchiefe; notwithſtanding they had ſpleen enough, as it is the ordinary cuſtome of the ignorant multitude.

Three thouſand Iewes ſlaine.

B After this, Archelaus accompanied with his mother, betook himſelfe to ſea, and led with him Nicholas & Ptolomey, with diuers other his friends, committing the gouernement of all his houſhold and Kingdome to his brother Philip: with him alſo departed Salome Herods ſiſter, leading with her her children. There went alſo diuers other of his kinred, who ſaid that they would all of them labour for Archelaus, that he might obtaine the kingdom, but in effect it was to cõtradict him with all their power: and in eſpeciall, to vrge that againſt him with great vehemency, that was done in the temple. Sabinus, Cæſars Viceroy in Syria, poſting into Iewry to take charge of Herods money, met with Archelaus in Cæſarea. But Varus arriuing in the meane while, detained him from finiſhing that voyage; for Archelaus had ſent for him to come thither by Ptolomey, and Sabinus willing to doe Varus a pleaſure, would not ſeize the fortreſſe of Iury; neither ſealed vp C Herods treaſures, but left them in Archelaus poſſeſſion, vntill ſuch time as Cæſar had giuen order for the eſtate; and after he had made this promiſe, he ſtaied in Cæſarea.

Archelaus repairs to Rome and many of his faction follow him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. al. 14.

After Archelaus had ſet ſaile towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch; Sabinus went to Ieruſalem, where he ſeized the Kings palace: and calling before him the Kings Agents, and the captaines of his garriſons, he required them to deliuer vp their Caſtles into his hands. But they, according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the poſſeſſion in their accuſtomed manner, according to the Kings direction, pretending to keepe the ſame in Cæſars behalf. At the ſame time, Antipas Herods ſon trauailed to Rome likewiſe, vnder the hope to bee elected King, in regard of Salomes promiſes; and for that hee better deſerued the ſame then Archelaus, conſidering that in the firſt teſtament, which ſhould be of more force then the later, he had been D appointed king. He led his mother alſo with him, & Ptolomy the brother of Nicholas, who had bin one of Herods moſt eſteemed friends, and was well affected to further and ſet forward his title. But eſpecially he was ſtirred vp to ſeek the kingdom by Ireneus, a man very eloquent, & to whoſe charge in regard of his ſufficiency, the affaires of the kingdome had been committed. For which cauſe, although he were perſwaded to giue ouer the kingdome vnto his elder brother, who was confirmed in the kingdome by his fathers teſtament, yet would he not giue eare thereunto. But Antipas no ſooner arriued in Rome, but all kinsfolke reuolted from Archelaus, vnto him, not ſo much for the loue they bare him, as for hatred they had conceiued againſt Archelaus: and aboue all, for the deſire they had to recouer their liberty, & to draw themſelues vnder a Roman Gouernour. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whom they E endeuoured to procure the royalty, ſhould bee more profitable vnto them then Archelaus. Sabinus alſo by his letters accuſed Archelaus to Cæſar: but Archelaus by Ptolomy exhibited vnto Cæſar a ſupplication containing his right and title to the kingdome, his fathers teſtaments, and the account of the money which Herod his father had ſealed vp, together with his ring, and expected the iſſue.

Sabinus repaireth to Ieruſalem, with an intent to ſeize Herods treaſures and caſtles.

Antipas vnder hope to recouer the Kingdome, ſaileth to Rome.

But when he had read theſe letters, and thoſe which Varus and Sabinus had ſent him, and vnderſtood what ſummes of money he had left, and what the annuall reuenue was, and how Antipas challenged the kingdom, and appropriated it to himſelfe, according as his letters made mention: he aſſembled all his friends to haue their aduice thereupon. Amongſt them was Caius the ſonne of Agrippa and his daughter Iulia, adopted by him, whom he cauſed to ſit in the chiefeſt F place: which done, hee commanded the aſſiſtants to ſpeake what they would touching this matter. At that Antipater Salomes ſonne, a man very eloquent, and a great aduerſary to Archelaus, ſpake firſt, ſaying, that it was a mockery for him at that time to ſpeake of the Kingdome, conſidering that before Cæſar had granted it him, hee had already ſeized the forces of the ſtate, when as vpon a feſtiuall day he had ſlaine ſo many: who although they had deſerued that puniſhment, yet ought the iuſtice thereof to haue been reſerued to a lawfull power, and not to haue bin vſurped by him, either being King with Cæſars preiudice, whoſe authority hee had contemned; or by being a priuate man, which was a greater ouerſight. For which cauſe hee vndeſeruedly at this this time hoped for his approbation, whom already as much as in him lay, hee had depriued of the title and authority of his allowance. Moreouer, hee obiected againſt him, that of his owne authority he had changed certaine chieftaines of the army, and that hee had ſeated himſelfe in the royall throne, and like a King had determined certaine cauſes, and had granted certaine demands of the people: finally, that he had left nothing vndone, which he might haue performed, had Cæſar confirmed his title. He alleaged alſo, that they who were incloſed in the Hippodrome, were diſmiſſed by him, and diuers other acts, partly true, partly probable in regard of the ambition of young men, who deſirous to gouerne, doe ordinarily commit ſuch things: beſides this, his neglect in mourning for his father, and withall, his reare banquets all night long at that very time his father died; whereat the people began to mutine, ſeeing the ſmall regard he had of his fathers death, from whom he had receiued ſo great goods and honors. How all the day long he made a ſhew of his ſorrow & teares in his pauillion, but all the night took pleaſures like a King; and being ſuch, if Cæſar ſhould grant him the Kingdome, he would behaue himſelf no leſſe vnkindly towards him, then he had done towards his moſt kinde father. That it was no leſſe then a haynous crime in him, to delight himſelf with ſongs & dãces at his fathers death, as if he had bin his enemy: That he now came to Cæſars preſence, to the intent to obtaine the Kingdome by his conſent, whereas already he had behaued himſelfe no otherwiſe then if he had already been eſtabliſhed King by his authority. But moſt of all he exaggerated the ſlaughter he had committed in the temple, and the impiety perpetrated ſo neere to the feaſt of Eaſter, at which time diuers both ſtrangers & citizens had been ſlaughtered after the manner of ſacrifices, and the temple filled with carcaſſes, not by a ſtranger, but by him, who vnder the colour of religion deſireth the gouernement of the kingdome, to the end he might ſatisfie the vniuſtice of his nature, in exerciſing each way his tyranny towards all men: for which cauſe his father neuer thought, nor euer dreamt to ſubſtitute him King in his place. For he knew both his life and diſpoſition, and by his former teſtament (and that of greateſt force) had ordained his aduerſary Antipater to bee King. For he had bin allotted the kingdom by his father, not when his minde was dead before his body, but when both his iudgement was ſound, and his body in health. Yea although at that time Archelaus father had ſuch a conceit of him, as in his later teſtament & bequeſt he pretendeth; yet that he had already declared what kind of King he was like to be, who contemned Cæſars authority in confirming the kingdome, and being as yet a priuate man, doubted not to murther the citizens in the temple. This ſaid, Antipater (to giue greater credit to his words, bringing diuers of his kinred as witneſſes of that he had ſaid) ended his Oration.

Nicholaus excuſeth Archelaus.

Whereupon Nicholas aroſe, and alleadged in Archelaus behalfe as touching the ſlaughter, that it was to be imputed to their impiety, who could not be reſtrained from their tumults and vprores, before Archelaus was enforced to appeaſe them by force; alleadging that they were ſo much the more guilty, for that they had not only exerciſed their malice, but alſo had enforced others to attempt ſo hainous a reuenge againſt them: for their inſolency ſeemed in apparance to concerne Archelaus; yet in a ſort their contumacy pertained to Cæſars ruine. For thoſe that had been ſent by him to appeaſe & redreſſe their ſedition, were againſt all law and right charged and ſlaine by them, without reſpect of God, or regard of the ſolemne feaſt: whoſe defence Antipater was not aſhamed of, without reſpect of equity, ſo that he might ſatisfie that hatred which he bare vnto Archelaus. That therefore it was their fault, who firſt of all abſtained not from iniury, but whetted thoſe ſwords, which were drawne in maintenance of the peace, againſt their owne boſomes. He enforced all other things alſo, whereof they had accuſed Archelaus, againſt themſelues, ſaying that none of theſe things were done without their conſents: and that the offence was not ſo grieuous, as they intended it ſhould be eſteemed, to the end they might diſcredit Archelaus. So great a deſire was in them to hurt their kinſman, a man both well reſpected, and affected by his father, as alſo kind and officious towards them in all things that concerned them. As for the teſtament, that it was made by the King when he was in perfect eſtate of mind and body, and of greater force then the former, becauſe the authority and confirmation thereof was aſcribed to Cæſar the Soueraigne of the world.

Further, that Cæſar would not imitate them in that wrong they did vnto Herod, who (being during his life-time bountifully graced by him, by many benefits) do now after his death, go about to violate his laſt and trueſt teſtament: but that rather like a friend & confederate he would confirme his will, who like his faithful & ſworne welwiller had cõmitted all things to his truſt. For that there muſt needs be a great difference between their malice & Cæſars vertue & faith, which was renowmed thorow the whole world. For which cauſe he would not iudge his decree to be incon-

A inconsiderately past, who left his succession to his well-deseruing son, and referred all things to his trust. For that it was vnlikely that he should erre in the choice of his successor, who had so discreetly submitted all things to Cæsars iudgement. After this manner Nicholas also finished his discourse. Hereupon Cæsar courteously raised Archelaus, who lay prostrate and humbled before his feet, telling him that he was most worthy to be King, by giuing an apparant testimonie, that he was constant in his resolutions; pretending that he would doe nothing but that which should be answerable to Herods testament, & Archelaus profit; and seeing the young man was confirmed in some good hope with this his promise, he determined nothing more for that time: but dismissing the councell, he debated with himselfe, whether he should ratifie the kingdome to Archelaus B only, or diuide it amongst Herods kindred, especially since all men had need of his assistance.

CHAP. XII.

BVT before Cæsar had determined any thing certainly in this behalfe, Marthalce Archelaus mother died of a sickenesse, and Varus the President of the Iewes in Syria, had sent letters, which certified the Emperour of the rebellion of the Iewes. For after Archelaus departure, all the nation were in an vproare. To pacifie which, Varus resorted thither, and punished the authors of the same: and after he had in this sort appeased all things, he returned to Antioch, leauing a Regiment of souldiers in Ierusalem to restraine the factious innouations amongst the C Iewes: yet preuailed he nothing by this his policie. For as soone as Varus was departed, Sabinus, who intended Cæsars affaires, remaining in that place, grieuously burthened the Iewes, trusting to that power that was left him, and supposing that he was already enabled to withstand the multitude. For he armed diuers souldiers, and made vse of them to oppresse the Iewes, and to prouoke them to sedition. For he inforced himselfe to surprize their fortresses, and forcibly to make search after the Kings treasures, for his priuate lucre and couetousnesse sake. When as therefore the feast of Whitsontide was come (which is one of our festiuals) diuers thousands from all parts repaired to Ierusalem, not only for religion sake, but also for despite & hatred they had conceiued against those violences and iniuries, which Sabinus had offered them. And not only were those of Iudæa grieuously offended (but diuers also resorted out of Galilee and Idu- D mæa, from Iericho & the cities situate on the other side of Iordan, desiring all of them to be reuenged on Sabinus. And diuiding their campe into three bands after this manner, and one part of them tooke vp the Hippodrome, & of the other two the one seized the southerne quarter of the Temple, and the other the Easterne, & the third which was in the Hippodrome, were planted to the Westward, where the Kings Palace stood; & thus prepared they all things that were necessary to set vpon the Romanes whom they had besieged on all sides. At that time Sabinus fearing their number, & resolution, who were resolued either to die or to ouercome, sent present letters vnto Varus, requiring him with all expedition to send him a supply, because the regiment that was left by him, was in great danger; and must needs vtterly perish without his speedy rescous: as for himselfe he withdrew into the tower and dungeon of the castle Phasaelus, which was a for- E tresse which was builded and so called in honour of Herods brother, who was slaine by the Parthians; and from the top thereof made a signe to the Romans, that they should sally out vpon the Iewes; being afraid to trust himselfe to his owne friends, and supposing that the rest ought to expose their liues to danger in maintenance of his safetie. The Romanes hauing made this sally, there arose a desperate skirmish, wherein the Romans diuers waies had the vpper hand; yet were not the Iewes any waies discomforted, notwithstanding they had lost many men; but wheeled about so long, till at last they seized the outward galleries, and those that incompassed the Temple, & in that place there was a hot assault: for they flung downe stones with their hands & slings, & there were certaine archers mixed amongst them; who in that they had recouered a place of aduantage, grieuously gauled the Romanes which were below, in that they had no meanes to a- F uoide their shot, but were in such sort exposed thereunto, as their enemies had the better. And with this disaduantage fought the Romans a long time, till at length sore aggrieued at this their present indignitie, they secretly fired the Galleries and porches, without any discouery of those that were therein: which fire brought thither by many, and fed with such matter, as would speedily flame, incontinently tooke hold of the roofe, because the roofe was couered with pitch and waxe, and guilded vpon the waxe; so that these great and excellent buildings were burnt downe to nothing in a moment, and they that were resorted thither, were all of them consumed before they were aware. For some of them fell with the roofe of the Galleries; other-some shot at and slaine by those that stood round abouts; othersome despairing of their liues, and amazed at the mischiefe, either cast themselues into the fire, or slew themselues with their owne swords; and all those that retired vnder hope to saue themselues by that way they ascended, were incountred by the Romanes, who slew them all in that they were discouraged and disarmed, though furiously desperate: so that not one of them that ascended the porches escaped with life. Afterward, the Romans thrusting forward one another by those waies, where the fire was slaked, entred the treasure house where the sacred money was kept, by which meanes a great part thereof was stolne away by the souldiers, and Sabinus to all mens knowledge carried away 400. talents. But the Iewes being afflicted with a double calamitie, first of all with the losse of their friends in that fight: and lastly, with the spoile of the treasury; yet assembled they a troupe of the most valianteſt souldiers, and besieged the palace, threatning to burne the same, with Sabinus and all other the Romanes that were therein, except they speedily departed; and in so doing, they promised both them and Sabinus all assurance and securitie: whereby it came to passe, that diuers of them that were in the palace, issued out and submitted themselues vnto them. But Rufus and Gratus hauing three thousand of those valiant souldiers vnder their charge, who had serued Herod, ioyned themselues with the Romanes. The like did those horsemen which followed Rufus, who in like manner submitted themselues to their direction: yet for all this, the Iewes continued and intended their siege, vndermining the walles, and exhorting their aduersaries to depart, and not to exempt them of their libertie, which they had long time enioyed vnder their predecessors. Sabinus was willing to depart from thence with his souldiers; yet durst hee not trust them in regard of their former attempt, and he suspected ouermuch the ouer-liberall offer his enemies had made him: but neglected the same, because he expected Varus.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 15.

At the same time infinite other troubles were raised in diuers other places of Iudæa, according as each man either was incensed with a desire of gaine, or a will to reuenge. For two thousand men of warre (who had sometime serued vnder Herod, and being at that time cashierd, liued at home) assembling themselues together assailed those of the Kings faction, who made head against them, vnder the conduct of Herods nephew Aciabus: who neuer daring to encounter them in a place of equall aduantage, in that they were old souldiers, and well exercised in warre, defended himselfe, in that he held and kept himselfe as neere as he could in the mountaines and places of aduantage. Moreouer, Iudas the sonne of Ezechias the archthiefe, whom Herod ouercame with so much difficultie, at Sephoris a citie of Galilee, gathering vnto him a band of desperate men, made incursions vpon the Kings dominions. And hauing taken all those Armes and weapons, which he might recouer in that place, hee armed from the first to the last all those souldiers that were with him: he tooke away all that money which was reserued for the King, in that place: and affrighting the inhabitants round about him, he spoiled all those with whomsoeuer he met; aspiring to the kingdome, and affecting the same, not by lawfull meanes, of which he was vnskilfull, but by a libertie to doe iniury.

Diuers tumults in Iury.

Two thousand of Herods souldiers assaile the Kings people.

Iudas Ezechias sonne the archthiefe.

Whilest these troubles ranged in euery place, Simon also, who had bin one of Herods seruants, and both for his shape, stature and strength, was esteemed amongst all men, vndertooke the kingdome: and being attended by a mightie army, and proclaimed king by them, who were a wicked and vnbridled multitude, and perswading himselfe that he was worthy to be King aboue any other, he first of all set fire on the palace in Iericho, and spoiled all that which was therein. Hee burnt also diuers other royall palaces, belonging to the King, which were in diuers places of the countrey, giuing them free licence, who were his followers in the action, to beare away the prey that remained: and farre more licencious pranks had he played, had not his practices bin speedily and wisely preuented. For Gratus, who with the Kings souldiers had coupled himselfe with the Romanes, and gathered all the forces that he had, went out against this Simon. And after a fierce battell, they on the other side of Iordan, were put to flight, and fighting rather vnder courage then military discipline, they were ouercome. And whilest Simon in trauersing a valley sought to saue himselfe by flight, Gratus met with him, and cut off his head.

About the same time also, the royall palace of Amatha, that was fast by Iordan, was burnt by men of as bad dipoſition as Simon was. And thus thorow the whole nation raigned this raging rebellion, for that the country had no King, who by his vertue might gouerne and moderate the people, for that the strangers, who were sent to represse these mutinies, did rather incense them through their violence and auarice. For a certaine obscure & base man (neither esteemed for vertue, nor worthy regard for his riches, but being a shepheard vtterly vnknowne beforetime, and onely famous for his huge stature and strength) called Athronges, was so audacious to aspire to royall

Athronges strong in body and goodly in stature, attempteth royall dignitie.

A royall dignitie, and tooke pleaſure to offer violence, ſetting light by his life, and expoſing himſelf to all hazards for the onely vnbridled affection he bare to ſoueraigntie. He had foure brothers of as goodly ſtature as himſelfe, who were eſteemed for men of valour and execution, whereby they imagined they had the meanes offered them to occupy the Kingdome. Each one of theſe had the commaund ouer a company. For a great company of people reſorted dayly vnto them; the charge of whom was committed vnto his brethren, at ſuch time as any occaſion of war was offered, and hee in the meane while wearing the Diadem on his head, ordered, counſailed, and commaunded all things. The power of this Gallant endured a long time, who was not called King for nought: for he diſpoſed all things according to his owne pleaſure, and both hee and his B brethren were fleſht with the ſlaughter of the Romans, & thoſe of the Kings ſide, whom he hated alike; theſe, by reaſon of the inſolence they had vſed during Herods life-time: the other, in regard of thoſe iniuries, which lately they ſuppoſed themſelues to haue receiued by them. This hatred of theirs daily increaſed more and more, and there was no man that could eſcape their hands, both in reſpect of the gaine they ſought, as for the cuſtom they had to ſhead bloud. They therefore at that time ſet vpon the Romans, & ſuprized them on the ſodaine neere to Emmaus, at ſuch time as they carried victualls and munition vnto their campe; and hauing encloſed the Centurion Arius with forty of their moſt valiant footmen, they ſhot him thorow with their darts. The reſt that expected nothing leſſe then life, were ſaued by Gratus, who came in vpon them with the Kings ſouldiers: whereupon leauing the dead bodies, they retired. Continuing C their war after this maner a long time, according as occaſion was offered, they had done much miſchiefe to the Romans, and farre more iniury to the nation of the Iewes. Finally, they were ſurprized; the one in an encountrie betwixt them and Gratus: the other in fighting againſt Ptolomey. The eldeſt was taken by Archelaus, and the laſt being diſmaid with the accidents, and ſeeing no meanes to eſcape (for beſides his other miſ-haps, his ſouldiers were afflicted with ſicknes) hewith the reſt vpon Archelaus faith and oath ſubmitted himſelfe vnto him. But this was done ſome little while after.

At this time was all Iudæa full of robberies, & as many ſeditious aſſemblies as drew together, ſo many Kings were there elected, who were raiſed to the vtter ruine of the common-weale. Amongſt the reſt, the Romans were they that ſmarted leaſt, but the murthers were executed D againſt thoſe that were out of the country. But Varus vnderſtanding by Sabinus letters, in what dangers they were, & fearing the vtter ouerthrow of his third legion, he tooke with him the two other (for to the vttermoſt, in Syria there were but three) and with the aſſiſtance of the Kings & Tetrarches hee haſted into Iewry, to relieue thoſe that were beſieged, commanding thoſe that were ſent out before he diſlodged, to meet him at Ptolemais, and paſſing by the Citie of the Berythians, he receiued a thouſand, & 5. hundreth ſoldiers at their hands, to attend him in his war. Aretas alſo, who was Lord of Petra, drawing himſelfe into confederacy with the Romans in regard of that hatred he bare toward Herod, ſent him horſemen and footmen. When all theſe forces were aſſembled at Ptolemais, he deliuered a part therof to his ſon, and one of his friends; commanding them to make war vpon the Galileans, who bordered vpon that Citie; who ente- E ring that region, and putting all thoſe to flight, whoſoeuer durſt make head againſt him, he took Sephoris, and ſelling the inhabitants vnder the ſpeare, hee conſumed the Citie with fire. Varus himſelfe marching towards Samaria with his army, violenced not the Citie, in that hee knew it was free from the contagion of the ſeditious, but he pitched his camp in a certain village, which was Ptolomies poſſeſſion called Arus. The ſame did the Arabians burne, reuenging themſelues on Herods friend for his ſake, and marching onward, the Arabians ſpoiled alſo another village called Sampho, and for that it was ſtrongly fortified burned the ſame. Beſides, in that iourney nothing eſcaped their hands, but they put all to fire and ſword. For both Emmaus was burned by Varus commaund, and in reuenge of his ſouldiers that were ſlaine in that place, it was left de- ſolate and voide of inhabitants. From thence drawing neere to Ieruſalem, thoſe Iewes that be- F ſieged the legion of that ſide, vpon the ſodaine view and approach of the army of the Romans, fearefully fled, giuing ouer that ſiege which they intended. But thoſe Iewes of Ieruſalem, being grieuouſly reproued by Varus, alleadged in their excuſe, that the people in regard of the feaſt were aſſembled in that place, and that the warre was not begun by their conſent, but vndertaken by their boldneſſe who reſorted thither from diuers places, and that they were ſo far off from aſſayling the Romans, as they rather ſeemed to bee beſieged by them. And long before this, Ioſeph King Herods nephew, Gratus and Rufus, with their ſouldiers were gone out to meet Varus, and thoſe Romans that had ſuſtained the ſiege, had done no leſſe. But as touching Sabinus, hee would not appeare in Varus preſence, by ſtealing away priuily out of the Citie, hee fled vnto the ſeaward. Thē Varus ſending a part of his army thorow the whole region, ſought out the authors of this ſedition; and thoſe that were noted men in the action; ſome of which, who were moſt guiltie, were puniſhed: the reſt were deliuered. Now of thoſe that were puniſhed for this occaſion, there were about two thouſand crucified; and that done, ſeeing that this army ſtood him in little ſtead, hee diſmiſſed them. For diuers diſorders and outrages, contrarie to Varus expreſſe commaund, were acted by his ſouldiers, who ſought after nothing more them to increaſe their meanes by other mens miſeries. And hearing that ten thouſand Iewes were aſſembled together, he haſted to apprehend them: but they not daring to hazard their fortune in a fight with him, by Achiabus aduice ſubmitted themſelues. But Varus hauing pardoned the people for that their rebellion, ſent all thoſe that were the ringleaders thereof to Cæſar, who diſcharged diuers of them. But hee chaſtiſed certaine of Herods allies, and ſuch as bare armes with them: for that neither in regard of kindred, not reſpect of iuſtice, they had abſtained from rebellious inſurrection. After that Varus had in this ſort appeaſed all the troubles in Iewrie, and left the firſt legion in garriſon in Ieruſalem, he returned to Antioch.

Hegio & Ruffinus, cha. 16. al. 17.

But Archelaus was croſſed in Rome by another occurrent that aroſe vpon this occaſion: Certaine Embaſſadors of the Iewes reſorted thither by Varus permiſſion, requiring that it might be lawful for them to liue according to their owne lawes: theſe preſented themſelues, to the number of fiftie, and were backt by eight thouſand Iewes that inhabited the Citie. And when as Cæſar had aſſembled the councell of his friends, and chiefeſt citizens in Apolloes temple, which he had builded to his mightie charge, thither reſorted the Embaſſadours, who were follow'd by a troupe of Iewes; & Archelaus alſo attended by his friends. But the Kings kindred neither ſtood by Archelaus in regard of the hate they bare him, & yet diſdained they to aſſiſt the embaſſadors, for that they were aſhamed in Cæſars preſence to oppoſe themſelues againſt their neereſt friend and kinſman. Philip alſo was preſent at that time, who by Varus perſwaſion reſorted thither out of Syria, eſpecially to the intent to pleade for his brother, to whom Varus wiſhed all god fortune: beſides that, hoping not a little, that if the Iewes ſhould obtaine the libertie to liue according to their lawes, it might come to paſſe that the kingdom being diuided amongſt Herods children, he might alſo light on ſome part thereof. After therfore the Embaſſadors of the Iewes had obtained licence to propoſe their demaunds, pretending with themſelues wholly to extinguiſh the royalty: they began to rippe vp Herods diſgraces, alleaging how onely in name he had beene a King; whereas otherwiſe he had vſed all the tyrannous practices that the wickedſt perſon could haue inuented toward the deſtruction of his nation; & that not content with theſe, he had of his owne head practiſed & inuented new. Neither that it needed them to reckon vp how many hee had depriued of life, when as the eſtate of thoſe that were aliue was farre more deſperate; whom hee not onely affrighted with perpetuall terror and ſeueritie, but alſo with iniurious hands had not abſtained from their goods. By which meanes it came to paſſe, that he not onely builded, but beautified forraine Cities inhabited by forraine nations, to the end hee might the rather vtterly ſpoyle thoſe by exaction, which were ſituated and ſeated in his owne Countrey: and that he inforced his nation to extreme pouertie, which hee receiued in moſt happy eſtate, whileſt he ſpoiled thoſe nobles of their eſtates, who vpon weake probabilities were condemned to die, or granting them life, depriued them of their poſſeſſions. Furthermore, whereas yeerely tributes were impoſed on euerie one; yet ſeuerally was the rauenous & couetous deſires of his friends & courtiers to be ſatisfied, yea & of his ſeruants alſo, who had the authority to exact theſe things, that by this meanes they might redeeme their iniurious vexations. As for the deflowring of virgins, and the ſcornefull betraying of a matrons chaſtitie, they couered them vnder ſilence, for that it is a great comfort to thoſe that ſuffer ſuch outrage, if their diſgraces bee but knowne to a fewe. In briefe, that Herod had in no other ſort gouerned, then as if the gouernment of them had been committed to a moſt ſauage beaſt. For which cauſe, whereas in times paſt that nation had been afflicted with many calamities and murthers, yet that there is no example extant amongſt their monuments of antiquitie, that may be compared with their preſent calamitie vnder Herod. For which cauſe, vpon iuſt reſpects they had with one conſent named Archelaus their King, ſuppoſing that whatſoeuer king might befall them, hee would alwaies demeane himſelf more affably then Herod had done; and that to honour Archelaus they had mourned with him for his father, to gratifie him in other things, to the intent they might tie his good affection vnto them: But hee without delay & all at once had made manifeſt to the whole nation, what opinion they were to conceiue of him, notwithſtanding that as yet he was not confirmed King (for that it lay in Cæſars hands

A hands to bequeath it, yea or no) and as if he had beene afraid leſt he ſhould aſſuredly be acknowledged for his fathers ſon, he had ſhewed an example of his vertue, moderation and good gouernment, that hee would vſe towards his ſubiects, by the firſt act which hee hath committed, not onely againſt God, but alſo againſt men. For in the Temple it ſelfe he hath cauſed three thouſand of his owne countrymen to be ſlaine. And how can he chooſe but be iuſtly hated, who beſides his other cruelties, obiecteth againſt vs the crime of rebellion and mutiny? The effect of their requeſt therefore was this, that they might not any more be gouerned by a King, nor any ſuch like gouernment, but that they might be annexed vnto Syria, and ſubmit themſelues vnto thoſe gouernours that ſhould be ſent thither: That in ſo doing it ſhould truly appeare whether B they were ſeditious, and addicted to changes, or whether they would liue in peace at ſuch time as they had fauourable gouernours. After the Iewes had ſpoken to this effect, Nicholas diſcharged the Kings of thoſe accuſations that were obiected againſt them, and namely Herod, who (as he ſaid) had neuer beene accuſed all his lifetime; and that it was no reaſon that they who iuſtly accuſing him, might haue cauſed him to be puniſhed during his lifetime, ſhould now addreſſe their accuſations againſt him after he was dead. And as touching thoſe things that were obiected concerning Archelaus actions, it ought to be imputed to their inſolence, for that engaging themſelues in matters contrary to law, and hauing begun to murther thoſe who ſought to appeaſe the tumult, they accuſed ſuch as had kept them in obedience. Beſides this, he obiected againſt them, that they were addicted to alterations, and tooke pleaſure to ſtirre vp ſeditions, for C that they knew not what thing it was to obey iuſtice and the lawes, and that there was no nation in the world ſo head-ſtrong as that of the Iewes; for that they would haue the vpper hand ouer all. Thus ſpake Nicholas.

D WHEN Cæſar had heard theſe things, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly. But ſome few dayes after, he deſirous to make an end of this matter, declared Archelaus not King, but Lord of halfe that gouernment that appertained to Herod, promiſing him to beſtow a royall dignitie vpon him, if ſo be he behaued himſelfe vertuouſly, according as it became him. As for the other moitie, he diuided it betweene two, giuing a ſeuerall part thereof to each of Herods ſonnes, Philip and Antipas, who debated with his brother Archelaus for the whole kingdome. The ſame Antipas alſo had the countrey on the other ſide of Iordan, and Galilee, with two hundreth talents of annuall reuenue. As for Philip, he had Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and part of the palace that was called by Zenodorus name, with one hundreth talents. As for Archelaus, he had Idumæa, Iudæa and Samaria, which were diſcharged of the fourth part of the tribunes by Cæſar, for that they had ioyned themſelues with the reſt of the people during the E time of the ſedition. Beſides that, Archelaus had the tower of Straton, Sebaſte, Ioppe and Ieruſalem. For Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon were cities of Greece which Cæſar had diſmembred, and adioyned to Syria. Archelaus had fiue hundreth talents of yeerely rent out of his countrey. Thus was the patrimony diuided among Herods ſonnes. As for Salome, beſides that which her brother had giuen her in his Will, which were the Cities of Iamnia, Azot, Phaſaelis, and halfe a million of ſiluer money, Cæſar granted her a royall houſe in Aſcalon; ſo as ſhe receiued, in the whole, ſixtie talents of annuall reuenue, and had her houſe allotted her within the dominion of Archelaus. All other of Herods kinred, receiued that which was bequeathed vnto them by his teſtament. Two of his daughters that were vnmarried, were endowed by Cæſar with a quarter of a million of ſiluer money which he gaue them, beſide their fathers portion, and they F were married to Pheroras ſonnes. The false Alexander.

After these things were in this sort disposed by Cæsar, a young man and a Iew borne, brought vp in the Citie of Sidon, by a certaine Romane libertine, intruded himselfe into Herods kindred, for that all those that beheld him, reported he resembled Alexander Herods sonne, who was slaine by him; and by this meanes, hee began to aspire vnto the kingdome: whereupon calling to him a companion, who was his owne countreyman and a long beaten Courtier, and his craftsmaster, and fit to execute any dangerous or desperate actions, he by his instructions fained himselfe to be that Alexander Herods sonne, who was deliuered from death by the meanes of a certaine friend, who had the charge to see him executed: who executing others in their steads, deliuered both him and his brother Aristobulus, and that they were both escaped in this manner. Beeing puffed vp by these toyes, he failed not to deceiue other men; and as soone as he came to Creet, as many Iewes soeuer as hee fell in conference with, he perswaded them no lesse; and getting much money at their hands, he sailed into the Ile of Melos, where he gathered a great summe of money vnder pretext that he was of the Kings blood. And now hoping that he should recouer his fathers kingdome, and that he should remunerate those who were beneficiall vnto him, he hasted towards Rome, accompanied with his friends in great pompe. And being arriued at Puteol, he there also was entertained with no lesse fauour by those Iewes whom he deceiued by his colourable title; and diuers others, who had bin Herods friends and familiars came vnto him, and entertained him as their King. The cause hereof was the naturall dispositiõ of men, who take pleasure in false reports, together with the report of his resemblance. For they that had frequented very familiar with Alexander, held it for a matter most assured, that he was the man, and none other, and affirmed vnto other vpon their oathes that it was he; so that this rumor at last came to Rome. And all the Iewes that dwelt there came forth to meet him, saying, That it was Gods handy-worke, that he was after that sort preserued beyond all mens expectation: and they greatly reioyced in his mother Mariammes behalfe, from whom he was descended; and he was carried in a litter thorow the streets with all the apparell of a king, the charge whereof was defraied by those who were his friends. He was attended with a great multitude of men, and honoured with great applause, as it ordinarily falleth out at such time as beyond all expectation any one is found to haue bin miraculously preserued. When this newes was brought to Cæsars eares, he gaue small credit thereunto, perswading himselfe that it was a hard matter to deceiue Herod in a cause of so great importance: notwithstanding, conforming himselfe in some sort to the opinions of men, he sent a certaine free-man of his called Celadus, who had very familiarly conuersed with Alexander and Aristobulus during their infancy, giuing him in charge to bring Alexander vnto him, to the end he might see him; which he did, and was neuer the wiser in discouering him. This notwithstanding, Cæsar was not fully deceiued. For, although he resembled him somewhat, yet was not he so neerely like him, that he could deceiue those who narrowly obserued him. For this counterfeit Alexander had hard hands, in that he had beene accustomed to labour, which the true Alexander could not haue in regard of his tender and delicate education: and contrariwise this man was of a rough skin and hard flesh. Cæsar therefore discouering the treachery both of the counterfeit scholler and lying master, & how they accorded in their confident iustifications, he enquired of them what was become of Aristobulus who was secretly hidden with him, & for what cause he presented not himselfe to enioy the honour that appertained to those, who were so nobly descended? It was answered him, that he remained in the Ile of Cyprus, for feare of dangers, to which they are exposed who saile by sea, to the end that if any misfortune should befall them, all Mariammes race should not be extinguished, but that at leastwise Aristobulus might be left aliue. Whilest he auowed these things, and the author of this fable iustified no lesse, Cæsar drawing the young man aside, said vnto him: My friend, if thou wilt not deceiue me, thou shalt haue this recompence, that thou shalt not be punished. Tell me therefore what thou art, and who hath emboldned thee to practise this fraud: for this malice is so great that it surpasseth thine age: wherupon being vnable to cõceale the truth: he discouered the trechery to Cæsar, how & by whom it was contriued. At that time Cæsar being loth to falsifie his promise that hee had past to this false Alexander, and seeing that in times past he had traueild with his hands, he caused him to be enrouled among the number of his saylers to row, & caused the other that induced him to this fraud, to be put to death, cõtenting himselfe

CHAP. XV.

Archelaus is accused anew, and afterwards banished, and sent into Vienna.

AFTER that Archelaus had taken possession of that Soueraignty that was allotted him, hee came into Iudæa, where he deposed Ioazar the son of Boëthus from the high Priesthood, accusing him to haue fauoured the seditious, and established Eleazar his brother in his B place. After this he reedified the Palace in Iericho, and sumptuously adorned it, drawing away the halfe of those waters which serued the borough of Neara: and conueying them thorow a field which he had planted with Palme trees; hee builded a borough in that place, which he named Archelais, and contrary to the lawes of his countrey he married Glaphyra Archelaus daughter, who had beene his brother Alexanders wife, by whom also he had diuers chidren, notwithstanding, the law of the Iewes forbiddeth a man to marry his brothers wife. Neither did Eleazar enioy the Priesthood any long time: but during his life-time, Iesus the sonne of Sias was substituted in his place.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 19. al. 18.

The Priesthood is taken from Ioazar, and deliuered to Eleazar, and from him to Iosuah the sonne of Sia.

Archelais builded.

The tenth yeere of Archelaus gouernment, the chiefest gouernours among the Iewes and C Samaritanes, vnable any longer to endure his crueltie and tyranny, accused him before Cæsar, and especially after they had vnderstood that he had transgressed Cæsars command, who had charged him to behaue himselfe graciously towards them. Which when Cæsar vnderstood, he was sore displeased, and caused Archelaus agent to be called before him, who was then at Rome, and sent for Archelaus also: and esteeming it too base an indignitie for him to write vnto him, Goe (said he) vnto him with all expedition, and bring him vnto me without delay. He posting forward with all diligence, at length arriued in Iudæa, where he found Archelaus banquetting with his friends, and hauing certified him of Cæsars pleasure, he incited him to hasten onward of his way. As soone as he came to Rome, after that Cæsar had heard certaine of his accusers and his iustifications, he banished him, and confined him in the Citie of Vienna in France, and con- D fiscated all his goods.

Archelaus banished and confined.

But before Archelaus was sent for to Rome, he reported vnto his friends this dreame which ensueth: Him thought that hee saw tenne eares full of wheat, and very ripe, which the oxen browzed vpon, and as soone as he awoke, he conceiued an opinion that his vision presaged some great matter. For which cause he sent for certaine sooth-sayers, who made it their profession to interpret dreames. Now whilest they were debating one with another (for they differed for the most part in their exposition) a certaine man called Simon an Essean, hauing first of all obtained securitie and licence to speake, said that the vision pretended, that a great alteration should befall in Archelaus estate, to his vtter disgrace. For the oxen signified afflictions, in respect that those kinde of creatures do ordinarily trauell; and as touching the change of estate, it was signified by E this, in that the earth being laboured by the trauell of the oxen, retained not the same estate: and as touching the ten eares of corne, they signified the like number of yeeres. And therefore when as one summer should be ouerpast, that then the time of Archelaus soueraignty should be at an end. Thus interpreted he this dreame. And the fift day after the vision thereof, Archelaus his Factor by Cæsars commandement came into Iury to summon him to Rome. Some such like matter hapned to Glaphyra his wife also, the daughter of King Archelaus: shee (as we haue said) married Alexander Herods sonne, when shee was a maide, and brother to this Archelaus; who being slaine by his father, she was married the second time to Iuba King of Mauritania: and he also being dead, she liuing with her father in Cappadocia, was married to Archelaus, who put away Mariamme his wife for the loue he bare vnto Glaphyra. Shee liuing with Archelaus, was encountred F with such a dreame: Shee thought that she saw Alexander fast by her, who cherishing and embracing her, checked her, saying, Glaphyra, Thou approouest the truth of that prouerbe, which saith, Women haue no loyaltie. For hauing giuen me thy faith, and married with me at such time as thou wert a virgin, and borne children by me, thou hast forgotten and neglected my loue, thorow the desire thou hast had to be married the second time. Neither wast thou cõtented to haue done me this wrong, but hast taken vnto thee likewise a third husband, lewdly and impudently intruding thy selfe into my family; and being married with Archelaus, thou art content to admit my brother for thy husband. This notwithstanding, I will not forget the loue that I haue borne thee, but will deliuer thee from him, who hath done thee this reproach, by retaining thee for mine owne, as heretofore thou hast beene. After that she had told this vision to certaine women that were her familiars, shee dyed very shortly after. Which accident I haue thought good to register in this place, in that I was to intreat of those Kings; and otherwise the matter seemeth to be a signall example, containing a most certaine argument of the immortalitie of soules, and Gods prouidence. And if any one deeme these things incredible, let him reserue his opinion to himselfe, and no waies contradict those, who by such euents are incited to the study of vertue. Now when the gouernment of Archelaus was annexed to Syria, Cyrenius, who had beene Consull, was sent by Cæsar to taxe Syria, and to dispose of Archelaus house.

CHAP. I.

CYRENIVS is sent by CÆSAR into Syria.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 1. Cyrenius is sent by Cæsar into Syria to execute iustice in that place. Coponius Præfect of Iudæa. The taxation of the people of the Iewes.

CYRENIVS the Romane Senator hauing executed all degrees, offices, and dignities, vntill such time as he obtained the Consulship (a man of great reckoning and estimation) was sent into Syria by Cæsars direction, to doe iustice among the people, and to sesse and taxe each mans goods: with him was sent Coponius a Captaine of a company of horsemen, who was appointed to haue the commandement of all Iewry. Cyrenius therefore came into Iudæa, which was already annexed vnto Syria, to taxe the goods of the inhabitants thereof, and to confiscate Archelaus substance. And although at the first the Iewes thought but hardly of this description, yet notwithstanding without contradiction they submitted themselues, being perswaded thereunto by the counsell of the high Priest Ioazar the sonne of Boëthus, by whose aduice they suffered themselues to be taxed without contradiction. But after this there arose a certaine Iew called Iudas the Gaulanite, borne in the towne of Gamala, who hauing a certaine man called Sadoc the Pharisee confederate with him, laboured to stirre vp the people to rebellion: alleadging that the description was no other thing, but a manifest confession of their seruitude, exhorting all the nation to maintaine their libertie, and putting them in hope that they thereby should happily establish their estates, and enioy their goods with securitie: and besides this, this, obtaine both honour and glory in profecution of ſuch an enterprize. Moreouer, that God would not affoord them a more aſſured way to ſettle their fortunes then by this meanes, namely, if they would employ themſelues in the execution of their deſignes, and if hauing conceiued in their minds hauty and noble attempts, they forbore not to finiſh the ſame, notwithſtanding the execution coſt them their liues. Theſe ſpeeches of theirs were entertained by the people with great pleaſure, and by the ſame they were the more confirmed and heartned to rebellion. So that there was no kind of euill which theſe men ſet not abroach, yea the whole nation was repleniſhed with ſuch miſeries, that it is impoſſible to recount them: for the wars therein continued with ſuch fury, that it was impoſſible to reſtraine the violence thereof; ſo that they neither ſpared friends, nor reſpected enemies, but were wholly giuen ouer to the ſpoile. There raigned nothing but robberies and murthers of noble perſonages, who entertained one another vnder pretence to eſtabliſh the eſtate of the Common-weale, but in effect for their priuate profit ſake, wherby the cities were repleniſhed with ſeditions and murthers, in which the inhabitants ſlaughtered one another, after a ſtrange manner of fury, and deſire they had not to ſpare any that was of their contrary faction. They were afflicted with forraine enemies and famine; yet none of theſe could pacifie their fury, but that they furiouſly razed Cities, ſhed innocent blood, till at length the horrible miſchiefe tooke ſuch a head, that they conſumed the Temple of God, and burned all the beautifull buildings. So dangerous a thing is it to change the cuſtomes and manners of a countrey. For Iudas and Sadoc hauing introduced and raiſed a fourth ſect, and tying the Sectaries to their command, filled the whole Common-weale for the preſent with many troubles, and produced the roots of theſe miſchiefes, which afterwards branched abroad from this vnaccuſtomed ſect. For which cauſe I thinke it not amiſſe to diſcourſe briefly of theſe Sectaries opinions, whereby ſo many euils haue fallen vpon our nation.

CHAP. II.

How many, and what ſects there were among the Iewes.

THERE were three ſects among the Iewes, of long continuance and antiquity: that of the Eſſeans; that of the Sadduces; and that of thoſe who were called Phariſes. Of theſe haue we ſpoken in our ſecond booke of the warres of the Iewes; and yet now I thinke it not amiſſe to ſpeake ſomewhat of them in this place alſo. The Phariſes vſe a very auſtere and ſtrict kinde of life, and addict not themſelues to any delicacy, but diligently follow that which their reaſon induceth them vnto. They honour their elders, neither dare they reply, or reproach them for their admonitions. They attribute all things vnto fate, and yet they take not an aſſent of will from man; ſuppoſing that God tempereth all things in ſuch ſort, that by his ordinance and mans will all things are performed either good or euill. They beleeue alſo that the ſoules of men are immortall; and that vnder the earth they receiue iudgement of honour or diſgrace, according as they haue addicted themſelues to vertue or vice in their life times: the one to liue in perpetuall priſon; the other to riſe againe very ſhortly. For which cauſe they are in great eſtimation among the people: and all that which appertaineth to the ſeruice of God, whether they be prayers or ſacrifices, all things are done according as they giue direction. So ample a teſtimony yeeld the Cities of their wiſedome, temperance and honeſt life. But the Sadduces are of that opinion, that the ſoules of men periſh with their bodies. They obſerue no other thing but that which is in the law, and hold it a vertue to diſpute with their maſters, as touching the decrees of their ſect. Their opinion is entertained by very few, yet ſuch, who for the moſt part are men of the beſt reckoning; yet entermeddle they not in any caſe with any affaires: and when they are aduanced to any honours, either with their owne good liking, or with conſtraint; they are enforced to allow of that which the Phariſes ſhall propoſe, otherwiſe the common people will not endure them. The Eſſeans attribute vnto God the gouernment and diſpoſition of all things. They ſay that the ſoules of men are immortall, and all the vttermoſt of their indeuour & delight is to maintaine iuſtice and equity. They ſend their offerings vnto the Temple, yet ſacrifice they not with other men, by reaſon they vſe more ſacred and different ceremonies: for which cauſe they are ſecluded out of the common Temple, and ſacrifice apart. Otherwiſe, they are men of moſt reconciled behauiour, & ſuch as are wholly addicted to trimming & labouring their fields. They haue one cuſtome which is worthy admiration, & ſuch a one as is not to be found amongſt any other, either Greeks or Barbarians, that make any reckoning of vertue, which they haue not practiſed practiſed for a little while, but euen from all antiquitie; which is, that they poſſeſſe their goods in common: neither doth the richeſt among them make more vſe of his poſſeſſions then he that hath leaſt of all. They are at leaſt foure thouſand in number, who neither haue wiues nor ſlaues; ſuppoſing that women are the occaſion of iniuſtice, and that ſlaues doe ariſe by mutinies: and liuing apart by themſelues, they ſerue one another: and chooſe out certaine vpright men among their Prieſts to gather the fruits and reuenewes of their lands, to the end they may be ſuſtained and nouriſhed thereby: In a word, they follow the ſame courſe of life that they doe, who are called Pliſti among the Danes. The fourth ſect was founded by Iudas of Galilee, which accordeth altogether and in all things with the Phariſes, but that they are extremely zealous of their liberty, acknowledging but one onely God, Lord and maſter of all things, and had rather both themſelues with their deareſt children and kinsfolke endure the moſt grieuous and bitter torments that may be imagined, then call any mortall man their Lord. Of which conſtancy of theirs I forbeare to diſcourſe any further at this time, for that it is ſufficiently knowne vnto diuers, who haue beene eye-witneſſes thereof: neither feare I leſt any one ſhould ſuppoſe thoſe things to be incredible, which I haue ſaid of them; but contrariwiſe, that I haue ſpoken leſſe then they themſelues make euident in contemning their grieuous tortures and puniſhments; which courage and magnanimity of theirs increaſed very mightily amongſt our nation, being kindled by the moſt hainous iniuries which were offered vs by Geſsius Florus our Gouernour, by which meanes at length it came to paſſe that they reuolted and rebelled againſt the people of Rome. The Tetrarches HEROD and PHILIP builded Cities in honour of CÆSAR.

AFTER that Cyrenius had confiſcated Archelaus goods, and finiſhed the valuation of euery mans eſtate (which hapned 37. yeers after Antonies ouerthrow by Cæſar in the Actian battell) hee depoſed Ioazar from the Prieſtly dignity, by reaſon of that ſedition which the people ſtirred vp againſt him, and eſtabliſhed Ananus the ſonne of Seth in his place. But Herod and Philip tooke each of them the poſſeſſion of their Tetrarchy, and diſpoſed of the affaires thereof. Herod inclozed Sephoris with a ſtrong wall, and made it the chiefeſt City and ornament of Galilee: he fortified alſo another City called Betaramphtha, and named it Iulias in honour of Iulia the Emperour Cæſars wife. Philip repaired Paneada ſituated neere vnto the ſourſe of Iordan, and called it Cæſarea: he repaired alſo the borough of Bethſaida neere vnto the lake of Genazereth, and gaue it the dignity of a City, both for the number of the inhabitants, as for other preeminences, and called it Iulia by Cæſars wiues name. As for Coponius the Gouernour in Iudæa, who (as we haue ſaid) was ſent with Cyrenius, in his time there hapned that which followeth. At the feaſt of vnleauened bread, which we call Paſcha, the cuſtome was that the Prieſts opened the Temple gates about midnight: at which time certaine Samaritans, who ſecretly entred into Ieruſalem, as ſoon as the gates were open, ſpred mens bones amidſt the porches, and ouer all the Temple: whereby it came to paſſe, that the Prieſts began to keepe a more diligent watch, then they had done before-time.

Some little while after, Coponius returned to Rome, and Marcus Ambiuius ſucceeded him in the gouernment. In his time Salome King Herods ſiſter departing out of this life, bequeathed vnto Iulia the Citie of Iamnia and all the lands and countrey round about: ſhe gaue her alſo Phaſaelis ſituate in the Plaine, and Archelais where there are diuers date trees, bearing moſt excellent fruit. After Ambiuius, Annius Ruphus had the command, vnder whom died Cæſar the ſecond Roman Emperour, after he had raigned fifty ſeuen yeers, ſixe moneths and two daies, and had Antonius his copartner in the monarchy for the ſpace of fourteene yeeres. After Cæſar ſucceeded Tiberius Nero the ſon of Iulia his wife, who was the third Roman Emperour. This Gratus depoſed Ananus, and appointed Iſmael the ſonne of Fabius High Prieſt: and after his deceaſe (for he liued but a little whiles after) Eleazar the ſon of Ananus was made High Prieſt. A yeer after this, this Eleazar was alſo depoſed, and the Prieſthood was giuen to Simon the ſon of Camithus: who continuing in this dignity for a yeers ſpace and no longer, Ioſeph called Caiaphas ſucceeded after him. After Gratus had behaued himſelf thus, he returned to Rome, after he had remained in Iudæa for the ſpace of 11. yeerrs. After him came Pontius Pilate, and ſucceeded him in the gouernment. But Herod the Tetrarch being entertained into Tiberius friendſhip, builded a City in honour of his name, and called it Tiberias. He planted it in the fruitfulleſt part of Galilee, hard by the lake Genazereth, and neere vnto the naturall bathes in the borough called Emmaus. This City was peopled by ſtrangers, who reſorted thither from all parts; and by diuers, of the countries of Galilee, ſome of which were conſtrained to inhabit the ſame. Some of thoſe likewiſe, who were in authority repaired thither, and from all countries there flocked many, who were not aſſuredly held for men of free condition; all which he enfranchiſed, and gaue them great gifts, vnder that condition, that they ſhould not abandon the City. To ſome of them he gaue houſes already builded; to other ſome lands very apt to be tilled, knowing that the habitation of ſuch a place was contrary to the lawes and cuſtomes of his countrey, and the ordinances of the Iewes; for that Tiberias was builded in a place full of ſepulchers: and our law ſaith, he that conuerſeth in thoſe places, is held vncleane and defiled for the ſpace of ſeuen dayes.

At that very time died Phraates King of Parthia, being traiterouſly ſlaine by his ſonne Phraataces, for this cauſe. After that Phraates had gotten many lawfull children, he tooke vnto him an Italian woman to his concubine, called Thermuſa, whom with other preſents Iulius Cæſar had ſent vnto him. After he had begotten on her his ſon Phraataces, he was ſo much beſotted with her beauty, that he took her to his wife, and held her in high eſtimation. She that might perſwade him vnto all that whatſoeuer ſhe liſted, enforced herſelfe to the vttermoſt to make her ſon king of Parthia: and ſeeing that ſhe might not attaine thereunto, except ſhe had firſt found out the meanes to deliuer her ſelfe of Phraates lawfull children, ſhee perſwaded him to ſend them hoſtages to Rome. In a word, they were preſently ſent away, becauſe Phraates in no ſort had the power to contradict Thermuſas will, and only Phraataces was brought vp in the affaires of eſtate; who thinking the time too tedious and long, if he ſhould expect the kingdome whilſt his father were dead, conſpired againſt him by the inſtigation and furtherance of his mother, with whom (as it is thought) he committed inceſt. In effect, being equally attainted of theſe two hainous crimes, both for the murther of his father, as his inceſt committed with his mother, he was generally hated by his ſubiects, who rebelled againſt him before ſuch time as he was ſettled in his kingdome. By this meanes was his fortune ouerthrowne, and he died. The noble men among the Parthians, perceiuing that it was impoſſible for them to maintaine their policy without a King, and that their King ought lineally to deſcend of the race of the Arſacians (becauſe by cuſtome they might not chooſe any out of another ſtock) and ſuppoſing that their ordinances had too much already bin broken, and that it would redound to their great diſhonor if the kingdome ſhould be continued in the hands of ſuch a man, who was deſcended from an Italian concubine, they ſent Embaſſadors to require Herod to come and bee their King, who otherwiſe was in hatred with all the people, and accuſed of extreme cruelty. In a word, he was an vnſociable man, and extremely cholericke, notwithſtanding he were of the blood of the Arſacides: they therefore flocked about him, and killed him at a banquet made at a certain ſacrifice (for the cuſtome of the Parthians was, that euery one bare his weapon) or as the common report was, that he was ſlaine at ſuch time as he was a hunting. For this cauſe, they ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, requiring that one of thoſe that were hoſtages there might be their King, and one Vonones was ſent vnto them, who was preferred aboue all his brethren. For he ſeemed to be capable of that high degree of honour, as to command two of the greateſt ſoueraignties that were vnder the ſunne; the one of his owne nation; the other of a forraine dominion. But the Barbarians, who are by nature mutable and moſt impatient of indignity, ſhortly after repented themſelues: for they diſdained to execute the command of a ſlaue; for ſo called they a pledge, ſaying, that the Parthians had not a King giuen them by right of warre, but that which was the moſt outrage that might befall them, by iniury offered them in time of peace. For which cauſe they ſpeedily ſent for Artabanus King of Media, who was of the race of the Arſacides. To this requeſt of theirs he willingly condeſcended, and came vnto them with his army. And Vonones marched forward to make head againſt him. At the firſt encountry, although the common ſort among the Parthians fauoured Artabanus; yet was he ouercome and fled to the mountaines of Media. But not long after, hauing aſſembled a greater army, he once more ſet vpon Vonones and diſcomfited him, at which time Vonones retired himſelfe with ſome horſemen of his into Seleucia. But Artabanus hauing made a great ſlaughter of thoſe that fled, and wholly abaſhed the minds of the Barbarians, he retired himſelfe to the City of Ctеſiphon, with thoſe people that accompanied him, and was afterwards made King of Parthia. Vonones arriued in Armenia, and at the firſt ſought to make himſelfe himselfe King ouer that nation, sending to this effect certaine Embassadours to Rome: but Tiberius repulsed his suit in respect of his cowardize, but the rather for that Artabanus by an expresse Embassage had threatned him with warre. For they of the greatest power among the Armenians (who are those that dwell about the floud Niphates) maintained Artabanus title; and Vonones, destitute of all hope to obtaine the Kingdome, yeelded himselfe to Syllanus, who was gouernour of Syria, and in regard that he had bin brought vp at Rome, he was kept in Syria: and Artabanus gaue Armenia to Orodes, one of his sons. Antiochus King of the Comagenes dyed also at that time, and there fell a debate betwixt the commons and the nobility; so that both parties sent their Embassadors to Rome. The nobles required that the forme of their gouernment might be changed into diuers signiories; and the people requested that they might be honoured by a King, as they had beene accustomed. The Senate decreed that Germanicus should be sent to settle the affaires in the East, fortune thereby presenting him with the occasion of his ruine. For, at such time as he arriued in the East, and orderly disposed all things, he was poisoned by Piso: whereof he died, as it is declared in another place.

CHAP. IIII.

The rebellion of the Iewes against PONTIVS PILATE.

PILATE Gouernour of Iudæa led his army from Cæsarea to Ierusalem, where he wintered them with an intent to bring in Cæsars statues, and standards into the City, in contempt of our law which forbiddeth vs to make images. For which cause, those Gouernours that were before him, were wont to make their entries into the Citie without such pictures or paintings. Pilate was the first, who vnawares and by night entred Ierusalem, bringing with him his images. Which when the people vnderstood, in great multitudes they resorted to Cæsarea, beseeching him for many dayes, that hee would transport those images into some other place. But when as Pilate denied them to performe their request, because the matter would redound to Cæsars dishonour, and the Iewes also ceased not to sollicite him; some sixe dayes after commanding his souldiers to lie in ambush in a readinesse, he sate him downe in the Tribunall within the Hippodrom, making vse of the opportunity of the place, for that it was most fit for a stratagem. There being vrged once more about the same businesse, he gaue a signe to his souldiers to beset them, threatning them with death, except they would presently giue ouer their suite, and repaire euery one of them with all speed to their owne houses. But they prostrating themselues vpon the earth, and offering their naked throats, told him that they rather desired to dye, then to see their lawes violated, which were with so great iudgement and reason proposed vnto them. Pilate amazed at the confidence they shewed in the conseruation of their lawes, suddenly caused Cæsars images to be transported out of Ierusalem into Cæsarea, and out of the sacred treasury he made certaine conduits of water, that had their fountaine heads more then two hundreth stades off. But the people tooke no pleasure in these conduits, and diuers thousands of men assembled themselues exclaiming against Pilate, endeauouring thereby to make him giue ouer his enterprize. Some of them also vttered diuers iniurious speeches against him, as it ordinarily falleth out amongst an vnbridled multitude. But he causing them to be hemmed in by a great number of his souldiers, attired in popular habit, as soone as they began to exclaime against him, gaue a signe to his souldiers: they, as it was before-time commanded them, made vse of their maces; and without distinction either of the persons or the offenders, fell on all those whom they had encompassed; and so vnmercifully laid on them, who were naked and disarmed, that some of them were slaine, othersome grieuously hurt: and after this manner was the tumult and sedition appeased.

At that time was IESVS, a wise man, if it be lawfull to call him a man. For he was the performer of diuers admirable works, and the instructer of those who willingly entertain the truth: and he drew vnto him diuers Iewes and Greeks to be his followers. This was CHRIST, who being accused by the Princes of our nation before Pilate, and afterwards condemned to the crosse by him; yet did not those who followed him from the beginning, forbeare to loue him for the ignominie of his death. For he appeared vnto them aliue the third day after, according as the diuine Prophets had before testified the same, and diuers other wonderfull things of him: and from that time forward the race of the Christians, who haue deriued their name from him, hath neuer ceased.

At that time also there fell out another accident, which very sore troubled the Iewes, and in the

the temple of Isis at Rome there were many shamefull acts committed. But I will first of all recount the accident in the Temple of Isis: and then will I declare that which befell the Iewes. There was in Rome a Lady called Paulina, renowmed both for the nobility of her house, as also through her study and exercise in vertue. Besides this, shee was verie rich, and with her riches beautifull, and in her flowring yeeres; and notwithstanding a verie mirrour of chastitie. Shee was married to a certaine noble man called Saturnine, that equald her in all those her excellent perfections. A certain young man called Decius Mundus, one of the knights of greatest account at that time, fell in loue with her. But she was of that disposition, that it was impossible for him to corrupt her by presents: And the more she refused those infinite presents which he sent vnto her, the more was Mundus heart inflamed with ardent affection; so that to enioy her but onely one night, he offered her two hundred thousand drachmes, amounting in our English money to some sixe thousand pound; yet for all this he could not ouercome her. For which cause being vnable to indure this his vnfortunate loue, he thought best to pine himselfe away for want of sustenance, thereby to deliuer himselfe from the tyranny of that passion, wherewith he was afflicted: Finally, that he confidently resolued, he constantly put in execution. Now there was a certaine freewoman that belonged to Mundus father, whose name was Ide, expert in all sorts of subtilties, who being sore aggrieued to behold the yong mans resolution, whom she saw wholly addicted to a desperate death, she addressed her self vnto him, and encouraged him with hope, promising him to bring him to Paulinas speech, by the meanes of a certaine bribe which she intended to offer. He reioycing very much at her motion, demanded what summe should serue her: who requiring nothing more then fifty thousand drachmes to obtaine Paulina; he furnished her presently. When as by this means she had quickned the young mans spirit, and receiued all that which she demanded, she shaped not the same course which others had kept that had the sollicitation of the matter before, seeing she saw that mony would not tempt her; but knowing that she was deeply deuoted to the seruice of Isis, she practised this subtill and vnexpected policy. She addressed her selfe to certaine priests of the temple, and vpon great hopes, and offer of greater presents, and paying them downe vpon the present, twenty & fiue thousand drachmes, and promising them as much more vpon the performance of the bargaine, she disclosed vnto them the passionate loue which the young man bare vnto Paulina, exhorting them to work so wisely that he might inioy her. They bewitched with this huge present they had, and hoped to receiue, promised her to work the feat. Whereupon, the eldest among them resorted to Paulina, and hauing free accesse vnto her presence, he required that he might haue conference with her in secret: which when he had obtained, he told her that he was sent vnto her by God Anubis, in that the God was surprized with her loue, and desired that she would come vnto him. Paulina, tooke great pleasure in this his discourse, and told her familiars how she had been honoured with the amorous sollicitation of a god, and certified her husband how Anubis would banquet and lie with her. Whereunto he consented, knowing how great his wiues chastitie was. She therefore repaired to the temple: and after she had supt, & the time was come wherein she was vsually accustomed to lay her downe to rest, and the gates were lockt vp by the priests that were therein, and the lights likewise were taken away; Mundus, who was hidden within, failed not to accost her: who thinking that it was god Anubis, satisfied his desires all the night long; and in the morning betimes before the priests, who were priuie to this trecherie, were stirring, he retired himselfe: Paulina also early in the morning repaired to her husband, and certified him how Anubis had appeared vnto her, and boasting her selfe among her familiars what conference hee had vsed with her. But some of them beleeued her not, in regard of the manner of their entertainment; the rest were altogether amazed, supposing those things to bee no waies incredible, at such time as they bethought themselues of the Ladies chastitie. Some three dayes after this act was committed, Mundus meeting with Paulina, said vnto her: You haue saued mee two hundreth thousand drachmes, wherewith you might haue augmented your treasure, and this notwithstanding, you haue not failed to satisfie my request: neither am I grieued that you haue contemned mee vnder the name of Mundus, since that vndertaking Anubis name, I haue accomplished my desire, and this said, hee departed. But she presently amated with the mans audacious impudence, tore her garments, and hauing told her husband of all this subtill circumuention, she requested earnestly his assistance, and that he would not forsake her in the prosecution of her reuenge: who presently certified the Emperour of each particular thereof. Now when Tiberius had diligently vnderstood, how all things had happened, by the inquisition and examination of the Priests, he condemned them and Ida, who had beene the inuenter and complotter of this this treason against Paulina, to be hangd: he pulled downe the temple also, and cast Anubis statue into Tyber, and banished Mundus; supposing that he ought not to be more grieuously punished, considering that the fault which was committed by him, proceeded from extreme loue: Behold here the insolence committed in the temple of Isis, by the priest that appertained to that temple. Now intend I to declare that which hapned to the Iews that were at that time in Rome, according as heretofore I both purposed and promised.

CHAP. V.

Of that which befell the Iewes that were at Rome in Pilates time.

Fuluia Saturnines wife deliuereth gold and purple to be sent to the temple in Ierusalem, they conuert it to their own vses which when Tiberius knew he cõmanded all the Iewes to be thrust out of Rome.

THere was a certaine Iewe, that hauing beene accused for the breach of the lawes of his country, and fearing to bee punished for the same, fled from thence, being without respect, a man of a most mischieuous behauiour. He dwelling at that time in Rome, professed himselfe to be an expounder of Moses law, and drawing to him three other no lesse reprobates then himselfe, he followed his ordinary profession. Fuluia a Lady of much honor became their scholler; and had embraced the religion of the Iewes, whom they had perswaded to send certain purple and gold to the temple of Ierusalem: which after they had receiued at her hands, they conuerted it to their owne vse, as before that time they had determined to doe. Tiberius, who was informed hereof by Saturnine his familiar friends, and Fuluias husband, who had discouered the same vnto him, commanded all Iewes whatsoeuer to depart out of Rome. Of these the Consuls chose out and enrouled to the number of foure thousand men, whom they sent into Sardinia: and punished diuers of them that refused to beare armes, for feare they should transgresse the ordinances of their countrey. So that by reason of the loose behauiour of foure wicked persons, all those of our nation were driuen out of the City of Rome.

The Samaritanes assemble at Tirathaba to ascend the mountain Garizim. Pilate chargeth and ouercommeth them and putteth them to flight.

Neither was the nation of the Samaritanes exempt from this trouble: for a certaine subtill companion, who sought by all the means he might to incroche vpon the peoples fauour, perswaded them to withdraw themselues with him to the mount Garizim (which they supposed to be the holiest amongst all their mountaines) in which place, he auowed he would shew them the sacred Vessels buried in a certaine place, where Moses had laid them: and at that time they being gathered together in armes, by his perswasion encamped themselues in a borough called Tirathaba, where they entertained those that repaired thither to adioyn themselues with them, to the end they might ascend the mountaine with the greater companie. But Pilate preuented them, and got vp before them with his horsemen and footmen: who charging those that were assembled in the borough, put them to flight; and slaying some, and putting the rest to flight, led away a great number of them prisoners with him. Pilate executed the chiefest ring-leaders amongst them, and those also of greatest force amongst the fugitiues. The tumult of these Iews being published abroad, and their misfortune made knowne, the Senate of Samaria addressed themselues to Vitellius who had bin Consul, and who at that time gouerned Syria, before whom they accused Pilate for the murther of those whom he had slaine, saying that they assembled not in Tirathaba to rebell against the Romans, but to warrantize themselues against Pilates tyranny. Whereupon Vitellius sent Marcellus his friend, to take charge of Iudæa, commanding Pilate to returne to Rome, and to satisfie the Emperor in those things wherof the people had accused him. Hereupon Pilate, after he had soiourned ten yeers in Iewry, repaired to Rome, hauing no means to contradict that commandement that Vitellius had giuen him. But before hee arriued there, Tiberius was departed and dead.

Vitellius commeth to Ierusalem, forgiueth the Iewes their tribute, & committeth the charge of the high priests garmẽts to them. The high priests vestmẽts reserued in the castle of Antonia.

AS sõne as Vitellius came into Iudæa, he went vp to Ierusalem and celebrated there the feast of the passeouer, and after he had been magnificently entertained in that place, he forgaue the Citizens the tribute of all those fruits which were sold. He deliuered them also the ornaments of the high priests, with all the rest of the priestly furniture within the temple, committing the charge thereof vnto the priests, according as in times past they had the same. But at that time they were laid vp in the castle of Antonia for this cause which followeth: Hircanus the high priest the first of that name (for diuers haue been so called) hauing builded a tower neere vnto the temple, did for the most part make his residence therein, and there kept his ty, and put vpon him his accuſtomed rayment. His ſonne and his ſonnes ſonnes entertained the ſame cuſtome, till ſuch time as Herod being exalted to the kingdome, and ſeeing this tower to B be ſtrongly ſited, builded the ſame moſt magnificently, and called it Antonia, in honour of Anto- ny his great friend. And hauing found theſe veſtments in the place, he retained them with him, aſſuring himſelfe, the people would attempt nothing againſt him. Archelaus his ſonne and ſucceſſor in the kingdome, kept the ſame courſe that Herod had done. But after that the Romans had obtained the ſoueraignty thereof, they kept the High Prieſts ornaments in their hands, and reſer-

B ued them in a place builded for the purpoſe, vnder the ſeale of the Prieſts: and the Prefect of thoſe that kept the ſacred treaſure, lighted the lamp euery day in that place. This euery ſeuenth day before the feaſt, doth the Prefect deliuer it into the High Prieſts hands, and after it was puri-ſied, he put it on to doe diuine ſeruice, and the next day after the feaſt he returneth it againe to the ſame place where it was kept before: which cuſtome was obſerued thrice euery yeere in the time of a faſt. But Vitellius returned thoſe ornaments into the hands of the Prieſts, according to the ancient orders, leauing them to be vſed at ſuch time as need required, commanding the Prefect to trouble himſelfe no more about the place where they ſhould be kept. After he Vitellius aduanced Ionathan the ſon of Anani to the prieſthood and degradeth Ioſeph ſurnamed Caiaphas had done this fauour to the nation of the Iewes, he depoſed the High Prieſt Ioſeph ſurnamed Caiaphas, and aduanced Ionathan the ſonne of Ananus to that dignity, and afterwards returned to C Antioch.

At that time he receiued letters from Tiberius, by which he commanded him to capitulate and conclude a friendſhippe with Artabanus the King of the Parthians (whoſe hatred hee ſuſpected, and feared, leſt being ſeized of Armenia, hee ſhould worke further diſpleaſure to the ſtate of Rome) willing him to aſſure the league by hoſtages, and namely with Artabanus ſonne. After Tiberius had written theſe letters aboue mentioned vnto Vitellius, he perſwaded the Kings of Iberia and Alania by great ſtore of money, that with all expedition they ſhould make warre againſt Artabanus. But the Iberians would not be drawne thereunto, yet ſuffered they the Alaines to march thorow their countrey, and opened them their gates of the mount Caſpius, The Parthians loſe Armenia.
to giue them paſſage to inuade Artabanus. Thus once more was Armenia conquered, and the D countrey of the Parthians was filled with warre, whereby the chiefeſt among them were ſlaine, and all their eſtate was ſpoyled and diſordered. The Kings ſonne alſo was ſlaine in thoſe conflicts, with diuers thouſands of his men of war. Moreouer, Vitellius hauing ſent money to a certaine kinſman and friend of Artabanus, pretended to corrupt him to make Artabanus away. But Such things as hapned betwixt Vitellius & Artabanus.
Artabanus perceiuing the plot that was intended againſt him, and ſeeing that he could not eſcape, becauſe it was attempted by a great number of the beſt accounted nobles within his court, ceaſed to paſſe any further: and ſeeing himſelfe moſt apparantly inuironed, and thinking that vnder colour of friendſhip hee was fraudulently betrayed, hee thought it better to retire himſelfe into the Prouinces of the higher country, and there to ſaue himſelfe, rather then to put himſelfe in hazzard, and reſort vnto them who had already betrayed and forſaken him. Arriuing ans: and hauing fought againſt them who oppoſed themſelues againſt him, he recouered his eſtate. When Tiberius had tydings hereof, he wrought the meanes to draw Artabanus into friendſhip with him: which when Artabanus had notice of, hee willingly admitted; ſo that Artaba- A league betwixt Vitellius & Artabanus.

nus and Vitellius met together neere Euphrates, and by the meanes of a bridge that was builded Herods banquet in the midſt of Euphrates.
vpon the riuer, they debated the matter together; being each of them attended by their guards. After that they had concluded the peace, Herod the Tetrarch feaſted them in a very magnificent Pauillion, erected in the middeſt of the floud, not without his great coſt. And not long after, Artabanus ſendeth Tiberius his ſon in hoſtage, and a Iew ſeuen cubits high.
Vitellius ſent Darius, Artabanus ſonne in hoſtage to Rome, with diuers preſents; amongſt which there was a man ſeuen cubits high, a Iew borne, who was named Eleazar, who was called a Gy-
F ant by reaſon of his greatneſſe. That done, Vitellius returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Baby-lon. But Herod deſirous to be the firſt who ſhould aduertiſe Cæſar of the receite of theſe hoſtages, ſent expreſſe meſſengers with letters, by which he fully ſatisfied him of all that which had Herod aduertiſeth the Emperour of all things, before Vitellius letters came to his hands.
hapned, omitting nothing for the Conſull to certifie: ſo that after Vitellius letters were brought vnto him, and that Cæſar had already certified him of the true information that Herod had giuen him, Vitellius was ſore troubled: and ſuſpecting leſt he had receiued a greater iniury then the matter made ſhew for; he conceiued in his heart a ſecret deſpight, which continued vntill ſuch time as Tiberius was dead, and Caius obtained the Empire.

The yeere of the world, 3999. after Christs birth, 37.

At that time also died Philip Herods brother, in the twentieth yeere of Tiberius raigne, after he had raigned himselfe for the space of seuen and thirty yeeres, in Trachonitis, Gaulonitis, and Bathanæa. During all the time of his gouernment, he behaued himselfe very peaceably, and farre from businesse. For he made his ordinary abode within his owne dominion. He walked being accompanied with a small number of his chosen seruants, and had that seat carried after him wherein he was accustomed to sit and doe Iustice: and therein sate he, to the end that if any one presented himselfe, and required his assistance, hee might without delay doe him right. For vpon the first motion, the seat was placed in that part wherein the plaintiffe met him; and being seated therein, he examined the cause, punishing those that were guilty, and absoluing the innocent. He died in Iuliade, and was buried in the sepulcher which he himselfe had caused to be built, and his obsequies were performed with great solemnity and maiesty. And for that hee left no heires males behind him, Tiberius seized his estate, which he annexed to the gouernment of Syria, ordaining that the tributes that were gathered in his Tetrarchy, should be kept within the bounds of the same region.

CHAP. VII.

Herod the Tetrarch putteth away Aretas daughter, and marrieth Herodias his brother Herods wife.

MEane-while, Aretas King of Arabia Petræa, and Herod fell at strife, the one with the other, for this cause that ensueth: Herod the Tetrarch married Aretas daughter, with whom he had liued married a very long time. Afterwards taking his iourney towards Rome, he lodged with Herod his halfe brother by the fathers side (for Herod was the sonne of Simons daughter, which Simon was the High Priest) and there being surprized with the loue of Herodias his brothers wife, which was the daughter of Aristobulus their brother, and sister to the Great Agrippa, he was so bold as to offer her some speech of marriage: which when she had accepted, the accords were made betweene them, that at such time as hee should returne from Rome, he should displace her, and lead her away with him, with conditions that he would banish Aretas daughter far from him. After he had ratified those couenants, he made his voyage to Rome, from whence he no sooner returned and performed that for which he went, but his wife (who had some priuy notice of the conuentions which were made betwixt him and Herodias) before he suspected that she knew thereof, required him to send her to the Castle of Macheron, which was the frontire towne betwixt Herods and Aretas countries, without certifying him any wayes of her intent. Herod without suspect easily condescended vnto her request, thinking she was ignorant of his drift: but she long before that time had taken order with the Gouernour of Macheron (which at that time was vnder her fathers gouernment) to prepare all things for her iourney, where being arriued, she speedily posted into Arabia, vnder the conuoy of those Gouernours, who receiued and conducted her the one after the other. As soone as she arriued in her fathers Court, she incontinently certified him of Herods resolution, whence arose the beginning of this discord betwixt them. As soone as therefore they had both of them assembled their armies vpon the confines of the countrey of Gamalite, they fought together vnder the conduct of the two Generals, to whom they had committed their armies. In this battell Herods army was wholly discomfited through the treason that was complotted against him by certaine banished men of Philips Tetrarchy, which were in pay with Herod. Tiberius was certified of all this by those letters which Herod had written vnto him: and being sore displeased with Aretas for his proud attempt, he commanded Vitellius to make warre against him, willing him that if he could take him aliue, he should send him bound vnto him: but if dead, he should send him his head. Such was the commission that Tiberius sent to the Gouernour of Syria.

Herods wife returned into her owne countrey.

Tiberius commandeth Vitellius to make warre against Aretas.

Diuers Iewes were of the opinion, that Herods army was ouerthrowne by the iust vengeance of God, who punished him most iustly, because of the execution which he caused to be done on Iohn surnamed Baptist: For he had done this man to death, who was replenished with all vertue, and who exhorted the Iewes to addict themselues thereto, and to execute iustice towards men, and piety towards God: exhorting them to bee baptized, and telling them that baptisme should at that time be agreeable vnto God, if they should renounce not onely their sinnes, but if to the purity of their bodies they should annexe the cleannes of their soules repurified by iustice. And whereas it came to passe that diuers flocked and followed him to heare his doctrine,

Herod

Herod feared leſt his ſubiects allured by his doctrine and perſwaſions ſhould be drawne to reuolt. For it ſeemed that they would ſubſcribe in all things to his aduice; he therefore thought it better to preuent a miſchiefe by putting him to death, then to expect ſome ſudden commotion, which he might afterwards repent. Vpon this ſuſpicion Herod cauſed him to be bound, and ſent to the caſtle of Macheron, whereof we haue ſpoken heretofore, and there was he put to death. The Iewes were of opinion, that in reuenge of this ſo grieuous a ſin, Herods army, againſt whom God was diſpleaſed, had been ſubiect to their vtter ruine and ouerthrow. But Vitellius being addreſſed to make warre againſt Aretas, gathered together two legions, and all thoſe horſe or foot that he could aſſemble amongſt thoſe Kings, who were the Romans allies, and marching towards Petra he ſtayed at Ptolemais, becauſe he pretended to paſſe by Iudæa. Which when the principall nobles amongſt the Iewes had notice of, they went out to meet him, beſeeching him that he would not paſſe thorow their country, becauſe it was a cuſtome amongſt them not to ſee any images borne, ſuch as he had of diuers colours in his army. Whereunto he condeſcended, and hauing changed his purpoſe, he cauſed his army to march thorow the great Plaine: as for himſelfe he came to Ieruſalem accompanied with Herod the Tetrarch and his friends, to offer ſacrifice to God vpon the next feſtiuall day, where he was moſt magnificently receiued by all the people of the Iewes. There ſoiourned he for the ſpace of three dayes, during which time he depoſed Ionathan from the High Prieſthood, and inueſted Theophilus his brother. The fourth day letters came vnto him that aduertiſed him of Tiberius death, for which cauſe he commanded the oath of fidelity ſhould be miniſtred to the people, in the new Emperour Caius behalfe. He called his army backe alſo, and ſent them to their wintering garriſon, becauſe it was not lawfull for him to proſecute the warre, by reaſon the ſoueraigne eſtate was fallen vnto Caius.

Vitellius repaireth to Ieruſalem, & diſplaceth Ionathan, and preferreth his brother.

Aretas gathereth by auguries, that it was impoſſible for the army to come to Petra.

Herods progeny.

It is ſaid, that Aretas hearing newes of Vitellius expedition or voyage, and after he had taken counſell of the Augurs, ſaid, that the army ſhould not finde engines to pierce as farre as Petra, becauſe the Chieftaine thereof, or he that had the command of the expedition, or he that obeyed his ordinance in conducting the ſame, or he againſt whom the army was conducted, ſhould dye. Vitellius therefore retired himſelfe to Antioch. A yeere before the death of Tiberius, Agrippa Ariſtobulus ſonne came to Rome, to intreate with the Emperour about certaine affaires, according to the power which he ſhould obtaine at his hands. But before I ſpeake any thing hereof, I will relate Herods progeny, both for that it is pertinent to this preſent narration, as alſo that the greatneſſe of Gods prouidence may appeare, to the end that a man may know that neither the number of children, nor any other humane force whatſoeuer it be, can be auaileable without the feare of God; conſidering that within the ſpace of one hundreth yeers or ſomewhat leſſe, it ſo fell out, that all Herods line, which was very populous and fruitfull, was extinguiſhed, a very few excepted. Whereby we are giuen to vnderſtand, what the miſery of mankind is, and learne to moderate our owne ſelues. It is alſo expedient to ſpeake ſomething of Agrippa, who amongſt all other deſerueth admiration, in that being a man wholly drowned in obſcurity and baſe in birth, he was exalted to ſuch greatnes, as no one of thoſe that knew him, would euer haue thought his fortune ſhould haue ſuch ſucceſſe and mightineſſe. And although heretofore I haue ſpoken ſomewhat of this matter, yet it is requiſite that I ſpeake ſomething more expreſly therof in this place. Herod the great had two daughters borne by Mariamme Hircanus daughter. The one of them which was called Salampſo, was married by Herod to Phaſaelus the ſon of Phaſaelus, who was Herods brother. The other called Cypros was eſpouſed to Antipater her Couſin, who was Salomes ſonne, who was Herods ſiſter. Phaſaelus had fiue children by Salampſo: Three ſons, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros, whom Agrippa the ſonne of Ariſtobulus married, and Alexandra was married to Timæus of Cyprus, who was a man of great dignity, and with whom ſhe died without iſſue. Cypros had by Agrippa her husband two ſonnes and three daughters: Bernice, Mariamme, and Druſilla: their two ſonnes were called Agrippa and Druſus. Druſus died very young: but Agrippa was brought by his grandfather amongſt his other brethren, Herod, Ariſtobulus, and Bernice. Theſe were Herods children, ſonne vnto him who was ſurnamed the great; Bernice was Coſtobarus daughter, begotten on Salome Herods ſiſter: Ariſtobulus died leauing his children vnder age, vnder his fathers charge with Alexander his brother, as we haue already recounted. Theſe attaining their full age were in this ſort married: Herod brother to Agrippa was matched with Mariamme Olympias daughter, who was Herod the Great his daughter, and of Ioſeph Herods brother: By her he had his ſonne Ariſtobulus: Ariſtobulus Agrippas third brother married Iotape the daughter of Sampſigeram King of the Emeſenians. They had a daughter which in like ſort was called Iotape, which was deafe.

The yeere of the world, 4001. after Christs birth, 39.

These were the children begotten by Herods three sonnes. But Herodias their sister married Herod the sonne of Herod the Great, whom he begot on Mariamme the daughter of Simon the High Priest, by whom Salome was begotten. After her birth, Herodias in contempt of the lawes of the countrey, married her selfe with Herod her husbands brother begotten of the same father, being separated from him during his life-time, who was Tetrarch of Galilee. His daughter Salome was married to Philip the Tetrarch of Trachonitis Herods sonne: who dying without children, Aristobulus married her, who was Herods sonne and Agrippas brother. They had three sonnes, Herod, Agrippa and Aristobulus. See here the posterity of Phasaelus and Salampson. Antipater by Cypros had a daughter that in like sort was called Cypros, which was married to Alexas Selcius the sonne of Alexas, of whom he begat a daughter called likewise Cypros. As for Herod and Alexander, who (as I said) were Antipaters brothers, they died without issue. Alexander Herods sonne, who was slaine by his father, begat Alexander and Tigranes on the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. Tigranes being King of Armenia died without issue, after hee had beene accused at Rome. Alexander had a sonne called Tigranes, after his brothers name, who was sent by Nero to raigne in Armenia, who had a sonne called Alexander, who married Iotape the daughter of Antiochus King of Comagena. This Alexander by Vespasian was elected King in Lesis a City of Cilicia. As soone as Alexanders posterity began to multiply, they fell from their countrey religion, to follow the customes of the Greekes. All the rest of King Herods daughters died without issue. Hauing after this manner reckoned vp Herods posterity, which continued vntill such time as Agrippa the Great began to raigne; it remaineth at this time to declare what aduentures befell this Agrippa, and how he escaping his dangers, obtained at last so great power and dignity.

CHAP. VIII.

AGRIPPAS voyage to TIBERIVS, where he is accused and shut in prison, and is deliuered after TIBERIVS death, by CAIVS his successor.

Agrippa liuing at Rome, through his lauish liberality groweth into necessity.

SOME little time before the death of King Herod, Agrippa conuersing at Rome, grew into great familiarity and acquaintance with Drusus, Tiberius the Emperours sonne, and was beloued by Antonia the wife of Drusus the elder; by the meanes of his mother Berenice, whom Antonia held in great estimation, and to whom shee had recommended her sonne. And whereas by nature he was of a liberall and high spirit, as long as his mother liued, hee would not discouer his intent, lest he should prouoke her displeasure against him. But incontinently after Berenice was dead, and hee became Lord of himselfe, partly by his daily and bountifull entertainment and liuing, partly by his immoderate liberalities, but especially by his lauish prodigality towards Cæsars freemen, whose fauour hee hunted after, hee was brought into extreme pouerty, and could no more liue at Rome; the rather for that Tiberius hauing lost his sonne, forbad his friends to come into his sight, for feare lest their presence should refresh and encrease the sorrow hee conceiued for the losse of his sonne. For these causes hee returned backe into Iudæa, hauing but badly ordered his estate, spent his money, and left himselfe no meanes to satisfie his importunate and many creditours. For which cause incertaine how to dispose himselfe, and ashamed of his present estate, he withdrew himselfe into a Castle called Malatha in Idumæa, bethinking himselfe after some sort to cut off his miserable dayes. Which purpose of his, when Cypros his wife perceiued, shee endeauoured by all meanes to preuent his resolution: shee wrote also to his sister Herodias, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, certifying her both what Agrippa had decreed, as also by what necessity he was enforced thereunto: and shee exhorted her, that in regard of affinity shee would assist him, and imitate her in this, who, as much as in her lay, relieued his misery, although her fortunes were farre weaker then hers. Being therefore sent for by his sister and wife, hee was commanded to dwell in Tiberias, and had a certaine summe of money assigned him for his maintenance, and for his greater honour was appointed Magistrate of that City. Yet did not Herod continue long time in that minde, although by the meanes he had giuen him, hee had not satisfied his kinsmans necessities. For being in the City of Tyre in a certaine company, where hee dranke immoderately, Agrippa esteemed it for an extreme iniury, that Herod had vpbraided him with his pouerty, and hit him in the teeth that hee maintained him at his charge. For which cause he withdrew himselfe to Flaccus, who had sometimes beene Consul Agrippa dwelleth at Tiberias.

Herod tanteth Agrippa with his pouerty.

A ſul at Rome, and for the preſent was Preſident of Syria, with whom at Rome he had fallen into familiarity, who entertained by him liued with him, who long before that time had entertained Ariſtobulus; who though Agrippas brother, yet was he his enemy; yet notwithſtanding this diſſenſion between them, Flaccus entertained them both with equall fauour. But Ariſtobulus remitted nothing of his hatred hee bare his brother, neither euer reſted hee before he had drawn Flaccus into diſlike with his brother, vpon this occaſion: The inhabitants of Damaſco, contending with the Sidonians about their demaines, and being to debate their cauſe before Flaccus; knowing what intereſt Agrippa had in him, they beſought him that he would further their cauſe, promiſing him a great ſumme of money: whereupon he addreſſed himſelfe in what he could to further thoſe of Damaſco. But Ariſtobulus, who had an inkling of this concluſion and promiſe, accuſed his brother to Flaccus: and after inquiſition was made, and hee found guilty of the fact, Agrippa grew out of the Preſidents fauour, and falling againe into extreme pouerty, he came to Ptolemais; and for that he had no meaus of maintenance, he determined to ſaile into Italy. And for that he wanted money, he commanded Marſyas his free-man, that by all means whatſoeuer, he ſhould ſeek to take vp money vpon intereſt. He ſpake vnto Protus (who was Agrippas mothers free-man, who by the teſtament of his deceaſed Miſtris was left vnto Antonias protection) that vpon his Maſters bill and promiſe, he would lend him ſome money. But hee alleaging that Agrippa before that time ought him money, extorted from Marſyas a bill of his hand, for twenty thouſand Attique drachmes, deducting out of that ſum two thouſand and fiue hundreth, which Marſyas took for himſelfe: which he might the more eaſily do, for that Agrippa could not otherwiſe chuſe. Hauing therefore receiued this money, hee went to Anthedon, where getting ſhipping he prepared himſelfe for the iourney.

Agrippa retireth himſelfe to Flaccus.

But when Herennius Capito, who was treaſurer of Iamnia, vnderſtood of his being there, hee ſent his ſouldiers vnto him, to exact three hundreth thouſand ſiluer drachmes at his hands, for which he ſtood indebted to Cæſars Treaſurer during his being at Rome, by which means he was enforced to ſtay. Whereupon he made a ſhew that he would obey their demand; but as ſoone as it was night, hee cauſed the cables of the ſhip to be cut, and caſt off, and ſailed to Alexandria: there requeſted he Alexãder Alabarcha to lend him two hundreth thouſand drachmes in ſiluer. But he proteſted that he would truſt him with nothing. But admiring Cypros his wiues conſtant B loue towards her husband, and her many other vertues, he vpon her promiſe accorded to doe him kindneſſe: whereupon in preſent money hee payed him fiue talents in Alexandria, and promiſed to deliuer him the reſt of the money at Puteol, fearing Agrippas vnthriftineſſe. Thus Cypros hauing furniſhed her husband for his iourney into Italy, returned her ſelfe and her children into Iudæa by land. But Agrippa, as ſoone as he arriued at Puteol, wrote vnto Tiberius Cæſar, who liued at Capreas, ſignifying vnto him that hee came to doe his duty, beſeeching him that hee would grant him free and fauourable acceſſe. Tiberius with all expedition returned him a very kinde anſwere, certifying him that he would be very glad to ſee him ſafely arriued in Capreas. In a word, as ſoone as hee was arriued, Cæſar expreſſed and made it knowne, that his affection was anſwerable to his letters, and both embraced him and lodged him. The next day Cæſar receiued letters from Herennius Capito, who aduertized him that Agrippa ought three hundreth thouſand drachmes of ſiluer, which he borrowed and paid not at the time prefixed, and that at ſuch time as the appointed time of payment was come, he was fled out of the countrey, & place of his procuration, and by this occaſion had depriued him of the meanes to conſtraine him to make ſatisfaction. When Cæſar had read the letters, he was ſore diſpleaſed, & commanded thoſe of his chamber, that they ſhould not admit Agrippa to his preſence, vntill ſuch time as hee had diſcharged that debt.

Agrippa arriueth at Puteol & is admitted to Cæſars preſence.

But he, nothing diſmaied at Cæſars diſpleaſure, required Antonia, Germanicus and Claudius mother, who was afterwards Emperour, to lend him the ſumme of three hundreth thouſand drachmes, to the end he might not loſe Cæſars friendſhip. Who remembring her Berenice Agrippas mother, and with what familiarity they had conuerſed together, and how Agrippa likewiſe had been brought vp with Claudius her ſonne, lent him that money: Whereupon he paying the debt, without any contradiction enioyed the Princes fauour, & was ſo reconciled to Cæſar, that he committed his nephew to Agrippas charge, commanding him to attend him alwaies, whitherſoeuer he went. Being by this benefit bound and tyed to Antonia, he began to reuerence her nephew Caius, who was gracious in all mens eyes, and honoured in memory of his parents. At that time by chance there was one Allius a Samaritane, Cæſars free-man, of whom hee borrowed ten hundreth thouſand drachmes of ſiluer, and paied Antonia her due, and kept the reſt the more honourably to attend and wait on Caius. By whom being entertained with moſt inward familiarity, it hapned one day that riding in the ſame Coach with him, Agrippa wiſht (for they two were alone) that Tiberius might ſhortly ſurrender the kingdom and Empire vnto Caius, who was each way more worthy then he. Theſe words of his were ouerheard by the Coachman called Eutychus, who was Agrippas freeman, who for that time ſpake not a word therof. But being afterwards accuſed for ſtealing Agrippas garment (as he indeed had done) and brought backe againe after he had fled away to Piſo (who was the Prefect of the city) he asked him why he fled: who anſwered, that he had certaine ſecrets which he deſired to reueale vnto Cæſar, that appertained to his profit and ſafety: for which cauſe he was ſent by him in bonds to Capreas. Tiberius, according to his dilatory manner, wherein no King or tyrant euer equalled him, held him priſoner. For neither did he preſently admit any Embaſſadours, neither ſent he ſucceſſors to thoſe, who were gouernours, and Prefects of his prouinces, when the former were dead; and no leſſe negligent was he in yeelding audience to his priſoners. But when his friends at any time queſtioned with him, why he vſed theſe accuſtomed delayes; he anſwered them, that he deferred the embaſſadors after that ſort, for feare leſt if he ſhould ſpeedily diſpatch them, they ſhould inſtantly returne with new, whereby it ſhould come to paſſe, that hee ſhould be continually troubled in entertaining and diſmiſſing them.

For what cauſe Tiberius changed not his gouernors

And as touching his offices, he left them in their hands, to whom he had committed them, in regard of his ſubiects welfare. For naturally all magiſtracy is ſubiect to auarice: but in eſpeciall ſtrangers induce thoſe, who exerciſe the ſame to gather, and ingroſſe the more inſtantly, when as the time of their authority is ſhort and of ſmall aſſurance; whereas if they ſhould continue in the ſame for a long time, in regard of the gaine they had made, and the much profits they had raiſed, they would be afterwards leſſe greedy to extort further. Now if he ſhould ſend others to ſucceed them on a ſudden, it were impoſſible for him to content them, notwithſtanding their many bribes: whereas in giuing them time to fill their purſes, when they had gotten well, they would abate the furious deſire of lucre which they affected before. And to this purpoſe he told them an example of a poore man that was a Lazar, to whoſe wounds a great number of flies aſſembled themſelues, and couered the ſame: at ſight wherof ſome by fortune arriuing there, and hauing compaſſion of his miſery, and ſuppoſing that the cauſe why he repulſed them not, proceeded from his diſability, approched neere to help him: but he required them to let him alone. Whereupon they demanding the cauſe wherfore he that was hurt refuſed to be diliuered from ſo irkſome an euill, he anſwered them, for that they ſhould do him more wrong, if thoſe flies were driuen away; for that being already full of blood, they prick me not (ſaid he) neither ſuck me ſo earneſtly, but giue me ſome eaſe; whereas if new ſhould alight on my wound which were hungry, and ſhould ſeize my fleſh in that deſperate eſtate that I am, they would procure my death. For theſe cauſes he ſaid; that ſeeing his ſubiects already conſumed by ſo many exactions, he thought it a good policy in him, and a better prouiſion for them, not to ſend them new gouernours continually, who might after the manner of flies ſucke them to the quick, eſpecially if to their innated couetouſnes hee ſhould annex the feare of their ſudden diſplacing. Now to approue that to be true which I haue declared of Tiberius diſpoſition, this action of his may ſuffice to iuſtifie me. For hauing beene Emperour for the ſpace of twenty two yeeres, all thoſe gouernours which he ſent into Iury were two, namely Gratus and Pilate his ſucceſſor; neither demeaned he himſelfe otherwiſe towards the reſt of his ſubiects of the Empire.

Why Cæſar would not giue audience to his priſoner.

Agrippa ſolliciteth Antonia to bring Eutychus to his anſwere.

Antonia very much honoured by Tiberius.

Antonia diſcouereth Seianus conſpiracy to Cæſar.

And as touching his priſoners, the reaſon why hee delayed ſo much to giue them audience, was, to the end that they who had been condemned to death, ſhould not ſpeedily be deliuered from thoſe torments, wherewith he threatned them, and which they had deſerued by their wickednes. For whilſt he kept them in that paine, their miſ-hap increaſed the more. For this cauſe Eutychus could not obtaine audience at his hands, but was long time detained priſoner. Afterwards in proceſſe of time, Tiberius tranſported himſelfe from Capreas to Tuſculanum, which was diſtant from Rome ſome hundreth furlongs. There did Agrippa ſollicite Antonia, to cauſe Eutychus to be called to his anſwer, as touching the accuſation which he pretended againſt him. Now Antonia was in great fauour with Tiberius, both in regard of the affinity that was between them (in that ſhe was Druſus wife, who was Tiberius brother) as in reſpect of her modeſty. For ſhe being young continued in her widowhood, and would not marry with any other, notwithſtanding Auguſtus importuned her to wed; but liued alwaies in honour without blame. Beſides that, ſhee had done Tiberius a great pleaſure: for at ſuch time as Seianus his friend, and a man in great account in thoſe daies (by reaſon he had the gouernment of the army) practiſed a conſpiracy racy against him, whereunto diuers of the Senate, and of his freemen, and his men of warre likewise were accessary: yet brought she all their intents to nothing. This attempt had taken a great head, and Seianus had finished his purpose, had not Antonia vsed more aduised courage, then Seianus did in executing his treason. For hauing discouered the danger that threatned Tiberius, she wrote and sent her expresse letters by Pallas one of her rrusty seruants vnto him to Capreas, certifying him in particular the whole processe of the conspiracy. Cæsar hauing true vnderstanding thereof, caused Seianus and his confederats to be executed. Although therefore that before that time he honored Antonia greatly, yet did hee afterwards honour her farre more, in such sort as he trusted her in al things. When as therfore she entreated him to giue Eutychus audience: Tiberius answered, If, said he, Eutychus hath falsely obiected any thing against Agrippa, it sufficeth that he endure that punishment which I haue enioyned him. But if in the torture hee maintaine that which he hath spoken to be true, it is to be feared lest Agrippa intending to punish his freeman, do rather heap the punishment vpon his owne head. When Antonia had reported this answere of his to Agrippa, hee did the more instantly sollicite her, requiring her that the matter might be brought to tryall. And for that Agrippa ceased not to importune her, Antonia took the occasion, which was this: Tiberius being after dinner time carryed in his litter, and hauing Caius and Agrippa before him, she walking foot by foot by the litter, besought him to call Eutychus to his tryall: whereunto he replyed: The gods (said he) know, that that which I do, I do it not of mine own wil, but for the necessity I am pressed with vpon your request: & hauing spoken thus, he commanded Macron Seianus successour to bring Eutychus before him: which was performed with al expedition? Whereupon Tiberius asked him what he had to say against him, who had enfranchised him? My soueraigne (said he) Caius that is here present, and Agrippa rode one day together in the same Coach, and I sate at their feet. After diuers discourses held between them, Agrippa began to speake after this manner vnto Caius; O, said he, would God the day were come wherein the old man departing out of this world, would make you gouernour thereof. For his son Tiberius would be no hindrance vnto you, for him might you make away. Then should the world be happy, and I likewise haue my share in the felicity. Tiberius esteeming this his accusation to be true, and hauing of long time conceiued a grudge against Agrippa, for that notwithstanding he had commanded him to honor Tiberius, who was his nephew, & Drusus son; Agrippa had giuen small regard to his commandement, and had not honored him, but was wholly addicted vnto Caius. For which cause said he to Macron, bind me this fellow. He scarcely vnderstanding that which hee spake, and no waies suspecting that he should giue that commandement in respect of Agrippa, deferred the performance vntil such time as hee might more exactly vnderstand his mind. When as therefore Cæsar turned into the Hippodrome, and by chance met with Agrippa in the teeth: This is he (said he) Macron, whom I haue commanded to be bound, & demanding of him once more by whom he spake: It is Agrippa, said he. Then had Agrippa recourse to submissiue and humble prayers, refreshing the memory of his sonne with whom he had been brought vp, & alledging the education he had vsed towards his nephew Tiberius: but he preuailed nothing, but was led away bound in those purple ornaments which he then wore.

Agrippa vrgeth Eutychus triall, and for certaine speeches of his is cast into bonds.

At that time it was very hot weather, and being in distresse of wine, he was extremely thirsty and distressed, yea more then became one of his quality. Whereupon espying Thaumastus one of Caius seruants, who carried water in a pitcher; he required him to giue him drink: which when he had willingly bestowed on him, he dranke, and afterwards said vnto him, This seruice thou hast done me in giuing me drink, shall do thee good one day. For as soone as I shall escape out of these bonds, it shall not be long before I obtaine thy liberty at Caius hands, for that thou hast not neglected to doe mee seruice in this my imprisonment, as thou hast beforetime done mee whilest I was in my prosperity and dignity: Neither deceiued hee the mans expectation of his promise, but rewarded and gratified him. For afterwards, when he had obtaind the Kingdom, he begged Thaumastus liberty at Caius hands, and made him superintendent of his affaires, and after his decease he gaue order that he should serue in the same place, with his sonne Agrippa and his daughter Berenice; so that he died very old, and much honored. But this happened afterward. But at that time Agrippa stood before the place bound with other companions, who were likewise in bonds: and through the griefe he conceiued, he leaned against a certaine tree, on which there sate an Owle. One of those prisoners, who was by nation a German, beholding that bird, asked the soldier that was fettred with him, who he was that was apparelled in purple: and vnderstanding that his name was Agrippa, and that he was a Iew, and one of the nobility of that nation, he required the souldier, who to the end to guard him was chained with him, to suffer him to draw draw neer vnto Agrippa, and to haue a little conference with him, for that he had a great desire to aske him of certain things concerning the customes of his country. Which when he had obtained, and hauing got neer him, he certified him by an interpreter of that which followeth: Yong man (said he) the sudden change that hath befallen thee at this present, afflicteth and oppresseth thee with great and grieuous torment, neither wilt thou easily beleeue that thou shalt » escape from thy misery: yet so doth the diuine prouidence dispose all things, that thou shalt » shortly be deliuered. Know therfore, and I sweare vnto thee by the gods both those of mine an» cestors, and those also, who haue residence and presidence in this place, and who haue procured vs this iron chaine, that I will tell thee all, not to yeeld thee pleasure by my vaine discourse, or to entertaine thee with fruitlesse consolation; knowing well that when these predictions shall happen to faile, they will breed thee more sorrow, then if thou hadst neuer heard of them. But I haue thought it good, yea although it were with mine owne danger, to declare vnto thee the predictions of the gods. It cannot otherwise be, but that shortly thou shalt bee deliuered from these bonds, and shalt be aduanced to great honour and power; so that those, who at this day » haue compassion of thy calamity, shall beare enuy to thy glory, and thou shalt depart this life in » great felicity, & shalt leaue thy children mighty possessions. But beare this in thy remembrance, » that when thou shalt see this bird once more, thou must needly die within fiue daies after. These » are those things which the gods thinke meet to foretell thee by this bird. As for my selfe, I haue » supposed that I should do thee wrong, if I should conceale this prediction from thee, hauing the » foreknowledge therof. I haue therfore thought good to impart this ioy vnto thee, whereby tho-» row hope of thy future profit, thou maiest more easily endure thy present misfortune: for which » cause I beseech thee, that as soon as thou shalt be partaker of this thy felicity, thou wilt endeuor » thy selfe to deliuer vs also from these aduersities.

A certaine German foretelleth Agrippa of his happy fortunes to come, and the manner of his death.

This presage of the German seemed so ridiculous to Agrippa, as it afterwards deserued most mighty admiration. But Antonia being sore grieued at the yong mans calamity, thought it not onely a difficult matter for her to entreat Tiberius for him, but altogether vnprofitable in regard she should be repulsed: yet wrought she so much with Macron, that hee was committed to the custody of such souldiers, who were of more reconciled behauiour, and had a Centurion appointed to keep him, that suffered him to vse his daily bathings, and gaue his friends and seruants leaue to visit him, by whose seruice and kindnesse his necessities might bee relieued. His friend Silas also was admitted to speake with him, and amongst his free-men Marsyas and Stichus, who brought him in such meates as hee was delighted withall, and couerings vnder colour to sell them: which by the permission of the souldiers, who had no lesse direction from Macron, they spred by night for him to take his rest vpon. See here the estate wherein Agrippa liued in prison for the space of six moneths. But Tiberius being returned to Capreas, beganne at first to be attainted with a certaine lingring disease, and for that his sickenesse increased more and more, hee began to conceiue a sinister hope of himselfe, and commanded Euodus, whom hee most honoured amongst all his free-men, to bring him his sonnes, because hee intended to talke with them before he died. But the sooth is, that he had not any children of his own, but had adopted them. For Drusus, who was his only childe, was already dead, and had left behinde him a sonne called Tiberius, surnamed Gemellus. Hee had Caius also, his brother Germanicus sonne, who was in the flower of his age, and had trauailed very diligently in good disciplines. To him also the people ascribed very much, in remembrance of the vertues of his deceased father; and as touching himselfe, he was of a sweet conuersation, and so modest, that he was familiar and conuersant with all men. Whereby it came to passe, that not onely the people, but the Senate also held him in great estimation, as also all the subiects in euery seuerall Prouince. For they that spake with him, were drawne partly by his affability, partly by the fidelity they saw in him: so that when he was dead, all of them mourned, not counterfeitly lamenting his losse, but with vnfained sorrow; for that there was not any one that supposed not his death to be euery mans particular losse. He therfore demeaned himselfe so modestly towards all men, that his sonne after his death was highly aduanced thereby. For among the rest the men of warre made their reckoning, that although it should cost them their liues to get him the Empire, they would not refuse the hazard.

After that Tiberius had charged Euodus to bring him the two young men the next morrow by breake of day, he besought the gods of that place to giue him an euident signe whereby hee might know who should succeed him: For although he desired to leaue the Empire to his sons son; yet made he more account of that which God should make manifest vnto him. He therefore

A fore conceiued a preſage, that he, who the next day ſhould enter firſt to ſalute him, it ſhould be he, who in the Empire ſhould neceſſarily ſucceed him. And hauing ſettled this thing in his fantaſie, he ſent vnto his little ſonnes Maſter, charging him to bring him vnto him by breake of day, ſuppoſing that God had ordained that the Empire ſhould be his: but the matter fell out quite contrary to his expectation. For being in this thought, hee commanded Euodus, that as ſoone as he might, and as ſoone as the day ſhould ariſe, hee ſhould ſuffer him of the two young Princes to enter in vnto him, who ſhould arriue the firſt. Hee walking out, met with Caius before the chamber doore (for Tiberius was not there, who being ignorant of that which his grandfather thought, was buſie about his breakefaſt) and ſaid vnto him, that the Emperour his father B called for him, and withall ſuffered him to enter. When Tiberius beheld Caius, he ſuddenly began to conſider vpon the power of God, who depriued him of the meanes to diſpoſe of the Empire, according as he had determined with himſelfe, for that it lay not in his power: and hee lamented greatly, not ſo much for that he ſaw his deliberation could not be brought to effect, as for that his ſonne Tiberius was diſtated of the Romane Empire; and beſides that, was in danger of his life. For he made reckoning that they, who were more ſtronger then he, would not ſuffer him to conuerſe among them, and that allſance could not aſſure him his life: for ſometimes for feare, and otherwhiles for hatred, ſome one would accuſe him, that he went about and buſily ſought to ſeize the Empire; or that hee had complotted ſome ſtratagem, leſt hee ſhould loſe the Empire with his life. In a word, Tiberius was very much addicted to Aſtrologicall predictions C and natiuities; ſo that the greater part of thoſe things which he executed in all his life-time, was ordered thereby.

Tiberius addicted to the Mathematicks.

He ſeeing Galba one day comming towards him, ſpake this of him to certaine of his familiars: Behold the man that ſhall be one day honoured with the Romane Empire. And amongſt all the Emperors, he gaue greateſt credit to diuination, for that in certaine things he had found the coniectures correſpondent to truth. But at that time he was grieuouſly diſquieted, by reaſon of the misfortune that had hapned; yea he was in ſuch ſort grieued, as if his grandchild had bin already loſt, and he blamed himſelfe for that he had ſought theſe preſages: for that he might haue dyed without falling into that diſaſter, in being ignorant of that which was to come: whereas now he ſhould die in the knowledge of their mis-haps whom he loued moſt intirely. Being thus trou- D bled to ſee that the ſoueraigntie of the Empire ſhould contrary to his intention fall into their hands, who by his will ſhould not enioy the ſame; although it were with hearts griefe and contrary to his will, yet ſpake he to Caius after this manner which enſueth: My ſonne, although Tiberius be more neerely allied vnto me then you are; yet notwithſtanding both by mine owne aduice, as alſo by the will of the immortall Gods, I commit vnto your hands the Empire of the Romanes. I require you therefore that when you ſhall enioy the ſame, you forget not the good will I haue borne towards you, who haue eſtabliſhed you in ſo high and worthy a dignity; and charge you likewiſe that you forget not your Couſin Tiberius; but knowing that by the will of the gods I am he, who after them am the author of ſo many goods, which haue befalne you, you returne me the like good will and affection: and that you likewiſe take care of Tiberius, by rea- E ſon of your mutuall alliance: for you ought to know that Tiberius ſerueth you for a bulwarke to maintaine your Empire, and your owne life; and if he die, it will be the beginning of your mis-hap. For it is a perilous matter for thoſe, who are raiſed to high dignities, to be ſole and without allies. Furthermore, the gods doe neuer leaue them vnpuniſhed, who attempt or act any thing againſt the lawes of conſanguinitie. Theſe were the laſt words which Tiberius ſpake to Caius, who promiſed him to performe all that which he required, notwithſtanding he meant nothing leſſe. For incontinently after he was inſtalled in the Empire, he cauſed Tiberius to be made away, bethinking him of thoſe diuinations: as alſo the ſame Caius dyed anon after by a conſpiracy that was practiſed againſt him. When that Tiberius had declared Caius his ſucceſſour in the Empire, he liued not many dayes after, and dyed after he had gouerned twentie two yeeres, F fiue moneths, and three daies. Thus Caius was the fourth Emperour.

The Romanes hauing intelligence of Tiberius death, greatly reioyced at the good newes: yet durſt they not aſſure themſelues: and though of long time they would haue willingly redeemed the truth of theſe reports with a good ſumme of money; yet feared they leſt the newes ſhould be falſe, and leſt if they ſhewed themſelues too diligent in expreſſing their ſignes of ioy, they ſhould afterwards be accuſed for it, and loſe their liues thereby. For only Tiberius had done much miſchiefe to the noble families in Rome, being of himſelfe a man cholericke, implacable towards all men without any occaſion, hauing a naturall inclination ſo cruell, that the eaſieſt paine where-whereunto he adiudged thoſe whom he condemned, was death: notwithſtanding therefore that each man tooke pleaſure to heare the newes, yet did each one conceale it, vntill ſuch time as they might bee more fully aſſured, through the feare of thoſe miſeries they foreſaw, if the matter ſhould fall out otherwaies. But Marſyas Agrippas freeman, hauing certaine notice of Tiberius death, ranne ſpeedily to comfort his Maſter Agrippa, with theſe good newes, and meeting with him as he came out of the Bath, he made a ſigne vnto him, and told him, in the Hebrew tongue, the Lyon was dead. Agrippa conceiuing that which he meant, was rauiſhed with ioy, and ſaid vnto him: I will requite thee for all thoſe benefits I haue receiued at thy hands, and eſpecially for this good newes, prouided that it prooue true. The Centurion, who had the keeping of Agrippa, conſidering what expedition Marſyas had vſed in running, and the pleaſure that Agrippa had conceiued in his report, he began to ſuſpect ſome alteration, and asked them what had hapned: and whereas they delayed to giue him an anſwer, he importuned him the more. Whereupon Agrippa told him plainely what he had heard, in that he had growne already into inward familiarity with him. The Centurion reioyced at his newes, as well as Agrippa, hoping to ſpeed the better thereby, and made Agrippa good cheere: but whileſt they were in the midſt of their banquetting, and drunke freely; there came one vnto them, who told them that Tiberius was aliue, and that within few daies he would come to Rome. The Centurion troubled with this newes, for that hee had committed a capitall crime in eating in the company of a priſoner, vpon the newes of Cæſars death, and by reioycing with him, he draue Agrippa out of the place where hee ſate, and reproachfully ſaid vnto him: Thinkeſt thou (ſaid he) that I know not how falſely thou ſpreadeſt rumor of Cæſars death? yes, be aſſured thou ſhalt anſwer thy lie with the loſſe of thy head. This ſaid, he cauſed Agrippa to be bound, whom before-time he had ſuffered to goe at libertie; and ſhut him vp in more cloſe priſon, then he had beene before: ſo that Agrippa was all that night long in this extreme miſery. The next day the rumour was ſpred thorow the whole Citie, that confirmed Tiberius death, and at that time euery one boldly proteſted it. There were ſome alſo, who offered ſacrifices for this cauſe, and there came letters alſo from Caius, which were addreſſed to the Senate, by which he certified them that Tiberius was dead, and how the Empire was committed to his hands. He wrote another alſo to Piſo, who had the guard of the Citie, containing the like report: and beſides that commanding him to transferre Agrippa from the company of thoſe ſouldiers, by whom he was kept, to the ſame place where he was lodged before; ſo that from that time forwards, he waxed confident. For although he was as yet a priſoner, yet liued he at his owne diſcretion. Caius arriuing in Rome, brought with him Tiberius body, which he burned moſt magnificently, according to the cuſtome of the countrey. And although he were very willing to deliuer Agrippa the ſame day; yet was he diſſwaded from the ſame by Antonia, not for any ill will ſhee bare the priſoner, but in regard of Caius honour, leſt thereby he ſhould ſhew himſelfe to be glad of Tiberius death, in ſetting him at libertie ſo ſpeedily, whom he had committed to priſon. When as therefore ſome few daies were ouer-paſt, he ſent for him to his houſe, and cauſed him to be powld, and his garments changed, and that done, he ſet a Diadem vpon his head, and made him King of Philips Tetrarchy, to which he annexed Lyſanias Tetrarchy, and changed his chaine of yron, into a chaine of gold of the ſame weight, and ſent Marullus into Iudæa to gouerne there. The ſecond yeere of Caius raigne, Agrippa asked licence to repaire into Iudæa, to the intent he might diſpoſe of his kingdome, purpoſing to returne againe at ſuch time as he had diſpatched thoſe affaires. Which when the Emperour had granted him, he came into Iudæa, and was ſeene and ſaluted for a King beyond all mens expectation, ſeruing thereby for a moſt notable example vnto men, to expreſſe vnto them how great the power of deſtiny is in humane affaires, conſidering the poore eſtate wherein he had beene before, and the happineſſe which he enioyed at that time. Some tearmed him happy, in that he reſolutely followed his hopes, otherſome could ſcarcely beleeue that he was in this ſort aduanced.

HEROD the Tetrarch baniſhed.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 14. al. chap. 16.

Herodias Agrippas ſiſter enuyeth her brothers happineſſe, and inciteth her husband to ſeeke a kingdome.

HErodias Agrippas ſiſter was married to Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa. Shee enuied her brother to ſee him raiſed to ſo great authoritie, and to farre greater dignitie then her husband enioyed. For which cauſe ſhee was diſpleaſed, that her brother, who fled out of his countrey in that he wanted meanes to pay his debts, was returned in great honour and

A and with greater ſubſtance. This charge endured ſhe with great hearts griefe, eſpecially, at ſuch time as ſhe ſaw him apparelled like a King, and inuironed with a great multitude of people, and impoſſible was it for her to hide the bitternes of her griefe; for which cauſe ſhe incited her husband and perſwaded him to make a voyage to Rome, & to purchaſe as much as he poſſeſſed. For ſaid ſhe, I cannot endure to liue, if Agrippa Ariſtobulus ſon condemned to death by the ſentence of his own father (ſo poore & indigent, that to redreſſe his neceſſities wherwith he was daily preſſed by his creditors, he was cõſtrained at laſt to flie to Rome) ſhould return with ſuch titles of a king, & that her husband who was a kings ſon, & was called to the kingdom by his father, ſhould liue obſcure, and paſſe his life like a priuate man: Husband (ſaid ſhe) if heretofore it hath bin no prejudice to thee to liue in leſſe dignity, then erſt thy father hath done; now at leaſtwiſe deſire that due honour which belongeth to thy family: neither thinke it to be ſufferable to ſubſcribe to him ineſtimatiõ, who in times paſt hath bin maintained by thy bounty. Neither ſuffer it to be thoght (through thine owne ſlouth) that he in his neceſſitie had better meanes and induſtry to obtaine an ample fortune, then you amidſt your mightie abundance; as if it redounded not to thy ſhame to be thought inferior to him at this time, who not long ſince, except by thy mercy, had no meanes to liue. Let vs therefore haſtily repaire vnto Rome, and neither ſpare gold, ſiluer, or any other expence, for that it auaileth vs not ſo much to keep the ſame, as to imploy the ſame in the purchaſe of a kingdome. But Herod diſſwaded her as much as he might, for that he contented himſelfe to liue in quiet, and ſuſpected the confuſion that was at Rome, which he endeuoured as much as in him lay, to lay open to Herodias. But the more negligent ſhe ſaw him, the more inſtantly incited ſhe him to ſeeke out the kingdome, and neuer gaue ſhe him ouer, vntill ſhe had conformed him to her deſire: Whereunto he the rather liſtned, in that ſhe might not be drawne from her reſolution. Hauing therefore furniſhed himſelfe after the moſt magnificent manner, and ſpared no coſt, he repaired to Rome, and led Herodias his wife with him. Agrippa ſmelling their intent and the preparation they made, made his prouiſion likewiſe. And hauing notice that they were put to ſea, he ſent Fortunatus one of his freemen to Rome, with Preſents to the Emperour, and certaine letters againſt Herod, with commiſſion to certifie Caius of euery particular, according as the occaſion ſhould ſerue. He embarking himſelfe after Herod, had a happy paſſage, and was onely preuented by him, but for the ſpace that Herod preſented himſelfe to Caius: for he incontinently followed him, and deliuered his letters. For they arriued at one time at Puteol, and found Caius at Baia, a village of Campania, diſtant from Puteol ſome fiue ſtades, inriched with moſt royall and ſumptuous palaces, for that euery Emperor enforced himſelfe to exceed the honor of his predeceſſour, by reaſon of the hot baths that naturally iſſued out of the earth, ſeruing both for the health of the body, and recreation of the ſpirits. Whilſt Caius talked with Herod in that he viſited him firſt, he receiued Agrippas letters, containing Herods accuſations, for they accuſed him of a conſpiracy made and complotted betwixt him and Seianus, ſince the beginning of Tiberius Empire: And how for the preſent he fauoured Artabanus King of the Parthians to the preiudice of the Emperour Caius: of this, the preparations Herod had ſtored vp in his Arcenals, gaue euident teſtimony, which were ſufficient to arme ſeuenty thouſand men of warre. Caius was ſore moued with theſe informations, and asked Herod if that which was informed him touching his warlike preparation, was true. He vnable to contradict the ſame in any thing, for feare he ſhould be conuicted of falſhood, auowed no leſſe. Whereupon Caius ſuppoſing the accuſation of his reuolt to be ſufficiently approued, depriued him of his Tetrarchy, and annexed it to Agrippas kingdom; beſtowing Herods ſubſtance alſo vpon him. He baniſhed him likewiſe for euer, and confined him in the Citie of Lions in France: and vnderſtanding that Herodias was Agrippas ſiſter, he gaue her all that which in right appertained vnto her. And ſuppoſing that ſhe would not willingly accompany her husband in that his calamitie, he told her that her brother ſhould be her warrant. But ſhee gaue him this reply: Mightie Emperour, you ſpeake magnificently, and as it well beſeemeth ſo great a Maieſtie, but there is a cauſe that hindreth me from partaking the benefit of that bountie, which you intend towards mee, which is the affection that I beare vnto my husband, whom if I ſhould forſake in this his miſery, it would very ill beſeeme mee, in that I haue bin a partner with him in his felicitie. Caius diſpleaſed with this her reſolute anſwer, baniſhed her likewiſe with her husband, and gaue the confiſcation of her eſtate alſo to Agrippa. God did after this manner puniſh Herodias, in regard of that enuy which ſhe had conceiued againſt her brother; and plagued Herod, in that he had ſo lightly liſtned to the fooliſh perſwaſions of a woman. But Caius gouerned the Empire, the firſt and ſecond yeere of his raigne, with moſt noble directions, behauing himſelfe graciouſly towards all men, whereby hee obtained the good liking of the Romanes, Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 15. al. chap. 17. Appion Prince of the Alexandrians Embaſſage, accuſeth the Iewes becauſe they aſcribed not diuinitie to Cæſar.

AND whereas there aroſe a ſedition betwixt the Iewes and Grecians, that inhabited Alexandria, three choſen Embaſſadours on either ſide were ſent vnto Caius. One of theſe Embaſſadours of Alexandria was Appion, who charged the Iewes with many outrages, and amongſt other things he alleadged that they made no reckoning of honouring Cæſar: And that whereas all other ſubiects of the Romane Empire had erected altars and temples in honour of Caius, & in all other things had receiued him as a God, the Iewes ſuppoſed it to be a diſhonor for them to honour his ſtatues, or ſweare by his name. After that Appion had vrged many things and inueyed grieuouſly againſt the Iewes, hoping that Caius would be prouoked againſt them, as in all likelihood and appearance it ſhould haue falne out, Philo, the chiefeſt among the Embaſſadors of the Iewes, a man of a famous memory, and brother to Alexander Alabarcha, being experienced in Philoſophy, enforced himſelfe to anſwer thoſe accuſations which were vrged againſt the Iewes. But Caius commanded him ſilence, and willed him inſtantly to withdraw himſelfe; and was ſo ſore diſpleaſed, that it appeared very manifeſtly, that he intended ſome hainous reuenge againſt them. Whereupon Philo departed after he had bin grieuouſly taunted, and ſpake thus vnto the Iewes that flocked about him, We muſt be of good courage, ſince Caius in words ſeemeth to be diſpleaſed with vs: for in effect he will arme God in our behalfe againſt himſelfe.

Alias, cap. 19. Cæſar ſendeth Petronius into Syria, and commandeth him in ſpite of the Iewes to plant his ſtatue in Gods Temple.

BVT Caius, being ſore diſpleaſed for that the Iewes onely deſpiſed his ordinances, ſent Petronius into Syria to ſucceed Vitellius in his roome, charging him with a ſtrong army to inuade Iudæa; and if they willingly admitted his ſtatue, that then he ſhould place it in the Temple of God; but if they denied the ſame, then, that ouercomming them by warre, he ſhould enforce them to condiſcend thereunto. As ſoone as Petronius came into Syria, he endeuoured himſelfe to ſatisfie Cæſars command: and hauing aſſembled as great an army as hee could poſſibly leuy, and leading forth with him two legions of Romane ſouldiers, he wintred at Ptolomais, intending vpō the firſt ſpring to inuade Iudæa. All which he ſignified to Caius by his letters: who commending him for his induſtry, aduiſed him to vſe all expedition therein, and to make warre againſt thoſe who ſhould diſobey his commandements. Meane-while diuers thouſands of the Iewes reſorted to Petronius, who ſoiourned at Ptolemais, beſeeching him not to conſtraine them to do that thing which was contrary to their lawes, or to tranſgreſſe the ordinances of their forefathers. For if (ſaid they) you haue wholly decreed to bring and erect this ſtatue in our Temple, firſt depriue vs of our liues: and afterwards doe that which ſhall ſeeme good in your eyes. For it and we are ready to encounter any misfortune, vnder hope that God will assist vs, for whose honour we feare not to aduenture on any danger. This had we rather doe, then by obeying thee through cowardise, to incur perpetuall ignominy; and that which is more, Gods wrath in neglect of his lawes, whose authority, euen in thine owne iudgement, is more to bee regarded then Caius commission. Petronius coniecturing by these their answers, how hard a matter it was to estrange them from their opinion, and perceiuing he could not doe for Caius what he expected in the erection of his statue, without great bloudshed, whereby much murder and inconuenience might follow, he tooke certaine of his neerest and dearest friends with him, and posted to Tiberias, that he might more conueniently and circumspectly look into the Iewes actions. They, fearing some imminent danger through the wars they expected from the Romans, and greater mischiefe through the breach of their laws, assembled once more many thousands of them, and met with Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him he would not inforce them to that necessitie, nor defile their sacred City with forbidden images. Whereunto Petronius answered: Therefore (said he) will you fight with Cæsar, without regard either of his ability or your own weakness? We will not fight (said they) but we will rather die then depart from our lawes. Whereupon prostrating themselues, and laying open their naked throats, they said they were ready to entertaine their deaths. In these tearmes continued they for the space of 40. dayes, neglecting their husbandry, whereas at that time it was the chiefest seed-time. For it was most resolutely concluded among them, rather to suffer death then to admit the statue. Whil'st the matter stood vpon these tearmes, Aristobulus, Agrippas brother, and Elcias surnamed the Great, accompanied with diuers of their houshold traine, and some of the chiefest among the Iewes, came vnto Petronius, beseeching him that hee would consider the obstinacie of the people: neither giue them occasion to draw them into desperate actions, but rather that hee would write vnto Caius, with what obstinacy the people refused the dedication of his image in the temple: and how giuing ouer the care of their husbandry, they prepared themselues for the warre, without any trust or confidence in their own strength, being rather addressed to die, then to suffer so great an indignity to be offred to their religion. Besides, how giuing ouer their tillage, there was nothing to be expected but robbery, whereas they should want meanes to pay their customes, by which meanes they hoped that Cæsar would bee moued to moderate his seuerity towards that nation, and not to giue them cause of rebellion: and that if hee might not be moued from the prosecution of the warre, that then he might go forward with his businesse. This was the effect of Aristobulus request.

The yeere of the world, 4002. after Christs birth, 40.

The Iewes meet Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him not to violate the sacred city with his images.

Aristobulus, K. Agrippas brother, and Elcias, the high priest, intreat Petronius in the Iews behalfe.

But Petronius, partly in respect of their praiers who instantly vrged him, and the waightines of the action; partly in regard of the contentious purpose of the Iewes, supposing that it was a matter vnworthy a man to put so many thousands of men to death, to satisfy Caius vnbridled desire and insolence, and touched with the feare of God, and remorse of his owne conscience, he had rather to his owne danger informe the Emperour of the absurdity of the matter by his letters, being no waies ignorant of his wrathfull spirit and forwardnesse in reuenge, except his furious passion and expectation were answered. For this thought he; that although it altered not his resolution, but haply inforc't his displeasure against him, in that he speedily executed not his command; yet that it was the duty of a good man, no, not to refuse an assured death, if so bee he might saue so guiltlesse and huge a multitude. When as therefore he had assembled the Iewes together in Tiberias (when many thousands of them resorted thither) & disposed all those warlike forces that at that time gaue attendance on him round about him, he told the Iewes first of all, not his owne, but the Emperours intent, who would haue them shortly taste his displeasure, and inforce them to beare the burden of his indignation, who were so bold as to contradict him. For himselfe, that it necessarily concerned him, that since by the Emperours fauour he had receiued so great honour, hee should not commit any thing contrary to his command. I hold it (said he) a matter most iust to imploy my life & honor for you, to the end that so huge a number of men should not be drawne into danger of death: and I will respect the excellency of the laws of your fathers, for which you thinke you ought to entertaine war and danger: neither is it lawfull to suffer the temple of God to be defil'd by the authority of princes. I will therfore write to Cæsar, and certifie him of your minds: and in all that I may, I will assist you to obtaine your request. God (whose power surpasseth all industry and humane force) vouchsafe to conduct you, and make you constant in the obseruation of your lawes, and grant that he, through excessiue desire of humane glorie, commit not any thing that may offend God. And if Caius be displeased, and inforce his ineuitable displeasure against me, I will vndertake all danger, and endure all torments both in body and ſpirit, to the end that I may not behold ſo many vertuous men, as you G are, periſh in your good and iuſt actions. Go therefore each of you and ply your worke, and till your lands: my ſelfe will ſend vnto Rome, and both in my ſelfe and by my friends, I will imploy my ſelf for you. After he had ſpoken thus, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly, praying the chiefeſt amõgſt them to encourage the husbandmen to ply their buſineſſe, and to confirme the reſt of the people in their good hope. Of himſelfe alſo he ceaſed not to animate them. And truly God ſhewed his aſſiſtance to Petronius, and aſſiſted him in all his affaires. For as ſoone as he had finiſhed his diſcourſe vnto the Iewes, there ſuddenly fell a great raine beyond all humane expectation. For the day was very faire, neither was there any appearance of raine in the ayre, and all that yeere long there was an extreme drought; ſo that men were paſt hope to haue any moiſture, notwithſtanding that ſometime there hapned certaine clouds in the heauens. At that time therefore the water fell in great abundance: and beſides the expectation and opinion of men, the Iewes conceiued hope that Petronius, ſolliciting their cauſe, ſhould not be repulſed. But Petronius was more amazed then all the reſt; ſeeing euidently that God vndertooke the affaires of the Iewes, and gaue them teſtimony of his manifeſt aſſiſtance; ſo that they that were their profeſſed aduerſaries, had no means to contradict them, as he himſelfe wrote to Caius at large, with inductions and exhortations, to the end hee ſhould not draw ſo many thouſand men into a deſperate reſolution and vnhappy death. For without war it was impoſſible for him euer to make thẽ forſake their religion. Furthermore, that he would not cut off & loſe the reuenue which he receiued of that nation; and would not erect a trophy of an euerlaſting curſe and malediction againſt himſelfe. Adding moreouer, what the power of their God was: which he had ſo cleerly declared, that no man ought to doubt, but that his mercifull hand was ouer them. This is the content of Petronius letters.

After a long & continuall drought there fell a ſudden ſhowre.

Petronius writeth to Caius.

On the other ſide, King Agrippa, who at that time conuerſed at Rome, grew more and more in fauour with Caius, hauing entertained him at a banquet, wherein he enforced himſelfe to exceed all others in ſumptuouſnes, as in all other ſorts of delights and pleaſures; yea with ſuch feſtiuals entertained he him, that not onely others, but alſo the Emperor himſelf could not attaine to ſuch magnificence; ſo much enforced he himſelf to exceed all others through the great deſire hee had to content and ſatisfie Cæſar in all things. Caius was abaſhed at this his courage and magnificence, ſeeing Agrippa enforce himſelfe aboue his power and meanes to abound in ſiluer; K and all this to the intent to pleaſe him. For which cauſe Cæſar in requitall of his kindnes, intending to honor Agrippa to his vttermoſt power, in granting him that which he moſt deſired, being one day whet with wine, inuited him to drinke a carouſe: adding theſe words; Agrippa, I haue heretofore known the honor thou haſt ſhewed towards me, and thou haſt expreſſed the earneſt affection that thou beareſt me, in hazarding thy ſelfe in diuers dangers, into which thou haſt bin drawne during Tiberius life-time; and haſt omitted nothing, no, not in that which exceedeth thy power, to ſhew thy vertuous affection towards me. For which cauſe I thinke that it ſhould be a great ſhame for me, if I ſhould ſuffer my ſelfe to be ouercome by thee in kindnes, without ſome anſwerable correſpondence: I will therefore put that in practice which I haue heretofore omitted. For all thoſe things that hitherto I haue beſtowed on thee, are of no reckoning. My will is L that thy readineſſe vertue ſhould at this preſent be requited, by ſuch meanes as might for euer make thee happy. Now hee ſpake after this manner, hoping that Agrippa would beg ſome great Prouince at his hands, or the reuenues of ſome Cities.

Agrippa honoreth Caius in Rome, and in reward thereof Caius willeth him to demand ſomewhat, who deſireth nothing elſe then that Petronius commiſſion to erect the ſtatue ſhould be reuoked.

But although he had already prepared his demand, yet did hee not diſcouer his intent, but gaue Caius this ready anſwer, that wheras he had ſerued him to the diſlike of Tiberius, it was not for the gaine he expected heretofore, and for the preſent alſo he did nothing vnder hope to be rich, contenting himſelfe that he was in the Emperours good fauour. That the benefits he had receiued by him, were great, yea exceeding all that which he durſt euer haue hoped. For (ſaid he) although they be but ſmall in compariſon of your Greatneſſe, yet in reſpect of my ſelfe, who haue receiued them, and in my conceit and quality, they are very great. Caius being amazed at this his courage, inſiſted the rather to perſwade him, that he would grant him all that he would require at his hands. Whereupon Agrippa ſaid: Drad Prince, ſince it is your good pleaſure to thinke me worthy to be honoured by your preſents, I wil not requeſt any thing at your hands that may tend to enrich me; for that by thoſe goods you haue already giuen me, I am greatly honoured: but I beſeech and requeſt one thing at your hands, which will purchaſe you the reputation of piety, and will procure God to bee propitious vnto you in all your actions; and which alſo will breed me much glory among thoſe, who ſhall heare that I haue not been refuſed in my

A demand, which concerneth mee more then the neceſſities of this life. I therefore beſeech you that it will pleaſe you to giue commandement, that that ſtatue, which you haue charged Petronius to erect in the Temple of the Iewes, may neuer be aduanced there. This was Agrippas requeſt, which to his great hazard he preſented the Emperour with, knowing very well how perilous a matter it was, and as much as concerned his life to demand any ſuch thing at Caius hands, that was not anſwerable to his humour. Caius on the one ſide mooued with the ſeruice Agrippa had done him, and on the other ſide ſeeing how great an indignitie it ſhould be for him, if before ſuch an aſſembly of witneſſes, hee ſhould deny that which he had ſo inſtantly preſſed Agrippa to requeſt, as if he ſuddenly had repented himſelfe, and admiring Agrippas vertue (who hauing B meanes within a little time to augment his particular eſtate, either by reuenues or other commodities, had preſerued the common cauſe, the lawes of his country and piety before all theſe) he granted him his ſupplication, and wrote to Petronius, praiſing him for that he had vſed ſuch diligence in aſſembling his armie, as alſo for all that whereof he had certified him, annexing theſe words: If (ſaid he) you haue already planted the ſtatue, as I commanded you, let it remaine in the place: but if it be not done, be thou no more troubleſome to the Iewes, but diſmiſſe thine armie, and repaire thou in perſon to that place whither I haue ſent thee. For I vrge no more the erection of that ſtatue for the deſire that I haue to gratifie Agrippa, whom I intirely honour, and in ſuch ſort, as it is impoſſible for me to contradict any thing whatſoeuer, that either he hath need of, or ſhall require. Theſe were the contents of thoſe letters, which Caius wrote to Petronius, C before he vnderſtood that the Iewes bethought them of reuolt: for they made it knowne, that rather then they would endure the ſtatue, they would hazard a war againſt the Romanes: which when Caius vnderſtood, he was extremely ſorrowfull: and being a man addicted to all villany, and eſtranged from all honeſty, and who gaue place to no good counſell, incontinently after he had conceiued a diſpleaſure againſt any man, and who likewiſe thought it a great good hap for him to accompliſh all that whatſoeuer he pleaſed, hee wrote againe to Petronius to this effect: Since the Preſent which the Iewes haue giuen thee, haue preuailed more with thee then my commandements haue done, ſo as to pleaſe them, thou haſt deſpiſed that which I haue enioyned thee, I make thy ſelfe the Iudge how much thou haſt deſerued to incurre my diſpleaſure, to the end that thou mayſt ſerue for an example to all thoſe, who ſhall come after thee, that an Empe- D rours commandement ought not in any ſort to be neglected. Although this Epiſtle was both written and ſent, yet did not Petronius receiue the ſame during Caius life-time, for that they that carried the ſame, were ſtayed by croſſe winds; ſo that Petronius receiued thoſe letters that certified him of Caius death, before he receiued the other. For God would not forget Petronius, who expoſed himſelfe to great dangers for the loue of the Iewes, and the honour of God. And Caius being taken out of the world by Gods wrath being kindled againſt him, by reaſon that he affected diuine honours, receiued his reward; and Petronius obtained fauour both at Rome, and thorow all the whole gouernment, and eſpecially among the principall Senators, againſt whom Caius was accuſtomed to vomit his cholericke diſgraces. Hee dyed a little after he had written the letter to Petronius, by which hee threatned and denounced him death. Hereafter will I declare the cauſe why he was taken out of this world, and the manner how treaſon was complotted and wrought againſt him. The letter that brought tidings of Caius death, was deliuered to Petronius firſt; and incontinently after he receiued that wherein he enioyned him to kill himſelfe. He highly reioyced at this his good hap, and Caius death, and admired Gods prouidence, who ſpeedily and happily had rewarded him both for the honour that he bare vnto his Temple, as alſo for the aſſiſtance he vſed towards the Iewes. Behold how Petronius eſcaped from death, by an vnexpected meanes.

CHAP. XII.

That which hapned to the Iewes which were at Babylon, and of the two brethren ASINÆVS and ANILÆVS.

IN thoſe daies there hapned a grieuous commotion amongſt thoſe Iewes that inhabited Meſopotamia and Babylon, and ſuch ſlaughters and calamities as neuer the like hath beene declared in our former narrations; which in that I intend to report both particularly and ſeriouſly, I will rippe vp the whole cauſe thereof from his firſt originall. There was a Citie called Nearda belonging to Babylon, ſtored with inhabitants, and enriched with many fruitfull poſſeſſions, ſufficient to ſuſtaine ſo great a multitude: Moreouer, it was ſuch as might be hardly inuaded by the enemy, both for that the riuer Euphrates hemmed it in on one side, as also G for that it was defenced with very strong wals. Vpon the same riuer also there stood another city, called Nisibis, in which the Iewes, in respect of the strength of the place, kept their Dragma, which they were accustomed to offer vnto God, and the rest of their votiue money. These two Cities therefore serued them for two store-houses: and from thence, according as time required, they sent the mony they had gathered, to Ierusalem, and committed the conuoy thereof to diuers thousands of men, for feare lest it should bee taken away by the Parthians, who at that time had the soueraignty in Babylon. Among these Iewes liued Asinæus and Anilæus, two brethren, borne in Nearda; whose father being dead, their mother set them and bound them to the weauers trade, for that among those nations it was accounted no indignity to follow that H trade: for both men and women exercise themselues therein. It hapned, that their master with whom they learnd their occupation, beat them one day, for that they came somewhat late vnto their worke. They taking this chastisement of his as if a great iniurie had beene done vnto them, betooke themselues to their weapons, whereof there were great store in that house, and retired themselues into a place where the floud deuideth it selfe into two parts, which naturally abounded with excellent pastures, and such fruits as were reserued for the vse of winter. To these men there flocked a number of needy persons, whom they armed and became their captaines, and no man opposed himselfe against their insolent proceedings. Being by this meanes growne absolute and impregnable, for that they had builded themselues a strong fortresse, they sent vnto the inhabitants, commanding them to pay them tribute for their cattel which they pastured; so that this tribute gaue sufficient to entertaine them, promising to those who obeyed them, all friendship, and that they would maintain them against all those that should iniure them, of what place soeuer they were: but if they did not that which they commanded them, they threatned them that they would kill all their cattell. The inhabitants of the countrey, knowing themselues vnable to crosse them, obeyed them, and sent them the number of cattell which they required; so that greater forces daily coupled themselues with them, and they grew of that power, that they could make their excursions against those whom they intended to hurt. Euery one respected them, and they were feared by all men, so that their renown came at last to the eares of the king of Parthia.

Nearda, Nisibis, two cities of Babylon.

Asinæus and Anilæus, born in Nearda, retire into a certain place, and great companies flock vnto them.

The Gouernor of Babylon likewise intending to cut off this mischiefe before it grew to greater head, assembled as many men as he could possible, both Parthians and Babylonians, & marched forth against them; with an intent to root them out, before they should haue any inkling thereof to prepare themselues for their defence. Hauing therefore prepared his army, he lay in ambush neere vnto a marish, and the next day following (which was the Sabbath, in which the Iewes forbeare all kinde of worke, he making his account that the enemy durst not make head against him, but without fight he should lead them away captiues) hee marched easily, thinking to charge them vnaware. Asinæus, who at that time by chance sate idly with his fellowes, hauing his Armes fast by him: Ye men (said he) me thinkes I heare the neighing of horses, not such as when they are in their heat, but as when they are backt by men. Moreouer, I heare the noise of their bridles, and I feare lest the enemies secretly stealing vpon vs, should circumuent vs: let therfore some one of vs go and discouer what the matter is, & certifie vs truly of that which he shall perceiue: I would I were found a lier in that which I haue told you. This said, one of them went out to espy what the noise intended; who running hastily backe againe, told him that he had not falsly coniectured as touching the intent of the enemy, for that they were at hand, and would not suffer themselues any longer to be out-braued by them. He also declared, that there was a mighty number of horsemen, who were assembled like a droue of beasts, sufficient & able vtterly to ouercome Asinæus and al his company, forasmuch as they were not in a readines to defend themselues: for that our law forbiddeth vs in any sort to trauell on the Sabbath. Asinæus determined with himselfe not to do that which the Spy had said, but thought that it was better for them to behaue themselues valiantly in that their necessity wherein they were plunged, and that if they must needs dye, it better became them to make breach of their law, then to hearten their enemies by their submission. He therefore presently betooke himselfe to his weapons, and encouraged all those that were about him, to make it knowne in effect what their valour was. Whereuponall of them at once marched forth against the enemy, and slaughtred a great many of them, for that they, despising Asinæus and his followers, marched as if they went to lay hold on men already vanquished; but in the end they were constrained to betake them to flight.

Asinæus and his companions beset by the gouernors and princes of Babylon.

Asinæus, after he had encouraged his souldiers, putteth his enemies to flight.

When the bruit of this skirmish was brought to the eares of the King of Parthia, hee was wholly

A wholly astonished at the boldnesse of these two brethren, and he had a desire to see them, and to speake with them. He therefore sent one of the trustiest of his guard, to let them vnderstand that although King Artabanus had beene iniured by them, in that they had inuaded his countrey; notwithstanding said this Embassadour, he making lesse account of the displeasure he hath conceiued against you, then of your vertue, hath sent me vnto you to giue you my hand and troth in his name for safeconduct and securitie in your voyage, requiring you to be his friends: he conditioneth therefore with you without any deceit or fraud, promising you gifts and honours, and determineth to encrease your dignitie by his power. Asinæus refused to enterprize this voyage, but sent his brother Anilæus with certaine presents, such as he could possibly finde. He there-
B fore departed with the messenger, and presented himselfe before Artabanus; who seeing Anilæus come alone, asked him how it hapned that Asinæus came not with him: and vnderstanding that he stayed in his marish through the feare that he had of him, he swore by the gods of his ancestors, that he would doe him no wrong, wishing them to giue credit to his promise, and he stretched out his hand, which is the greatest signe which the Kings of that country vse to assure those that parley with them. For after they haue mutually giuen one another their hands, there is no sinister practice to be feared, and they from whom a man expecteth any harme, are no more to bee feared at such time as they haue giuen this testimony of assurance. That done, Artabanus sent backe Anilæus to perswade his brother Asinæus to come to the Court. Artabanus did this,
C supposing that this his amitie with the two brothers would be a bridle for the Iewes, who otherwise might encroach vpon his gouernments. For, he feared lest if any rebellion should happen, and hee should bee troubled in that warre, Asinæus and they of Babylon should grow more strong, both by the voluntary submission of the Iewes, as by force: and thereby should doe him the more mischiefe. Vpon this deliberation he sent Anilæus, who easily perswaded his brother, giuing him to vnderstand among other things, what good will the King bare him, and the oath that he had sworne: so that both of them resorted to Artabanus, who receiued them very graciously, admiring Asinæus vertue, who had so great a courage to exercise his enterprizes, considering especially that he was a man of low stature, and who to looke on seemed to be contemptible: and he told his friends that without comparison, hee had a greater heart then his body.

Asinæus and Anilæus are sought vnto by Artabanus for friendship.

D And when as in banquetting he had named Asinæus, and shewed him to Abdagasis the Generall of his army, signifying vnto him with what valor these brethren were endowed in feats of armes; Abdagasis required that it might be lawfull for him to kill Asinæus, to the end that he might punish the wrongs he had done to the estate of the Parthians. Neuer (said the King) will I giue my consent to betray a man, who hath committed himselfe to my protection, and hath giuen me his hand, and who buildeth vpon the oath I haue past vnto him in the name of the gods. But if thou be a valiant man in feats of armes, thou hast no need to make me forsweare my selfe, to the end I might doe iustice on him for his outrages committed against the Parthians: but at such time as he and his brother shall depart from hence, assayle him, and ouercome him by thy valour, prouided that I be not priuy to thy attempt. And afterwards calling Asinæus to him in the morning:
E It is time (said he) that thou returne homeward, for feare thou prouokest diuers of the Captaines of my Court, which contrary to my will, will endeuour themselues to kill thee. I commit the countrey of Babylon to thy protection and guard, which by thy care and vigilancie shall remaine exempt from all robberies, and other such calamities. Reason it is that I procure thy good, be-
F cause I haue engaged mine honour & faith irreuocably vnto thee, not vpon any light matter, but for things that importune thee as neerely as thy life. This said, he gaue him certaine presents, and incontinently dismissed him. Now as soone as he returned home to his owne fortresse, he fortified the places, both those which before-time he had thorowly defenced, as the other which as yet no man had attempted to strengthen: and in short time he grew to that greatnesse, as no one man of so obscure fortune and beginning attained before him. Neither contented with the honors of G the Babylonians, he was also held in great account by the Captaines of the Parthians, who were sent to gouerne in the neighbouring Prouinces: yea so much encreased his authoritie with his power, that all Mesopotamia was at his command. In this felicitie and encreasing glory of his, he continued for the space of fifteene yeeres: which neuer began to wane vntill such time as neglecting the ancient study of vertue, and contemning the lawes of his forefathers, both hee and his factious followers being deuoured in pleasure, yeelded themselues captiue to forraine lusts. It fortuned that a certaine Gouernour of those Parthians came into that countrey, accompanied with his wife, not onely enriched and endowed with other perfections, but also admired for her incomparable comlineſſe and beauty. Whom without euer ſeeing her, only by report of her beauty, Anilæus, Aſinaeus brother loued entirely: and when as by no one of his allurements he could obtaine her fauour, neither had any other hope to enioy the Lady, he could not bridle his vnruly luſt, but he made warre againſt her husband: and killing the Parthian in their firſt conflict, his wife became his, both in ſubiection and bed-ſeruice, which thing was the originall of many mighty calamities both to himſelfe & towards his brother. For when as hauing loſt her former husband, ſhe was led away captiue, ſhe carried with her the images of the gods of her country, which ſhe highly eſteemed, according as it was the cuſtome of thoſe that inhabited that place, to haue their gods whom they adored in their houſes, whom at ſuch time as they trauell into a forraine countrey, they carry about with them. She therefore brought them with her, and vſed them, according to the faſhion of her country, at the firſt ſecretly: but after ſhe was knowne for Anilæus wife, then adored ſhe them according to the cuſtom, and with the ſame ſeruice which ſhe vſed during her firſt husbands daies, ſacrificing to her gods.

Anilæus killeth a noble man of the Parthians, & leadeth away his wife.

Their chiefeſt friends ſeeing this, firſt of all reproued them, for that Anilæus committed ſuch things, as were no waies vſed among the Hebrewes, and altogether repugnant to their lawes, for that he had married a woman of a forraine nation, that contradicted and violated their accuſtomed religion: for which cauſe they aduiſed them to beware, leſt in ſubmitting themſelues too much to their vnbridled pleaſures, they ſhould loſe the honor & power they had receiued from God, euen vntill that preſent. But ſeeing their perſwaſions profited nothing, and that Anilæus likewiſe had villainouſly ſlaine one of his deareſt friends, who had ſomwhat too freely reproued him (who at ſuch time as he lay a dying, being touched with the zeale of the lawes of his anceſtors, and with griefe againſt his murtherer, wiſhed that Aſinæus and Anilæus and all their aſſociates might die the like death: they, for that they were tranſgreſſers of the law; the other, for that they ſuccoured not themſelues in that oppreſſion, which they ſuffered for the maintenance of their lawes.) They were ſore diſpleaſed: yet notwithſtanding they contained themſelues, calling to their remembrance that their felicity proceeded from no other cauſe, but from the valour of thoſe brethren.

Anilæus being reprooued for his wifes Idolatry, killeth one of his friends.

But when they vnderſtood that the Parthian gods were adored by this womã, they bethought them that it behoued them not any more to beare with Anilæus, in contempt of their laws: for which cauſe, addreſſing themſelues to Aſinæus in great aſſemblies, they exclaimed againſt Anilæus; ſaying, that he ought, although at firſt he had no power to diſpoſe of himſelfe, yet now at laſt, to correct this error before it ſhould redound to their publike plague: for that both his marriage was diſallowed in all mens eies, as altogether contrary to their countrey lawes, & that the ſuperſtitious obſeruance of the gods, which the woman preſumed to vſe, was an apparant iniurie offered to the true God. But he, although he knew that his brothers fault would breed ſome great inconuenience, both to himſelfe and his followers, yet being ouercome with brotherly affection, he eaſily pardoned his brother, aſcribing his error to the violence of his vnbridled paſſion. But whereas daily more and more he was tired with exclamations, and greater reproofes, at length hee admoniſhed his brother of the matter, chiding him for that which was paſt, and willing him to amend the error hereafter, by ſending home the woman vnto her kinred. Yet did this admonition of his take no effect with him; for that the woman perceiuing that the rumour that was raiſed among the people was for her ſake, and being affraid leſt for her loue ſake Anilæus ſhould incurre ſome danger, ſhee poiſoned Aſinæus, to the end that her loue being in authority, ſhe might more freely practiſe her impiety. Now when Anilæus had gotten the gouernment into his owne hands, he drew out his forces againſt certaine villages belonging to Mithridates, one of the chiefeſt among the Parthians, and Artabanus ſonne in lawe, which villages hee ſpoiled, and carried away moueables, men, ſheepe, and other riches. When Mithridates, who at that time was reſident in thoſe quarters, vnderſtood of the ſpoyle of his villages, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and the rather for that without any occaſion or proffer of iniury, Anilæus had aſſailed him in contempt of his eſtate, who was a chiefe Peere of the Countrey: for which cauſe he incontinently aſſembled the greateſt power of horſe and footmen he could gather, to ſet vpon Anilæus and his aſſociates. Leading his forces therefore againſt one of his villages, he kept himſelfe in couert, to the end he might fight the next day; which was the Sabbath day, on which the Iewes attempt not any thing. Whereof when Anilæus was aduertiſed by a certain Syrian, who dwelt in another village, who had exactly tolde him all Mithridates intent, and the place where he intended to banquet with his ſouldiers; after he had made his ſouldiers take their refection, he departed by night, to the end he might charge the Parthians before they might be aduertiſed of his

He therefore ruſhed in vpon them about the fourth watch of the night, and ſlew thoſe whom he found aſleep, and the reſt being aſtoniſht hereat, were forced to ſaue themſelues by flight: he alſo tooke Mithridates priſoner, and cauſed him to be carried away naked on an Aſſe, which is one of the greateſt diſgraces which the Parthians imagine may be offered them. Hauing after this diſgracefull maner carried him into a forreſt, ſome of his familiars perſwaded him to kill him: but Anilæus told them incontinently, that they ought to deale with him farre otherwiſe; for that it behoued them not to kill a man, who was one of the chiefeſt among the nobility of the Parthians, and one who was moſt honored in regard of that affinity and alliance he had with the King: that although all that which heretofore had bin offered to Mithridates, were inſupportable; yet if they ſhould be the meanes of the ſafegard of his life, he would remit the iniuries, and remunerate them for their mercy in ſauing his life; whereas if they ſhould deale ſeuerely with him, the King would ſeek his reuenge, and make a horrible ſlaughter of all thoſe Iewes that inhabited Babylon: whom they ought to haue compaſſion of, both for that they are of their bloud, as for that if any miſchief ſhould befall them, they knew not whither to retire themſelues; whereas they might be aſſiſted with the flower and picked number of the men of their nation. Hauing thus diſcourſed and debated the matter in the eares of his ſouldiers, his opinion was approued, and they were perſwaded; and ſo Mithradites was ſent backe againe.

Mithridates, vnable to indure theſe vſuall reproches, and on the other ſide, apprehending his wiues hauty courage, from whom he feared to be ſeparated, he aſſembled the greateſt power of men of war that he could poſſible, notwithſtanding it were againſt his will, and led them forth; ſuppoſing himſelf to be vnworthy of life, if he who was by nation a Parthian, ſhould be cowardly put to the worſt by the Iewes. When Anilæus vnderſtood that Mithridates came forth againſt him with a gteat force, he thought that it would redound greatly to his indignity, if he ſhould lye lurking amidſt his marſhes; and hoping that he ſhould haue no worſe fortune againſt his enemies, then he had at the firſt, and building much vpon his ſouldiers, who were euer wont to get the vpper hand in their encounters, he likewiſe drew forth his army: to them alſo certaine other adioined themſelues, who ſought nought elſe but pillage, and hoped that with their onely preſence they might diſmay their enemy.

But after they had marched about ninety ſtades, and paſſed thorow a country that was ſcant of water, and were about the heat of the midday trauailed with thirſt: Mithritades army came in ſight, and charged them euen at that time; when they fainted for want of drinke, and thorow the extremity of heat; ſo as they could ſcarcely wield their weapons. At that time Anilæus ſouldiers encountring with Mithridates freſh men, were ſhamefully put to flight: whereby it came to paſſe that a great number of them was murthered, and many thouſand men put to the ſword, But Anilæus himſelf, and al thoſe of his company, retired themſelues in great haſte into a forreſt, leauing Mithridates Lord and Maſter of the field, whereof he was very ioyfull. Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, an infinite number of lawleſſe men reſorted to Anilæus, who ſet little by their liues, prouided there might no limit be propoſed to their vnbridled licentiouſneſſe; ſo that he gathered a greater number of men, then thoſe whom he had loſt: yet were they farre different in valour from the former: for they were men wholly ignorant of warlike diſcipline: notwithſtanding, hee being accompanied with theſe men, went and ſet vpon certaine boroughs of the Babylonians, which were wholly deſtroyed by his rapine and violence. For which cauſe, the Babylonians and his other enemies, ſent vnto Nearda to the Iewes that were there, requiring that Anilæus might be deliuered into their hands: whereunto condeſcending not (for although they had a wil to performe their requeſt, yet it lay not in their power to deliuer him) they required that they might liue in peace. And to intreat of the conditions of peace, the Babylonians ſent certaine men to confer with Anilæus. They hauing ſuruaied the place wherein Anilæus kept, aſſailed both himſelfe & his followers by night, and ſlew all thoſe they encountred with, without reſiſt, and amongſt the reſt Anilæus. When the Babylonians ſaw that they were deliuered from the oppreſſion of Anilæus, who till that time had been as it were a bridle vnto them, to reſtraine and curbe the hatred they conceiued againſt the Iewes, with whom they had oftentimes beene at oddes, by reaſon of the contrariety of their religions, whereby it grew that they oftentimes fell at debate vpon each opportunity, wherein they met.

The Iewes afflicted by the Babylonians, repaire to Selucia.

At that time therfore that Anilæus men were diſcomfited, the Babylonians ſet vpon the Iewes on all ſides; who ſeeing themſelues in danger by reaſon of the inſolence of the Babylonians, againſt whom they were too weake to make reſiſt, and on the other ſide vnable to liue amongſt them, they went and dwelt at Seleucia, a City famous in regard of Seleucus the ſonne of Nicanor, who builded it. In that City dwelt diuers Macedons, diuers Greekes, and a great number of Syrians. The Iewes fled thither, and ſoiourned there about ſome fiue yeers, without any moleſtation: but in the ſixt yeere, when the plague grew rife in Babylon, the Iewes that remained there, were enforced to ſeeke them ſome new habitation; and that remooue of theirs into the City of Seleucia was the cauſe likewiſe of their further miſchiefe, as I will make manifeſt. The Greekes who dwell in Seleucia, are ordinarily at debate with the Syrians, and haue alwaies the vpper hand; but after that the Iewes came to inhabit in that place, in a certain ſedition that aroſe among them, the Syrians had the vpper hand, by the meanes of the Iewes, who ioyned their forces with theirs, who of themſelues were valiant and good ſouldiers.

The Greekes who had beene repulſed in this tumult, ſeeing they had but one only means left them to maintaine their former honour, but to breake that league of friendſhip which was betweene the Syrians and the Iewes, deuiſed in priuate each one with thoſe Syrians, with whom they were acquainted, promiſing to liue in peace and amity with them, whereunto they condeſcended willingly. For the chiefeſt of theſe two nations concluded the peace, which preſently after followed, to the end that on both parts they ſhould ioyne in hatred againſt the Iewes. So that all together charging them at vnawares, they ſlew more then fifty thouſand of them: and all of them were ſlaine, except ſome few, who through the mercy of their friends, and warrantize of their neighbors were ſuffered to eſcape. Theſe retired themſelues to Cteſiphon a City of Greece, that was not farre from Seleucia, where the King ſoiourneth euery yeer, and keepeth the greateſt part of his moueables; hoping in that place through the reuerence of the King they might remain in more ſafety and ſecurity. All the nation of the Iewes that were in theſe quarters ſtood in great feare: For the Babylonians and the Seleucians, with all the Aſſyrians of that country, accorded among themſelues to make a generall war againſt the Iewes; whereby it came to paſſe that they aſſembled themſelues at Nearda and Niſibis, truſting themſelues to the ſtrength of theſe fortreſſes, which were inhabited alſo by men who were expert in armes. See here what the eſtate of thoſe Iewes was, who remained in Babylon.

How CAIVS was ſlaine by CHÆREAS.

The yeere of the world, 4004. after Chriſts birth, 42.

CAIVS did not only expreſſe and manifeſt his fury towards thoſe Iewes that dwelt in Ieruſalem, and in other neighbouring places; but alſo thorow all the countries both by land and ſea, which were ſubiect to the Roman Empire, filling the whole world with an infinite number of miſchiefes; yea, ſuch and ſo hainous, as the like heereof hithreto haue neuer beene heard of. But Rome in eſpeciall felt the force of his fury, which partooke no leſſe calamity and miſery, then any other city: but eſpecially the Senatours, Patricians, and noble men were plagued. They alſo that were called Roman knights, who in wealth and dignity were next vnto the Senators, for that out of their number ſuch men were choſen, who were to ſupply the Senate, were vexed with intolerable iniuries. For with ignominies they were detracted, with baniſhments and confiſcations weakned, and by ſlaughters wholly exterminated. Hee likewiſe vſurped the Name of God, commanding his ſubiects to dignifie him with more then humane honours; and aſcending the Capitol, which amongſt all the Temples in Rome is moſt religiouſly honoured, he was ſo bold as to ſalute Iupiter, and to call him brother. Many ſuch impieties committed he, by which he expreſſed, that his vnbridled and boundleſſe madneſſe did neuer forſake him. Amongſt his other mad pranks that he plaied, this is worthy of memory: for on a time, thinking it to bee too much trouble for him to croſſe the ſea betweene Puteol a city in Campania, and Miſenum another towne ſeated by the ſea-ſhore, in a galley; and otherwiſe eſteeming it a thing correſpondent to his greatneſſe, who was Emperour, to exact that ſuperiority on the ſea, which was anſwerable to his ſoueraignty on the land, betwixt one Cape of the ſea vnto another, for the ſpace of thirty furlongs or ſtades, betwixt which the gulfe had his courſe, hee cauſed a bridge to be built, on which he commanded himſelfe to be drawne in a charriot, as if that way were anſwerable to the dignity of his deity. Hee left not one Temple of Greece whatſoeuer, that he ſpoiled not of thoſe excellent pictures or imagery that was therein; Giuing a commiſſion, that all ſtatues, and whatſoeuer ornaments or gifts, and preſents that were dedicated in any temple, ſhould be brought vnto him; ſaying, that ſuch things as were admirable, ſhould be reſerued for a place of admiration, ſuch as was the City of Rome: with theſe ſpoiles of the Temples decked he his Palace and Gardens, and generally, all his houſes and Palaces that he had in Italy. He was ſo impudent alſo, as to giue direction, that Iupiter Olympius ſtatue, which the Greeks had in great eſtimation, and Phidias the Athenian caruer had made, ſhould be tranſported to Rome. But Memmius Regulus, to whom he directed this commiſſion, executed it not, becauſe the Maſons informed him, that without ſpoiling it they could not remooue it from the place. It is reported alſo, that he was hindered from this execution by ſuch prodigies as are almoſt incredible: which he certified Caius of, giuing him to vnderſtand, what the occaſion was that had moued him to diſobey him therein: and whil'ſt he was in danger of death for this his delay, the ſudden and ſucceſſefull death of Caius warranted him from the ſame. Yea, ſo far ſtretched his vnbridled fury, that hauing a daughter newly born, he cauſed her to-be carried into the Capitoll, and laid at the feet of the Image of Iupiter; ſaying, that that child was common betwixt him and Iupiter, leauing the iudgement to all men, which of the two parents was the greateſt. And notwithſtanding all theſe his miſdemeanours, yet did men tolerate him.

He gaue liberty to ſlaues alſo to accuſe their maſters of whatſoeuer crimes they would: which was ſo much the more hatefull, becauſe all things were done by Cæſars authority, & to his good liking: ſo that Pollux, who was Claudius bondman, durſt accuſe him, and Caius the Emperour was contented among the Iudges to heare his vncle brought in queſtion for his life, hoping (although it fel out otherwiſe) to pick out an occaſion to put him to death. For hauing filled all the countries of his Empire with falſe accuſations, and all ſorts of miſchiefs, & giuing ſlaues a prerogatiue aboue their maſters; their lords deuiſed many conſpiracies againſt him, ſome for ſpite, and with an intent to reuenge them of thoſe iniuries they had receiued: other ſome pretending by his death to preuent thoſe inconueniences that threatned them. In a word, his death concerned the ſecurity of the lawes, and the ſafety of all men: and had he not been ſpeedily cut off, our nation had almoſt been vtterly exterminated. For which cauſe I thought good to make an exact and ample declaration of euery occurrent, namely, for that the knowledge thereof maketh very much towards the manifeſtation of Gods power and will, which bring conſolation vnto thoſe who who are in aduerſity,and keep them within the bounds of modeſty,who ſuppoſe that their proſperity ſhould continue alwaies firme;and although they neglect vertue,thinke that no euill may befall them. Three plots of conſpiracy were intended againſt him, and purpoſed to his vtter ruine, each of them was attempted by men of great reckoning. For Æmilius Regulus, who was borne in Corduba in Spaine, was fully reſolued to kill him, himſelfe, or to make him away by the meanes of his confederates. Chæreas Caſsius, Colonell ouer a thouſand men, was the chiefe-taine of another band; and Annius Minucianus was in no leſſe readineſſe to doe his vttermoſt herein. The cauſe that moued them to accord thus altogether in hatred againſt Caius,was,that in reſpect of Regulus, he was by nature a deteſter of all iniquity: for he was a man endowed with great magnanimity,and beautified with a liberall ſpirit;ſo as he diſſembled not any of his counſels, but communicated them with many, who either were his friends, or valiant men fit for execution. And as touching Minucianus,he was induced to ſeeke his reuenge, through the deſire he had to do iuſtice on him in Lepidus behalfe, who had bin one of his eſpeciall friends, and one of the rareſt men that were euer found among the Romane citizens (whom Caius had put to death through the feare he had conceiued of him) knowing well that all they,againſt whom Caius was incenſed,could not eſcape with leſſe indignity then loſſe of life. As for the third man Chæreas, he could not endure the ſhame and reproach of cowardiſe that Caius had obiected againſt him, but feared beſides,that his friendſhip and inward familiarity with Caius would draw him into manifeſt dangers:for which cauſe and his own ſecurity & honors ſake, he thought good to make him away. Generally,all of them were reſolued to rid the world of Caius,& bring an end to his pride and tyrannical power,for their hope was that their attempt ſhould haue good ſucceſſe: which if it happily fel out,their country and common-weale ſhould reape the fruits therof,for whoſe ſecurity and ſafety,it became them to hazzard thēſelues,though it were with loſſe of their heads. But aboue all the reſt, Chæreas was egged on with a deſire he had to grow famous,and through the facility & conuenient means he had to finiſh the ſame, becauſe his Colonels roome gaue him moſt ſecure acceſſe vnto him. About that time the Circenſian games were ſolemnized,which is a kind of paſtime which the Romans very willingly behold, and to this intent they reſort to the place of theſe exerciſes, and the common people is wont to demand ſomewhat at their Emperors hands,which they deſire to obtaine; and they,after they haue examined their requeſts, doe neuer refuſe them. Now they required with inſtant and importunate ſupplications, that Caius would diſcharge them of their taxations,and moderate the exceſſiue tributes which they paid: but he would giue no eare vnto them,and cauſed thoſe to be apprehended who called vpon the matter moſt earneſtly; ſending his Guard, ſome of them one way, ſome of them another, to put them to the ſword. After he had giuen this commandement, and they who receiued the charge, had fully executed it, a great number of men were ſlaine. The people ſeeing this, ceaſed to exclaime any more, ſetting light by their goods; and ſeeing before their eyes, that their refuſall would be the cauſe of their death. Theſe conſiderations incited Chæreas the more to execute his enterprize,to the end he might finiſh his furious and lawleſſe life,whoſe pleaſure was all mens iniurie and preiudice. And very oftentimes was he determined to ſet vpon him whil'ſt he banquetted,yet he deferred to do the ſame,not for that he failed or fainted in his reſolution,but becauſe he expected ſome fit opportunity to hit him home, and ſpeed him to the death. Hee liued Captaine of Caius Guard a long time, yet tooke he ſmall pleaſure in conuerſing with him.

Many conſpiracies againſt Caius.

Three conſpiracies againſt Caius. Æmilius Regulus. Caſſius Chæreas. Annius Minucianus.

The Circenſian games. Caius cauſeth diuers to be murthered, who requeſt mitigation of their exactions.

Chæreas for many cauſes is incited againſt Caius.

But after that Caius had appointed him to gather in his tributes, and that money which was confiſcate, he ſeemed to haue leſſe occaſion then before: for at that time he had doubled their paiments, in the execution whereof he followed his owne nature rather then Cæſars command, and ſpared thoſe of whom he ought to haue compaſſion for their pouerty ſake. Caius was ſore diſpleaſed herewith,and obiected againſt him, that the cauſe why he delayed the bringing in of his money, was his cowardiſe and negligence: And among other outrages that he offered him, as oft as he gaue him the watch-word, as he vſually went to fetch it once a day vpon his watch day,he gaue him the names of women, and other that were full of ignominie, notwithſtanding that he himſelfe was not exempt from note of no leſſe daintineſſe. For in certaine ceremonies which he himſelfe had eſtabliſhed,he attir'd himſelfe like a woman,and was diſguiſed with certaine vailes, whereby hee might the better counterfeit that ſexe, and yet notwithſtanding durſt he obiect this diſhonor to Chæreas. As oftentimes as Chæreas receiued the watch-word, ſo oftentimes grew he in choler: which was increaſed the more at ſuch time,as he deliuered the ſame to his companions, who openly mocked and ieſted at him. For when it was his turne to receiue the word from Cæſars mouth,he ordinarily fitted him with ſuch a one as might moue laughter,

A which made him the bolder to conſpire with his confederates, in that hee had iuſt occaſion to be diſpleaſed: among theſe was a Senator, and one that had paſt all honors and offices, otherwiſe an Epicure & louer of delights. Him did Timidius accuſe (in that he was his enemy) that he had vſed certaine iniurious ſpeeches againſt Caius: and for proofe hereof, he alleadged Quintilia for his witnes, a woman amongſt all ſtageplaiers dearly beloued by many, but in eſpeciall, by Popedius, by reaſon of her incomparable beauty: and for that ſhe refuſed to beare witnes in a matter falſly obiected againſt him, whom ſhe intirely loued, Timidius required, that ſhe might bee examined by torture. Caius, prouoked herewith, commanded Chæreas with all expedition and diligence to ſee Quintilia tortured: and the rather gaue he Chæreas theſe commiſſions to kill & torB ment thoſe whom he pleaſed, for that he had conceiued this opinion, that he would acquit himſelfe with more cruelty, to the end he might exempt himſelfe of that reproach of faint-heartednes which was wrongfully inforced againſt him.

Popedius is accuſed of a crime by Timidius vnto Cæſar.

Whil'ſt thus Quintilia was led forth to bee tortured, ſhe trod vpon the foot of one of thoſe who were of the confederacie, giuing him to vnderſtand that he ſhould be of good courage, for that there was no feare that ſhee would bewray any thing in torture, but would endure it with great conſtancy: notwithſtanding, Chæreas tormented her cruelly, which he rather performed by conſtraint then of his owne free will. And ſeeing he could inforce nothing out of her, hee brought her back to Caius in ſo pitifull an eſtate, that all they that beheld her, had compaſſion on her. Caius likewiſe himſelfe was moued, and bethinking him of thoſe paines ſhe had indured, he C deſiſted from the enqueſt and accuſation which was proſecuted againſt Popedius and Quintilia, and gaue her a certain ſumme of mony, to comfort her againſt the indiſpoſition that might happen by reaſon of her torments, which ſhe had ſo couragiouſly endured.

Caius commandeth Quintiliana to be tortured who cõfeſſeth nothing.

Popedius is abſolued.

This diſpleaſed Chæreas very much, as if he had been the cauſe of all thoſe euils that had happned to thoſe two perſons, hauing been ſo great, that to heale them, it behooued Cæſar to miniſter a medicine. He conſulted therfore with Clement, who was Captaine of the footmen, and Papinius, who had the command of the guard, and ſpake vnto them to this effect: We haue (ſaid hee) O Clement, imploied our ſelues to the vttermoſt for the Emperors ſafety: for by our prouidence and trauell we haue wrought ſo much, that of all thoſe, who haue conſpired againſt him, ſome of them haue bin ſlaine: the reſt in ſuch ſort tormented & martyred, that Caius himſelfe had com- D paſſion on them. But what reward or honour receiue we for all theſe ſeruices? Clement, hearing theſe words, held his peace, giuing manifeſt teſtimonie by his looks, and the change of his colour, that he was greatly aſhamed he had ſo long time obeyed the Emperours commandements: and whil'ſt he thought with himſelfe that it was no policy for him to open his mouth againſt Caius cruelty, Chæreas emboldned himſelfe to diſcouer the calamities and dangers wherin both the city and the whole Empire were plunged, telling him that the common report was, that Caius was the cauſe of them: but (ſaid he) thoſe that will narrowly examine the truth, will iudge that I, and Papinius that ſtandeth by me, and you, Clement, more then we, haue cauſed the Romans torment, and the worlds miſery, for that of our own will we haue bin miniſters of Caius commands; and although the means lieth in vs to make an end of thoſe violences that are committed againſt the citizens, and iniuries to the whole world: yet we ſerue him for his guard and hangmen, inſtead of men of warre. And we beare armes, not to maintaine our libertie, and the Roman Empire, but to preſerue him, who keeps their bodies & mindes in ſeruitude: and euery day are we ſoiled in their bloud who are ſlaine and tortured, vntill ſuch time as ſome one ſerue vs with the ſame ſauce, to ſatisfie Caius cruelty. For it is not for the good will he beareth vs, that he maketh vſe of vs: but that which is more, we are ſuſpected by him, and he will cauſe vs to be ſlaine, as he hath done others. For his diſpleaſure is not limited by iuſtice, but by his will: wee alſo ſhall ſerue him for a mark to aime at. For which cauſe, it behooueth vs to prouide for the ſecuritie and liberty of all men, and eſpecially to warrant our ſelues againſt thoſe dangers that threaten vs.

Chæreas conferreth with Clement and Papinius.

Clement declared by apparent ſignes, that he thought well of Chæreas reſolution, but he counſelled him to make no words of it, for feare the rumour thereof ſhould bee ſpred among the people, and the ſecret ſhould be diſcouered before the execution: and leſt that Caius getting an inkling thereof, they ſhould all of them be drawn into danger of death; and in the meane while, it behooued them to hope that ſome good fortune would fall out to their furtherance: and that for himſelfe, his age had taken from him the neceſſary courage that belonged to ſuch enterprizes. It may be (ſaid he) that I may furniſh you with ſome aduice more ſecure then yours is, Chæreas: for a more honeſter then it is, who is he that can propoſe? This ſaid, Clement returned to his houſe, houſe, ruminating with himſelfe vpon thoſe words which hee had both heard and ſpoken. But Chæreas waxt fearefull, & conferred with the Colonell, Cornelius Sabinus, whom he knew to be a man of reputation, a louer of liberty, and greatly diſcontented with the eſtate about the miſeries of the common-weale; & ſeeing it was neceſſary to attempt that with all expedition which he had intended, hee thought good to impart the matter to him; fearing leſt Clement ſhould diſcouer all the conſpiracy, conſidering that delay & procraſtination would bee but an occaſion to hinder the action. When as therefore he perceiu'd him to giue willing eare to all that which hee intended, and that already he was confirmed with no leſſe reſolution then himſelfe was; but in that he knew not with whom he might familiarly cõmunicate the ſame, he ſaid nothing: whereas otherwiſe he was ready, not only to conceale that which he had heard, but alſo declared that which he had in his heart, he was ſo much the more incouraged. For which cauſe, without further delay they went to Minucianus, who was conformable vnto them in vertue, good affection, and great courage; & who beſides that, was ſuſpected by Caius by reaſon of Lepidus death. For Minucianus and Lepidus were very great friends, & had been aſſociates in the ſame dangers. For Caius was feared by all thoſe who had any publike office, ſparing none of them in particular or in generall, but made them all grone vnder the burthen of his fury.

Cornelius Sabinus.

Annius Minucianus.

Now they knew well one another, that all of them were diſpleaſed to ſee the common-weale in that eſtate: but the apprehenſion of the danger ſuffered them not to manifeſt the hatred that each one of them bare to Caius, although their ſecret conceit engendred among them a certain amity. For before that time, as often as they mette together, they were accuſtomed to eſteeme Minucianus for the moſt honourable man of the company; as in truth, among all the citizens of Rome he was the moſt famous, valiant and beſt eſteemed among them: being therefore aſſembled at that time, he was firſt of all requeſted to ſpeake his opinion. For which cauſe hee asked Chereas what the watch-word was hee had receiued that day (for all the city knew very well what mockery Caius vſually vſed in giuing Chæreas the watch-word) Chæreas, notwithſtanding this diſgrace, failed not to anſwer him, relying on the wiſedome of Minucianus, & ſaid vnto him;

» But giue you mee for the watch-word Liberty; meane while I giue you thankes for that you » haue awakened me more ſpeedily then of my ſelfe I haue accuſtomed to bee. You need not now » any further inforce your ſelf to incite me by your words, ſith both you & I haue vndertaken the » ſame reſolution. Before we were aſſembled in this place, our thoughts were vnited. Behold here » my ſword, that is girt vnto my ſide; this ſhall ſuffize for vs both. And if you pleaſe, you ſhall be » my captaine, and I will march vnder your command, & will follow you vnder aſſurance of your » aſſiſtance and wiſedome. They, who haue valiant hearts, neuer want armes: for it is a confident » courage that makes the weapon walk. That which enkindleth me thus to this action, is not the » conſideration of my particular intereſt: for I haue not the leiſure to think on thoſe dangers that » threaten me, through the griefe that I conceiue, to ſee the libertie of my countrey changed into » ſeruitude, and the force of the lawes wholly aboliſhed, and all ſorts of men aſſigned to death by » the cruelty of Caius. It is I that deſerue to be truſted in this execution, and I make you my Iudge, » ſith you haue the like intention as I haue.

» Minucianus, perceiuing with what affection Chæreas ſpake, embraced him with all loue; & after he had praiſed him, he exhorted him to continue his conſtancie: then departed they one from the other, with praiers and wiſhes; and at that time there hapned a preſage that confirmed them the more. For as Chæreas entred into the Senate, ſome one among the people caſt out a word, that redoubled his courage. Diſpatch (ſaid he) that which thou haſt to do: for God will aſſiſt thee. Chæreas was ſome-what affraid, leſt ſome one of his aſſociates had betraied him. But at laſt, he thought it was ſome one of thoſe, who, being priuy to his reſolution, gaue him a watch-word to animate him the more; or that it was God, who, gouerning and obſeruing humane affaires, puſhed him forward. After he had imparted this his deliberation to diuers; ſundry Senatours, knights, and men of war, being aduertiſed hereof, were in armes. For there was not any one that ſuppoſed not that Caius death was the greateſt good hap the common-weale could expect. For which cauſe, all of them enforc't themſelues, as much as they could, to aſſiſt that execution with courageous and vertuous reſolution: & as forward were they in affection as in power; in words as in effect, deſiring each of them to be partakers in the diſpatch of a tyrant. For Caliſthus alſo, who was Caius free-man, & raiſed him to great authority, yea, ſuch as he almoſt equald him, adioined himſelf to them for the feare he apprehended of all men, & for thoſe great riches which he had gathered together, for that he was a man of a corrupt conſcience, & eaſily won by bribes & preſents, doing wrong to all men, & abuſing the power he had, againſt whõſoeuer he pleaſed, Chæreas, with certain others intend to kill Caius.

Caliſthus, Caius free-man, certifies Claudius that Caius commanded him to poiſon him.

A contrary to all right and reaſon. Beſides, for that he knew the vnbridled nature of Caius, who hauing once conceiued an ill opinion of any man, could neuer afterwards be diſſwaded or reconciled. Amongſt diuers other dangers that he had to apprehend, the greatneſſe of the danger of his riches was not the leaſt, which was the cauſe that made him ſerue Claudius, and ſecretly to follow him vnder hope, that after Caius death, he ſhould be his ſucceſſor in the Empire, and that at that time he ſhould by him be maintained in the ſame eſtate, which he enioyed: and by this meanes thought he to obtaine his amity and good liking, by giuing him to vnderſtand how Caius had commanded him to poiſon him, and how he had inuented infinit delaies to deferre this execution. As for mine own part, I thinke that Caliſthus forged this matter. For if Caius had
B pretended to kill Claudius, he had not beene diſſwaded by Caliſthus allegations, who had incontinently receiued his reward, if he had deferred to execute his Maſters command, with all expedition in a matter ſo acceptable to him. So it is, that the prouidence of God would not permit Caius to execute that rage againſt Claudius; and Caliſthus was thereby thanked for a benefit which he no waies deſerued.

Thoſe that were about Chæreas day by day, followed the action very ſlowly, notwithſtanding that he willingly delayed not, but thought all occaſions fit to finiſh his purpoſe in, for that he might aſſaile him at ſuch time as he aſcended vp into the Capitoll, or euen then when he ſolemnized thoſe ceremonies, which he had inſtituted in honor of his daughter, or at ſuch time as hee ſtood in the palace to ſcatter gold, and ſiluer money among the people, by caſting him from the C toppe of the Palace into the market place, or at ſuch time as he celebrated thoſe myſteries, that were introduced by him. For no man ſuſpected Chæreas, ſo diſcreetly had he behaued himſelfe in all things: and he perſwaded himſelfe that no man would haue thought that he ſhould lay violent hands on Caius. And although he had done nothing to any effect; yet ſo it is, that the power of the gods was ſufficient to giue him force, and to kill him without drawing weapon. Chæreas was ſore diſpleaſed againſt his companions, in reſpect that he feared that they would let ſlip their occaſions; and although they perfectly knew that he trauailed for the maintenance of the lawes, and for the good of them all: yet did they requeſt him to delay a little, for feare leſt in the execution he ſhould in ſome ſort miſcarry, and for that cauſe the City might be brought in trouble, by the informations that would bee made of that act; and that finally when Caius
D ſhould be ſo much the better defenced againſt them, they ſhould not know how to ſhew their vertue, when the time required that they ſhould aſſault and ſet vpon him. They therefore thought it good that the opportunity to ſet forward this buſines, ſhould be the time in which the games of the Palace were celebrated, which were ſolemnized in honor of Cæſar, who firſt of all diſannulled the peoples authority, and appropriated it to himſelfe. This ſolemnity is celebrated in a Tent before the Palace, where the noble Citizens with their wiues and children remained to behold the ſport, and Cæſar himſelfe likewiſe. At that time concluded they that it would be an eaſie
E matter for them, when as ſo many thouſands of people ſhould be ſhut vp in ſo narrow a place; ſo that he, who would ſtep formoſt to giue the ſtroke, might very eaſily be ſuccoured, for that he could haue no force in armes, although his guard ſhould haue the courage and deſire to defend him. Chæreas reſolued vpon this, and it was concluded that the firſt day of thoſe ſports that were next at hand, the deed ſhould be done: but their aduenture was greater then their concluſion. For the delay was ſuch, as the third day was almoſt paſt, and hardly could they be drawne to attempt the matter on the third day. At which time Chæreas aſſembled all the confederates, and told them that the opportunity of time that ouerſlipt them, accuſed and reproached them of ſlackneſſe in that execution, which had beene ſo vertuouſly reſolued amongſt them: and that it was to be feared, leſt if any ſhould be diſcouered, the whole matter ſhould waxe fruſtrate: by which meanes Caius might grow more cruell then he was before. See we not (ſaid he) that by F how much liberty we take from our ſelues, by ſo much we augment Caius tyranny? whereas we ought firſt of all to obtaine ſecurity for our ſelues, and afterwards purchaſe perpetuall felicity to others, the greateſt glory whereof ſhall redound vnto our ſelues. Now they hauing nothing to reply againſt ſo honourable a reſolution, and yet notwithſtanding no waies enforcing themſelues towards the action, but remaining altogether diſmaied without one word ſpeaking, Chereas ſpake thus:

Chæreas expecteth the occaſion to aſſaile Caius.

The finall concluſion of the confederates touching Caius death.

Moſt noble and generous Gentlemen, what is the cauſe that we linger and delay in this ſort? See you not that this day is the laſt day of the games, and that Caius is ready to depart to ſea? For he hath determined to ſaile into Alexandria, and to ſee Ægypt: verily it will be a ſmall honour for vs, if we ſuffer him to eſcape our hands, to the end that both by land and ſea, he may triumph ouer the Romans vaine boast and negligence. How can we chuse but condemn our selues iustly, and challenge nothing but dishonor, if some Ægyptian supposing that men of free cõdition could not any longer endure his insolence, should put the matter in execution? For mine owne part, I will dreame no longer vpon your consultations, but this very day I will hazard my selfe; and betide me what can, I will sustaine all fortunes with pleasure and courage. For I am a man of that mind, that no danger can be so great or grieuous to daunt me, as that Caius should be slaine, during my life-time, and I should be depriued of so deserued an honor, which so worthy an attempt may chalenge. This said, he departed with an intent to attempt and end the matter, and encouraged the rest to do the like; so that all of them were desirous to set hand to the enterprize, without any further delay. The custome was, that the captains of the guard entred the palace with their swords by their sides, and in such equipage they asked the Emperor the watch-word. At that time it fortuned that it was Chæreas turne to set the word, when as a great number of people flocked to the palace, to take vp their places to behold the games with great preasse and noise; wherin Caius was greatly delighted: for there was no distinction of place either for Senators or Knights, but each one sate together confusedly, men and women, slaues and freemen. Caius, ariuing there first, had offered sacrifice in honor of Cæsar Augustus, in dignifying whom likewise those sports were solemnized. It came to passe that whilest those beasts were emboweld, that were appointed for sacrifice, Asprenas gown, who at that time was Senator, was besprinkled with blood: whereat Caius began to laugh; yet notwithstanding, this was a presage for Asprenas. For he was slaine that very day that Caius was. It is reported that Caius at that time, contrary to his own nature, behaued himselfe most affably towards all men, so that all the assistants were astonished to behold the courtesy that he vsed. After the sacrifice was done, he sate him down to behold the pastimes, and had about him the most noble of his friends and familiars. Now was there euery yeere a Theater builded, according to this form and fashion that ensueth: It had two gates, the one towards the open yard; the other opening vpon the porch, by which the actors had their egresse and regresse, without disturbance of those who sate to behold the pastime. There was within the same a certain seuerall room, separated from the rest, where the plaiers and musicians kept. When the people were seated, and Chæreas with the captains were neer about Cæsar, who sate on the right side of the Theater: Batibius one of the Senators, a man very expert in feats of Armes, asked Cluuitus priuily in his eare, who sate by him and had in like sort bin Consul, whether he heard any newes? who answering him, that he had heard nothing. On this day (said Batibius) shall the tragedy be plaid of a tyrants death. Cluuitus made him this reply in Homers words:

Whist; lest some Greeke should listen to our talke.

Now whilest some one darted certaine apples and rare and precious birds at the people, Caius tooke great pleasure to behold how they stroue one with another round about him, buffeting one another to see who should get the same: but at that present there chanced two presages: for the sport that was represented, was of a Iudge, who was apprehended and crucified, and in the dance they represented Cynera, who was slaine with Myrrha her daughter: and there was a great quantity of blood gathered to counterfait both the murther of the Iudge that was crucified, as also of Cynera. It is affirmed likewise that the day was the very same, whereon Philip the son of Amyntas King of Macedon, had been slaine by Pausanias one of his familiars, at such time as he entred the Theater. Whilest Caius was incertaine with himselfe whether he should remaine vntill the sports were finisht, for that it was the last day of them, or rather should resort to the bath, and after he had taken his refection, returne back againe thither, as he had done beforetime; Minucianus sitting next vnto him, fearing lest the occasion should be ouerslipt, arose, for that he had seene Chæreas depart out of doores, with an intent to goe and encourage him. But Caius catcht him by the gown, saying, Whither go you my friend? At which time for the reuerence sake that he bare vnto Cæsar, he sate him down againe: but the feare that he had, grew so forcible, that he arose againe; so that Caius could not detaine him, supposing that he departed thence to dispatch some important businesse. At that time did Asprenas counsaile Cæsar to repaire to the bath, telling him that after his refection hee might returne thither againe; all which he did, being desirous that the resolution might take effect. They that were with Chæreas were already disposed to take aduantage of the time, and were agreed each of them to stand prepared and in a readinesse, in a place appointed, to the intent to act the tragedy: and the delay was very grieuous vnto them, for that it was already three a clock after noone. So that Chæreas seeing that Caius lingred so long, intended to go in vnto him and assaile him in his seat: but he conceiued that he could not bring that to passe without great losse and murther of Senators, and Knights that were there present.

A Now although he had this apprehenſion, yet addreſſed he himſelfe to the execution therof, ſup- The yeere of the world, 4003. after Chriſts birth, 41.
poſing that the loſſe that might happen by the death of ſome one, would be well recompenced by the ſecurity and liberty, that would redound vnto all men. When as therefore they were in a readineſſe to enter the Theater, newes was brought them that Caius was riſen to come forth; by means whereof there aroſe ſome noiſe. For which cauſe the confederates turned backe into the Theater, and appeaſed the people, telling them that they diſpleaſed and annoyed the Emperour: but the effect was, to draw him aſide from all thoſe, who might yeeld him any aſſiſtance; and ſo to ſet vpon him. Before Caius marched Claudius his vncle, and M. Minucianus his ſiſters husband and Valerius, who at that time was Proconſul, who might not any waies be drawne from their
B place, although they had the will, by reaſon of the place and dignity which they held. Caius followed after them, accompanied with Paulus Aruntius. Now when he was entred into the palace, heleft the ready way where his officers were, and Claudius with his aſſociates held: he turned aſideby an vnfrequented way to the baths, vpon purpoſe to ſee certaine young boyes, who were come out of Aſia, and were ſent him out of that country, partly to ſing in thoſe ceremonies that were inſtituted by him, and partly to dance in armes about the Theater; and in that place Chæreas came and encountred him, asking him the watch-word: which Caius gaue him very reprochfully according to his cuſtome. For which cauſe without any further delay, Chæreas aſſayling him both in word and act, drew his ſword and gaue him a great wound, which notwithſtanding Caius ſlaine.
C was not mortal: ſome ſay that Chæreas purpoſely wounded him after that ſort, becauſe he would not kill him at once, but to his further torment increaſe the number of his wounds: but I cannot beleeue the ſame, for that in ſuch executions a man hath no leaſure to determine how to ſtrike. And if Chæreas had ſuch an intention, I account him the verieſt foole that might be, for that he rather tooke his pleaſure to content his deſpite, then readily to deliuer both himſelfe & others, who by his delay in being of his confederacy might be drawne into hazard. For if Caius had not beene ſuddenly ſlaine, hee could not haue wanted meanes of reſcous, and it ſhould ſeeme that Chæreas had not pretended to doe ſo much miſchiefe to Caius, as to himſelfe and his fellow confederates. And being in this incertainty, whether his enterprize ſhould haue fallen out happily or no, he had without reaſon both vndone himſelfe and loſt the occaſion: whereas hauing happily hit home, he might without a word ſpeaking, warrantize himſelfe againſt thoſe, who would D offend him. But let each man thinke what beſt pleaſeth him. Caius feeling the griefe of the wound (for he was ſtrooken betwixt the ſhoulder and the neck, and his ſword could not pierce further, by reaſon that it hit vpon the firſt bone of the breſt) he cryed not in any ſort, neither called for any of his friends, whether it were that he diſtruſted them all, or that he had ſom other thought, and in lamenting himſelfe he paſt onward. But he was met by Cornelius Sabinus, who was already prepared to encounter him, who thruſt him downe vpon his knees: whereupon all of them enuironed him round about, and with mutuall exhortations encouraged one another to do their vttermoſt in murthering him. At length in all mens opinion they agreed on this, that it was Aquila that gaue him the deadly wound, that ſeuered his ſoule from his body. But this act ought Aquila gaue Caius his deaths wound: but Chæreas was the author & chiefe actor of the tragedy.
to be attributed to Chæreas. For although diuers ſet to their hands in the action; yet was he the firſt, who had bethought him of the action, hauing long time before any of them premeditated the ſame, after what ſort it ſhould be attempted: and he alſo was the firſt that durſt boldly impart it vnto others, and who after they had allowed of his reſolution aſſembled them: and when as euery one was to ſpeake his opinion, hee concluded the ſame very diſcreetly, and had alwaies done farre more then the reſt; ſo that by his earneſt and honourable perſwaſions, he encouraged thoſe that were faint-hearted, ſince at ſuch time as the opportunity preſented it ſelfe, to ſet hand to the execution, he was the firſt that attempted it, and who valiantly ſtrooke and made an eaſie way to the reſt, who found Caius calme enough, in that he was a man almoſt thorowly ſlaine. For which cauſe, it is neceſſary, that all that which others haue done, ſhould be aſcribed to Chæreas aduice, vertue and diligence.

Thus died Caius, being ſlaughtered with many mortall wounds: now when Chæreas and his companions had diſpatched him, they perceiued well that it would be impoſſible for them to ſaue themſelues, if ſo be they ſhould returne by the way that they came; ſomuch were they raiſhed with that which they had done. For they drew themſelues into no ſmall danger, by murthering an Emperour, who was cheriſhed and beloued through the folly of the common people, and whoſe death the men of warre would not leaue vnpuniſhed. Now in that the waies were narrow where the murther was done, and they themſelues alſo were hindered by reaſon of the great number of people, and officers and ſouldiers that gaue their attendance that day in garding the Emperor, they tooke another way & retired themſelues into Germanicus lodging, who was Caius father, whom they had lately ſlaughtered. This houſe adioyned vpon the palace. For although the palace was but one, yet conſiſted it of diuers lodgings which were builded by ſeuerall Emperours; whoſe names, whether they had begun or finiſhed the workes, were impoſed on the ſame buildings. When as therefore they were eſcaped from the preaſe, they were in ſafety as long as the inconuenience that had befallen the Emperour was as yet hidden. The firſt report of his death came to the Germans who were of his guard, being a company choſen out of that nation named the Celtique band, for the preſeruation of the Emperours perſon. Theſe men are very prone vnto wrath, and amongſt all other Barbarians, it is a rare thing in them to examine the cauſes of their execution: otherwiſe they are men ſtrong in body, and who in the warres alwaies giue the firſt onſet, yelding great aduantage to thoſe on whoſe ſide they fight. They hauing notice of Caius murther, were vehemently aggrieued therat, for that it is their manner to cenſure all things, not according to right, but as they are anſwerable to their own profits: Caius in eſpeciall was dearely beloued by them, in that he had obtained their fauour by beſtowing much money vpon them. Their captaine was one called Sabinus, who was not aduanced to that eſtate, either for his vertue or the nobility of his anceſtors (for he was but a fencer) but for his mighty ſtrength & huge body. They therfore ran about with their naked ſwords ſearching for Cæſars murtherers from houſe to houſe: and meeting with Aſprenas at firſt, whoſe gowne (as we haue ſaid) was bebloodied with the blood of the ſlaughtered ſacrifice, which was a preſage that boaded him but little good fortune, they hewed him in pieces. The ſecond was Norbanus (who for his nobility and anceſtors might deriue his titles from the nobleſt Citizens, amongſt whom were diuers Generals of Armies) who ſeeing they made no reckoning of his dignity, and being of himſelfe endowed with great force and ſtrength, hee tooke a ſword from one of them which firſt aſſailed him; with whom he grapled, and made them know that he intended they ſhould buy his blood very dearely: and indeed ſo had hee done, but that being inuironed by diuers, who aſſailed him at once, he was beaten downe and ſlaughtered with many deadly wounds. The third was Anteius, one of the number of the Senators, who with ſome others met not with theſe men by chance, as the two other had done; but to ſhew the hatred that hee bare vnto Caius, & the pleaſure that he tooke to ſee him lie dead, was come out of his houſe, being egged on with enuy to feed his eyes with that ſpectacle. For Caius had baniſhed Anteius father, whoſe name likewiſe was Anteius, and not content therewith, hee had ſent his ſouldiers to kill him. He therefore with great pleaſure beheld the ſlaughtered carcaſſe of this tyrant: but hearing the vprore that was raiſed in euery part of the houſe, he thought good to hide himſelfe; yet might he not auoid the narrow ſearch of the Germans, who were ſo diſpleaſed, that they ſlew al thoſe whom they met with, whether they were guilty or guiltleſſe of the fact. Thus were theſe three made away.

But after the rumour of Caius death was heard in the Theater, euery one was amazed, and could ſcarcely beleeue it. For although diuers of them were very glad, that he was taken out of the world, perſwading themſelues that it would highly profit them; yet did their feare hinder their beliefe. On the other ſide, there were ſome, who deſiring not that any ſuch miſ-hap ſhould befall Cæſar, and conceiuing in their thoughts, that it was impoſſible to be done, for that there was no man ſo hardy, as to enterprize the ſame; they ſuppoſed the report to bee vtterly vntrue. Of this minde were certaine women and children, ſlaues and ſouldiers. Theſe, by reaſon they receiued wages at his hand, and tyrannized with him, being his miniſters in all thoſe outrages that he offered to many good citizens, in partaking the bootie and other aduantages that Caius drew vnto him. As for the women and children, they were of that opinion, by reaſon that ſuch kinde of people take delight in plaies, ieſts, donations of fleſh, and other ſuch paſtimes, which Caius in word pretended to do to gratifie the common people, but in effect it was to haue means to ſatisfie his rage and cruelty. He was alſo gracious among the ſeruants & ſlaues, for that by him they had the liberty to accuſe and contemne their Maſters, and were therein countenanced by Caius. For when they falſely accuſed their Maſters, they were eaſily beleeued: and when they diſcouered their Maſters treaſures, in recompence of their diſcouery they were not onely made free by him, but alſo ſent home with rich and ample rewards. For the reward that was aſſigned them, was the eighth part of thoſe goods that were confiſcated. As for certaine of the nobility, although the matter ſeemed true to ſome of them, for that before-time they were priuy to that which the reſt intended, and notwithſtanding they deſired that the enterprize ſhould bee effected: yet kept they all things cloſe, and gaue no ſigne of ioy, nor made any ſhew that they heard that

What ſort of people they were that lamented Caius death.

A that which was reported. For ſome of them feared leſt if they ſhould be fruſtrated of their hope, they ſhould bring themſelues in danger of puniſhment, for that they had diſcouered their intent ſooner then they ſhould haue done. They likewiſe who knew the enterprize and were confederates with the actors; yet did they more cloſely conceale it the one from the other, fearing leſt if they ſhould diſcouer the matter to any one of thoſe, who drew any commodity from Caius tyranny, they might bewray them: whereby if Caius ſhould be yet aliue, they might incurre the danger of puniſhment. For the voice was, that he had been wounded in certaine places; yet that he was not ſlaine; but as yet aliue, and among his Phyſicians hands, who dreſſed his wounds. No man therefore durſt liberally diſcouer the ſecrets of his heart to his neighbour: for they that B ſpred thoſe reports, were either friends (and for that cauſe were ſuſpected as fauourers of his tyranny) or enemies, and by that meanes in that they were but ſiniſterly affected towards Caius, there was no certainty to be gathered of that which they ſaid. There aroſe alſo another report, which abaſhed and beat downe the hearts and hopes of the nobility, namely, that Caius ſetting light by the danger wherein he was, and as little alſo by the wounds he had receiued, was come into the market place all bloody as he was, and after that manner declaimed before the people. See here how they that ſpred theſe rumours, preferred their coniectures, which were void of all reaſon; which diſtracted thoſe vncertainly that heard the ſame, according as they were affectioned. This notwithſtanding no man remooued from his place, for feare leſt they ſhould be ſuddenly accuſed, knowing well that they ſhould be cenſured, not according to their thoughts and C affections, but according to the diſpoſition of their Iudges and accuſers.

Diuers rumors of Cæſars death.

But after that the troupe of Germans had inuironed the Theater with their naked ſwords, all the aſſiſtants expected nothing but death; and as ſoone as any man entred, they were ſeized with ſuch an amazement, as if they had already felt the ſtrokes; ſo that they knew not what to do, hauing no heart to depart from thence: and otherwiſe perſwading themſelues, that if they ſtayed there any longer, it would breed them further danger. Finally, when the ſouldiers were entred into the Theater by force, all the whole aſſemblie cried out, and beſought them, proteſting that whatſoeuer was done, it was beſides their knowledge, whether it were either attempted by conſpiracy, or any other meanes. They therefore moſt humbly intreated them, that they would ſpare them, and not inflict the penalty of the guilty on thoſe that were innocent for their owne parts, D they beſought them to ſearch out thoſe, who had cõmitted the act, if any ſuch thing were committed. And thus ſpake they with teares, beating their breſts, and calling the gods to witneſſe, alledging all that which the preſent danger ſuggeſted them with, and as much as ſuch as pleaded for their liues could proffer. By theſe perſwaſions of theirs the ſouldiers fury was abated; ſo that they began to repent themſelues of that which they had executed in the Theater: for this alſo was a cruelty, as they themſelues (notwithſtanding their barbarous inciuility) ſuppoſed it to be, which was, that the heads of Aſprenus and other that were ſlaine, were carried and ſet vpon an Altar. Whereat all the aſſiſtants were moſt grieuouſly diſcontented, remembring themſelues of the dignity of the men, and hauing compaſſion of that which had befallen them, conſidering alſo that they themſelues were not farre off from dangers, being vncertaine whether they ſhould E ſaue themſelues: whereby it came to paſſe, that ſome of thoſe, who had for good cauſe hated Caius, durſt not freely reioyce at his death, becauſe they were vpon the point to loſe their owne liues, hauing as yet no appearance of any ſafety.

The German ſouldiers reſort to the Theater.

At length Aruntius, a man who was gracious among the people, and was one of the common cryers, who had a ſtrong voice, and by crying ſuch goods as were to be ſold, had gathered ſo great ſubſtance, as that he was accounted one of the richeſt men in Rome, and in great eſtimation amongſt all men in that behalfe, entred the Theater in a mourning habit, and after a lamentable manner: and although he inwardly hated Caius, yet for the feare hee conceiued leſt hee ſhould loſe his goods, and in conſideration of the preſent danger, he diſſembled his ioy, wearing all thoſe garments of mourning, and vſing no leſſe lamentation then if hee had bemoaned the F death of his deareſt friend. After this manner came he into the Theater, publiſhing Caius death, to the intent that the people might not be ignorant of that which had hapned: after this, he began to repreſſe the rage of the Germans, and commanded their captaines and tribunes to put vp their ſwords, certifying them of the Emperours death, which act of his did manifeſtly ſaue the liues of all thoſe, who were aſſembled in the Theater; and all them likewiſe, whom they could haue met with. For if they had had but the leaſt ſurmize, that Caius had as yet beene aliue, there was not any ſort of cruelty which they had not committed. For they bare him ſo great loue and affection, that to warrantize him frõ that miſ-hap, they would haue redeemed him with the loſſe of their own liues. But as ſoon as they vnderſtood that he was dead, they repreſſed their furious rage, which egged them forward to reuenge: knowing that it auailed them nothing to diſcouer their affections towards him, in that he could yeeld them no requitall. Beſides, the feare they had leſt that in purſuit of their tyrannous murthers, the Senate ſhould be incenſed againſt them, if ſo be the gouernment of the eſtate ſhould be returned into their hands, made them containe themſelues. Thus was the fury of theſe Germans appeaſed for the death of Caius.

Chæreas, Minucianus, and Clement conſult about Cæſars death.

Meane-while Chæreas (who feared very much leſt Minucianus ſhould fall into the Germans hands, and in their fury be ſlaughtered by them) ſought for him among the ſouldiers, enquiring of euery one whether they knew if he were ſlaine or no. Wherupon Minucianus and Clement were brought vnto him, who in his preſence commended Chæreas exploit, and gaue him thanks in the name of the whole Senate, who witneſſed that it was to the generall benefit and good of the common-weale, and that the greateſt perſons were beholding to him, for that hee had neither wanted good aduice in his deliberation, nor courage to execute his reſolution; alledging that the nature of tyranny was ſuch, that being puffed vp with a ſhort pleaſure of vniuſt and intolerable rule, it finally (as being hated by all good men) determined and ended in miſery, as it manifeſtly appeared in that which had befallen Caius; who before any thing was either deuiſed, practized or executed againſt him, was already hatefull to all men, and had in ſuch ſort violated all lawes; that his greateſt friends were reſolued to take armes againſt him, who in appearance had depriued him of life, when both in truth and in effect it was he himſelfe, who was the author of his owne ruine.

Arcion a certain Phyſician diſmiſſeth ſome.

Hereupon all they aroſe who were in the Theater, and raiſed great noiſe and trouble in ſeeking to ſaue themſelues. The occaſion was, that a certaine Phyſician called Arcion, being called out to goe and dreſſe certaine men that were wounded, making a ſhew as if he went to goe and prepare ſuch things, as were neceſſary for thoſe that were wounded, made thoſe iſſue out with him who ſate neereſt vnto him: but the truth was, that he did it to the end to draw them out of the preſent danger. Meane-while the Senate aſſembled themſelues in the Palace, and the people flocked together to make enquiry after thoſe, who had murthered Caius: the people with an intire and ſimple intent, the Senate only to vſe ſome formall proceeding. For Valerius Aſiaticus, who had otherwhiles been Conſull, came forth among the people, who were in an vprore; and ſuppoſing it a ſtrange matter that no man knew who had ſlain the Emperor, whileſt euery one enquired who it was that had done the deed: O ſaid hee, would it had been I that had done it. But the Conſuls publiſhed an edict, containing the accuſations that were preſented againſt Caius, commanding the people and ſouldiers, who were as yet in the Theater, to retire themſelues to their lodgings. And the people were put in great hope, that they ſhould be eaſed of thoſe taxations, wherewith before time they had been burthened: and the men of war were promiſed honors and dignities, if they would containe themſelues in their accuſtomed order, and ſtirre vp no further trouble. For it was to be feared, leſt if they had been further fleſhed in ſlaughters, the City ſhould haue fallen into ſome great danger through rapines and ſpoiles both of houſes and temples. But by this time all the whole order of the Senate were aſſembled, eſpecially thoſe who were confederates in Caius murther; who ſeemed to gather courage, and to ſpeake boldly, as if the gouernment of the eſtate had been fallen into their hands.

Hedio and Ruffinus, cha. 2.

WHILEST the eſtate of the Empire was thus diſtracted, Claudius was ſuddenly fetcht out of his houſe: For the ſouldiers aſſembling themſelues together, and conferring among themſelues what was requiſit to be done, perceiued that it was impoſſible, that ſo many and ſo waighty affairs of the common-weale ſhould be well diſpoſed by a popular gouernment; and that this change alſo would yeeld thē little profit, if ſome of thoſe who were in authority ſhould happen to obtain the ſoueraigne gouernment. Furthermore, that it would be euery way preiudiciall vnto them, if they had not a part of the gouernance, and a hand in the adminiſtration of the common-weale. Whileſt therefore the ſoueraigne authority remained as yet vndiſpoſed, they thought meet to elect Claudius, who was Caius vncle, for their Emperour; who was a man of that reputation, that none of thoſe, who had been aſſembled in the Senate, was more capable then he was, both in regard of the vertue of his anceſtors, as alſo in reſpect of the doctrin wherewith he was endowed. Who likewiſe being by them exalted to the dignity of the Empire, would honor them, and with all anſwerable bounty acknowledge their good deſerts. This concluſion of theirs was both admitted, and preſently executed: ſo that Claudius was receiued and elected Emperor by the men of war. But Cnaius Sentius Saturninus hauing intelligence that Claudius was in this ſort elected (who in appearance ſeemed vertuouſly to contradict, but in effect deſired nothing more) preſented himſelfe before the Senate: and being neither amated nor amazed in any ſort, he freely ſpake his minde; and as it became his birth and nobility, he ſpake vnto the aſſembly after the maner that enſueth:

Cnaius Sentius Saturninus declaimeth in the Senate.

Liberty a precious thing.

You Lords of Rome, although it be an incredible matter, that the liberty which hath ſo long time been vnexpected, ſhould returne and viſit vs; yet ſo it is, that we ſee the excellency thereof; although it be vncertaine how long time the Gods will beſtow it on vs: which is ſuch, that it may reioyce vs for the preſent; what iſſue ſoeuer it may haue hereafter. For to them that know what vertue is, it is no ſmall felicity to liue one houre in freedome of mind, and in a free country gouerned by ſuch lawes, which in times paſt haue made our common-weale to flouriſh. For mine own part, I cannot remember our ancient liberty, for that I was borne after the ſubuerſion thereof: But I infinitly deſire to haue the happy fruition of that which we enioy at this preſent. And I think them alſo very happy, who are borne and brought vp in vertuous ſtudies. I likewiſe ſuppoſe that a ſecond honour next to the immortall Gods is to bee aſcribed to them, by whoſe vertue at laſt though very late euen in this our age, wee haue obtained the felicity to enioy the ſame; which happineſſe would God with our inheritances we might bequeath to our poſterity. For in regard of our ſelues, this day ſufficeth vs both, as well all thoſe that are yong as they alſo who are old. For the aged ſhall forſake this life with more pleaſure, in that they haue had the knowledge of that bleſſing which is annexed to their liberty: and the yonger ſhall be furniſhed with a royall example in admiring and knowing their vertues, by whom we enioy this benefit of freedom. For in regard of the preſent time, there is not any thing that we ought more earneſtly to affect, then to liue vertuouſly. For only vertue is the thing that confirmeth men in their liberty. I cannot ſpeake of the time paſt, but only by hearſay: but for that I haue ſeen with mine eyes, and perceiued by my obſeruation, I know how great miſchiefes tyrannies do ordinarily breed in a politike eſtate: for they vtterly extinguiſh all vertue, and depriue freemen of all that perfect magnanimity that may be in them, and teach both to flatter and to feare, for that the common-weale is abandoned not to the wiſedome of the lawes, but to the fury of intemperate gouernours. For ſince Iulius Cæſar bent his thoughts to ouerthrow the popular gouernment in Rome, and violated that happy courſe of law, whereby our ſtate was policied, the common-weale hath been ouerthrowne. For in ſubiecting the law to his good liking, and himſelf to his particular deſires, there is not any kind of miſery and miſchiefe, that hath not ouerthrown our city; ſo that his ſucceſſors haue imploied themſelues to the vttermoſt, and with a certain emulation, to aboliſh the lawes of our country, ſtriuing which of them might deſpoile our common-weale of her nobleſt citizens: for that they haue made their account, that their ſecurity conſiſted in communicating their ſecrets with ſuch as were baſe and abiect; abaſing not only the hauty courages of thoſe men, who were famous for their nobility and vertue, but alſo by ſlaughtering a great number of them by all ſorts of puniſhment: and whileſt each of them laboured to be abſolute in their command, they enforced themſelues to oppreſſe the common-weale.

Liberty purchaſed by vertue.

Tyrannies breed many miſchiefes in common-weales.

Iulius Cæſar.

But amongſt all the reſt, Caius, who this day hath loſt the benefit of life, hath wrought greater miſchiefes himſelfe alone, then any other, by inforcing his brutiſh and beaſtly wrath not onely againſt the common citizens, but alſo againſt his owne parents and friends; demeaning himſelfe alike towards all men, and manifeſting his vniuſtice in that he purſued them with moſt iniury, who were moſt innocent: and by this meanes grew hatefull not onely to men, but alſo to the immortall Gods. For it is not enough for tyrants to ſatisfie their concupiſcence, to vſe all ſorts of outrages, to rauiſh both mens wealth and their wiues; but alſo their gaine and glory is, when they may vtterly ruinate both their fortunes and families, who are their enemies. For all liberty is oppoſed againſt tyranny, and it is impoſſible (notwithſtanding al the miſeries that it may be imagined or offered) that freemen ſhould accord with tyrants, how little time ſoeuer it be that they haue exerciſed their tyranie. They alſo know too well with how many miſchiefes they haue entangled their ſubiects (although they haue not the ſpirits to reuenge themſelues of thoſe wrongs that are done vnto them) and being well aſſured into what incombrances they haue drawn them, perſwade themſelues, that they haue but one only meanes left them to warrantize themſelues from ſuſpicions; and to procure their owne ſecurity, which is, to put them to death,

if they may possibly doe it. Sith therefore at this present you are deliuered from so many mischiefes, and are no more subiect, except to one another (which is a pledge of concord for the present, and of security in time to come, and glory vnto him that hath redressed the estate) you shall deale very well and wisely in my opinion to prouide for the common-weale, foreseeing very diligently all that which concerneth the good and profit thereof. It is free for any man to speake his opinion of that which displeaseth him, for that there is no superiour to countermand their sayings, or that is exempt from reproofe if hee offend against the common-weale, or that may threaten with the authority of an Emperor for that shall be said. For what else in these later times hath increased and furthered our ouer-topping tyranny, then their slouthfull feare, who durst in no sort oppose themselues against his lust? For being entangled by a certain kind of pleasure of a quiet life, and accustomed to liue after the manner of slaues, and being afraid also to dye vertuously, and desirous to liue with shame, we are fallen into these scarce sufferable calamities, and into such mischiefes as haue concerned vs too neerely. First of all therfore, you ought to honour those, who haue slaine the tyrant, by dignifying them with as great honors as may be imagined, and especially Chæreas. For he only hath bin the man, who by the power of the gods, and through his great wisedome & valour, hath giuen you your liberty. Neither ought you to forget him, but to heape honors on his head, yea especiall fauours, as to the man who first of all consulted, and first of all hazarded himselfe against a tyrant for your liberty. It is an honest and well beseeming action in men of free hearts, to restore and repay condigne kindnes for the benefits that they haue receiued: such is this man in your behalfe, not like to Brutus & Cassius, who murthered Cæsar; for they were the originals of seditions & ciuill wars in this city: and this man by the death of a tyrant, hath not only at once deliuered you of him, but also hath cut off all those mischiefes that arose by him.

An exhortation to maintain liberty.

Chæreas to be honoured for his noble attempt.

Thus spake Sentius, and his aduice was entertained with great applause, not onely by the Senators, but the knights also that were there present. Whereupon a certaine Senator called Trebellius Maximus arose, and stepping to him, pulled off the ring which Sentius had on his finger, wherein was inchased a stone with Caius picture in it, which Sentius had forgot to pull off: so intent was he about that which he both said and did: and by this meanes the engraued image was broken. Now for that it was late, Chæreas demanded the watch-word at the Consuls hands, who gaue him the word Liberty. Thus all of them were astonished at this change, and could scarcely beleeue that which had hapned. For since that time that the popular gouernment had been abolished, the Consuls had neuer giuen the watchword vntill that present time. For before the city was oppressed by tyranny, the Consuls commanded the men of warre. After that Chæreas had receiued the word, he gaue it to his souldiers, who subscribed to the Senats authority: of these there were about foure companies, which preferred the lawfull gouernment before a tyranny, who also retired themselues to their chieftaines. As for their parts, the people returned to their seuerall houses, full of ioy, hope, and courage, for that they had regained the gouernment of the state, which belonged vnto them, and not to any particular gouernour. In a word, Chæreas was their only hope: He foreseeing that there would some mischiefe follow, if Caius wife & daughter should remaine aliue; and that if all his friends and family should not be vtterly extinguished, all those who should bee spared, would serue to no other end, but to the ruine of the common-weale and the lawes: and on the other side, desiring to see a finall end of that which he had begun, and to satisfie that hatred he had conceiued against Caius, he sent Iulius Lupus one of the captains of the guard, to kill both his wife and daughter, which he did. And the cause why hee gaue this charge chiefly to Lupus, was, for that Lupus was Clements kinsman, who was a confederate in the execution of Caius; to the end that partaking after this manner the death of the tyrant, he might be knowne to haue dealt as forwardly for the common-weale, as if from the beginning he had bin a counseller & agent in the conspiracy. Notwithstanding, there were some of his companions of that opinion, that it should be but cruelty to deale with a woman in that sort, for that Caius had offended through the corruption of his owne nature, and not by the counsell of his wife; and that all those euils which he committed in the common-weale, by desolating the flower thereof, was his owne offence, not hers.

Chæreas sendeth Iulius Lupus to kill Caius wife & daughter.

There were others that accused her to be the cause of all that which Caius had committed, alledging that she had giuen him an amorous drinke, by which he was tied and entangled in such sort vnto her, and so led & transported by her loue, that she gouerned all that which concerned the estate of Rome, and the world subiect to Rome; but her defenders preuailed nothing. For finally it was resolued, that she should lose her life.

To

A To finish this tragedy, Lupus was dispatcht, who lost no time in the accomplishment of their intent who had sent him, for feare he had to be blamed, and accounted but coldly affectionate towards the good of the common-weale. As soon as therfore he came into the palace, he found Cæsonia, Caius widow, lying fast by the body of her slaughtered husband, destitute of all that which the law gratifieth those that are dead with, altogether bloody & greatly afflicted, hauing her daughter fast couched by her. Being in this estate, she was heard to vtter no other words, but that she blamed Caius, for that he had not giuen credit to that counsell which she had giuen him sooften: which words of hers, were by certaine of them interpreted two waies. For some of them thought that she meant, that she had counselled her husband to giue ouer his cruelty, and B murthers which he exercised against his citizens; & that in his gouernment he should vse a tempered measure with vertue, for feare lest his subiects misliking of his manners, should seeke his destruction. Others tooke it as if she had encouraged Caius to set vpon the conspirators and kill them, without any delay; yea, before they had committed any offence, and by that means prouide for his security. They therefore said, that Cæsonia blamed Caius for that hee had behaued himselfe too carelesly, in that wherein she had counselled him. Such were the words Cæsonia spake, and such was the exposition, as diuers men interpreted the same.

Cæsonia accuseth Caius, for that hee would not giue credit to her counsels.

She seeing Lupus comming, shewed him Caius body, and besought him with teares and complaints to come no neerer. But perceiuing that he continued in his resolution, & made no account of her words, but did that for which he came, after that she knew the cause of his arriuall, she of- C fred her naked throat vnto him, with a great courage, vsing such supplications as they ordinarily do who despaire of their liues. For she willed him to defer no longer, to finish that tragedy which his companions had begun, & died in this sort courageously by the hand of Lupus: and after her was her daughter slain, which was very yong. This did Lupus certifie Chæreas of with all expedition. This was Caius end, after he had liued foure yeers, wanting foure months. Before such time as he obtained the Empire, he was an intemperate & wicked man, and addicted to his pleasure, a fauourer of tale-bearers, exceeding fearefull, and for that cause, when he got the vpper hand of any man, he was ready to kill him. He esteemed this the only fruit of his power, when he abused the same against innocents; and gathered or heaped vp great spoiles and booties by wicked and vniust murthers, rapines and oppressions; lifting himselfe aboue all humane authority, and af- D fecting to be esteemed as a God, suffering himselfe to be transported by the peoples praises. Furthermore, all that which the law condemned and punished, as a thing most detestable, that made he vse of to punish vertue with. He neuer remembred any friendship that had beene done him, how great soeuer it either was or had bin, at such time as he was in his choler, and was apt to inflict punishments in his rage on iust & vpright men. All that which was answerable to vertue, was odious in his eyes: In all things that him listed he had so violent appetites, that it was impossible to contradict him; so that he was not ashamed to vse the vnlawfull company of his owne sister: whereby it came to passe, that the Citizens of Rome began to hate him extremely, for that the like matter had not beene seene nor heard of: of a long time men could not beleeue the same, yet notwithstanding they sufficiently expressed the hatred they bare against the fact he E had committed. It cannot be said of him, that he builded any work beseeming his royall magnificence worthy the mentioning, or profitable either to the present or future world, except some ports that he made neere to Rhegium and Sicilia, for harbour of such ships as came & went into Egypt for corne, which doubtlesse is a goodly and mighty work, and very profitable for such as trauell by sea. True it is, that it was not brought to perfection, but only halfe finished, because the workemen trauelled leasurely. But the chiefe cause thereof was, that he spent his study in vnprofitable matters, and loued rather to consume his substance to feed his owne priuate lusts wherein he tooke great delight, then to erect and build any goodly or famous worke, which might haue redounded to the profit of the common-weale. Otherwise he was a man well spoken, and very expert in the Greek & vulgar Roman tongues, apprehending presently, that which others said: F and although they had spent long time in discouering their minds; yet answered he them vpon the instant, and in affaires of consequence hee had such a mouing perswasion and power, as no man could exceed him, both in regard of his quick spirit & easie apprehension, as of the exercise and paine he had taken. For being Tiberius brothers sonne, whose successour also he was, he was enforced to be studious, seeing that Tiberius, who was of the same yeeres, was in like manner excellently learned. Caius therfore inforced himselfe to imitate the Emperor Tiberius whose neere kinsman he was, and surpassed all those that were in Rome at that time; yet notwithstanding, all these great aduantages, which his good instruction had bred in him, could not hinder the the misfortune that befel him, by the abuse of his authority. So rare a thing it is to see them, who haue liberty to do what they list without punishment, to gouerne themselues with modesty. In the beginning he tooke delight in the friendship of very honest men, to get credit & reputation, thinking to outstrip the most excellent: but after he was giuen ouer to licentiousnes, the affection that he bare them was changed; and in stead thereof, he grew in hatred of them from day to day: whereby they were inforced to conspire against him, and seeke his ruine.

Now, as I haue heretofore declared, Claudius vnderstanding of that which had befallen Caius his Nephew, and seeing all his house wholly troubled, for this occasion was in such distrust, that he knew not what to do to saue himselfe: but went and hid himselfe in a certain corner, where he was surprized, hauing no other cause to apprehend his danger, except his nobility. For during the time that he liued a priuate man, he behaued himselfe modestly, kindly, and fauourably vnto all men, being well seene in the Sciences, and principally in the Greeke tongue, shunning as much as in him lay, all tumult & train that might breed trouble. When as therfore the people at that time were wholly amazed at the trouble, and the palace was repleniſhed with souldier-like fury and feare, & nothing raigned more in generall then confusion & disorder; the souldiers of the guard, who were the most experienced & hardy amongst the men of warre, consulted amongst themselues what course they were to take. Neither were they much discontented with Caius death, in that they supposed that vpon iust occasion, he was done to death: for which cause they rather bethought themselues on that which concerned their estates, and how they might assure themselues in those dangers, seeing the Germans were wholly bent against those, who had slaughtred Caius; rather incited thereunto of their owne cruell natures, then of any good affection they had towards the welfare of the common-weale. All which things troubled Claudius, and put him in feare of his life, the rather for that he saw Asprenas head, and the rest of the nobility that were massacred, carried about to be seen: for this cause he kept himselfe in a certaine place, which was, onely accessible by certaine steps or staires, and hid himselfe therein, because it was obscure. In that place one of the souldiers of the palace, called Gratus, being vnable to discerne who he was, in regard of the obscurity of the place, and, supposing him to be some one that desired to be concealed, he drew neere vnto him, to the intent he might the better know him: And when as Claudius besought him that he would depart and leaue him, he passed the more onwards, and laying hold of him and drawing him into the light, knew him; crying out to those that followed him; This is Germanicus, let vs take hold of him, and create him Emperour. Claudius perceiuing that he was ready to be attached, & fearing lest they should put him to death in the like maner as they had done Caius, besought them that they would pardon him, protesting vnto them his innocencie, and how he had in no sort been either accessary or agent in that which had bin done. Wherupon Gratus beginning to smile, tooke him by the hand, saying, that he had no cause in that sort to suspect his life: For (said he) it behoueth thee to pull vp thy spirits, and to bethink thee how to gouerne an Empire, of which the gods (who haue the care of the whole world) haue despoiled Caius, to reward thy vertue with. Arise therefore and take possession of the throne of thine ancestors. This said, he lifted him on his shoulders, for that Claudius could not walke on foot, through the feare and ioy that he had conceiued of that which had beene told him.

Vpon these speeches diuers of the souldiers of the guard assembled about Gratus: and perceiuing that it was Claudius, whom they supposed to be dragged to his death, they had compassion of him as on an innocent, for that they knew him to be a man of milde nature, who all the time of his life intermeddled with nothing, and who in like sort had bin often in great danger during Caius life. There were others of them that said, that the iudgement of his matter pertained to the Consuls: whereupon, although a great number of souldiers flocked about him, and the simple people that were vnarmed, fled from them; yet could not Claudius goe onward in his way; so weake and feeble felt he himselfe in his whole body. It fortuned likewise, that they who carried his litter, perceiuing his flight, fled away for feare, and left him; so little hope had they that their Master should escape with his life, whom they saw to be thus drawn by the soldiers. Now when Gratus & his associats were arriued in the court of the palace, which (as it is reported) is the place which was first of all inhabited in Rome, they began to thinke vpon that which was to be done: thither also there flocked a great number of other soldiers vnto them, who tooke pleasure to behold Claudius, enforcing themselues to place him in the Imperiall dignity, in regard of that good affection which they bare to Germanicus his brother, whose memory was much honored among all those, who had at any time conuersed with him. Moreouer, they ripped vp how many auaricious acts the Senate had cõmitted, & how great errors the chiefest Senators had defaulted in, before fore the publike gouernment was changed. Moreouer, they considered vpon the danger & difficulty of their actions then in hand, for that the gouernment being administred by one only man, would bee dangerous for them, if he should obtaine the same by any other meanes; whereas if Claudius should enioy the same by their permission & good will, he would haue them in remembrance who had fauoured him, and would recompence them according to their merits. This was the effect of their discourse, which they held among themselues, or when they met with one another. Finally, all of them at length concluded vpon this aduice, and enuironed Claudius, and lifting him vp vpon their shoulders, they carried him into the army, to the intent that no man might hinder them to finish that which they intended. There fell a debate also betwixt the Senators and citizens: For the Senate desirous to recouer their former dignity, & enforcing themselues to auoid the seruitude that had befallen them by the out-rage of Tyrants, intended the maintenance of their offered good fortune. Contrariwise, the people enuied them that dignity. And knowing that their Emperors should be as it were certaine bridles, to restraine the auarice of the Senate, and the refuge of the people, they were very glad to see that Claudius was aduanced: making their account that if he were created Emperour, they should auoid a ciuill warre like vnto that which hapned in Pompeius time.

Claudius carried on mens shoulders into the army.

Difference betwixt the citizens and Senators.

The Senate knowing that Claudius was carried into the army by the soldiers, chose out some of their order, and now sent them as messengers in their behalfe, to signify vnto him that he ought to vse no violence in obtaining the Empire, but rather to remit the charge of the common-weale to the Senate. That he both was and should be one of the Senators, and haue the conduct of the common-weale, and dispose it according to law, perswading him to call vnto his remembrance those grieuous mischiefs, which the former tyrants had wrought in the common-weale, & what dangers he himselfe had also suffered with them, during the raigne of Caius their late Emperor. That it should ill become him, who had detested the fury of others tyranny at such time as they vsed outrages, now willingly to be drawne to oppose himselfe against his country. That if he would obey them, and continue to expresse the vertue and constancy of his life, which in times past he led with commendation, he should obtaine those honors which free citizens could affoord him; and in suffring himselfe to be gouerned by lawes, to the end he might haue part in the commandement, and to be commanded in his turne, he should obtaine the praise of vertue. That if he should not be disswaded by the slaughter of Caius, wch was fresh in memory, for their own parts they would hinder his proceedings as much as in them lay. They also alledged, that they were furnished with men of warre, with store of armor, and a great number of domesticall seruants, all which they would imploy against him: But ouer and aboue these things, they had farre greater helps, namely their hope, and good fortune, and the gods, who are wont to fight for those who maintaine vertue and goodnes. They solemnly protested also for their own parts, that they were of that mind, that there was nothing more honest and iust, then to fight for their liberty and country. The Embassadors that brought this message, were Veranius and Broccus, who both of them were Tribunes of the people. They prostrating themselues on their knees before him, humbly besought him that he would not draw the common-weale into ciuill war. And seeing that Claudius was inclosed with a great company of men of warre, in respect of whom the Consuls were of no force, they besought him that it would please him to demand the gouernment at the Senates hands, and receiue it from them if he were resolued to be Emperor; for that it would be an act more holy, and coupled with iustice and good hap, if he should obtaine the same with their good will, and not in despight of those, who would vouchsafe it him willingly.

The Senate perswade Claudius to resigne the dignity offered him.

Chap. III.

The sedition that arose betweene the Senate and the people.

Although Claudius knew with what presumption the Senate had sent this Embassage, yet did he modestly entertaine the same for the present. But supposing that it stood very little with his security to commit himselfe to their trust, and being encouraged by the exhortation of the souldiers, who promised him their vtmost endeauour, and by the incitation of King Agrippa, he determin'd in no sort to let the soueraignty escape out of his hands, in that it was so willingly and freely bestowed on him when he thought least on it. After that Agrippa had performed all those duties vnto Caius which were requisit for such a one as had bin by him aduanced to honor, and hauing taken his body and laid it in a litter, he brought him out before the souldiers of his guard, and certified them that Caius was yet aliue, and for that he found himselfe selfe sick of those wounds which he had receiued, he sent to seek for Physicions. But afterward, vnderstanding that Claudius was taken by the men of warre, he thrust so much that he got himselfe passage, and came vnto him, whom hee found altogether dismaid, and ready to surrender all things into the Senates hands, and incouraged him, and incited him to take vpon him the gouernment of the Empire which the men of war had offered him. Which done, he departed, and was suddenly sent for by the Senate, whither he resorted altogether perfumed with odors, as if at that time he were returned from some banquet, and had known nothing of that which had happened: Hee therefore asked the Senators what was become of Claudius, who certified him of the truth; and besides that required him to giue them his opinion and counsell as touching the present affaires: his answer was, that he was ready to aduenture his life in the behalfe of the Senate; yet by the way he told them that they ought to haue an especiall regard of the common-weale, rather then all the pleasure they could pretend; and that they who would bee Lords of an Empire, had need of armes and men to maintaine themselues, lest being weake and vnfurnished, they should be deceiued in their expectations. The Senate replied that they had great store of furniture, and that they would contribute money; that they had good store of men of war, to whom they would annex their slaues and giue them liberty. But Agrippa replied, Would God, graue fathers, that you were able to performe the matters you intend; yet will I not feare to discouer that vnto you, which concerneth you neerely. You know well, that the army which is with Claudius, consisteth of such men, who haue beene long time trained vp in feates of armes; and that those that are to fight on your side, are but men gathered together, and such as you couple them with, are the very scum of your slaues, who are both intractable and vntrained. We shall therfore enter fight against expert souldiers, and commit our fortunes to such men as scarcely know how to draw their swords: I rather thinke it meet that we send vnto Claudius such men, as may perswade him to giue ouer the Empire. And to performe this message, behold my selfe in a readines to be commanded by you.

Claudius confirmed in his resolutions by Agrippa.

Agrippa telleth the Senat his opinion.

To this effect spake Agrippa; And hereunto the Senators accorded, and sent him to Claudius, appointing him certaine others to accompany him. As soone as he came to Claudius, he secretly discouered vnto him in what perplexity the Senate was, & gaue him instructions to answer and demeane himselfe like an Emperor, and to shew his dignity and power. Wherupon Claudius gaue the Embassadors this answer; That he wondred not that the Senat were so vnwilling to be commanded by a soueraigne, in regard of that cruelty which the forepassed Emperors had vsed to their destruction. But for the present, they should taste of his mercy, and feele his moderate rule; and they should liue vnder the gouernment of such a one, who although in name he had the Imperiall authority; yet that in effect he would gouerne all things by their disposition. For which cause he wished them in no sort to distrust him, whom as they themselues could witnes, they haue seen and known to haue dealt vertuously & iustly in many affaires, although the state of times had bin far different. Those that were sent from the Senate hearing these words, returned back again. But Claudius instantly assembled his men of war, and exacted an oath of fidelity from them, bestowing on euery one of them who were of his guard in way of largesse, fiue thousand drachmes, amounting to some 25. pound a man of our sterling money. He presented their Captaines also with presents answerable to their qualities, promising to performe no lesse bounty to all the rest of the men of war, in what place soeuer they were. Hereupon the Consuls assembled the Senate in the temple of Iupiter the victorious, before day, and some of them hid themselues through the feare they had of that which should be spoken: othersome departed out of the City, and resorted to their country farmes, foreseeing with themselues the issue of all these things: and perceiuing that their hope of liberty was lost, they thought it far better for them to be exempt from danger, and to passe their life in repose, though it were with subiection, then to bee altogether vncertaine of their security & safety, by maintaining the dignity of the Senators: yet about some hundreth of them drew themselues together and no more. Now whilest they were consulting vpon that which they were to doe, they suddenly heard a shout of Soldiers that were assembled round about them, requiring the Senate to chuse them an Emperor, and not to suffer their state to be lost through a multitude of gouernours: and to this effect spake they, lest the gouernment should be giuen to diuers, and not to one. This course of theirs gaue little content to the Senators, both in regard of the losse of that liberty which they expected, as through the good liking they had of Claudius; notwithstanding there were some that pretended some hope to bee aduanced both in respect of the nobility of their race, as in regard of their alliance that they had by marriage with the Cæsars. Another Minutianus alſo, one of Caius tutors withdrew Valerius Aſiaticus from thinking on thoſe things: and there had hapned as great a ſlaughter as had euer beene heard of, had any of theſe had the liberty to deſire the Empire, or oppoſe themſelues againſt Claudius. For amongſt other, the fencers, who were of no ſmall number, they of the watch, and the ſailers ioyned themſelues together with the men of warre. They therefore that pretended to demand the Empire, gaue ouer their ſuites, partly in the cities behalfe, partly for their owne priuate ſecuritie ſake.

About the day-ſpring Chæreas and his companions went forth to debate the matter with the
B ſoldiers: but they ſeeing by the beckening with their hands they would draw them to ſilence, and were vpon the inſtant to fall into diſcourſe, made a great noyſe to cut them off from proceeding any further, for that all of them were earneſtly affected to haue an Emperour & Soueraigne Lord, and required with all expedition that they might haue one proclaimed and knowne. At that time the Senate were ſo diſtracted, both for the maner how they ſhold command, as for the meanes they ought to vſe to cauſe themſelues to be obeied, conſidering the ſouldiers ſet light by them; and thoſe that were confederates in the death of Caius, ſuffered not the Senate to obey the ſouldiers. At length Chæreas being vnable to conceale his paſſion wherwith he was ſurprized, & hearing that they asked for a Monarch, promiſed that he wold giue them one, if they wold bring him a token from Eutychus, who was the wagoner to the greene band, whom Caius had loued ex-
C tremely, in ſomuch as he imployed his ſouldiers in ſeruile labours, as to build him ſtables for his horſes, & reproched them with diuers like matters, telling them that he wold bring them Claudius head, ſhewing them that it was a matter ill beſeeming them, if after a mad man they ſhould commend the Empire to a foole. Yet none of theſe words could diuert them from their purpoſe: but all of them drew their ſwords, & with diſplayed enſignes marched towards Claudius to vnite themſelues with thoſe, who had already bound themſelues by an oath to ſerue him faithfully. So that the Senate was abandoned, & deſtitute of al defence; ſo as there was no diffrence betwixt priuate men & Conſuls. All of them were aſtoniſhed & confuſed, not knowing what to do, becauſe they had thus prouoked Claudius diſpleaſure againſt them. And now fell they to reuiling one a-D nother, in teſtimonie of the repentance they conceiued for theſe their proceedings. Whereupon Sabinus one of thoſe who had murthered Caius, aroſe and proteſted that he would ſooner cut his own throat, then conſent to the eſtabliſhment of Claudius, or behold with his eies the miſery and thraldome of his country: he likewiſe encouraged Chæreas, telling him that he had deſerued very little by cutting off Caius, if he thought to liue without the liberty of his countrey. To which he anſwered, that he made no account of his life; yet that he intended to ſound Claudius mind, & with this reſolution they cõcluded. Meane-while certain of the Senators ſought on euerie ſide to break thorow the midſt and thickeſt of the ſouldiers, to go and do reuerence and homage to Claudius: amongſt whom was Q. Pompeius one of the Conſuls, whom the men of war accuſed to be one of the principall actors to incite the Senate to recouer their liberty, and they drew their ſwords againſt him. And if Claudius had not reſtrained them, they had ſurely diſpatched him: but he E made him ſit downe by him, and by that meanes deliuered him from the danger. The other Senators, who accompanied him, were not entertained thus honourably; but ſome of them were wounded euen then when they preſſed forth to ſalute Claudius. Aponius retired himſelfe ſore wounded, and the reſt were in great danger to loſe their liues. But King Agrippa drawing neere vnto Claudius, deſired him to vſe as much lenitie as was poſſible in him towards the Senators, for that if any miſchiefe ſhould betide them, hee ſhould haue no other perſons to commaund. To the which counſell of his, Claudius gaue place, and aſſembled the Senate in the Palace, cauſing himſelf to be carried thorow the citie in the company of his ſoldiers, who marched before him, doing much miſchiefe to the common people. But amongſt thoſe that ſlewe Caius, Chæreas and Sabinus were come out into the ſtreets, notwithſtãding they were forbidden by Pollio, whom not F long before Claudius had made Captaine of his guard. And as ſoone as Claudius came into the Palace, whither he aſſembled his friends, he pronounced ſentence againſt Chæreas. For although his action was accounted both generous and noble; yet was hee condemned for this, becauſe he was perfidious; whereupon hee was adiudged to die, to giue example to others, to the end that Princes and Emperours may hereafter liue in ſafety. He was therefore led to his death with Lupus, and diuers other Romanes. It is ſaid of Chæreas, that he endured this accident with a great courage, which he expreſſed not onely in that he changed not his countenance, but alſo by the reproches which he gaue Lupus who wept. For when as Lupus was putting off his cloaths, and complained of the cold that he felt, he taunted him thus, alluding to his name which was Lupus; That neuer any cold did harme to a woolfe. Furthermore, when he came to the place of execution, where a great number of people were gathered together to behold the spectacle, he asked the souldier that was appointed to behead him, if he were a cunning headsman, and whether hee had a new sword, wishing him to vse that wherewith he murthered Caius. His death was happy, for hee receiued but one stroke; whereas Lupus was faint-hearted, and receiued diuers, because he stretched not out his neck freely. Some fewe daies after, at such time as the Romans solemnized their expiations, and that euery one honoured the memory of his dead friend, they gaue Chæreas a part of that honour, and cast his portion into the fire, saying, that was to deface and purge their ingratitude, wherof they were guiltie towards him. Thus ended Chæreas his life. But for Sabinus, although Claudius had not onely absolued him, but also suffered him to exercise his office, as beforetime he had done: yet thought he that he should do amisse & against iustice, if hee falsified his faith to his associates and confederates; for which cause hee shortned his owne daies, thrusting his sword thorow his body to the very hilts.

Incontinently after this, Claudius cashierd all those of the souldiers whom hee suspected; and published an edict, by which he confirmed the Kingdome to Agrippa, that Caius had giuen him, accompanying his bounty with many praises; annexing moreouer vnto his gouernment all that which Herod his grandfather had possessed, to wit, Iudæa, and Samaria, which, in that they were as one lawfull inheritance, appertained vnto him. He gaue him also out of his own dominions, Abela and all the countrey about the mount Libanus, that in times past appertained to Lysanias. And he caused the alliance that was past betwixt them twaine, to be engrauen and registred in an open place of the city of Rome. He tooke from Antiochus the Kingdome that he had, and gaue him in exchange a portion of Cilicia and Comagena. He set Alexander Lysimachus Alebarcha at liberty, who had beene his old friend, and sometimes Gouernour in Arabia, and otherwhiles his mother Antonias steward, who had been committed prisoner through Caius displeasure, and married Bernice Agrippas daughter, with his sonne Marcus: which after the death of Marcus, who died before he was espoused, was afterwards married with her father Agrippas allowance to Herod his brother, for whom Agrippa begd of Claudius the Kingdome of Chalcis. At that very time the Iewes, that were in the Citie of Alexandria, mutined against the Greekes. For after Caius death the nation of the Iewes, which had beene oppressed during his raigne, and iniuriously dealt withall by the Alexandrines, recouered their former courage, and instantly fell to armes. For which cause Claudius gaue commission to the gouernor of Egypt, to pacifie and appease that vrprore. He sent also his letters patents into Alexandria and Syria, at the request of the two Kings Agrippa and Herod, to this effect: Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, Father of the people, signifieth this that followeth: Vnderstanding that the Iewes inhabitants in Alexandria, and for this cause called Alexandrines, haue at all times enioyed the selfe same priuiledges of the city, which the ancient & first Alexandrines haue had: Which fauours they haue obtained by the largesse of those princes, that were our predecessors, as

But that which was generally made in fauour of those, who were dispersed thorow the whole world, was to this effect: Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, High Priest, Father of the people, elected Consul the second time, signifieth that which ensueth. Our well-beloued friends, the Kings Agrippa and Herod, haue required vs, that we will permit all those Iewes, that liue vnder the Roman Empire, to vse the same lawes and priuiledges which they haue vsed heretofore, as we haue granted to the Iewes that dwell in Alexandria. Which suite of theirs we haue willingly granted, not onely in fauour of those that require the same, but also for that I thinke them worthy such a grace: for whome I haue bin intreated, in regard of the fidelity & friendship they haue alwaies expressed towards the Romans. My pleasure therefore is, that no City eyther Grecian or otherwise, shall deny any priuiledge, from whence they shall be excluded, for that since the Emperour Augustus time they haue neuer beene exempted from them. It standeth with reason therefore, that henceforth the Iewes, who liue vnder our Empire, of what place soeuer they be, may obserue their auncient customes, without any contradiction: Giuing them to vnderstand, that hereafter they vse our clemency so much the more moderatly, without neglecting the religion of other nations, in retaining their owne. And our will is, that this present ordinance be published by the magistrates of Cities, Colonies and countries of Italie, and bee sent vnto Kings and forraine Princes, by fit Embassadours, within thirty dayes at the least, to the end that they should be in such sort set vp, that they may be seene and read by all those that passe by.

BY these edicts of Claudius Cæsar, which he sent both to Alexandria and other parts of the world, it plainely appeareth how well affected he was towards the nation of the Iewes. And presently after this, after he had dignified Agrippa with all kinds of honour, he sent him backe into his Kingdome to gouerne the same, commanding all his Presidents and Lieutenants in his Prouinces, thorow which he was to passe, to giue him a friendly & honorable conuoy. But he hauing wisely and happily dispatched his affaires, returned in all haste. As soone as he came to Ierusalem, he offered his sacrifices of thanksgiuing which he had vowed, without omitting any thing that was commanded by the law. He caused also diuers Nazarites to be pould and offered in gift that chaine of gold that Caius had giuen him: which was of the same waight the yron chaine was of wherewith his royall hands were manacled, in memorie of the aduersity he had past, and the testimony of the exchange thereof into better fortune: commanding that it should be hanged vp in the temple, and ouer the chamber of the treasury, to testifie vnto those that should behold the same, that the highest estates are subiect to alterations, and that God can raise men again from obscurity to happy fortune. For this chaine that hanged in the temple, being consecrated to God, manifestly expressed vnto all men, that King Agrippa was vpon a very small occasion despoiled of his former dignitie, and made prisoner: and then a little while after that he, being deliuered from his bonds, was raised and exalted to a famous Kingdome; to signifie thereby, that humane affaires are of that nature, that that which is the greatest may be easily ouerthrowne, and that which is declining, may recouer againe his ancient honour and dignity. When as therfore Agrippa had duely and deuoutly acknowledged Gods mercies, he deposed the Hie Priest Theophilus the son of Ananus, and bestowed that honour on Simon surnamed Cantharа the son of Boethus. This Simon had two brothers, & Boethus was their father, whose daughter had bin married to King Herod, as heretofore it hath bin spoken. Simon held the Priest-hood with his brethren and his father, in such sort, as beforetime the three sons of Simon hie priest, son of Onias had done, during the Empire of the Macedonians, as wee haue declared in our former bookes. After the King had giuen order for the priestood, he thought good to recompence the good affection that they of Ierusalem had borne vnto him: for which cause he acquited them of those tributes that euery family paid, knowing well that it became him to shew kindnesse vnto them, who had beene faithfull and well affected towards him. He created Silas, who had been his companion in many dangers, Generall of all his army. Not long after, certaine young men that were Dorites vnder the colour of constancy in case of religion, who also had daily expressed in their actions an vnbridled rashnesse, brought the image of Cæsar into the temple of the Iewes, and erected it in that place; which insolence of theirs highly offended Agrippa, who construed it as an act that tended to the abolition of the religion of their countrey: for which cause, with all expedition he repaired to Petronius, who was Gouernour of Syria, and complained against these Dorites, who was no lesse displeased with the action then he himselfe. For he supposed that such breach of religion was the meanes to further impiety, & for that cause he wrote to those which had attempted this innouation, somewhat sharpely, to this effect following.

Alias, cap. 5. P. Petronius writeth to the Dorites, to send the vnto him who haue broken Cæsars edict.

PVblius Petronius, Lieutenant to Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, to the Magistrates of the countrey of Doria, health: Whereas Cæsar hath published an edict, by which he permitteth the Iewes to liue according to their lawes and customes, some one amongst you haue beene so presumptuous to contradict the same in effect (although in words you protest that you obey him) and doe all that which you can, to hinder the Iewes from enioying their Synagogue, in so much as in the same you haue planted Cæsars image, not onely thereby opposing your selues against the Iewes, but also against the Emperour himselfe, whose image might haue beene better placed in his owne temple, then in a forraine temple: and you haue placedit in their Synagogue; whereas by right euery one ought to bee master of his place, according to Cæsars iudgement: For it should be very ridiculous in me to alleadge mine owne iudgement after that of Cæsars, who hath granted the Iewes the libertie to liue according to their lawes and customes, and hath commanded that they should conuerse in equall freedome among the Greekes. For these causes I command you, that they, who haue bin so bold as to contemne Augustus decree (against whome their owne magistrates haue beene displeased, excusing themselues that this accident hapned not by their motion, but by the fury of the common people) be brought before me by the captaine Proculus Vitellius, to yeeld a reason of that which they haue done; exhorting the magistrates, that if they will not be accounted parties in this contempt, they labour to discouer those that are guilty, vnto Proculus, & giue order that no sedition or violence be offered thereupon. Which notwithstanding it seemeth that they affect, although we and the most honoured king Agrippa, whom I take for my good and speciall friend, labour nothing more then that the nation of the Iewes should not assemble and take armes vnder colour of their defence. And to the end that whatsoeuer Augustus hath ordained as touching this matter, may be the better knowne vnto all men, I haue annexed his edict which he published in Alexandria: and although they are sufficiently knowne vnto all men, yet hath the most honoured King Agrippa read them vnto me, at such time as I sate in my tribunall seat; concluding according to right, that the Iewes ought not to be excluded nor hindred from enioying those benefits, which are granted vnto them by Cæsar: I therefore charge all men, that henceforward they take heed lest they seeke any occasion of mutinie or sedition, and that euery one liue according to his religion. See herehow Petronius proceeded in this matter, both to amend that which was past, as also to preuent that which was to come, that none should be so bold to attempt the like. After this, Agrippa tooke the Priesthood from Simon Canthara, and gaue it againe to Ionathan the sonne of Anani, whom he esteemed to be more worthy then the other. But Ionathan declared that hee was not desirous of this dignitie, for in effect he refused it, saying, O King, I most willingly acknowledge the honour which it pleaseth you to bestow vpon me, and know well that it is a dignitie which of your owne freewill you bestow vpon me; notwithstanding that God iudgeth me vnworthy. It sufficeth me that I haue once beene inuested with the sacred habit: for at that time I wore it with more holinesse, then I can now receiue it at this present; yet notwithstanding if it please you to know one that is more worthy of this honour then my selfe, I will informe you of one. My Liege, I haue a brother, who towards God and you is pure and innocent, whom I dare commend vnto you for a most fit man for that dignitie. The King tooke great pleasure in these his words, and leauing Ionathan, he bestowed the Priesthood on Matthias his brother, according as Ionathan aduised him: and not long after this, Marsus succeeded in Petronius roome, and tooke vpon him the gouernment of Syria.

Ionathan the sonne of Ananus is restored to the Priesthood and refuseth it, and prayeth that his brother Matthias may ministter therin.

AGRIPPAS acts vntill the time of his death.

The yeere of the world, 4005. after christs birth, 43.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cha. 7.

SILAS was made Generall ouer the kings army: and for that he had alwaies been faithfull vnto him, and had neuer forsaken him in any danger that was offered, without partaking the vtmost extremity, but had alwaies aduentured on the greatest perils in respect of his intire and constant resolution; he made his account, that being so firme a friend to the King, hee should also be partaker and companion with him in the honour. For which cause in all things whatsoeuer, he submitted not himself to the King, but chalenged to himselfe a liberty to speake what him listed. For this cause he grew hatefull in the kings sight, for that in particular he boasted of himselfe beyond measure, and oftentimes refreshed the memory of those aduersities the King had past, the rather to expresse how affectionate he had been toward him, and his continuall talke was nothing else but of those trauailes he had endured. Now for that he obserued no measure in this his discourse, the King took it as an iniury intended to his honor, and was offended with the vnbridled licence of the mans prattle. For nothing soundeth more harsh in a mans eare, then the memory of his forepassed misery, and it is but the fault of a foole to rip vp the courtesies he hath emploied on another man. Finally, Silas grieuously prouoked the kings displeasure against himself, that rather subscribing to his wrath then his wit, he not only dispossessed Silas of his generals roome, but also sent him bound into his countrey in that place to be held prisoner. This notwithstanding, time asswaged his displeasure, and the King drawing himselfe into better consideration, and remembring himself how many trauels Silas had endured in his behalf, he reuoked the sentence that he had pronounced. At such time therefore as he was ready to celebrate the festiuall day of his birth, and all his subiects were addressed to take their pleasure, he speedily sent for Silas, to the end he might be partaker thereof, and banket with them. But Silas, who was of a free nature, supposing that he had iust cause to be displeased, concealed it not frō those who were sent vnto him, but spake vnto them after this maner: To what honour doth the King inuite me at this present, to the intent incontinently to depriue me thereof? For he hath not onely depriued me of those honours which he bestowed vpon me, in acknowledgement of the good affection I haue alwaies shewed vnto him; but he hath altogether spoiled me, and contumeliously intreated me: but if he think that he can restraine me from speaking freely, he deceiueth himselfe. For my conscience knoweth how many hazards I haue deliuered him from, and as long as I breathe, I will ring it in all mens eares, how many trauels I haue endured for his conseruation and honour, in recompence whereof I am at this day in bonds, and shut vp in an obscure prison, which I will neuer forget. Yea and when my soule shall depart out of this body, she shall beare with her the remembranee of those benefits I haue imploied on him. These words spake he with a loud voice, willing them to relate the same vnto King Agrippa; who seeing that hee was grounded in an incurable folly, left him in prison.

Silas by too much reuiuing the kings miseries and misfortunes, and tipping vp his owne deserts, groweth into the kings hatred, and is sent prisoner into his country.

Agrippa sendeth for Silas out of prison, who dissembling not his displeasure, is left still in prison.

After this, the King began to fortify the walles of Ierusalem, on the side of the new town, vpon the common charge; increasing them both in length and bredth: and might he haue thorowly finished them, it had bin a fortresse inuincible, by all humane force. But Marsus the Gouernor of Syria certified Cæsar what the worke was; and Claudius suspecting some commotion, wrote expresly to Agrippa, commaunding him thence-forward to desist from further building of the walles, according to that forme wherein he began: whereunto he would not disobey. This King Agrippa was of nature so ready to exercise liberality, and tooke so great pleasure to vse his magnificence towards all sorts of nations, that the great expences he was at, obtained him great reputation. So that his whole pleasure and delight was, to shew courtesie vnto all men, and to purchase good esteem, being euery way different in nature and disposition from King Herod his predecessor. For Herod was naturally malicious, extreme in punishing men, and irreconciliable to those with whom he was displeased, manifestly expressing that he loued the Grecians better then the Iewes. For he beautified those cities that belonged to strangers, and gaue them mony, and erected them baths, and sumptuous Theaters, and Temples, and in some of them galleries: but as touching the cities of the Iewes, he bestowed not this bounty on any of them, no not the least reparation or gift that was worthy the speaking of. Contrariwise, King Agrippa was very courteous and lowly, & equally imparted his bounty vnto all men. He was courteous vnto strangers, and testified no lesse by the bounty he bestowed on them. To his countrimen he behaued himselfe affably, and in especiall he was mercifull to all those that were in misery. For which cause his his ordinary court & the place he tooke moſt pleaſure in, was Ieruſalem. He was a diligent obſeruer of the lawes of his country, and liued religiouſly, & with as great piety as was poſſible: neither paſſed there one day wherein he offred not ſacrifice. It happened at one time that a certaine cunning lawyer, who was called Simon, & dwelt in Ieruſalem, had aſſembled the people by reaſon of the kings abſence, who for the preſent was in Cæſarea: In which aſſembly he alleadged many things againſt him, that he was a prophane man, and that vpon iuſt cauſe hee was forbidden to enter the temple, in that it was not lawfull nor decent for thoſe that were vncleane, to enter thereinto. Theſe words of Simons thus wrongfully vrged againſt him, were ſignified to the King by certaine letters ſent him by the Gouernour of the City: when as therefore he ſate him downe in the Theater, he commanded that very Simon to ſit next him, and in peaceable and kind manner he ſpake thus vnto him: Tell me, I pray thee, what thing thou ſeeſt fault worthy, or done contrary to the law, in that which is done heere? Simon hauing not any thing to reply, beſought him to pardon him. The King grew friends with him farre ſooner then it could be imagined, reſoluing with himſelfe that mercy doth farre better become a King, then wrath; and that moderation is more requiſite, then haughty courage; ſo as after he had beſtowed certaine preſents on Simon, he dimiſſed him. Now although he had many reparations in diuers places; yet honoured he thoſe of Beryth aboue all the reſt, and builded them a Theater ſurpaſſing all other in ſumptuouſnes and beauty: and beſides that, he made them a ſumptuous Amphitheater, and baths and porches: in which hee neither ſpared coſt, neither ſcantled the beauty and greatnes of the workes in any ſort. The dedication alſo of theſe things was celebrated with great pompe and magnificence: he alſo made great ſhewes and plaies in the Theater, in which there were all ſorts of muſicke and recreation. He made alſo diuers turnaments in the Amphitheater, expreſſing in all things the greatnes of his magnificence; and being deſirous to delight the people with a combate, he gathered all the malefactors that he might get, and made two ſeuerall companies of ſeuen hundreth apiece, and brought them together to fight, to the end that in skirmiſhing they might receiue their puniſhment; and beſides, that by this warlike excerciſe he might preſent the people with a paſtime concluded with the puniſhment of wicked men: for each of theſe combatants ſlue one another.

After that he had finiſhed theſe aboue-named buildings in Beryth, he reſorted to Tiberias a city of Galilee, and was admired of all the other Kings, ſo that Antiochus king of Comagena came to viſit him: the like did Samſigeran king of the Emeſenians: Cotys king of Armenia the leſſe; and Polemon Lord of Pontus: and beſides all theſe, Herod Prince of Chalcis and his brother, all whom he receiued and entertained moſt magnificently and amiably, to ſhew his greatneſſe; to the end that all men might perceiue, that he was deſeruedly honoured with the preſence of ſo many kings. And during the time, that theſe Princes were with him, Marſus the Gouernour of Syria viſited him likewiſe, whom, to the end he might expreſſe the reuerence he bare to the Romans, he met with, ſeuen furlongs off from the city. This interview of ſo many kings was the originall of that diſcontent that grew betwixt him & Marſus; for whileſt he ſate in his litter, he ſent for theſe other kings. But Marſus ſuſpected this concord and ſo great amitie, ſuppoſing that this agreement of ſo many Kings, would be no waies profitable or beneficiall to the Romans. For which cauſe he preſently ſent vnto them, charging them with all expedition to returne each of them into their owne countries: which ſtrict commiſſion of his Agrippa tooke in ill part, and for this occaſion he conceiued ſcarce kindly of Marſus. He tooke the Prieſthood from Matthias, and gaue it to Aelioneus the ſon of Cithæus. After he had raigned three whole yeeres ouer Iudæa, he came to Cæſarea, which in times paſt was called the tower of Straton, and there made he ſports in honour of Cæſar, ordaining a certaine feaſt for his conſeruation, to the celebration whereof there were aſſembled a great number of thoſe, who were of eſtate and dignity thorow the whole countrey. On the ſecond day of this ſolemnity, he ſhewed himſelfe being apparelled in a Robe of ſiluer, made with admirable workmanſhip; and came in the ſame to the Theater in the morning: Whereas the firſt reflex of the riſing of the ſun beating vpon his Robe, he ſhined after ſuch a ſort, that all thoſe that beheld him, were ſeized with reuerence and feare. Whereupon certaine ſycophants (which did not a little diſhonour him) exclaimed one on the one ſide, the other on the other, ſaluting him for a God, and in ſpeaking to him, cried out thus: Be mercifull vnto vs: hitherto haue we feared thee as a man, but henceforward we will confeſſe and acknowledge thee to be of a nature more excellent then mortall frailtie can attaine vnto. Agrippa reproued them not for vſing theſe words: neither reiected he their palpable and deteſtable flattery. But not long after, he looking vpwards, perceiued an Owle ouer his head perched vpon a cord, and knew the ſame

Whileſt he ſpake thus, his griefes augmented in ſuch ſort, as he was brought almoſt to his laſt: for which cauſe with all expedition he was conuaied into his royall Palace, and the rumor was ſpred in euery place, that very ſhortly he would be dead. For which cauſe the people with their wiues and children put on ſackcloth, according to the cuſtome of the country, to the end they might ſollicit Gods mercy in the Kings behalf, and all the city was filled with teares and lamentations. The King that lay in an vpper chamber, and looking down into the court, ſaw them lying thus on the earth, could not refraine himſelfe from teares. And after he had for the ſpace of fiue daies without ceaſing been tormented with griping in his belly, he gaue vp the ghoſt in the fiftie fourth yeere of his age, and the ſeuenth yeere of his raigne. For he had raigned foure yeeres vn-
C der the Empire of Caius Cæſar (hauing firſt of all gouerned Philips Tetrarchy three yeres, to which was annexed the ſigniory of Herod in the fourth yeere) and three yeeres vnder the Empire of Claudius Cæſar, during which time he gouerned ouer the abouenamed countries: and moreouer ouer Iuda, Samaria and Cæſarea. His reuenue amounted to twelue hundreth myriades, beſides which, he made many loanes. For in that he was very liberall in giuing, he ſpent farre more then his reuenue, and ſpared not any thing to ſhew himſelfe magnificent. Before the people knew of his death, Herod his brother Prince of Chalcis, and Chelcias the Kings lieutenant and friend, agreed between themſelues to ſend Ariſto one of their truſtieſt ſeruants to kill Silas, who was their enemy, as if they had beene commanded by the King.

After Agrippas death, they of Cæſarea and Sebaſte forgot themſelues of thoſe benefits they had receiued from him, and vſed him no leſſe deſpitefully, then as if he had been their vtter enemy. For they reprochfully abuſed him after his death, and reuiled him in ſuch ſort, as it is vnſeemely to report the ſame. Furthermore, all the men of warre, who were at that time many in number, went vnto the Kings lodging, and with one accord ſeized the ſtatues of the Kings daughters, and E carried them to the brothell-houſe; where, after they had placed them, they vttered all the indignities they could poſſibly, practicing ſuch ſhamefull matters, as they may not be expreſſed. Beſides this, reſting themſelues in the publike places, they banqueted in the open ſtreet, wearing chaplets of flowers on their heads, and perfuming themſelues with odours to ſacrifice to Charon, drinking to one another for ioy that the King was dead. Thus expreſſed they their ingratitude not only towards their King Agrippa, who had beſtowed ſo many liberalities on them; but alſo towards Herod his grandfather, who had builded their Cities, and to his extreme charge erected their ports and temples. At that time Agrippa, the deceaſed Agrippas ſon was at Rome, and was brought vp vnder the Emperor Claudius. When Cæſar vnderſtood how thoſe of Cæſarea and Sebaſte had iniuriouſly dealt with Agrippa, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and mooued with their ingra-
F titude: and his purpoſe was, to ſend the yonger Agrippa with all expedition to take poſſeſſion of the kingdome of his father, and therewithall to diſcharge himſelfe of his oath: but diuers of his freemen & friends, who were in great credit with him, diſſwaded him from the ſame, alleadging that it would be a dangerous matter to commit the greatneſſe of ſuch a Kingdome to a young man, who ſcarcely had as yet attained to the age of eighteene yeeres: and for whom it was impoſſible to ſupport the care of ſo great a Kingdome, conſidering that if he were at mans eſtate, he ſhould finde himſelfe ouerburthened with the charge of a Kingdome. This aduice of theirs was allowed by Cæſar, and for this cauſe hee ſent Cuſpius Fadus to gouerne Iudæa, and the whole realme;

realme; honoring his dead friend in this, in that he would not suffer Marsus, who had beene his enemy, to enter into his kingdome. He gaue especiall commission also, that Fadus should sharply punish those of Cæsarea and Sebaste, for the outrages they had offered to his deceased friend, and the excesse that was committed against his daughters, who were yet liuing; commanding him to transport the companies of the Cæsareans and Sebastens, and the fiue Roman legions into the country of Pontus to serue in that place, and to take those Romane souldiers that bare armes in Syria, to serue in their place: yet notwithstanding this commandement of his, they were not displaced. For they sent Embassadors to Claudius to appease him, and by this meanes they obtained the fauour to remaine in Iudæa. After this they gaue an entrance to those most grieuous mischiefes and calamities that befell the Iewes: for they spred the seed of the war, which was awakened vnder Florus gouernment. And for that cause, after that Vespasian had obtained the victory, as it shall be hereafter declared, he caused them to depart out of that prouince, and made them seeke their habitation elsewhere.

CHAP. I.

The dissension betweene the Philadelphians and the Iewes: and of the Ephod which was the sacerdotall stole.

Hedio and Ruffinus, ca. 1. Cassius Longinus Prefect of Syria.

AFTER King Agrippas decease (as we haue heeretofore declared in our former Booke) the Emperor Claudius sent Cassius Longinus to succeed Marsus in the gouernment of Syria, whom he displaced of that honor in memory of Agrippa, who during his life-time had oftentimes required by his letters, that he should not suffer Marsus to gouerne the estate of Syria. As soone as Cuspius Fadus came into Iewry to take charge of that country, which he was to gouerne vnder Cæsar, he found the Iewes that dwelt on the other side of Iordan in an vproare, who had taken armes against the Philadelphians, about the limits of a certaine village called Mia, which was stored with valiant men at armes. Now had those who inhabit beyond Iordan, armed themselues in this maner, without the consent of their Gouernors; and had slain a great number of the Philadelphians. Which when Fadus vnderstood, he was sore displeased, for that they had not reserued the cause to his hearing, and opened their griefes they had conceiued against the Philadelphians, but were so bold, of their owne authority, and without feare, to betake themselues to their weapons. Hauing therefore apprehended some three Annibas executed, Amaramus and Eleazar baniſhed.

Anon after this, Tholomæus the Archthiefe was alſo taken, and brought vnto him, who commanded him to be executed, in that he had done many robberies in Idumæa and Arabia; and by this meanes all the country of Iudæa was cleared of all theeues, by the care and prouidence of Fadus. After this he ſent for the High Prieſts, and the Gouernours of Ieruſalem, commanding them, according to the Emperors direction, that they ſhould deliuer vp into the Caſtle of Antonia the long and ſacred robe, which the High Prieſt only was accuſtomed to weare; to the end that it might be at the Romanes diſpoſition, as in times paſt it had been. This command of his they durſt not contradict, yet notwithſtanding, they required Fadus and Longinus (who at that time was come to Ieruſalem with a great power, for feare the Iewes, by reaſon of this iniunction, ſhould grow to rebellion) firſt, that it might be lawfull for them to ſend their Embaſſadors vnto Cæſar, to beſeech him that the Sacred Robe might remaine in their cuſtody. Secondly, that it might pleaſe them to expect the anſwer which Cæſar would returne vpon this their requeſt. Fadus gaue them this anſwer, that he permitted them to ſend their Embaſſadors to Rome, prouided, that beforehand they deliuered him their children for hoſtages. Which when they had readily performed, the Embaſſadors were ſent away. Now when they came to Rome, the yonger Agrippa (who was his ſonne that lately died) knowing the cauſe of their comming, and being ordinarily accuſtomed to attend vpon Cæſar (according as we haue heretofore declared) beſought Cæſar, that he would grant the Iewes their requeſt, as touching the ſacred robe, and that it might pleaſe him to ſignifie no leſſe vnto Fadus. On this his petition Claudius gaue the Embaſſadors audience, and told them that he fauoured their ſuit, willing them to be thankfull to Agrippa, vpon whoſe ſuit he reſpected them, and allowed of their demands; and beſides this anſwer, he deliuered them a letter to this effect:

The Iewes deliuer pledges, to the intent they might be permitted to ſend letters to Cæſar.

Claudius vpon the yonger Agrippas motion, granteth the Iewes liberty to haue the cuſtody of the High Prieſts veſtments.

Being required by our welbeloued Agrippa, whom I both haue, and at this preſent doe bring vp with me, and whom I know to be moſt deuout; I haue heard your Embaſſadors, who were admitted to my preſence by his meanes, and haue receiued their thanks for the benefits I haue beſtowed on your nation: I haue alſo willingly inclined to that inſtant and expreſſe requeſt you haue made vnto me; and it is my pleaſure, the Sacred Robe of the High Prieſt, and the holy Miter remaine in your cuſtody, in ſuch maner, as our moſt deare and right honored friend Vitellius heretofore ordained: To which demand of yours I vouchſafe my allowance: firſt in regard of mine own piety, and for that I deſire that euery one ſhould ſerue God according to his own religion: for that I am reſolued, that in ſo doing, I ſhall gratifie King Herod and yong Ariſtobulus, whoſe piety towards me I am priuy to, and whoſe good affection towards you I can witneſſe, with whom I haue had diuers occaſions of friendſhip, both in regard of their vertue, as for the honor that I beare vnto them. I haue alſo written to this effect to Cuſpius Fadus mine Agent: The names of thoſe who haue receiued my letters, are Cornelius the ſon of Ceron, Trypon the ſonne of Theudion, Dorotheus the ſon of Nathanael, and Iohn the ſon of Iohn. Giuen the eight and twentieth of Iune, in the yeere wherein Rufus and Pompeius Siluanus were Conſuls. At that ſame time Herod, who was Agrippas brother that had lately deceaſed, to whoſe hands in times paſt the gouernment of Chalcis had beene committed, required the Emperour Claudius to grant him the power ouer the temple, and the ſacred veſtments and neceſſaries, and the authority of chooſing the High Prieſt. All which he obtained, and from that time forward vntill the end of the warre of the Iewes, this power remained in all his ſucceſſors. According to this authority Herod depoſed Canthara from the Prieſthood, and gaue the ſucceſſion thereof to Ioſeph the ſonne of Caneus.

Hedio & Ruffinus, c. 2. al. 5.

AT that time Helena Queene of Adiabena, and her ſonne Izates conformed themſelues to the religion of the Iewes, vpon this occaſion that enſueth: Monobazus King of Adiabena, who was alſo cald Bazeos, being ſurprized with the loue of his ſiſter Helena eſpouſed her, her,& got her with child. Vpon a time it hapned, that sleeping with her, he laid his hand on her belly, whilst she lay asleepe: and him thought, that he heard a voice that commanded him to take away his hand from off her belly, lest he should crush the fruit that was therein, which by Gods prouidence should haue a happy beginning, and no lesse fortunate ending. Monobazus was sore moued at this voice, and as soone as he awoke, he told it to his wife; and afterwards when the child was borne, he called him Izates: Besides, he had another elder sonne by the same wife, who was called Monobazus, according to his owne name. And he had also other sons by his other wiues: yet notwithstanding Izates was most manifestly his best beloued, and so cherished by him, as if he had beene his only begotten sonne. For which cause, his other brothers enuied him: which increased their hatred, for that al the rest of them were aggrieued, because Monobazus made most account of Izates. The father manifestly perceiued all this, yet did he pardon them, knowing that they did it not for malice, but for the desire that euery one of them had to be best esteemed by his father. Notwithstanding, being affraid lest some mis-hap should betide Izates, by reason of the hatred his brethren bare vnto him, he gaue him many great gifts, and sent him to Abemerigus, who raigned at that time in a fort called Spasinus, committing his sons life into his hand. Abemerigus also intertained him with kind affection, and loued him in such sort, that in processe of time he gaue him Samacha his daughter to wife; and for her dowrie he gaue him a countrey of great reuenew.

Izates sent to Abemerigus, marrieth his daughter Samacha.

Cæron very fruitfull in Amomum, in which the reliques of Noes arke are to be seene.

Monobazus being old, and seeing he had no long time to liue, desired before his death that his sonne might come and visit him; hee therefore sent for him & receiued him very louingly, giuing him a countrey which he called Cæron, which bringeth forth great aboundance of excellent Amomum. In this place was the remainder of the Arke, in which Noe was saued, during the Deluge; which remnants are to be seene at this day, if any man haue a desire to behold the same. Izates remained in that place vntill his fathers decease. But on the very day of his death, Helena sent for all the Lords and Gouerners of the Kingdome, and Captaines of all the Army, and vpon their assembly she spake vnto them after this manner:

Izates was made King by his motner Helena, and the nobility, and Momobazus gouerneth the kingdome till his comming.

"I suppose (said she) that you are not ignorant of my husbands minde, who hath desired that "Izates might be King in his stead, & hath esteemed him most worthy of such an honour: yet expect I your iudgement in this point. For he that receiueth the soueraignty, not from one mans hand, but from many, & hath the same confirmed vnto him by their consent, is happy. She vsed this discourse vnto them to trie what their intent was, who were there assembled. They vnderstanding her mind, prostrated themselues first of all vpon the earth before the Queene, according to the custome of their countrey; and afterwards answered her, that they approued the Kings election, and tooke pleasure to obey Izates, whom his father deseruedly, and to all their contents and the desire of the common people had preferred aboue the rest of his brethren: alledging "moreouer, that they would put his brethren and kinsmen to death before his comming, to the "end that he might enioy the Kingdome with all security: for by their deaths all the feare that "might grow by their hatred and enuie might be extinguished. Hereunto the Queene answered; "that she gaue them thanks, for the fauour they bare vnto her and her sonne Izates: notwithstanding she required them to suspend their iudgements touching the death of his brethren, vntill "such time as Izates himselfe should giue his consent thereunto. They seeing they might not obtaine the liberty to put them to death, gaue counsaile that they should be kept prisoners vntill his comming, to the end, at leastwise for their owne parts, that they might be out of danger; and that moreouer, vntill his comming there might one be appointed to gouerne the estate, whom she should esteeme most trustie and faithfull vnto him. Whereunto Helena condescended, and made his elder brother Monobazus King, and set the Diademe on his head, and gaue him his fathers seale ring, with that robe which they call Sampsera; exhorting him to gouerne the kingdome vntill his brothers arriuall. Izates hauing certaine notice of his fathers death, resorted thither speedily, and receiuing his brother Monobazus willing surrender, tooke vpon him the gouernment of the kingdome.

Izates and his mother Helena learne the true seruice of God according to the maner of the Iewes.

During such time as Izates soiourned in the fortresse of Spasinus a certain merchant, who was a Iew, called Ananias, hauing accesse to the Kings wiues, taught them the manner how to serue God, according to the religion of the Iewes: and Ananias by their meanes growing acquainted with Izates, taught him the like, and accompanied him into Adiabena: being drawne thereunto by his earnest entreaties, at such time as Izates resorted thither vpon his fathers sending for. It chanced also in like sort that Helena was in like manner instructed by another Iew, and retained the rites and religion of the Iewes.

After

After that Izates came into his Kingdome, and knewe that his brethren and kinsfolke were imprisoned, he was much grieued Conceiuing therefore with himselfe that it would be a great impiety in him to suffer them to be slaine, or kept bound in prison; and that on the other side, it were a dangerous matter for him, if being at liberty they should remember the euill they had indured: for this cause hee sent some of them to Rome for hostages with their children vnto the Emperour Claudius, and the rest vnto Artabanus King of Parthia. Afterwards when he was thorowly assured that his mother was wholly addicted to the religion of the Iewes, hee endeuoured himselfe the more to shew himselfe zealous therein: and supposing that he could not be a perfect Iew, except he were circumcised, he prepared himselfe to bee circumcised. Which when his mother vnderstood, she laboured to her vttermost to hinder his resolution, certifying him that in so doing, hee should bring himselfe in great danger; for that in being King, he would draw himselfe into the dislike of his subiects, if they should haue notice that he was addicted to a new religion, and to strange ceremonies, and that they would not endure, that in being a Iew, hee should be their King: so she for a while by her disswasion restrained him from his desire. But the King required counsell of Ananias, who, according with Helena in the course of her dislike, threatned Izates, that if he would not obey his mother, he would forsake him, & depart from him, for that he feared, lest if the matter should be publikely knowne, he should suffer some punishment, as being the only author and instructer of the King in vndecent matters; that otherwise he might serue God, although he were not circumcised; since he had resolued to liue according to the institution and lawes of the Iewes, and that God would pardon him: for in this, true religion consisteth, more then in the circumcision of the body, though he were not actually circumcised, since the necessitie and feare of his subiects ouerruled him. By which words the King for that time was wonne to affect the same no further. But some little whiles after (for he was not wholly altered in that affection which he had) another Iew called Eleazar, comming from Galilee, and accounted a man of great experience in the doctrine of our religion, perswaded him to bee circumcised. For, comming one day vnto him to salute him, he found him reading of the bookes of Moses, and sayd vnto him; O King, contrary to your knowledge you offend the law, and God like-wise; for it sufficeth you not, that you vnderstand the same, but the chiefest matter you are tyed vnto, is to doe that which the lawe commandeth: how long therefore will you remaine vncircumcised? And if as yet you haue not perused the law as touching this point, read it now, to the intent you may know what impiety it is to omit it.

Izates sendeth his brothers to Claudius Cæsar & Artabanus.

Izates is disswaded by Helena his mother and Ananias from circumcision.

Eleazar perswadeth Izates to bee circumcised.

After the King had heard this, hee would no longer deferre his circumcision: for which cause withdrawing himselfe into another chamber, he called a surgeon vnto him, who acted that which he required, and afterwards calling his mother and master Ananias vnto him, he certified them what had past: whereupon they grew strangely amazed, fearing lest the King should growe in danger of the losse of his Kingdome, if this action of his should come to light; for that his subiects would not endure that such a man that followed a contrary religion should be their King: they feared also, lest they themselues should be in danger, for as much as the cause of all this matter would bee imputed to them. But God by his prouidence preuented lest any of those things which they feared should come to effect: for hee deliuered Izates himselfe and his children likewise out of many dangers, yeelding them his assistance in their doubtfull and desperate estates, declaring in effect that those that onely put their trust in him, and depend vpon his prouidence, are neuer depriued of the fruit of their piety. But of these things will we speake hereafter.

They that rely on God, & put their confidence in him, doe alwaies reape the reward of their piety.

When Helena the Kings mother perceiued that the estate of the Kingdome was in peace, and that by all mens opinion, both home-bred and strangers, her sonne was reputed happie by the good will of God, she was seized with a desire to go and visit the Citie of Ierusalem, and adore God in that temple, which was so much renowmed thorow the whole world, & offer sacrifice of thanksgiuing therein; for which cause she besought her son that he would suffer her to performe her vowes: who willingly condescended to her desire, and furnished her royally with all things that were necessary for such a voiage; giuing her a great masse of mony with her, and bringing her onward on her way many daies iourney; so that at length she arriued in Ierusalem, to the great aduantage of the inhabitants of that city. For at that time the city was oppressed with a grieuous famine, so as many died for want of food; for which cause Queen Helena sent her seruants some into Alexandria to buy a great quantity of corne, the rest into Cypris to buy dried figs, who returned with all expedition they might: whereupon Helena distributed the victuals among the poore, leauing a singular memory of her beneficence among the whole nation. Her sonne Izates also vnderstanding of this famine, sent a great summe of money to the Gouernour of Ierusalem. But hereafter after will I declare what other benefits the King and Queene haue beſtowed vpon our nation.

The yeere of the world, 4009. after Chriſts Natiuitie, 37.

Now Artabanus King of Parthia, perceiuing that the Princes of his Kingdome had conſpired againſt him, reſolued with himſelfe to go vnto Izates, for the ſecuritie of his life and perſon, hoping by his meanes, if it were poſſible, to recouer his Kingdome. He therefore retired thither, and brought with him about one thouſand men of his kinsfolke and houſhold ſeruants. And by the way he met with Izates, whom he knew verie well by his royall traine, notwithſtanding he were vnknowne vnto him by countenance. Drawing therefore neere vnto him, he firſt of all humbled himſelfe on his knees, according to the cuſtome of the countrey, and afterwards ſpake vnto him after this manner:

Artabanus retireth himſelfe to Izates and requireth his aſsiſtance.

» Drad King, forſake me not, who am thy ſeruant, neither reiect thou my prayers. For being » deiected by the meanes of my misfortunes, and of a King become a priuate man, I haue neede of » thy ſuccour. Conſider therefore the inconſtancie of fortune, and thinke with thy ſelfe, that by » prouiding for mee, thou ſhalt prouide for thy ſelfe. For if thou makeſt no reckoning of the » wrong that is done vnto me, diuers men will grow audacious to enterprize vpon other Kings.

Theſe words pronounced hee with weeping teares, and with lookes lowely fixed vpon the ground. When Izates had heard Artabanus name, and ſaw his humble and ſubmiſſiue eſtate, he leapt incontinently from his horſe and ſaid vnto him: King, be of good courage, and let not thy preſent and perplexed condition diſmay thee, as if thy misfortunes were irrecouerable. For this ſorrow of thine ſhall ſodainely bee changed, and thou ſhalt finde a better friend and allie, then thou hopedſt for at this time. For either will I repoſſeſſe thee of thy Kingdome of Parthia, or I will loſe mine owne gouernment. This ſaid, he cauſed Artabanus to get vp on horſebacke, & walked by him on foote, yeelding him this honour, as to a greater King then himſelfe. Which when Artabanus ſaw, hee was diſcontented, and ſware by his fortune and honour to come, that he would ſet foot on ground, if he would not get vp on horſeback and ride before him: whereunto he obeyed, and mounting vpon his horſe againe, he conducted him to his Palace; yeelding him all the honour that was poſſible, both in his ſittings and banquets, as in his aſſemblies, not reſpecting his preſent eſtate or condition; but his former dignitie: conſidering with himſelfe, that ſuch caſuall misfortunes and changes are incident to all men. Furthermore, he wrote vnto the Parthians, perſwading them to receiue their King Artabanus, aſſuring them on his faith and oath, that hee would obtaine a free pardon for all that which was paſt, and to that intent he offered himſelfe to bee an arbitrator betweene them. The Parthians gaue him this anſwer, that they wold not refuſe to entertain him, but that they could not: for that one who was called Cinnamus, was aduanced in his place and dignitie, and that they feared leaſt a ſedition ſhould happen amongſt them. Cinnamus, who was a noble and honourable minded man, knowing that their intent was ſuch, wrote himſelfe vnto Artabanus, who had nouriſhed and brought him vp, exhorting him to returne vpon his faith, and to receiue againe his owne Kingdome. Artabanus vpon this motion gaue credit to his words, and returned backe againe. Whereupon Cinnamus came foorth and met him, and proſtrating himſelfe before his feete, called him King; and afterwards taking the diademe from off his own head, he ſet it vpon Artabanus head, who by this means was reſtored to his former eſtate by Izates mediation, after he had beene driuen out of his Kingdom by his chiefeſt nobilitie. And hee did not forget the fauours which hee had receiued at Izates hands, but did him all the honour that poſſibly hee could imagine: For hee permitted him to weare the ſtraight Tiara, and to ſleepe vpon a gilded bed, which is a priuiledge that belongeth onely to the kings of Parthia. He gaue him alſo a goodly and great countrey which he had taken from the King of Armenia. This countrey was called Niſibis, where in times paſt the Macedons had builded the Citie of Antioch, by them called Mygdonia.

Preſently after Izates was in this ſort honoured, Artabanus died, leauing his Kingdome to his ſonne Vardanes; who repaired to Izates, praying him to ioyne with him in that war which he intended to wage againſt the Romans: but he preuailed not with him. For Izates knowing the Romans force and good hap, imagined that hee vndertooke a matter beyond his power. Furthermore, he had ſent fiue of his young ſonnes to Ieruſalem to learne our tongue and diſcipline, and his mother likewiſe to adore in the temple, for which cauſe hee the rather held backe & diſſwaded Vardanes from enterprizing againſt the Romans, whoſe power and puiſſant conqueſt he ordinarily reckoned vp vnto him, to the end he might diſmay him, & by theſe his allegations cauſe him to giue ouer his purpoſed intent of war againſt them. But the Parthian was diſpleaſed with this his perſwaſion, and for that cauſe denounced a preſent warre againſt Izates. But this his enterprize had but a fruitleſſe iſſue: for God cut off all his hopes. For the Parthians vnderſtanding what

The yeere of the world, 4009. after Christs birth, 47.

After Vardanes was slain, the kingdome is committed to Gotarza. Vologesus King of Parthia.

When Monobazus King Izates brother and the rest of his kinsfolke saw how happily all things succeeded to Izates, and how in respect of his piety towards God, he was honoured and reuerenced by all men, they also resolued themselues to forsake their religion, and to serue God after the manner of the Iewes. But this intent of theirs was discouered. Whereupon the chiefest among them grew displeased; yet did they not manifest their despite, but kept it hidden in their hearts, seeking some fit occasion to reuenge themselues as soone as they might. They wrote also to Abias King of Arabia, and promised him great summes of money, if he would take armes against their King, promising him that vpon the first charge, they would forsake him, for that they desired to be reuenged on him, who was growne in hatred of their religion. Hauing therefore confirmed their promise with an oath, they incited him to make haste. The King of Arabia performed that which they required, and marched forth against Izates with a great power. And when as the first charge was ready to be giuen, and before they came to handy-strokes, all Izates souldiers forsooke him; and turning their backs to their enemies, fled in great disorder, as if they had beene surprized with a Panicke feare; yet was Izates no waies dismaied, but hauing discouered that it was the treason and conspiracy of his greatest Peeres, he retyred himselfe also into his campe, where he enquired of the cause that they pretended. After he knew that they had complotted with the Arabian, he caused the conspirators to be put to death: and the next day after went out to fight, and slew a great number of his enemies, and constrained the rest to betake them to flight. Hee pursued their King also into a fort called Arsam, which he battered and assaulted with such spirit and diligence, that he tooke the same with a great quantitie of booty that was therein, and returned to Adiabena with great triumph: but hee tooke not Abias aliue; for hee himselfe had preuented his captiuitie with his death. The Lords of Adiabena seeing themselues frustrated of their former hopes, in that by Gods hand they were deliuered into the hands of their King, could not containe their displeasure, but practised further mischiefe: for they wrote their letters to Vologesus King of Parthia, desiring him to kill Izates, and to bestow another King vpon them who was a Parthian, for that they hated their King, who had abolished their religion, and had embraced a strange law. The Parthian vnderstanding hereof, prepared himselfe for the warre: and hauing no iust colour or pretext to enforce the same, he sent a messenger vnto him to redemand those honours which his father had giuen him; which if he refused, hee denounced warre against him. Izates was not a little troubled in his minde, when hee vnderstood this message: For he thought that if he should restore the gifts, he should offer himselfe great preiudice, for that it would be imagined that he did it for feare: knowing on the other side, that if the Parthian should recouer that which he redemanded, yet would he not be in quiet, he therfore commended his cause to God, trusting that he would take care of him. And building vpon this, that the greatest good he might haue, was to haue God to helpe, he shut his wiues and children in a strong Castle, and his corne in his strongest towers: and afterwards burned all the hay and forrage; and hauing after this manner prouided for all things, he expected the approach of his enemie. The Parthian came onward sooner then he was expected, with a great power of horsemen and footmen. For he marched forward in all haste, and encamped neere vnto the floud that separateth Adiabena from Media. Izates likewise encamped not farre from thence, hauing with him about sixe thousand horsemen. To whom the Parthian sent a messenger to giue him to vnderstand how great his power was, which extended from the riuer of Euphrates as farre as Bactria, recounting vnto him what Kings he had vnder his subiection, threatning him to punish him very seuerely, in that he behaued himselfe so vngratefully towards his benefactors, yea in such sort as the god whom he adored, might not deliuer him out of the Kings hands. Hereunto Izates answered, that he knew well that the Parthian farre exceeded him in power, but that hee was farre better assured that Gods power extended beyond all mens contradiction. And hauing returned him this answer, he betook himselfe to his prayers, & prostrating himselfe vpon the earth, and casting ashes on his head, and fasting himselfe, his wiues and all his children, he called vpon God, and prayed, after this manner: O Lord Almighty, if I haue not vainely submitted my selfe to thy protection, but haue entirely chosen thee for mine onely and true God, be thou my helpe and assistance, and not only deliuer mee from mine enemies, but also abate and controule their pride, who haue not beene affraid in their vnbridled language, to prophane thy holy and ſacred name, and vtter blaſphemous ſpeeches againſt thy power. Thus prayed he with ſighes and teares; and God heard him: For incontinently, and the very ſame night, Vologeſus receiued letters, by which he was certified that a great numbe of Dahans and Sacans taking opportunitie by his abſence, were entred into the kingdome of Parthia, and ſpoiled the whole countrey; for which cauſe hee returned backe into his countrey without any further trouble. And thus Izates by Gods prouidence was warranted from the Parthians threats.

Izates deliuereth vp the kingdome to his brother Monobazus, and dyeth.

Not long after this, at ſuch time as he had liued fiftie fiue yeeres, and raigned foure and twentie, and left behinde him foure and twentie ſonnes, he dyed, and appointed his brother Monobazus to ſucceed him in the kingdome, requiting hereby his faith and loyaltie, in that during the time of his abſence, and after the death of his father, hee had faithfully ruled and gouerned the kingdome to his vſe. His mother Helena hearing newes of his death, lamented very grieuouſly as reaſon would, in that ſhe being his mother was depriued of a ſonne that ſo zealouſly honoured and feared God. Yet notwithſtanding ſhee was comforted, when ſhe vnderſtood that her eldeſt ſonne was to ſucceed him in the kingdome; and haſted herſelfe with all diligence to goe and meete him. As ſoone as ſhee arriued in Adiabena, ſhee liued not long time after her ſonne Izates. Whereupon Monobazus tooke both her body and his brothers bones, and ſent them to Ieruſalem, commanding that they ſhould bee buried in three Pyramides which Helena had builded, ſome three ſtades or furlongs from Ieruſalem. But hereafter will we recite the acts and geſts of Monobazus during his raigne.

But during Fadus gouernment in Iudæa, a certaine Magician called Theudas, perſwaded a great number of the people to take all their goods and ſubſtance, and to follow him to the floud Iordan; for he ſaid he was a Prophet, and told them that the riuer ſhould diuide it ſelfe into two parts vpon his commandement, and yeeld them free paſſage. By theſe words of his he deceiued diuers of them. But Fadus would not permit that ſuch a fury of theirs ſhould breed them any commodity: but hee ſent a troupe of horſemen, who charged them on the ſudden, and ſlew a great number of them; and tooke diuers of them priſoners aliue, amongſt whom was Theudas, whoſe head was ſtricken off, and was afterwards carried to Ieruſalem. This is that which befell the Iewes vnder Fadus gouernment.

AFTER Fadus, ſucceeded Tiberius Alexander, the ſonne of that Alexander who had beene Gouernour of Alexandria; a man of as great riches as any one of his time and place, who ſurpaſſed likewiſe his ſonne Alexander in pietie and ſeruice of God, who forſooke the religion of his forefathers. In that time there happened a great famine in Iewry, during which, Queene Helena ſent huge ſummes of money into Ægypt, and bought corne and diſtributed the ſame to thoſe that were in want, according as I haue foreſpoken. At the ſame time Iames and Simon the ſonnes of Iudas of Galilee, who had buſied themſelues to incite the people to reſiſt the gouernment of the Romanes, were put to death at ſuch time as Cyrenius valued each mans goods, as we haue heretofore declared. Theſe did Alexander command to bee crucified Herod King of Chalcis tooke away the ſoueraigne Prieſthood from Ioſeph the ſonne of Camydas, and transferred it to Anias the ſonne of Nebedæus. After Tiberius Alexander, ſucceeded Cumanus. Then dyed Herod, who was brother to King Agrippa the Great, in the eighth yeere of Claudius Cæſar. He left behinde him three ſonnes; Ariſtobulus whom hee had by his firſt wife: Bernicianus and Hircanus by Bernice his brothers daughter. Claudius Cæſar gaue the kingdome belonging to him, to Agrippa the younger. During the time that Cumanus gouerned, there hapned a ſedition in Iudæa, whereby diuers Iewes miſcarried. The cauſe of all which accidents I will rip vp from the originall.

How a great number of the Iewes were ſlaine about the Temple.

The yeere of the world, 4011. after Chriſts Natiuitie, 49.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9. al. 10.

AT the time of the feaſt of Paſcha (during which time we are accuſtomed to feed on vnleauened bread) a great number of people aſſembled themſelues from all parts to the Citie of Ieruſalem. Whereupon Cumanus fearing leſt by this occaſion there ſhould ariſe ſome commotion, he gaue order that a company of his ſouldiers ſhould be armed, and ſhould keepe their guard in the porches of the Temple, to the end that if any trouble ſhould happen, they might repreſſe it. Thoſe gouernours, who had beene his predeceſſors, had done the like in ſuch manner of aſſemblies. It came to paſſe on the fourth day of the feaſt, that a certaine ſouldier diſcouering thoſe priuities which were vndecent to be ſeene, ſhewed them before the people: wherewith they that beheld the ſame, were ſore diſpleaſed, and prouoked, ſaying, that the diſhonour was not done vnto them, but to God, to whom it rightly appertained. And ſome of them of beſt reſolution caſt out certaine ſpeeches againſt Cumanus, ſaying, that the ſouldier was ſet on by him. Which when Cumanus vnderſtood, he was in like manner grieuouſly offended in regard of thoſe iniuries: yet exhorted he thoſe, whom he ſaw too forward in raiſing factions, to keepe the peace, for feare leſt a ſedition ſhould grow during the time of the feaſt; and ſeeing they would in no ſort obey him, but contrariwiſe they ceaſed not to iniure and reuile him, hee commanded that all the forces he had ſhould be in armes, and retire themſelues into the fortreſſe of Antonia that was neere vnto the Temple, as we haue heretofore declared. The people, ſeeing the armed ſouldiers, were affraid, & began to flie: but becauſe the places thorow which they iſſued, were but narrow, they imagined that they were purſued by their enemies; ſo that they thruſt on one another in their flight, and diuers of them were thronged to death. In this mutiny there dyed twentie thouſand men: and after this, in ſtead of a feaſt, there was nothing but mourning; and without bethinking themſelues of their prayers and ſacrifices, all of them began to weepe and lament. So great miſchiefe ſprang from the inſolence of one ſouldier. This firſt lamentation was ſcarcely finiſhed, before a ſecond ſucceeded the ſame. For ſome of thoſe who had a part in this mutiny, being about ſome hundreth ſtades from the Citie, robbed one Steuen that was Cæſars ſeruant in the high-way, and tooke from him all that which he had. Which when Cumanus vnderſtood, he preſently ſent ſome of his ſonldiers to ſpoyle thoſe villages, which were neereſt to the place where the fact was committed, and to bring the chiefeſt inhabitants thereof in bonds vnto him. In this pillage a certaine ſouldier found a booke of the law of Moſes in one of theſe villages, which he tooke & brought, and before them all tore it in pieces, with hainous blaſphemies and vile ſpeeches againſt the Law and whole nation. The Iewes vnderſtanding hereof, ſuddenly aſſembled themſelues in great numbers, and ran to Cæſarea where Cumanus kept for that preſent, requiring him that he would reuenge not their cauſe, but Gods, whoſe Law was on that ſort diſhonoured; ſignifying vnto him, that it was impoſſible for them to liue, ſo long as their law was thus contemned. Cumanus fearing leſt a ſecond mutiny and vprore ſhould be raiſed among the people, by counſell of his friends cut off the ſouldiers head, who had committed that outrage againſt the law, and by this meanes appeaſed the ſedition that was ready to take head.

In the feaſt of Paſcha, a certaine ſouldier ſhewing his priuy members, mooueth a ſedition among the people, whereby twentie thouſand Iewes loſt their liues.

A certain ſouldier teareth the bookes of Moſes law, & therefore is beheaded by Cumanus cõmandement.

CHAP. V.

The ſedition of the Iewes againſt the Samaritanes.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10. al. cap. 12.

THere hapned alſo an enmity betwixt the Samaritanes and the Iewes, vpon this occaſion. They of Galilee, who reſorted to the Citie of Ieruſalem at the times of our ſolemne feaſts, were accuſtomed to paſſe thorow the countrey of the Samaritanes. And at that time it hapned, that their way lay thorow a borough called Nais, ſituate in a great champaine field: where a quarrell ariſing betwixt diuers inhabitants of the place, and certaine paſſengers, a great number of the Galileans were murthered. Which when the Magiſtrates of Galilee vnderſtood, they reſorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute iuſtice on thoſe that had murthered their countrymen: but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritanes, made no account of their complaint. The Galileans being prouoked by this contempt of his, perſwaded the common people of the Iewes to betake them to their weapons, and maintaine their libertie; telling them that ſeruitude is of it ſelfe tedious; but that when it is accompanied with outrages, it is intolerable. But their gouernours laboured to pacifie them, promiſing them to deale ſo effectually with Cumanus, that he ſhould take puniſhment of the murtherers: but they gaue them no audience, but fell to armes, requiring Eleazar the ſonne of Dineus, to be their chieftaine. This Eleazar was a thiefe, who for many yeeres made his abode in the mountaines: They therefore ſpoyled and burnt certaine villages of the Samaritanes. After that the report of all that which had paſſed, came to Cumanus eares, hee tooke a company of the ſouldiers of Sebaſte, with foure bands of footmen, and armed the Samaritanes likewiſe to goe and make warre againſt the Iewes; whom they tooke, and ſlew many of them, and led more of them away priſoners. When the chiefeſt gouernors in Ieruſalem ſaw into what an infinity of miſchiefs they were falne, they cloathed themſelues in ſackcloth, and caſt aſhes on their heads, exhorting thoſe that were mutinous, to forethinke themſelues of the ruine of their countrey, the danger the Temple was in to bee burned, the ſeruitude both of themſelues, their wiues and children, to prophane and ſtrange nations; and deſired them to change their aduice, and to lay aſide their weapons, and ceaſe to offer violence, to the end that they might hereafter liue in quiet, and that euery one of them would retire themſelues peaceably to his owne habitation. By which words in the end they being perſwaded, returned home, and betooke them to their buſineſſe. The theeues alſo retired themſelues againe into their ſtrong holds, and from that time all Iudæa was repleniſhed with thefts. The gouernours of Samaria reſorted to Numidius Quadratus gouernour of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre, to accuſe the Iewes for that they had fired their villages, and ſpoiled them; telling him that their loſſe did not ſo much trouble them, as for that they ſaw the Romanes were contemned by the Iewes: who notwithſtanding ought to appeare before them as their competent Iudges; yet natheleſſe that they aſſembled themſelues in ſuch ſort, as if the Romanes were not their ſuperiours. For which cauſe they addreſſed themſelues to him, to the end they might haue redreſſe of thoſe wrongs which they had receiued by them. This is that wherewith the Samaritanes charged the Iewes: who anſwered to the contrary, alledging that the Samaritanes themſelues had beene the authors of that mutiny and vprore; and that Cumanus being wholly corrupted by their money, had ſmothered the matter, and done no iuſtice on the murtherers. When Quadratus heard this, he reſerued the iudgement till another time, telling them that he would giue ſentence in the matter at ſuch time as he came into Iudæa, and had examined the truth of both ſides; ſo that they returned without doing any thing.

The Galileans in reuenge of their iniuries, burne certain villages of the Samaritanes and ſpoile the ſame.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. al. 12.

The Samaritanes accuſe the Iewes before Numidius Quadratus.

The Iewes lay the burthen of the warres on the Samaritanes and Cumanus.

Anon after, Quadratus came into Samaria, where he heard that the Samaritanes had beene the authors of the trouble: and on the other ſide, knowing that ſome Iewes likewiſe intended ſome inſurrection, he cauſed them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in priſon. From thence he tranſported himſelfe to Lydda, which is a borough of no leſſe bigneſſe then a Citie: in which place he ſitting on his tribunall ſeat, heard the Samaritanes the ſecond time, & diſcouered by the report of a certaine Samaritane, that one Dortus one of the principalleſt among the Iewes, and foure other his confederates induced the people to rebell againſt the Romanes. Theſe did Quadratus cauſe to be executed. As for Ananias, who was the high Prieſt, and the Captaine Ananus, he ſent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperour Claudius of that which they had done. Moreouer, he commanded the chiefe gouernours both of the Samaritanes and Iewes, that they ſhould ſpeedily repaire to Rome; whither Cumanus and Captaine Celer ſhould conduct them, to the end they might be iudged by Cæſar himſelfe, vpon the information taken on both ſides: And fearing leſt the common people of the Iewes ſhould breake out into ſome rebellion, he repaired to the Citie of Ieruſalem, to giue order that the Iewes ſhould attempt to raiſe no new ſtirres: but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and buſied in the celebration of the feaſt, and offering ſacrifices to God, according to their accuſtomed ceremonies. Being therefore aſſured that no man would innouate or rebell in that place, he left them to their ſolemnities, and repaired to Antioch.

Dortus with foure other are crucified. Ananias, Ananus, Cumanus, Celer, & ſome other are ſent to Rome.

But the Iewes that were ſent to Rome with Cumanus, and the principall Samaritanes had a day aſſigned them by the Emperour to decide the differents that were betweene them: Cumanus and the Samaritanes laboured all that they might by the mediation of Cæſars friends and freemen, to haue the vpper hand of the Iewes, and indeed the day had beene theirs, if young Agrippa had not beene in Rome. For hee ſeeing that the matter was handled to the diſaduantage of the Iewes, beſought Agrippina the Emperors wife, that ſhee would labour her husband in ſuch ſort that he would be pleaſed to take full knowledge of that which was done, and that afterwards he ſhould execute due iuſtice on thoſe whom he found guiltie of that ſedition. Claudius fauourably gaue eare to this requeſt: and hearing the whole matter, he found that the Samaritanes were the firſt

Claudius Fœlix Gouernor of Iudæa.

B Antiochus son would not giue eare vnto the marriage,for that he refused to entertaine the religion of the Iewes,although in times past he had promised his father no lesse. He gaue Mariamme also to Archelaus Chelcias sonne, who by her fathers consent was before-time promised him, on whom he begat a daughter called Bernice. A little after this,the marriage of Azizus and Drusilla was broken off,on this occasion following: At such time as Fœlix gouerned Iewry, he saw Drusilla,and was surprized with her loue,for that she surpassed all other women in beauty. He therefore sent a certaine Magician called Simon, who was borne in Cypris, and one of his greatest friends among the Iewes,who perswaded her to forsake her first husband,& to marry with Fœlix, giuing her to vnderstand, that she should be happy, if she refused not this match. C wards her(who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this occasion ceased not to iniure her) she condescended to forsake the religion of the Iewes,and to marry with Fœlix, by whom shee had a son who was called Agrippa. His death hereafter will I declare, and how in the Emperour Tiberius time he died,and was burned in the fire of the mountaine Vesuuius with his wife. Bernice remained a widow,very long time after Herods death,who was both her vncle and her husband, and the report was that she had the company of her brother. Finally,she wrought so much,that Polemon King of Cilicia caused himselfe to be circumcised, to the end he might espouse her,purposing by that meanes to make it knowne how falsely she had bin accused. Whereunto Polemon gaue eare,because she was rich. But this marriage continued not any long time. For Bernice thorow her impudency, as it is reported, abandoned Polemon, who giuing ouer that marriage for-

At the same time Marriamme hauing refused Archelaus her husband,married with Demetrius one of the chiefest Iewes that were in Alexandria, both in regard of his descent,as also his riches, who at that time also exercised the office of Alubarcha, that is to say, the Gouernour of Arabia. She caused the son she had by him to be called Agrippinus. But of all this, will I speake more exactly hereafter.

The Emperour Claudius died after he had raigned thirteene yeeres, eight months and twenty dayes. Some say, that he was poisoned by Agrippina his wife,the daughter of Germanicus Claudius brother, which was first married to Domitius Oenobarbus, one of the greatest men of Rome: after whose death and long widdowhood, she was finally married to Claudius, into whose house she brought her sonne called Domitius, by his owne fathers name. Claudius had before-time

E put Messalina his wife to death, for the iealousie that he had of her: although he had had children by her, namely Brittanicus and Octavius. He had Octauia also by his first wife Pætina, which was elder then her brethren, and was married to Nero, whom Claudius so named, and adopted for his sonne. Agrippina, fearing lest Brittanicus, growing to mans estate, should succeed his father in the Empire,and desirous to make her owne sonne Emperour,as it is reported: she left nothing vnattempted that might bring her husband to his death;and presently sent Burrus, who was Generall of the army,with certain other Captains,and those of greatest power among his freemen, to bring Nero into the field, and to proclaime him Emperour. Hee being thus established in the Empire,caused Britannicus to be secretly poysoned;and not long after this he openly caused his mother to be put to death,yeelding her this recompence, not only for that she had born

F him in her womb,but also because by her policies he had obtained the Empire. He likewise murthered Octauia his wife,and diuers other noble men, vnder colour of some conspiracy intended against him. But I will no further prosecute this matter,for that there are diuers who haue composed Neros History, of whom some haue no regard of the truth, but haue spoken at their pleasure,for that he had beene their benefactor: other some transported with hatred and despite against him, haue not beene ashamed to publish such impudent lies against his renowne, as they deserue to be condemned. Neither doe I wonder that they haue inuented so many lies against Nero, considering that in those Histories which they wrote as touching the precedent Emperours, they haue not ſtudied to ſpeake truth, although they had not any occaſion to hate them; G conſidering that they liued a long time after their death. But let theſe contemners of truth write as them liſteth, for that they ſeeme to take delight in that licence. For mine owne part I am intended to write nothing but the truth: neither ſtand I much on that which concerneth not the matter which I intreat of, purpoſing in all truth and diligence to declare that which hath befalne our nation of the Iewes, without omitting of either their misfortunes or follies, that haue proceeded with them. I will therefore returne to the diſcouery of our affaires. Azizus King of Emeſene being dead the firſt yeere of the Emperour Neros raigne, his brother obtained the kingdome: Ariſtobulus the ſonne of Herod King of Chalcis, had the gouernment of the Signory of the leſſer Armenia from Neros hand. Cæſar gaue Agrippa a certaine portion of Galilee, com- H manding thoſe of Tiberias and Tarichæa to liue vnder him. Beſides this, he gaue him Iulias ſituate beyond Iordan, with fourteene boroughs neere adioyning thereunto.

Alias, cap. 16. Fœlix puniſheth the theeues, and Magicians, & other ſeducers of the people. Eleazar the ſon of Dinæus ſent to Rome.

BVT the affaires of Iudæa grew daily worſe and worſe. For the countrey was repleniſhed againe with theeues, and enchanters, who deceiued the common people. Fœlix apprehended many of them daily, and cauſed them to be executed and put to death. He tooke Eleazar alſo the ſonne of Dinæus, who was captaine of thoſe outlawes and theeues that ranged in I the countrey, and ſurprized him by a ſubtilty. For Fœlix had giuen him his word, that he ſhould in no ſort be endangered: Whereupon hee came and ſubmitted himſelfe, and was preſently fettered and ſent to Rome. And for that hee had conceiued a diſpleaſure againſt Ionathan the high Prieſt, who had diuers times admoniſhed him to vſe more circumſpection in the gouernment of Iudæa, for feare he ſhould be blamed by the people, for that he had required Cæſar that Fœlix might be admitted to the gouernment, he thought it not amiſſe to cut off Ionathan, who continually ſollicited and vexed him. For this cauſe, he perſwaded and bribed a certaine man called Dora, who was borne in Ieruſalem, and was one of thoſe in whom Ionathan repoſed his moſt truſt, to bring in certaine theeues to murther Ionathan, who willingly liſtned to his demands; and deſirous to gratifie the Gouernor, by this meanes that enſueth brought that to effect which he had K intended. There were certaine theeues that came vp to Ieruſalem, vnder colour to adore God, who carrying their ſwords cloſely hidden vnder their garments, accoſted Ionathan & ſlew him. Now for that this murther was let ſlip, and not puniſhed; from that day forward the theeues reſorted boldly to the ſolemne feaſts, hauing their weapons hidden vnder their garments, and thronging in among the people, ſlew ſome of thoſe who were their aduerſaries; and otherſome to pleaſure thoſe, who had hired them with ready money to rid them of thoſe they miſ-liked. And theſe outrages committed they not onely in other parts of the Citie, but in the Temple likewiſe, where they ſlaughtered ſome who little ſuſpected that any impiety ſhould be cõmitted in that place. For mine owne part, I thinke that God hath deſtroyed our Citie in deteſtation of that impietie: and for that he accounted the Temple for an impure manſion place, he hath ſent I vs the Romanes, who haue ſet fire on the ſame to purge the Citie, and make vs ſlaues with our wiues and children, intending thereby to teach vs wiſedome by our owne miſeries. Thus was the Citie filled with theſe thefts and murthers. And as touching the enchanters and deceiuers, they perſwaded the common people to follow them into the deſart, promiſing them to ſhew them ſignes and miracles done by the power of God: whereunto diuers gaue eare, and at laſt ſuffered the penaltie of their folly. For Fœlix recalling them backe againe, puniſhed them.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 12. al. cap. 17. A falſe prophet draweth the Iewes to the mount Oliuet.

At that ſame time there came a certaine man from Ægypt to Ieruſalem, who tearmed himſelfe a prophet, who incited the common people to follow him to the Mount called Oliuet, ſituate not far off from Ieruſalem, and onely diſtant ſome fiue furlongs from thence, telling them from thence that he would make them ſee the wals of the Citie fall vnto the ground, by which M way he promiſed them to giue them entry. Which being reported to Fœlix, he cauſed his ſouldiers to arme themſelues, and departing out of Ieruſalem with great ſtore of horſe and foote, he ſet vpon them, and ſlew foure hundreth of them, and tooke two hundreth aliue: as for the Ægyptian he eſcaped out of the skirmiſh, and no man knew what became of him. The theeues alſo incited the people anew to make warre againſt the Romans, telling them that they ought not to yeeld them obedience; and they burned and ſpoiled diuers of theſe boroughs which oppoſed themſelues againſt them. It chanced alſo that the Iewes, which inhabited Cæſarea, mutined againſt

A againſt the Syrians that were in the ſame City, in that they ſtroue to haue an equall authority in the gouernment of the ſtate as wel as they. The Iewes pretended the title of ſuperiority, becauſe that Herod, who was a Iew, had builded the city of Cæſarea: on the other ſide, the Syrians auowed the Iewes ſayings to be true; but they replyed alſo that Cæſarea was in times paſt called the tower of Straton, and that at that time there was not one Iew that inhabited the ſame. Which when the Gouernours of that countrey heard, they laid hands on the authors of this ſedition, as well of the one as of the other party, and gaue them the baſtinado, pacifying by this meanes the trouble for a little ſpace. For the Iewes once more being puffed vp with their riches, and contemning the Syrians, iniuriouſly reuiled and prouoked them: on the other ſide, the Syrians being B weaker in ſubſtance, but as great in heart (by reaſon the greateſt number of thoſe that bare armes with the Romans were Cæſareans & Sebaſtens) at ſome times brake out into opprobrious ſpeeches againſt the Iewes, and at length the quarrell grew to that heat, that they caſt ſtones one at another: ſo that on both ſides diuers of them were both ſlaine and hurt; yet had the Iewes the vpper hand. Fœlix perceiuing that this debate might breed a war, came on betweene them, requiring the Iewes to deſiſt from further violence, and commanding his ſouldiers to beate down thoſe who would refuſe to obey him: by which meanes a great number were ſlaine, and diuers taken priſoners. Moreouer, he gaue his ſouldiers liberty to ſpoile, and rob diuers very rich houſes. The other Iewes, who beſides their authority were renowned for their moderation, fearing leſt the like miſery ſhould befall them, beſought Fœlix to ſound a retreat, and to call in his ſoul- C diers, and to ſpare that which as yet remained, being ſore grieued at that which had hapned: to which Fœlix condeſcended. At that ſame time King Agrippa gaue the Prieſthood to Iſmael, the ſonne of Phabeus. There aroſe alſo a diſſenſion betwixt the High Prieſts, and the other Prieſts and Gouernours of Ieruſalem, and each faction walked forth accompanied with a troupe of proud and mutinous perſons, who decided their debates with bitter words, and flinging of ſtones; ſo that no man might pacifie them. For all things were ſo out of order, as if there had beene no Magiſtrates in the City: and the impudency and audaciouſneſſe of the High Prieſts permitted ſo much, that they ſent their ſeruants to the granges, to ſeize the tenths that were due vnto the Prieſts; whereby it came to paſſe, that ſome poore Prieſts died of neceſſity, and want: ſo much did the violence of the ſeditious at that time preuaile aboue all right.

AFTER that Portius Feſtus had beene ſent by Nero to ſucceed Fœlix in the gouernment of Iudæa, the chiefeſt of thoſe Iewes that inhabited Cæſarea, repaired to Rome to accuſe Fœlix: and without all doubt he had beene puniſhed for the iniuries he had committed againſt the Iewes, if Nero had not pardoned him vpon his brother Pallas ſubmiſſion and intreaty, who importuned him, and was at that time in great reputation with him. Furthermore, two of the chiefeſt amongſt the Syrians wrought Berillus, who had ſometimes bin Neros Maſter, E and at that time was Secretary of eſtate in the Greeke tongue, by mighty bribes, to beg at Neros hand the reuocation of the right and title, which the Iewes enioyed in the gouernment and adminiſtration of the Common-weale. For which cauſe Berillus ſollicited the Emperour, and obtained a letter at his hands, which was the cauſe of thoſe miſchiefes that afterwards hapned in our nation. For the Iewes of Cæſarea, vnderſtanding what commiſſion the Syrians had gotten, were ſo much the more kindled and encouraged to make warre.

As ſoone therefore as Feſtus was arriued in Iudæa, he found the countrey grieuouſly afflicted with robberies, and the lower countrey was ſpoyled by ſword and fire. The theeues likewiſe at that time increaſed wondrouſly, and they vſed ſhort ſwords after the manner of a Perſian Cymetre, and crooked like the Roman faulchion; with which they ſlew diuers men. For thruſting F themſelues into the preſſe of people that came in great multitudes on the feſtiual daies to celebrate Gods ſeruice, they killed thoſe very eaſily whom they liſted; and oftentimes repairing to their enemies villages, they ſpoiled and burnt the ſame. But Feſtus ſent diuers forces both of horſe and foot againſt certain Iewes, that were ſeduced by an enchanter, who had promiſed them ſecurity and repoſe from all their troubles and moleſtations, if ſo be they would follow him into the deſart; who ſlew both the deceiuer and the deceiued that followed him. At that time King Agrippa erected a ſtately building, within the Palace at Ieruſalem, neere vnto the Porch. This Palace in times paſt appertained to the Aſmoneans, and was ſituate in a high place with a goodly proſpect, from from whence they that liſted, might with pleaſure behold the whole City of Ieruſalem, wherin the King tooke great delight, and beheld from thence that which was done in the Temple. The chiefeſt men of Ieruſalem ſeeing this building, were ſore diſpleaſed. For neither doth our cuſtom or law permit that any one ſhould look on that which is done in the Temple, and eſpecially forbiddeth that no man ſhould behold the ſacrifices and oblations. They therefore builded a high wall vpon the gallery, which was within the Temple on the Weſtſide, which did not onely dam vp the ſight of the royal chamber, but alſo that of the gallery without the Temple on the Weſt ſide, where the Romans kept guard neere vnto the Temple on the feſtiuall daies. Herewith was King Agrippa ſore diſpleaſed, and the Gouernor Feſtus far more then he, who commanded them to pull downe the wall. But they beſought him that he would giue them licence to ſend their Embaſſadors to Nero, to this intent, alleadging that it was impoſſible for them to liue, if any part of their Temple ſhould be beaten downe. Which being granted them, they ſent tenne of their chiefeſt nobility, and with them Iſmael the High Prieſt, and Chelcias the Treaſurer of the Temple, vnto Nero: who no ſooner heard their ſuite, but he pardoned them, not onely for that they had done, but he commanded that the building ſhould remaine as it was. All which he did in fauour of his wife Poppea, who was intreated by the Iewes, for that ſhe was a deuout Princeſſe, to ſue for them. Shee therefore commanded the ten Embaſſadors to returne, and kept Chelcias and Iſmael for pledges with her. CHAP. VIII.

The Gouernment of ALBINVS.

Albinus Gouernour of Iudæa.

CÆSAR being aduertiſed of Feſtus death, ſent Albinus to gouerne Iudæa. But King Agrippa commanded Ioſeph to lead a priuate life, and aduanced in his ſtead a certaine man called Ananus, the ſonne of Ananus, who is reported to haue beene moſt happy. For he had fiue ſons, all which ſupplyed the place of the High Prieſt, after himſelfe had long time before them enioyed the roome: the like whereof hath neuer hapned to any of our High Prieſts. The younger Ananus, who, as we ſaid, was aduanced to this place, was a raſh and head-ſtrong man, that followed the ſect of the Sadduces, who (as we haue already declared) were amongſt all other the Iewes the moſt ſeuere in executing Iuſtice: whereas therefore Ananus was of this diſpoſition, he thought that he had a fit occaſion offered him to doe what him liſted after Feſtus death, and during the time that Albinus was as yet vpon his way. He therefore aſcended and ſate downe in the Tribunall, aſſiſted by the Iudges, and cauſed Iames the brother of Ieſus, who was called Chriſt, to appeare before him, with certaine others; and accuſed them for tranſgreſſing the law, and blaſphemy againſt God, and cauſed him to be ſtoned to death. They that were men of vpright conſcience within the City, and diligent obſeruers of the law, were very much diſpleaſed with this act, and ſent ſecretly vnto the King, beſeeching him to prohibit Ananus, that hereafter he ſhould commit no ſuch like offence: for that his firſt action was not allowable. Some of them alſo went to meet Albinus, being on his way from Alexandria, to enforme him that it was not lawfull for Ananus to aſſemble the Councell without his licence. Albinus perſwaded by theſe words, wrote a cholericke letter to Ananus, wherein he threatned to puniſh him. And for the ſame cauſe King Agrippa diſpoſſeſſed him of the Prieſthood, after he had held the ſame for the ſpace of three moneths, and in his ſtead he eſtabliſhed Ieſus the ſon of Damneus. After that Albinus was arriued in Ieruſalem, he employed all his care and ſtudy to pacifie the countrey, by executing diuers of the theeues.

But the High Prieſt Ananias daily increaſed in honour and credit, and purchaſed the good will of the citizens by his liberality and great gifts. But he had certaine miſchieuous ſeruants about him, who conuerſed with thoſe that were moſt intemperate and audacious, who repairing from grange to grange, tooke vp many tenths that belonged to the Prieſts, and beat thoſe that refuſed to tender them. The Prieſts vſed no leſſe force then did their ſeruants, hauing no man that might reſtraine them: whereby it came to paſſe that the Prieſts, who were before-time maintained by the tenth, died at that time for want of victuals. And the theeues renewing their entrance into the City by night, during the feaſt that was celebrated at that time, tooke the Secretary of Captain Eleazar aliue, who was Ananias ſon, who was the hie Prieſt. And hauing bound him, led him

To the performance whereof, Ananias perſwaded Albinus by manifeſt reaſon: and by obtaining his demand, encreaſed and begat a number of miſeries. For the theeues vſed all the wily meanes they could deuiſe in apprehending ſome one of Ananias houſe; and when they had taken any one of them aliue, they would not deliuer him, except before they might haue one of their owne deliuered. So that increaſing both in courage and number, they waxed more and more inſolent to afflict the countrey.

At that ſame time King Agrippa enlarged the city of Cæſarea, ſurnamed Philippi, and in honor
B of Nero called it Neronias. He builded alſo to his great charge a Theater in fauor of the Berytians, wherein euery yeere he ſpent diuers thouſands of ſiluer in ſports. He diſtributed oyle and corne to euery one of the people, and garniſhed all the city with moſt antick and goodly counterfaited portraitures vpon the porches. Briefly, he welny tranſported into the City all the ornaments of the reſt of his kingdome; for which cauſe his ſubiects began to hate him, ſeeing he depriued them of their rare ornaments to adorne one ſtrange City. Ieſus the ſon of Gamaliel ſucceeded in the Prieſthood, which the King had giuen him, and taken away from Ieſus the ſon of Damneus: who reſigned him his place againſt his will. Whereupon there aroſe a diſcord betweene them. For hauing aſſembled their reſoluteſt followers, they grew from bitter words to fatall blowes and ſtones. But amongſt all the reſt, Ananias was the richeſt in wealth, and by his
C bounty reconciled the more vnto him. Coſtobarus alſo and Saul gathered each of them a band of raſcall and deſperate men. Theſe two were of the blood royall, and by reaſon of their affinity and alliance with Agrippa, they were well beloued. For which cauſe they were outragious and violent, in ſpoiling and rauiſhing the fortunes of the weaker ſort. From this time forward the eſtate of our City grew deſperate, encreaſing daily more and more in wickedneſſe.

When Albinus vnderſtood that Geſsius Florus came to ſucceed him, deſirous that they of Ieruſalem ſhould acknowledge ſome good turne at his hands, he called before him all thoſe priſoners that were notoriouſly guilty of murther, and cauſed them to bee executed. As for thoſe that were impriſoned vpon any ſmall or ſlight cauſe, vpon payment of their fines, he deliuered them: and in ſo doing, the priſon was cleanſed of malefactors, and from that time the countrey
D remained full of theeues and robbers.

Albinus executeth the hainous malefactors.

The Leuites, who were ordained to ſing Hymnes vnto God, ſollicited the King to aſſemble the Councel, and therby to permit them to weare the linnen Robe, which the Prieſts were accuſtomed to vſe, telling him that ſuch an ordinance would dignifie his eſtate very much, in that he would be alwaies famous in memory of this new eſtabliſhment. This ſuite of theirs was eaſily reſpected and admitted: For the King, after he had conſulted with thoſe who were his aſſiſtants, ſuffered the Leuites that ſung the Hymnes, to lay aſide their ordinary Robe, and to apparell themſelues in linnen, as beſt liked them. He permitted alſo that another part of the Leuites, who intended the ſeruice of the Temple, ſhould learne to ſing the Hymnes and Pſalmes according as they had required. All which he did contrary to the ordinances of the countrey, which being E broken, there was nought elſe to be expected but puniſhment.

Agrippa giueth them of the tribe of Leui, leaue to weare linnen garments.

Agrippa permitteth the Miniſters of the Temple to ſing the ſacred Hymnes.

At that time was the building of the Temple finiſhed: And the people perceiuing that more then eighteene thouſand workmen ſhould be idle, and depriued of wages, wherupon they were accuſtomed to liue in trauailing in the building of the Temple: on the other ſide, being loth to reſerue their money through the feare they had of the Romans; to prouide for thoſe workmen (in the entertainment of whom they reſolued to imploy their treaſure: for if any one of them trauailed but one houre in the day, he was ſuddenly paied his wages) they requeſted the King that it would pleaſe him to repaire the Eaſterne gate on the outward part of the Temple, ſituate in a deſcent, the wals whereof were in height foure hundreth cubits, made of ſquare ſtones of white marble, from the top to the bottome, and euery ſtone twenty foot long, and ſixe foote
F thicke.

The people of the Iewes beſeech the king that it may be lawfull for them to repaire the porch.

This worke was firſt builded by King Salomon, who was the firſt that builded our Temple. But the King, to whom Claudius Cæſar had giuen the commiſſion of building the Temple, thinking with himſelfe that it was very eaſie to breake it downe, but very hard to build it vp, and that to reedifie the porch, it would coſt much time and expence, he denied their requeſt, permitting them neuertheleſſe to paue their City with broad ſtone. He tooke the Prieſthood from Ieſus the ſonne of Gamaliel, and gaue it to Matthias the ſon of Theophilus. In whoſe time the warre betwixt the Romans and Iewes grew to the firſt head.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 18. The succession & number of the High Priests among the Iewes. Aaron and his progeny. There were 83. High Priests in all.

But I thinke it not amisse, but very answerable to the course of this present historie, to speake of the priests, and to shew how they had their beginning, and to whom this honour may be lawfully communicated, and how many they were in number vntill the end of the war. The first of them was Aaron Moses brother, after whose death his children succeeded him, & from that time forward the honour hath continued with their successours. For it is a law obserued by our ancestors, that no man should be admitted to the priesthood, except it be of Aarons posterity: for albeit he were a King, if so be that he were of another line, it was impossible for him to obtaine the Priesthood. All the Priests after Aaron, who (as we haue said) was the first, vntill Phanasus, whom the seditious created Priest in the time of the war, haue bin in number 83. wherof 13. haue executed the office from the time that Moses erected Gods Tabernacle in the Desart, vntill such time as arriuing in Iudæa, King Salomon builded a Temple to God. For in the beginning, the High Priest-hood continued with the possessors for terme of life: but afterwards, although the Priests were yet aliue, yet were there other successors planted in their rooms. These 13. were of Aarons posterity, and obtained this degree in succession the one after the other. Their first gouernment was Aristocratia, which is the gouernment of the nobility: afterwards a Monarchy; and finally, a royall gouernment. The number of yeers wherein these 13. flourished, were sixe hundreth and 12. yeers, from the day that our fathers departed out of Egypt, vnder the conduct of Moses, vntill the edification of the Temple that was builded in Ierusalem by King Salomon.

After these 13. high Priests, there were 18. others; who after Solomons time succeeded one after another, vntill the time that Nabuchodonosor King of Babylon, hauing encamped before the city, took the same, and burned the Temple, and transported our nation into Babylon, & led away the High Priest Iosedech prisoner. The time of the Priesthood, and continuance of these 18. was foure hundreth sixty sixe yeeres, sixe moneths, and ten dayes: so long as the Iewes haue had the royall gouernment. After the surprizall of Ierusalem by the Babylonians, vntill such time as Cyrus King of Persia dismissed the Iewes, and gaue them leaue to returne from Babylon into their owne countrey, with permission to reedifie their Temple, there are 70. yeers: and at that time the captiues being returned, Iesus the sonne of Iosedech tooke vpon him the High Priesthood, who with those of his posterity to the number of fifteene, haue gouerned in a Democratic or popular estate, vntill the time of Antiochus surnamed Eupator, for the space of foure hundreth & fourteen yeeres. This Antiochus was the first, who with his Generall Lysias displaced Onias, surnamed Menelaus, of his Priesthood; commanding him to be slain at Beryth, and after he had driuen his son out of the succession, he established Iacim high Priest, who notwithstanding was of Aarons race; but not of his family. For this cause Onias, the son of Onias, and nephew to the deceased Onias, retyred himselfe into Egypt: where growing familiar with Ptolomey Philometor and Cleopatra his wife, he perswaded them to build a Temple in the confines of Heliopolis, not vnlike to that of Ierusalem, and to create a high Priest in the same: of which Temple in Egypt, we haue made very oftentimes mention. After that Iacim had held the Priesthood for the space of three yeeres, he died without successor. For the City remained seuen yeeres without a High Priest. Againe, the Asmoneans recouered the gouernment of their nation, and after they had warred against the Macedons, they established Ionathan High Priest, who exercised the office seuen yeeres: but afterwards he was slaine by an ambush, and treason conspired against him by Tryphon, as we haue declared elsewhere. After him, Simon his brother vndertook the Priesthood, who was not long after slaine treacherously by his sonne in law at a banquet. After him succeeded his sonne Hircanus, who enioying this dignity for the space of thirty one yeers, died when he was very old, leauing behind him Iudas, surnamed Aristobulus, who dying by sickenesse, left his brother Alexander his heire, both of the Kingdome and high Priesthood. After that Aristobulus had obtained the royall gouernment, he enioyed both dignities one whole yeere. For this Iudas surnamed Aristobulus, was the first that set the diadem on his head, causing himselfe to be called a King. The which, Alexander did continue: for he also ioyned the kingdome with the high Priesthood, and raigned twenty-seuen yeeres: and feeling himselfe draw neere to his death, he left it in Alexandras his wiues hands to dispose of the Priesthood as she pleased. She therefore bestowed it on Hircanus: and as touching the kingdome, she kept it in her owne hands nine yeeres, and afterwards died. Her sonne Hircanus was High Priest for so long time: for after Alexandras death, his brother Aristobulus made warre against him: and hauing ouercome him, hee tooke the kingdome from him, and not onely seized the Crowne, but the Priesthood. After he had raigned three yeers, and as many moneths, Pompey repaired to Ierusalem, and tooke it perforce, and laying hold of Aristobulus, sent him bound vnto Rome with his children. After which he restored

A the Prieſthood once more to Hircanus, committing the gouernment of the nation vnto his hands, forbidding him in the meane ſpace to weare the Diademe. Beſides the firſt nine yeeres, Hircanus gouerned twenty and foure, but Barzapharnes and Pacorus Princes of the Parthians, paſſed Euphrates, and made war againſt Hircanus, and tooke him aliue priſoner, and made Antigonus, Ariſtobulus ſonne King. But after he had gouerned three yeeres and three moneths, Soſius and Herod tooke him aliue perforce, and Antonius ſent him to Antioch where he was put to death. After that Herod was created King by the Romans, there was neuer any high Prieſt created of the poſterity of the Aſmoneans (for he gaue the high Prieſthood to certain men of obſcure and baſe condition, who were of the order of the Prieſts) Ariſtobulus onely excepted. This Ariſtobulus was Hircanus nephew, who was priſoner among the Parthians; and hauing giuen him the Prieſt-
B hood, he married himſelfe with Mariamme his ſiſter, to the intent to continue himſelfe in the good liking of the people, in remembrance of Hircanus: but afterwards fearing, leſt all of them ſhould turne to Ariſtobulus ſide, he cauſed him to be ſlaine, by finding out a meanes to cauſe him to be ſtifled, at ſuch time as he bathed himſelfe in a fiſh-pond neere to Iericho, as we haue declared before this. After him he beſtowed the Prieſthood no more on any of the line of the Aſmoneans. Archelaus, his ſon followed his fathers ſteps in reſpect of the Prieſthood, and from that time forward the Romans haue enioyed the ſoueraignty ouer Iewry. All they then that haue exerciſed the Prieſthood from Herods time, vntill the day that Titus tooke the City and the Temple, haue bin in all twenty and eight. All the continuance of their gouernment was one hun-
C dreth and ſeuen yeers. Certaine of theſe gouerned during Herods life, and in the dayes of Archelaus his ſonne: but after theſe two were dead, the gouernment was Ariſtocraticall, or of the nobility, wherein the Prieſts had the gouernement ouer the whole nation. Thus much haue we thought meet to ſpeake at this time as touching the High Prieſts.

CHAP. IX.

How FLORVS, ALBINVS ſucceſſour, offered many iniuries to the Iewes, which conſtrained them to take armes.

D GEſſius Florus being ſent by Nero to ſucceed Albinus, filled al Iudæa with many miſchiefs and miſeries. He was a Clazomenian borne, and was married to a certaine woman called Cleopatra, no leſſe miſchieuous then himſelfe: who being beloued by Poppea Neros wife, obtained this dignity for him. He behaued himſelfe ſo outrageouſly and violently in all his gouernment, that through the great iniuſtice he committed, the Iewes praiſed Albinus as if he had beene their benefactor. For he concealed his miſchiefe, taking care leſt it ſhould wholly be conceited or diſcouered: but Geſsius Florus behaued himſelfe in ſuch ſort, as if he had beene ſent to make open ſhew and ſale of his villanies, publiſhing his iniuſtice in the eares of our nation, without omitting either rapine or iniuſtice in execution and inflicting puniſhment on the innocent. For he was pittileſſe and couetous, and made no difference betweene noble and ignoble, and was not aſhamed to be partaker with theeues: of whom there were diuers that made it their profeſ-
E ſion, to ſteale without any feare, in that they were aſſured of their ſafety, becauſe he was partaker with them. And in a word, there was no moderation in him; in ſuch ſort that the poor Iewes being vnable to endure the inſolent rapines and ſpoiling of their goods that they receiued by theſe theeues, were conſtrained to abandon their owne houſes, and to flie their country, and remaine in ſome more commodious place of ſecurity, yea though it were among ſtrangers. What need I ſpeake any more? He that conſtrained vs to raiſe our ſwords againſt the Romans, was Florus, who made this account, that it was better for them to die all at once in great troupes, then to periſh by little and little. In briefe, the war began the ſecond yeere of the gouernment of Florus in that Prouince, which was the twelfth yeere of Neros Empire. But they that deſire to know exactly all that which we haue beene conſtrained both to doe and ſuffer, may peruſe my bookes as Florus the originall cauſe of the wars of the Iewes.

The beginning of the wars.

This ancient Hiſtory containeth all that which hath beene reported to be done ſince the firſt creation of man, vntill the twelfth yeere of Neros Empire, omitting nothing that hath befallen the Iewes, as well in Ægypt as in Syria, and Paleſtine: All that likewiſe, which we haue beene enforced to ſuffer vnder the Aſſyrians and Babylonians; as alſo our eſtate vnder the Perſians and Macedons, and finally vnder the Romans. All this, as I ſuppoſe, I haue compiled and gathered together with carefull diligence, and I haue enforced my ſelfe to recite the number of thoſe, who haue haue bin High Priests for the space of two thousand yeeres. I haue also collected the succession of Kings, their actions and gouernments, with the power of their Monarchies, according as it is amply described in holy Scriptures, as also I haue promised in the beginning of my History. Furthermore, I dare boldly say, that whatsoeuer I haue set downe, is so assured, that there is no man either Iew or of what nation soeuer, yea although he should haue imployed the vttermost of his power, could more exactly communicate the same vnto the Greeks, then I haue done. For in their confessions and opinions who are of our nation, I haue such knowledge in that which concerneth our doctrine, as I surpasse them all: And as touching the Grecian disciplines, I haue studied and learned the tongue, although I cannot boast of the familiar and fit pronunciation of the same, for that I haue liued in the country. For amongst vs we make but slender reckoning of those, who are exercised in diuers tongues, for that this study is accounted prophane by vs, and common not onely to free persons, but also vnto slaues: and they onely are esteemed to haue profited in wisedome, who fully know the contents of the law, and who can expound the holy Scriptures. For this cause, although diuers haue trauailed in this exercise of writing Histories, yet are there scarcely two or three of them that haue written successefully, and haue receiued the fruits of their labours. And it may be that it shall not be mis-thought of, if I freely speake somewhat of my progeny and life, considering that there are men at this day liuing, who can approue or reproue me in that I set downe. And in this place I will make an end of mine ancient History, which I haue reduced into twenty Bookes, containing sixty thousand verses. And if God grant me life, I will shortly entreat of out wars, and the euents of the same that haue hapned hitherto, which is the thirteenth yeere of Domitianus Cæsars Empire, and the fifty sixt yeere of mine age.

Moreouer I am resolued to discouer in foure Bookes, the diuers opinions of the sects of the Iewes, as touching God and his Essence, and our lawes: according to which certaine things are permitted vs, and other-some are forbidden.

THE LIFE OF FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS, THE SONNE OF MATTHIAS, WRITTEN BY HIMSELFE.

KNow therefore that I am not basely but nobly descended, being both on the father and mothers side, deriued from the line of the Priests: and for as much as some are accustomed to draw the ground of their nobility, the one from this man, the other from that; so among our nation the marke of true nobilitie is, to deriue a mans pedigree from the priesthood. Touching my selfe I am not onely lineally issued from the Priests, but I draw my originall from them, who amongst the foure and twenty ranks or families of Priests iustly challenge the superiority. Moreouer, by my mothers side I am of the bloud royal. For the heires of the Asmoneans, from whom she is descended, haue for a long time exercised the priesthood and princely power among our nation. I will likewise make it knowne, how my predecessors haue succeeded the one after the other. My great grandfathers father was Simon, surnamed Psellus, that is, the stutterer, who liued at such time as Hircanus the high Priest, the first of that name, and the sonne of Simon the high Priest, was in office. This Simon Psellus had nine sonnes: the one of these was Matthias, surnamed Aphlias. This Matthias tooke to wife the daughter of the high Priest Ionathan, by whome he had one sonne, who was Matthias surnamed Curtus, who was borne in the first yeere of Hircanus priesthood. Matthias begat Ioseph the ninth yeere of Alexandras gouernment, and of Ioseph came Matthias the tenth yeer of the raigne of Archelaus; and Matthias begat me the first yeere of the Empire of Caius Cæsar. I likewise haue three sonnes, mine eldest is Hircanus, who was borne in the fourth: my next, Iustus, who was borne in the seuenth: and Agrippa my last was borne in the ninth yeer of Vespasians Empire. This genealogy of mine do I in this manner propose, according as I haue found it written in the publike registers, to put them to silence who shall pretend to reproue or detract the same.

Ioseph the sonne of Matthias was borne in the first yeere of Caius Cæsars Empire, and the 4007. yeere of the world, and the 39. after Christs birth.

My father Matthias was not onely famous for his expresse nobilitie, but hath also bin praised by reason of his iustice and authoritie in Ierusalem, which is the mother city of all the rest in our countrey. My bringing vp during my tender yeeres was with Matthias, who was my brother by the same father and mother; with whom I happily profited in all kinde of science, hauing a good memorie and a quick apprehending spirit: so that, being as yet a child of fourteene yeeres of age, I was praised by all men in regard of the good affection I bare to learning, and the Priests & noblest citizens alwaies assembled about me, to receiue certaine exact instructions from mee in any thing that concerned our ordinances. About the age of sixteene yeeres my desire was to haue a search and insight into the sects of our nation, which (as I haue said) are three: the first of the Pharises, which is the chiefest. The second of the Sadduces. And the third of the Essens. For I truly thought with my selfe, that I might easily choose the better of the three, at such time as I had beene exercised and acquainted with them all: for which cause with great abstinence and no lesse labour, I passed thorow them all: and not content with this experience; after I had heard that a certaine man called Banus liued in the desart, clothing himselfe with that which the trees brought forth, and feeding on no other kind of meat, but that which they willingly yeelded him, washing himselfe oftentimes by day and night in cold water to keep himselfe chaste: I began to imitate his course of life: and after I had liued with him for the space of three yeeres, and satisfied my desires, at last I returned into the citie.

Ioseph from his infancy very studious, and addicted to learning.

At the age of nineteene yeeres, I began to intermeddle with publike affaires, following the sect of the Pharises, which very neerely resembleth that sect among the Græcians, who are called Stoicks. After I was sixe and twentie yeeres old, it was my fortune to repaire to Rome vpon this occasion that ensueth: During such time as Fœlix gouerned Iudæa, there were certain priests my familiars, men of much honour, and more vertue, who vpon some slight occasion were bound and sent to Rome by his commandement, to answer to that which was obiected against them in Cæsars presence. Whereupon I being desirous to labour for their liberty, hauing especiall intelligence, that notwithstanding the torments wherewith they were martyred, they buried not in forgetfulnes that pietie which they ought to God, but liued on figges and nuttes: for this cause I departed for Rome, and was encountred with many great and grieuous hazards by sea. For the ship, wherein I sailed, was wrackt in the midst of the Adriatike sea, and there were about sixe hundreth of vs that swamme all night long, and vpon the day-spring by Gods prouidence a Cyrenian ship came in sight, and both I and certaine others to the number of fourescore, outswimming the rest, were taken vp into it and saued. After I had in this sort escaped, I came to Dicæarchia, which the Italians call at this day Puteol, and grew acquainted with Aliturus a Iew borne, who was a plaier, and in good reputation with Nero; by whose meanes insinuating my selfe into Poppeas knowledge, who was Cæsars wife, I determined to beseech her to procure those Priests liberties, with all expedition: which done, I by her meanes recouered their present liberty: and being gratified likewise by her with many great gifts, I returned into my countrey. There found I the common-weale too much addicted to factions and troubles, and diuers too prone and readie to rebell and forget their allegeance to the Romans. I inforced my selfe to represse the seditious, and exhorted them to change their opinions, representing before their eies the qualitie of those, against whom they enterprized their war, with whom they neither might compare in experience of war, neither in good fortune: for this cause I aduised them, not to hazard and ouerthrow their countrey by their rashnes and rage, and with it their posterities and themselues.

Iosephus obtaineth the priests liberties.

The Iewes seditious.

To this effect spake I vnto them, and instantly intreated them to forsake their vntamed resolution, for that I foresaw that the end of this warre would redound to our vtter ruine: but I preuailed nothing with them. For the fury of desperate and dissolute men preuailed aboue reason: for which cause fearing lest by continuall inforcing of one thing, I should grow into hatred and suspicion among them, as if I fauoured their enemies; fearing likewise lest if they should lay hold on me, they should be put to death, seeing that the fort of Antonia was already seized vpon by the seditious; I retired my selfe into the inward part of the temple. In processe of time, after Manahem and the chiefest among the theeues were put to death, I came out again from the temple, and conuersed with the priests, and chiefest Pharises, who were surprized with great feare. And grieuously were we dismaied, when we saw the people in armes: and being vncertain what to do, and wanting the meanes to pacifie these mutinies, and apparantly perceiuing their manifest danger, both I and the Pharises told them, our opinion was answerable to theirs, and counsailed them to containe themselues in peace, and not to prouoke the enemy. For our hope was, that Iesius would with all expedition draw out great forces, and chastice those peace-breakers. But as soone as he arriued, and had fought with them, he was ouercome, and a great number of his men were slaine: whereupon grew the vtter ruine of our whole nation. For such as desired the warre, were puffed vp with that victory, and conceiued an assured hope that in the end they should ouercome the Romans. Besides that, this ensuing occasion presented it selfs: The inhabitants of the cities that bordered vpon Syria, laid hands on those Iews that dwelt amongst them, & slue both them, their wiues, and children, without any iust cause or crime committed by them. For they had not conspired any waies, or intended to reuolt from the Romans, or to vse any hostilitie, or any secret conspiracie against any of those, with whome they were conuersant. But among all the rest, the citizens of Scythopolis exceeded all other in impietie and wickednes. For being besieged without by certaine of the Iewes, they inforced those Iewes that inhabited amongst them to take armes, & to charge those of their owne nation (which is both prohibited & vnlawfull by our lawes) who fighting against them discomfited them: but after this ouerthrow, they in such sort falsified and forgot their faith that they had giuen to their associates and fellow citizens, that they slew euery mothers sonne of them, to the number of many thousands. The like misfortune also fell vpon those Iewes that inhabited Damasco. But of this wee haue more amply spoken in those our bookes, which we haue written of the warres of the Iewes: and at this present I make mention hereof, intending to signifie, and certainly perswade the readers, that the warre which was waged with the Romanes, proceeded not of a resolute intent and purpose, but for the most part of an inforced necessitie.

Ioseph dehorting the Iewes from sedition, is suspected by them of treason.

The Iewes are plagued both by strangers & their owne countrimen.

The Iewes constrained by necessitie to make war.

After that Iesius was ouercome (as we haue heretofore declared) the chiefest men of Ierusalem perceiuing that the theeues made a partie among the seditious, and were strongly and plentifully armed and prouided, they began to feare lest if they should be found disarmed, they should

A should suddenly be ouerthrowne by their enemies; as in effect it fell out afterwards: and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly reuolted from the Romans; but that a part thereof as yet entertained the peace, they sent me with two other Priests Ioazar and Iudas, who were both vertuous and honorable men, to perswade the mutinous to lay by their armes, & to let them know that it was more behoouefull for the good of the nation, that such men as were in authority and reputation, should haue the keeping thereof. The resolution that was taken by them was, that they had them alwaies ready vpon all occasions, but that they expected vntill they were certified what the Romans intended to doe.

With this commission and such like instructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sephorites were in no small hazard in respect of their countrey, for that they of Galilee had re- The danger of the Sephorites.
B solued to forrage the same in regard of their league of friendship continued with the Romanes, and contracted and ratified by Senius Gallus Gouernor of Syria. But I deliuered them all of that feare, & appeased the common people by permitting them, to send at all times when they pleased, their hostages to Gessius, who lay at Dora a City of Phœnicia. I found likewise that the inhabitants of Tiberias were already in armes, vpon this occasion following: There were in that Sedition in the Citie of Tiberias. Three factions in the city of Tiberias.
City three different factions, the one of the nobility, whose chieftaine was Iulius Capella, and all those that accompanied him, that is to say, Herod the son of Miarus, Herod the son of Gamalus, &
C Compsus the sonne of Compsus (for Crispus his brother, who in times past had been gouernor for Agrippa surnamed the Great, was amongst his possessions on the other side of Iordan) all these, I say, gaue counsell at that time to subscribe to the Romanes authority, and to obey their King. But Pistus would no waies accord to this aduice, in regard of his son Iustus: for naturally he was vaine-glorious. The second faction was of the common sort, who concluded vpon warre. Iustus, Pistus son, who was the ring-leader of the third faction, carried himselfe very doubtfully as touching the warre; yet notwithstanding he sought and thirsted after innouation, hoping that by a change he should encrease his power. Presenting himself therfore in the midst of the multitude, The oration of Iustus, Pistus sonne to the multitude.
he inforced himselfe to perswade the common sort, that their City had alwaies belonged to Galilee, and that during the daies of Herod the Tetrarch, who founded the same, it was the chiefest Citie, whose pleasure it was that the Citie of Sephoris should yeeld obedience to that of Tiberias. Furthermore, he auowed that they had not lost that preeminence in the time of King
D Agrippa the father, but had continued the same till Fœlix obtained the gouernment of Iudæa. ,, But for the present wherein they had been giuen by Nero to the younger Agrippa, they had fallen ,, and lost their superiority. For the Citie of Sephoris obtained the soueraignty of Galilee, after ,, that she acknowledged the Roman gouernment, who had abolished the table royall and publike ,, registers. By these words and others of like nature, inforced against King Agrippa, he incited the Iustus incites the people to rebellion.
people to rebellion, signifying vnto them, that the opportunity inuited them to take arms, to the end that being associated with the Galileans, they might make themselues Lords, for that all of ,, them would willingly ioyne themselues with them through the hatred they bare to the Sepho- ,, rites, on whom they would reuenge themselues with great force, because they continued in their ,, allegeance, which they promised to the Romans.

E And by these words he won the peoples hearts vnto him: for he was a man that was very e- Iustus the offspring of war.
loquent, and by his subtilty and politike discourse, easily ouerthrew all that which his aduersaries produced against him. For hee was not ignorant of those sciences that are knowne vnto the Greekes: but trusting to his wisedome and good discourse, hee began to discouer how all things had past at that time, to the intent that by such colourable insinuations he might smother the truth. But in the processe of our discourse, wee will declare that hee was a man of a dissolute life, and that by his and his brothers meanes, he wanted little of vtterly ouerthrowing his countrey. When as therefore this Iustus had perswaded the Citizens of Tiberias to take armes, and had constrained diuers men likewise, who were of the contrary opinion, to do the like, he issued out with them, and burned the villages of the Gadareneans and Hippenians, that are situate in F the confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this estate was Tiberias: and as touching Gischala, their estate and affaires were brought to this issue: Iohn the sonne of Leui seeing some of the Citizens waxen proud by meanes of their reuolt from the Romans, laboured to restraine them, and required them to continue in their allegeance: but notwithstanding all his perswasion and diligence, he could not containe them. For the nations round about them as the Gadareneans, Gabaraganeans and Tyrians assembled a great army, and with the same assailed Gischala, and Gischala burned & spoiled.
tooke it by force: and after they had consumed it by fire and vtterly destroied the same, they returned euery one to their dwelling places. Iohn being sore displeased with this act, armed all thoſe that were with him, and ſet vpon theſe abouenamed nations: and hauing obtained the victory, he reedified Giſchala in farre better ſort then it was before, incloſing it with a wall, to the intent it might be the better fortified againſt future inuaſions.

Gamala faithfull to Rome. The danger whereinto Philip Iacims ſonne was fallen.

But thoſe of Gamala perſeuered in their faith towards the Romans, for the occaſion that enſueth: Philip the ſonne of Iacim, who gouerned vnder King Agrippa, eſcaping beyond all opinion, and flying to the royall Palace in Ieruſalem at ſuch time as it was beſieged, fell into another great danger; to wit, to be ſlaine by Manahem, and thoſe theeues that were with him: but certain Babylonians his kinſmen being at that time in Ieruſalem, hindered the theeues from executing their purpoſe at that time. When as therefore Philip had ſoiourned there for the ſpace of foure daies, on the fift he fled away, diſguizing himſelfe in a falſe haire, for feare hee ſhould bee diſcouered: And as ſoone as he was arriued in one of thoſe villages which was of his owne poſſeſſion, ſituate neere vnto the mount Gamala, he ſent for certaine of his ſubiects to make their repaire vnto him. But God would not permit it; but for Philips greater good, he croſſed the ſcope of his intent, which otherwiſe had bin the ruine of many: for being ſurprized by a ſudden feuer, hee committed certaine letters of his written to Agrippa and Bernice who were yet but young, to one of his free-men, commanding him to deliuer them to Varus, who was put in truſt by the King and Queene, to adminiſter the affaires of their Kingdome, for that they were gone to Beryth to meet with Ieſsius. As ſoone therefore as he had receiued Philips letters, and vnderſtood that he was eſcapt, he tooke it very hardly, for that he thought it would bee ſaid that the King and Queene had no vſe of him ſince Philip was arriued. He therefore brought him that had the carriage of theſe letters, into the peoples preſence, obiecting againſt him that he had forged that writing, alledging that he falſely lyed in that he reported that Philip was in Ieruſalem, making warre with the Iewes againſt the Romans: and for that cauſe he commanded him to be executed. Philip being ignorant of the cauſe why his free-man did not returne, ſent another with letters, to the intent he might diſcouer what was become of his firſt meſſenger, & for what cauſe he ſtaied ſo long. But Varus accuſing his ſecond meſſenger alſo very falſely, commanded him to be executed, as he had done the firſt. For the Syrians that inhabit Cæſarea, had made him proud, inſomuch that he aſpired to high and great matters, by telling him that Agrippa ſhould be put to death by the Romans, in regard of thoſe faults which the Iewes had committed; and that Varus, who was royally deſcended, ſhould poſſeſſe his gouernment. For without queſtion Varus was held to be of the blood-royall, for that he deriued his pedigree from the Tetrarch Sohemus that gouerned the countrey that abutted on Libanus. For theſe cauſes, Varus grew proud, and retained Philips letters by him, hoping by theſe means that the King ſhould haue no knowledge thereof; and he ſet watch in euery paſſage, for feare leſt any man ſhould flie and certifie the King, of that which had hapned; and to giue the Syrians the better content, who dwelt in Cæſarea, hee put diuers of thoſe Iewes that dwelt among them to death. Hee intended alſo to vndertake a warre againſt the Iewes of Bathanæa, who were called Babylonian Iewes, by confederating himſelfe with the Trachonites of Bathanæa. For which cauſe, ſending for twelue of thoſe Iewes who were of moſt eſtimation among the inhabitants of Cæſarea, he enioyned them to repaire to Ecbatane, to ſignifie vnto thoſe of their nation that dwelt there, that Varus vnderſtanding that they pretended to take armes againſt their King, and ſcarcely beleeuing it, had ſent them vnto them, to perſwade them to lay by their armes. And that this ſhould be a certaine ſigne, by which they might perfectly expreſſe that hee had no reaſon to giue credit to their reports who had inforced and obiected ſo much againſt them. Furthermore, he commanded them that ſeuenty of the chiefeſt of them ſhould be choſen out, to anſwer to thoſe accuſations wherewith they ſhould be charged. Theſe twelue arriuing in Ecbatane, and entertained by thoſe of their nation, found that they neither imagined nor intended any commotion: for which cauſe, they perſwaded them to ſend their ſeuenty men: which they did, little ſuſpecting that which would happen.

Varus iniuſtly executeth him that brought the letters. Varus tyranny in gouerning the countrey. Varus ſeeketh to conceale his power and tyranny.

Varus killeth the ſeuenty Iewes with the Embaſſadours. The Iewes retire thẽſelues into the fortreſſe of Gamala, and thither reſorteth Philip alſo.

As ſoone therefore as theſe with the other twelue Embaſſadours came to Cæſarea, Varus hauing inkling of their comming, met them on the way with the Kings forces, and ſlew them altogether with the foreſaid Embaſſadours, and tooke his way towards the Iewes of Ecbatane. But one of the ſeuenty, who had eſcaped, reſorted thither with all expedition preuenting Varus, and certified the reſt of that which had hapned. Whereupon, they incontinently fell to arms, & with their wiues & children retired thẽſelues to the fort of Gamala, abandoning their villages which were ſtored with all kind of goods, and many thouſand cattell. When Philip had tydings hereof, he repaired himſelfe alſo to the fort of Gamala: where he no ſooner arriued, but the people cried out with a loud voyce, exhorting him to take the soueraignty, and to make warre against Varus and the Syrians of Cæsarea. For they had intelligence that the King was dead. But Philip moderated their fury, recounting vnto them what benefits the king had bestowed on them, & of what power the Romans were, against whom it was but a folly for them to take armes; and in the end he perswaded them to peace. The King vnderstanding that Varus, was determined to kill and murther all the Iewes that were in Cæsarea, with their wiues and children all in one day (who were as many in number) he sent vnto him Equus Modius to supply his place, as it hath been by vs declared in another place. Meane-while Philip kept the fort of Gamala, & the countrey thereabouts, perseuering in their fidelity and loyalty to the Romans. As soone as I arriued in Galilee, and had perceiued & learned all occurrences that had hapned, by those who reported the same vnto me, I presently signified the whole estate by my letters, to the councel at Ierusalē, to know what their pleasure was I should do. Who gaue me this answere, that I should remaine where I was, and retaine those Embassadors that I had with me, if they thought good to take charge of Galilee. But they being very wealthy, by means of those tenths & tithes that were giuen them; and very willing, because they were due, to gather them vp in right of their priesthood, resolued with themselues to returne to their owne houses. But for that I entreated them to remaine with me, vntill such time, as we had settled the affaires, they willingly consented vnto me. I therefore departed with them to the citie of Sephora, and came into a borough called Bethmaus distant from Tiberias some foure furlongs, and from thence I sent a messenger to the councell of Tiberias, exhorting the chiefest among the people to come and speak with me: who comming forth to visit me, accompanied with Iustus also, I told them that I was sent Embassadour vnto them, with those other, by the communalty of Ierusalem, to perswade them to deface that building that was erected by Herod the Tetrarch, wherein diuers figures of liuing creatures were painted; for that our law forbad them to allow or doe such things, and I exhorted them to suffer vs to doe that execution as soone as they might.

Gamala still faithfull to the Romans.

Ioseph by the commandement of the Councell remayneth in Galilee.

Capella and those of his party, did for a long time refuse to consent thereunto: but in the end we inforced them so much, that they condescended. Now whilest wee debated vpon this conclusion, Iesus the sonne of Saphias (of whom we haue spoken heretofore, declaring how he was the chieftaine and conductor of the faction of sailers and poore men) took with him certain Galileans, and set fire on all the palace, vnder hope to get great riches thereby (for that there were certaine roofes of the house couered with gold) who spoiled many things against our consent. For after we had conferred with Capella, and the chiefest Tiberians, we retired our selues from Bethmaus into the higher Galilee. In the meane time Iesus men slew all the Greekes that remained there, and who before the warre had been their enemies. Which when I was certified of, I was grieuously displeased, and came down to Tiberias, & disposed of the Kings moueables, for feare lest they should be carried away by the robbers: and hauing recouered a candlesticke of Corinthian worke, princely tables, and no small quantity of massiue siluer, I resolued with my selfe to reserue it to the Kings vse. Calling therefore ten of the chiefest Senators, and Capella, Antillus sonne vnto me, I deliuered the vessels into their hands, charging them to deliuer the same to no man, except it were to my selfe.

The Palace set on fire that was in Tiberias.

Ioseph procureth the safety of the Kings goods.

From thence, with mine associates I went to Iohn at Gischala, to knowe what his minde and resolution was, and I presently smelt out by him, that hee affected innouation and tyranny. For he besought me to grant him liberty, to transport Cæsars wheat that was stored vp in the villages of higher Galilee, telling me that hee would bestow the same in reedifying & repairing the wals of his countrey. But I smelling out both his drift and counsels, denyed him that liberty. For I thought that that wheat would either serue the Romans, or my selfe, for that already I had the care of that countrey committed to my hands by the Citie of Ierusalem. When as therefore he could winne nothing at my hands, hee appealed to my companions, who were improuident of those troubles that were to come, & greedy of rewards, and obtained at their hands through his lauish liberality, a liberty to dispose of all the corne that was in the Prouince, in that I my selfe was vnable to contradict them both. After this, Iohn vsed another subtilty: for he said that those Iewes, who inhabited Cæsarea Philippi, being by the command of their King, to whom they were subiect, kept prisoners with in their wals; being in want of pure oyle, desired to buy the same at his hands, for feare lest contrary to their custome, they should be compelled to vse that of the Greeks. But this spake he not in respect of religion or deuotion, but for his filthy lucres sake. For knowing that among the Cæsareans, two sextaries were sold for a drachme, and that at Gischalis eighty sextaries were sold for foure drachmes, hee sent all that oyle that was in that place vnto them, doing it (as he thought) by my permiſſion. But I did not willingly condeſcend thereunto, but for feare leſt if I ſhould withſtand the ſame, the people ſhould ſtone me to death. As ſoone therefore as I had giuen him leaue, Iohn gathered a great ſumme of money by this cunning ſhift.

Ioſeph ſends back his companions to Ieruſalem.

Ioſeph Preſident of Galilee.

From this place diſmiſſed I my companions, and ſent them back to Ieruſalem, imploying my ſelfe wholly afterwards in preparing armour, and fortifying cities. After this, calling the ſtouteſt theeues before me, when as I perceiued that I might not recouer their weapons from them, I perſwaded the multitude to hire them by rewards, telling them that it was more profitable for them to entertain them in their ſeruice, then to ſuffer their country to be ſpoiled by their excurſions. And thus hauing taken their oathes, did I diſmiſſe them vnder condition, that they ſhould not come into our region, except they were called, or to receiue their due pay vnder condition, that they ſhould abſtain from ſpoiling either the Romans or the inhabitants of the country. But aboue al things my care was to keep Galilee in peace. And whereas my deſire was to get ſeuenty pledges of their loyalty, choſen out amongſt their nobility vnder pretext of friendſhip, as ſoone as they came vnto me in way of friendſhip, I made them my companions and fellow Iudges, & decreed many things according to their opinions, hauing an eſpeciall care leſt through raſhnes I ſhould iniure Iuſtice, or through corruption of rewards diſtaine mine incorrupted honor. At ſuch time therefore as I was thirty yeeres old, at which yeeres although a man bridle himſelfe from vnlawfull affections; yet hardly can he eſcape from the poiſoned ſting of detraction, eſpecially if a great authority be annexed to his green yeeres: I neuer offered vaine and vnlawfull courting to any woman, neither could any man faſten bribe on mee, in that I pretended want of nothing: yea, I refuſed thoſe tenths which in right of prieſthood I might haue receiued from thoſe, that brought them me. Yet after the conqueſt of the Syrians, I tooke part of the ſpoile, which (as I freely confeſſe) I ſent to Ieruſalem to my kinſmen. And whereas at two times I had forcibly ouercome the Sephorites, the Tiberians foure times, and the Gadarenians once, and had brought Iohn vnder my ſubiection, who had oftentimes ſought to entrap me; neither could I endure to reuenge my ſelfe on him, neither on any of the abouenamed people, as in the ſequell of this Story I will make manifeſt.

Ioſeph ioyned ſeuenty of the Nobility with him.

Ioſeph at thirtie yeeres of age offered no woman violence, and would not bee bribed.

Ioſephs bounty towards his enemies.

For which cauſe I ſuppoſe that God, who is the tryer and ſearcher of all iuſt hearts, both deliuered me at this time out of the hands of mine enemies, and afterwards, and that many times out of dangerous and ſeuerall misfortunes; as hereafter ſhall appeare in time and place. But ſo great was the faith and beneuolence of the common people of Galilee towards mee, that their cities being ouerthrowne, and their families led into captiuity, they ſpent not ſo many teares for their owne calamities, as they beſtowed cares for my preſeruation and ſecurity. Which when Iohn perceiued, hee beganne to enuy mee, and beſought mee by his letters, that I would giue him licence for his health ſake, to bathe himſelfe in the hot baths of Tiberias: I ſuſpecting no treaſon, willingly granted him that which he demanded. Moreouer, I wrote vnto thoſe, to whom I had committed the truſt & adminiſtration of the citie, to prepare him a lodging, & to furniſh all his companions with victuals, and to prouide him alſo of all things neceſſary for his diet and entertainment. In the meane ſpace, I my ſelfe paſt my time in a certaine village of Galilee called Cana. But after that Iohn came to Tiberias, hee wrought the townſmen in ſuch ſort, that forgetting both their faith and dutie, they reuolted vnto him; and many of them lent a willing eare vnto his entreaties, eſpecially ſuch as reioycing in innouations were too, prone to change, and greedy of diſſenſion: but in eſpeciall Iuſtus and his father Piſtus, willingly entertained this occaſion to reuolt from my obedience, and to ſubmit themſelues to Iohn; yet was this conſpiracy of theirs preuented by my ſpeedy acceſſe. For a certaine meſſenger came vnto mee from Silas, whom I had in former time preferred to the gouernment of Tiberias, who certified me of the citizens intent, and exhorted me in all haſte to make my repair thither, for that otherwiſe the citie would ſhortly fall into another mans hands. As ſoone therefore as I had peruſed Silas letters, I trauelled all night long with two hundreth choſen men; and ſending a meſſenger before me, who might ſignifie my approach to the citizens, I loſt neither time nor way: And in the morning when I drew neere vnto the citie, the whole people came out to meet me, and among the reſt Iohn; who after he had beheld me, and ſaluted me with a ſuſpicious countenance, fearing leſt his treaſon being diſcouered, he ſhould grow in danger of his life, ſpeedily retired himſelf into his lodging. And when as I drew neere the citie within a furlong, diſmiſſing all my guard but one, and retaining onely ten armed ſouldiers with mee, I beganne to expoſtulate with the Tiberians from a certaine high place, from whence I might bee heard, and coun-

Iohns treaſon.

The people of Tiberias came out to meet Ioſeph.

Ioſephs exhortations to the Tiberians.

ſailed

A failed them that they ſhould not reuolt, leſt in ſo doing they might ſhortly repent them of their mutability and breach of faith: for that no man hereafter would giue them credit, being already either ſuſpected or guilty of this their perfidiouſneſſe.

Scarcely had I ſpoken this, but that I heard one of my attendants, who perſwaded mee to deſcend, telling me that this was no time now to reconcile the Tiberians, or to perſwade them, but rather to ſeeke for mine own ſecurity, and how I might eſcape mine enemies. For after that Iohn had learned that I was deſtitute of followers, he ſent a thouſand of his choſen ſouldiers: commanding them to kill me; who were at hand, and ready to commit the murther, had I not ſpeedily leapt down with my ſeruant Iacob, and being relieued by Herod the Tiberian, had been B brought to the lake; where finding a barke by chance, and putting forth to ſea, I eſcaped contrary to mine enemies expectation, and came to Taricheas.

Iohn ſeeketh to betray and murther Ioſeph.

As ſoone as the inhabitants of that citie vnderſtood how perfidiouſly and traitrouſly the Tiberians had dealt with me, they were ſore diſpleaſed, and betaking themſelues to their weapons, perſwaded me to lead them forth againſt them, telling mee that they would reuenge the iniury that was offered vnto their Gouernor, and they blazed this treaſon of theirs thorow all Galilee. For which cauſe a number of armed Galileans came to me, requeſting me that I would inuade Tiberias, and entering it, that I would ſpoile the ſame; and in the ruines thereof, that I would ſell the inhabitãts with their whole families vnder the ſpeare. The like did my friends, who eſcaped with me out of the citie, perſwade mee. But I in no ſort would admit their ſuite, ſuppoſing it to C be a matter vnworthy my diſcretion, to reuiue a cauſe of ciuill warre, imagining with my ſelfe, that ſuch a contention ought to proceed no further then words: yea, I proteſted vnto them, that ſuch reuenge would be preiudicial to thẽſelues alſo, if the Romãs ſtanding at gaze, they ſhould ſpend themſelues in ciuill diſcords. By this meanes at length the Galileans wrath was appeaſed.

The Galileãs require that they may inuade Tiberias.

But when Iohn perceiued that he failed of his purpoſe, he began to feare: for which cauſe taking with him thoſe armed men which he kept about him, and forſaking Tiberias, he repaired to Giſchala, and from thence he wrote his letters vnto me, excuſing the fact, as if hee had beene no waies guilty thereof, & beſought me that I would in no ſort ſuſpect him, & cõfirmed his words with execrable oathes, whereby hee might win the more credit to his writing. But the Galileans, who were gathered in great multitudes from all parts of the region, knowing that hee was a D wicked and perfidious man, beſought mee that I would lead them forth againſt him, promiſing me to ouerthrow both him, Giſchala, and all his country. Therefore, after I had giuen them thanks for their loue towards me, I promiſed them that mine offices of loue ſhould be anſwerable to their kindneſſe. Yet beſought I them to reſtraine themſelues, and to grant me pardon, for that I thought it better to appeaſe, then procure troubles.

Iohn excuſeth himſelfe to Ioſeph.

This requeſt of mine the Galileans granted: Whereupon we preſently came to Sephoris. But the townſmen, who were reſolued to continue faithfull towards the Roman people, fearing my approach, endeuoured themſelues to diſtract me with ſome other affaires, whereby they might liue in more ſecurity. Whereupon, ſending their meſſenger to Ieſus, the Captaine of the theeues, that kept vpon the confines of Ptolemais, they promiſed him a great ſumme of money, if with E his armie of eight hundreth men, who liued vnder his command, he would wage warre with vs. He, allured by their promiſes, bethought himſelfe to aſſaile vs ſuddenly & vnwares: for which cauſe he beſought me by a meſſenger, that I would grant him leaue and liberty to come & ſalute me: which when he had obtained, for that I was wholly ignorant of his treaſon, taking with him a troup of his theeues, he haſted ſpeedily towards me: yet failed he of his purpoſed treaſon; for when he was not far off from me, a certaine fugitiue of his troupe diſcouered his intent towards me. Which when I heard, I went out into the market place, faining that I knew nothing of his ſecret fraud, attended with a multitude of armed Galileans, and among theſe with certain Tiberians.

Ieſus captaine of theeues.

Afterwards, ſending abroad certaine ſpies, who ſhould ſcoure the high-waies, I cõmanded the F keepers of the gates, that they ſhould only ſuffer Ieſus to enter with the formoſt of his cõpany, and exclude the reſt: and if they ſhould attempt to break in by force, they ſhould beat them off. Who fulfilling that which was commanded them, Ieſus entred with a few: and being willed by me preſently to lay downe his weapons, except he deſired to be ſlaine; he, ſeeing himſelfe inuironed with armed ſouldiers, obeyed. Whereupon they that followed him, and were excluded, perceiuing that their Captain was apprehended, ſuddenly betook them to flight; & leading Ieſus apart, I told him I was not ignorant of thoſe treaſons, which he intended againſt me, neither by whoſe prouocatiõs he attempted the ſame. Yet told I him that I would pardon him, if ſo be by changing changing his manners, he would be faithfull vnto me hereafter. Who promising mee all that which I requested, I dismissed the man, and gaue him leaue to depart with his weapons: yet threatned I to punish the Sephorites, except hereafter they desisted from their treasons. About the same time there came two noblemen vnto me, who were subiect to the king of Trachonites, bringing with them both horsemen, armour, and money: whom when the Iewes would haue constrained to be circumcised, if so be they would remaine amongst them, I would not permit them to be troublesome to the Trachonites, alledging that euery man ought, according to his owne minde, and not by other mens impulsion, serue God: and that it was not to be suffered that they, who for their security sake were fled vnto vs, should repent themselues of their trust they put in vs. And thus hauing perswaded the multitude, I freely and aboundantly furnished these men with all things necessary.

Iosephs care of religion.

Ebutius against Ioseph.

In the meane space, Agrippa sent out his forces vnder the conduct of Equus Modius, to take the Castle Magdala by force, which for that they durst not assault, they beset the waies, & the rather troubled Gamala. But Ebutius Decadarchus, who had the gouernment of the great champaine, hearing that I was come to a certain village called Simonias, situate on the confines of Galilee, and distant from the same some sixty furlongs, took with him by night one hundreth horse that attended him, and about two hundreth footmen, with certaine inhabitants of the citie of Gaba their associates, whom he conducted by night, and assailed and beset the borough where I was. Against whom after I had drawn forth a valiant band of men, Ebutius laboured al that he might to toule vs into the champain, for that he trusted very much in his horsemen: but he easily perceiued that we might not be won. For knowing the aduantage which the horsemen had, if wee should encounter them in the plaine, considering that we were but footmen, I resolued to fight in the place where we were: and Ebutius charged vs for a while very valiantly. At length, perceiuing that he had no vse of his horsemen in that place, he sounded the retreat, and departed back againe with lost labour to Gaba, hauing onely lost three men in the battell. But I presently pursued him with two thousand armed men: and when I came to Besara, which is situate on the confines of Ptolemais, distant some twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Ebutius encamped at that time; & besetting all the passages with courts of guard, whereby we might be more secure from the excursions of our enemies, vntill wee had carried out the wheat, whereof there was a great quantitie stored vp in that place, which was gathered out of the townesships thereabout, belonging to Queene Berenice, and loading diuers Camels and Asses, which to that end I had brought with me; I sent the same corne into Galilee. And hauing finished this businesse, I offered Ebutius the battell: and whereas he detracted the same, being terrified by our boldnes, I took my course to encounter with Neopolitanus, who (as it was reported) was in the territorie of the Tiberians, and foraged there. Now this Neopolitanus was a Captaine of horsemen, and had vndertaken to defend Scythopolis against their enemies: Hauing therefore driuen him from doing any wrong in the country belonging to the Tiberians, I prouided for the security of Galilee.

Ebutius departeth without performing any thing.

Ioseph transporteth corne into Galilee.

Ioseph against Neopolitanus.

But Iohn the son of Leui, who (as we said) liued at Gischala, after he heard that all things fell out fortunately with mee, and that I was loued of my subiects, and feared by mine enemies, was sore aggrieued thereat: and supposing his owne fortune was embased by my felicity, and being touched with no small enuy, & in greater hope that he should hinder my good successe, if so be that he could bring me in hatred with my subiects; he sollicited those of Tiberias and Sephoris to forsake me, and supposed also that the Gabarenians would reuolt vnto him, which Cities are the chiefest in Galilee. For he told them, that vnder his conduct the common-weale should be more discreetly gouerned: but among the rest, the Sephorites gaue least eare vnto him, for that neglecting vs both, they onely held for the Romans.

Iohn maligneth Iosephs good successe.

As for the Tiberians, they would not consent to rebell: yet notwithstanding they promised him some friendship. But the Gabarenians wholly addicted themselues to Iohn, by the meanes of one Simon, a principall Citizen, who was Iohns fellow and friend. Yet did they not openly seeme to allow him, for that they vehemently feared the Galileans, whose good will towards me they were long time assured of, but priuily they sought another meanes to entrap mee. And truely I fell into great danger vpon this occasion. For when as certaine Debarittenians (beeing audacious young men) had intelligence that Ptolomeis wife, the Kings steward, vnder the conduct of certaine horsemen should in great pompe trauell along the great Plaine, out of the Kings countrey into the Romane gouernment, they suddenly set vpon them, and putting the woman to flight, they spoiled all that which she carried with her. Which done, they draue to Taricheas, a place where I then kept, certaine Moyles loaden with apparell, and houshold stuffe of diuers sorts:

The Debarittenians spoile Ptolomeis wife.

A sorts; among which there were diuers siluer vessels, and fiue hundred pieces of gold. Intending therefore to reserue these things for Ptolomey, as being one of the same tribe, in that our law permitteth not to defraud, no not our enemies, if they be of the same tribe; I told those that brought the goods thither, that they must be kept to be sold, to the end that the price of the goods might be bestowed vpon the building of the wals of Ierusalem. This motion of mine, the yong men interpreted very hardly, in that they were cut off from the part of the prey which they hoped for. For which cause, dispersing themselues in the streets of Tiberias, they spred a rumor that I would betray that country to the Romans, alledging that I only fained that the prey was destinated towards the repairing of the wals of Ierusalem: whereas the truth was, that I kept the same to the intent I might restore it to the owner. In which matter they were no whit deceiued in their opi-

B nion. For after the departure of the yong men, I called vnto me two chiefe citizens, Dasion and Iannæus the sonnes of Leui, intire friends to the King, and commanded them, that taking the houshold stuffe with them, they should conuay it vnto the King, threatning them with death, if they reuealed this secret to any man.

Ioseph laboureth to restore Ptolomey to his goods.

But when as the rumour was spred thorow Galilee, that I would betray the region into the hands of the Romans, and all of them being grieuously bent and intent against me to punish me; they of Taricheas also giuing credit to the yong men, fained speeches, perswaded my guard, and the rest of the souldiers, that forsaking me whil'st I was asleep, they should come into the horse-race, and consult with other in that place how to degrade me, and giue the honor vnto another.

C They, being perswaded, came to the appointed place, where they found many others there arriued: and all of them cried out with one consent, that it was meet to take punishment on a traitor, who hath sought the destruction of the common-weale. But he that most of all incited them to these troubles, was Iesus the sonne of Saphias, who at that time had the magistracy of Tiberias in his hands, a man giuen ouer to all wickednesse, and borne to breed troubles, and stirre vp seditions.

Sedition against Ioseph. Iesus, the son of Saphias, conspireth against Ioseph.

This man, bearing Moses tables in his hands, and comming out into the midst of the assembly, spake thus with a loud voice: If (said he) you be touched with no care of your selues, yet at the leastwise contemne not these sacred lawes, which this your chieftaine Ioseph, a man worthy to be hated by all men, hath of long time dared to betray, and for that cause is worthy of extreme pu-

D nishment.

After he had thus spoken, and was applauded by the acclamations of the people, he leading the armed men with him, hastily repaired to the house where I kept, with a certaine intent and purpose to put me to death. Meanewhile, I suspecting nothing of all this tumult, and tired with labour and wearinesse, took my rest; when as suddenly Simon one of my guard, who at that time onely remained with me, seeing the incursion of the people, came and awaked me: and certifying me of mine instant perill, he gaue me counsell likewie, that rather, like a noble and vndaunted chiefetaine, I should shorten mine owne life, then shamefully die by mine enemies direction. Whil'st he gaue me this counsell, I committing my safety to Gods, hands and chenging my garments, went forth into the assembly after a mournfull manner, and wearing my sword hanging

E about my neck, stealing by that way, by which I knew that none of mine aduersaries might meet me: and comming into the horse-race, I offred my selfe to euery mans eye, and lying prostrate on my face, & watring the earth with my teares, I moued all men that beheld me to compassion. And when I perceiued that the affections of the people were changed, I laboured all that I might to diuide them in opinions, before the armed souldiers returned from my house: and confessing my self that I was not wholly cleere of that which was obiected against me I besought them to vnderstand to what vse I reserued that prey that was brought to my hand; after which, if they list they might kill me. And whil'st the multitude commanded me to speake, the armed men returned back, and beholding me, rushed in vpon me with an intent to murther me: but being restrained by the peoples exclamations, they moderated their fury; supposing, that after

For which cause, after silence I beganne thus: Men and brethren (said I) if in your opinion I deserue death, I refuse not to dye; yet before my death will I certifie you of the whole truth: truly, when as I perceiued, that this City was most commodious and fit to entertaine strangers, and that I perceiued that many men, forsaking their owne countries, were delighted with your conuersations, and willing to partake with you in all sorts of fortune: I was resolu'd to build vp your wals with this mony; for which being thus destinated to do you good, your indignation is prouoked againſt me. Vpon theſe words, the Taricheans and ſtrangers cried out, giuing me thanks, and willing mee to be of good courage. But the Galileans and Tiberians continued in their hatred, in ſo much as they grew to debate betwixt themſelues, the one threatning me with puniſhment; the other contrariwiſe, willing me to aſſure my ſelfe of ſecurity. But after I had promiſed the Tiberians that I would reedifie their wals, and fortifie other conuenient cities, they giuing credit to my words, repaired euery one of them to their own houſes. And I beyond all expectation eſcaping from ſo great a perill, with certaine of my friends, and ſome twenty ſouldiers, returned to my houſe.

But once againe the thieues and authors of ſedition, fearing leſt they ſhould be puniſhed for theſe their offences, begirt my lodging with ſix hundreth armed men, intending to conſume it with fire. Of whoſe arriuall, as ſoon as I had intelligence, imagining with my ſelfe that it would be much diſhonor for me to fly, I reſolued to vſe valor and courage againſt them: for which cauſe commanding the gates to be ſhut, I required them from the top of the houſe, that they would ſend in ſome of them vnto me, to receiue that money, for which they had been drawne into this mutiny: whereby they might haue no further cauſe to be incenſed againſt me. Which done, laying hold of one of the moſt troubleſome fellowes, that with the reſt came in vnto me, I cauſed him to be beaten with many grieuous ſtrokes, & his hand to be cut off, and hung about his neck; and thus handled, we thruſt him out of dores, to returne vnto thoſe who had ſent him. But they being wondrouſly affraid heerewith, and ſuſpecting the like puniſhment if they ſhould ſtay there any longer, for that they ſuſpected that I had diuers armed ſouldiers in my houſe, they ſuddenly all of them fled away: and ſo by this ſtratageme eſcaped I the other dangers. Yet wanted there not ſome, who incited the people once more againſt me; ſaying that the kings ſeruants, who were fled vnto me for refuge, ought not to liue, except they ſubmitted themſelues to their lawes and cuſtomes, from whom they required protection.

Ioſeph in another danger.

Ioſephs ſtratagem.

Another ſedition.

They likewiſe accuſed them, that they were of the Roman faction, and priſoners, and preſently the people began to mutine, being deceiued by their words, who labored to flatter them. Which when I heard of, I once more inform'd the people, that they ought not to perſecute thoſe who reſorted vnto them for reſcous: and I ieſted at their folly who accuſed them of impoiſoning, and that the Romans would not vainly nouriſh ſo many thouſands of ſoldiers, if they pretended to make away their enemies with poiſon. Being by theſe words ſomwhat pacified, they had ſcarcely withdrawne themſelues awhile, but that by certaine out-caſts and wicked men, they were incited againſt the nobility, ſo that with armed weapons they came to the houſes of the Taricheans, intending to murther them. Which when I heard, I was ſore affraid, that if this wickednes ſhould be committed, no man hereafter ſhould dare to truſt his life in my hands. For which cauſe being aſſiſted by diuers others, I haſtily reſorted to their lodging, and ſhut vp the gates: and cutting a trench betwixt it and the lake, I called for a bark, and entring into the ſame with them, I croſſed ouer into the confines of the Hippenians: and furniſhing them with mony to buy them horſes, for that they could not tranſport their owne with them in that flight, I diſmiſſed them, requiring them to digeſt their preſent misfortunes with a conſtant minde. For, I my ſelfe took it very heauily, that I was once more inforced to land thoſe men in the enemies country, who had committed themſelues to my truſt: yet thinking, that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that they ſhould fall into the Romans hands, they ſhould be ſafer, then if by ſuffering them to remaine in my country, I ſhould ſee them oppreſt: I aduentured them thus. Yet were they ſaued, and the king gaue them pardon. And this was the end of this tumult.

Seuen ſtadia make almoſt a German mile.

But they of Tiberias wrote vnto the king, requiring him to ſend a garriſon into their country, and promiſing him to reuolt and follow him. Which done, as ſoone as I came vnto them, they required me that I would build them thoſe wals which I had promiſed them: for they had already heard that Taricheas was enuironed with wals. Whereunto I condeſcended, and gathering ſtuffe from euery place, I ſet the workmen to their taske. But ſome three daies after, departing from Tiberias towards Taricheas, which was thirty ſtades diſtant from thence, by chance a troupe of Roman horſemen were diſcouered, not far from the City, which made the inhabitants beleeue, that they were the Kings army: Whereupon they preſently began to vtter many things in honour of the King, and more in my reproach. And preſently a certaine friend poſted vnto me, and told me what their mind was, and how they intended to reuolt from mee. Which when I vnderſtood, I was wondrouſly troubled: For I had ſent backe my men of war from Taricheas to their houſes, for that the next day was the Sabbath: for I would by no meanes, that the Citizens of Taricheas ſhould be charged or troubled with entertaining ſouldiers. And at all times

A times, when I remained in that citie, I tooke no care of the guard of mine owne perſon, hauing had often proofe of the loyaltie of the inhabitants towards me. Beeing therefore at that time attended onely with ſeuen ſouldiers, & a few of my friends, I knew not what to doe. For I thought it not fit to call back my forces, for that the day was welny paſt; and although they ſhould haue been with me the next morning, yet they might not haue taken armes, becauſe our lawes forbad the ſame, how great ſoeuer the occaſion bee that is offered. And although I ſhould haue drawne forth the Taricheans and the ſtrangers that were retired thither, and if vnder hope of prey I had led them forth, yet ſaw I that they were too feeble to reſiſt their forces. On the other ſide, I alreadie perceiued that if I ſtaied ouer-long, the army which was ſent by the King, being already entred the citie, would haue excluded me: I therefore determined to vſe this ſtratagem: I preſently

Ioſeph in danger for the Tiberians ſakes.

B therefore garded the gates of the Taricheans with my moſt truſtie friends, ſuffering no man to paſſe out of them; and aſſembling the chiefeſt of euery familie, I commanded euery one of them to lanch their boates into the lake, and to follow me with the maſters of their ſhips. After which both I and my friends, and ſeuen other ſouldiers, betooke vs to a barke, and ſailed toward Tiberias. But when the Tiberians perceiued that they had no forces come from the King, & that the whole lake was couered with barkes; amazed and fearing the ruine of their citie, for that Ioſeph ſaileth to Tiberias.

C they ſuppoſed the ſhips to bee loaden with ſouldiers, they changed their former opinion. For which cauſe laying by their weapons, they themſelues with their wiues and children came forth to meet mee, entertaining me with happy acclamations: for that they thought I had heard no inkling of their intents, beſeeching me that for the ſafetie of their citie, I would enter the ſame. But I drawing neere the citie, commanded the maſters of the barks to caſt anchor farre off the ſhore, leſt the townſmen might perceiue that the ſhippes were emptie: and I my ſelfe drawing neere with mine owne barke vnto them, accuſed them, for that contrarie to their oaths, they had beene ſo fooliſhly induced to reuolt. Afterwards, I promiſed them aſſured pardon, if ſo bee they would deliuer mee tenne of their chiefeſt nobilitie: which when they had incontinently performed, I ſhipt them in a barke, and ſent them priſoners to Taricheas: and by this policy one after another, I at laſt gotte all the Senate of Tiberias, and manie of the chiefeſt Citizens, and carried them thither alſo.

At length, the reſt of the multitude, as ſoone as they perceiued in how great danger they Clytus the author of the ſedition in Tiberias.

D were, they beſought mee that I would puniſh the chiefe authour of this conſpiracie, who was called Clytus, a bold and raſh young man. But I, that held it a wicked act to kill one of the ſame Tribe, and yet was inforced to puniſh him, commanded Leuias one of my guard to goe vnto him and cut off his hand: who not daring for that he was alone, to enter into ſo huge a multitude; for feare leſt his cowardiſe ſhould be diſcouered by the Tiberians, I called Clytus vnto mee, and ſaid vnto him: Sith vngratefull and perfidious man, as thou art, thou deſerueſt to loſe both thy hands, I charge thee to become thine owne executioner, for feare leſt through thy delay thou procure thy further puniſhment. And whereas with many prayers hee beſought mee to grant

E him one of his hands, I hardly condeſcended: at length of his owne accord, for feare leſt hee ſhould loſe both, hee tooke a knife and cutte off his left hand: and thus was this tumult appeaſed.

As ſoone as I returned to Taricheas, and the Tiberians vnderſtood what ſtratagem I had vſed with them, they were all amazed, ſeeing how I had puniſhed their ingratitude and diſobedience without any bloudſhed or murther. After I had ſent for ſuch of the people of Tiberias as were in priſon, amongſt whom was Iuſtus and his father Piſtus, I inuited them to ſuppe with mee: and during the repaſt, I told them that I was not ignorant, that the Romane armie excelled all men of the world in power & force: notwithſtanding that, I kept my ſelf ſilent in the reſpect of thoſe theeues that were round about, and I counſailed them that they alſo would do the like in expectation of ſome better daies; and yet that in the meane time they would not thinke amiſſe of my gouernment, becauſe the time affoorded them not a more affable and commodious gouernour. I admoniſhed Iuſtus alſo, that before I came from Ieruſalem the Galileans had cut off his brothers hands, accuſing him to haue forged falſe letters before the warre; and that after Philips departure the Gamalites, beeing at oddes with the Babylonians, ſlew Chares, Philips own kinſman, and had moderately puniſhed his brother in law Ieſus, who had married his ſiſter. After this diſcourſe during ſupper time, I diſmiſt Iuſtus and his friends early in the morning, with their freedomes. But before this came to paſſe, it hapned that Philip the ſonne of Iacimus departed from the fort of Gamala vpon this occaſion that enſueth: As ſoone as he vnderſtood that Varus was reuolted from King Agrippa, and that Modius Equus who was his friend, was ſent to ſucceed him, hee certified certified him of his eſtate by his letters: which when he had receiued, he highly reioyced at Philips ſafetie, and ſent thoſe letters to the King & Queene, who liued at Berytum. Whereupon the King vnderſtanding the falſe rumour that ranne as touching Philip, that he was the chiefetain of the Iewes armie, who vndertooke the war againſt the Romanes, ſent certaine horſemen to Philip to bring him to his preſence: before whom hee no ſooner arriued but he embraced him verie kindly, and ſhewed him to the Romane Captaines, telling them that that was Philip, of whom it was commonly reported, that he was in rebellion againſt the Romans. He therfore charged him, that taking with him certaine horſmen, he ſhould poſte in all diligence to the fort of * Gamala; & drawing his houſhold ſeruants from thence, hee ſhould lead and reeſtabliſh the Babylonians in Batanæa, and trauaile to his vttermoſt power that the ſubiect ſhould bee continued in obedience and peace. After Philip had receiued this commandement from the King, he haſted to performe the ſame.

Hedio, Gadara.

But Ioſeph a certaine drougier or treacle-ſeller, gathering together a ſort of bold young men, & inciting the nobilitie of Gamala, perſwaded the people to fall from the King, and that betaking them to their armes, they ſhould recouer their former libertie: and thus drew they other into their opinion, killing thoſe that durſt contradict them. Amongſt theſe died Chares and Ieſus his kinſman, and the ſiſter of Iuſtus the Tiberian, as we haue heretofore declared. After this they requeſted me by letters, that I would ſend them aide, and certaine labourers to begirt their Towne withall. To both which requeſts of theirs, I eaſily condeſcended. About this time the countrey of Gaulonite, as farre as the borough of Solyma, rebelled againſt Agrippa. I alſo incloſed Seleucia and Sogon, which were two ſtrong places vnacceſſible, and fortified by nature, with walles. I did the like alſo by Iamnia Ameritha, and Charabe, a borough of higher Galilee, although they were ſituated amongſt the rocks. I fortified in like ſort Taricheas alſo and Tiberias, & Sephoris, citties of Galilee; and the borough of the caue of the Arbalians, Berſobe, Selamen, Iotapa, Capharath, Comoſogana, Nepapha, and the mountaine Itabyrium. In thoſe places hoorded I vp great ſtore of corne, and laid vp ſtore of armour, and munition for defence.

Ioſeph ſtirred vp a ſedition in Gamala.

Manie Iewes reuolt from the Romans.

Meane-while, Iohn the ſonne of Leui, increaſed his hatred daily more and more towards mee, being greatly aggrieued to ſee my fortunes happy, and the ſucceſſe anſwerable: and whereas he was wholly reſolued to rid me of my life, after he had encompaſſed his countrey Giſchala with walles, he ſendeth Simon his brother with one hundreth ſouldiers to Ieruſalem, to Simon the ſon of Gamaliel, requiring him to labour the matter in ſuch ſort with the City, that my authority might be diſannulled, and that Iohn by the common conſent of all, might bee ordained Gouernour ouer the affaires of Galilee. This Simon was borne in Ieruſalem, noble in birth, and in ſect a Phariſe (which ſect of all other ſeemed moſt exactly inſtructed in the lawes of our countrey) a man of excellent wiſedome, who by his counſaile was able to repaire the decaying ruines of his countrey, who of long time had made vſe of Iohns friendſhip, becauſe hee was at that time mine enemy.

Iohn laboureth to ſupply Ioſeph in his gouernment.

This man, ſollicited by the interceſſion of his friends, perſwaded the high Prieſt Ananus and Ieſus the ſonne of Gamala, and others of his line and faction, to cut off my increaſing honours, and not to permit me to attaine the fulneſſe and content thereof. For it ſhould be very profitable for them alſo, if I were remoued from the gouernment of Galilee. Further, he told Ananus and the reſt, that they were not to delay the matter, leſt vpon the diſcouery of their counſaile, I ſhould inuade the Citie with mine army. Thus ſpake Simon: yet Ananus the high Prieſt replyed, that it might not eaſily be done, for that diuers Prieſts and gouernours of the people bare witneſſe for me, that I behaued my ſelfe honeſtly in that gouernment, and that it was ill done to intend an accuſation againſt a man, who might not bee touched with any miſdemeanour. When Simon had heard what Ananus had ſaid, he beſought him and the reſt alſo to ſpeak nothing therof; neither to make his motion knowne, certifying them that he had prouidently prouided, that I ſhould be ſpeedily driuen out of Galilee: And calling vnto him his brother Iohn, he charged him to ſend preſents to Ananus. For (ſaid hee) in ſo doing they would ſo much worke with him, that they would make him change his opinion. In the end, Simon obtained that which he long time ſought after. For Ananus and his adherents were corrupted with money, and accorded to caſt me from the gouernment of Galilee, without the conſent or allowance of any other of the citizens. For which cauſe they thought good to ſend certaine noble men in birth, and no waies inferiour to one another in learning, whereof two of them were of the common ſort, and Phariſes; the one called Ionathas, the other Ananias; the third was Iozarus of the tribe of Leui, who was alſo a Phariſe, and of the race of the Prieſts. But Simon was of the order of the Prieſts, and the yongeſt of

of them all. Theſe did they command, that calling together a Gouncell of the Galileans, they ſhould demand why they loued me ſo well; commanding them that if they anſwered that I was a Galilean, they ſhould likewiſe ſay that Ieruſalem was their countrey. But if they allowed in me the knowledge of the law, they were likewiſe willed to ſay, that they knew their countrey cuſtomes, or if in regard of the name of Prieſthood, they ſhould ſay they loued me, they ſhould likewiſe auerre that two of them were Prieſts. Being thus inſtructed, and receiuing forty thouſand ſiluer drachmes of the publike treaſure, for their fellow and conſort Ionathas, they ſet forwards. Embaſſadors with ſouldiers ſent to Ioſeph.

And for that at the very ſame time a certaine man called Ieſus of Galilee, was come to Ieruſalem with a band of ſixe hundreth ſouldiers, they ſent for him and hired him, & gaue him three moneths pay, commanding him to follow Ionathas and his companions; and to doe that which they ſhould command them: and to theſe annexed they three hundreth Citizens, whom they hired with reward. With this preparation the Legates ſet forward, being accompanied with Simon Iohns brother, who had one hundreth ſouldiers with him, who had commiſſion from thoſe that ſent them, that if I willingly gaue ouer armes, they ſhould ſend me aliue to Ieruſalem: and if I reſiſted, by their authority they might lawfully kill me. They had letters alſo directed to Iohn, which incited him to make warre againſt me. Moreouer, they charged the Sephorites, Gabarites, and Tiberians, to maintaine Iohn againſt me. After that I had intelligence hereof, by my fathers letters, who had intelligence thereof by Ieſus the ſonne of Gamala, one of thoſe who were preſent at the deliberation, and who intirely and familiarly loued me; I was much grieued, ſeeing with how much ingratitude my countrimen requited me, who of malice had decreed vpon my death: and for that my father inuited me by moſt affectionate letters to draw my ſelfe homeward, telling me how much he deſired to ſee me, who was his ſonne, before he left this life; I imparted theſe things to my friends, and certified them, that within three daies I would forſake their countrey, and retire my ſelfe into mine owne. Whereupon they were altogether ſurprized with great ſadneſſe, and beſought me with weeping teares, that I would not forſake them, for that they ſhould be vtterly ouerthrown, if ſo be they were left deſtitute of my conduct. But wheras by no meanes they might perſwade me, and the care of mine owne ſecurity preuailed very much with me; the Galileans fearing leſt I ſhould leaue them, and by that meanes the theeues ſhould be encouraged to ſet vpon them, they ſent meſſengers thorow all Galilee, to ſignifie vnto them the reſolution of my departure. Whereupon diuers of them being made priuy to theſe newes, reſorted vnto me from all parts, bringing with them their wiues and children; not ſo much, as I ſuppoſe, for the ſorrow they conceiued at my departure, as the feare that they had of their owne eſtates: For they perſwaded themſelues, that if I remained among them, there could no miſchiefe befall them. They aſſembled therefore in a great Plaine, called Aſochim, where I remained. Ioſephs father ſignifieth all theſe newes vnto him. Ioſeph reſolueth to returne home.

That night in my ſleepe I had a wonderfull dreame. For lying in my bed, and being wholly diſconſolate and troubled with the newes I had receiued, me thought that a certaine man from aboue ſpake vnto me after this manner: Pacifie thou the paſſions of thy ſpirit, and be thou free from all feare. For that which diſcomforteth thee, ſhall be that which ſhall make thee great, and happy beyond thine expectation. For not onely theſe things ſhall turne to a fortunate end or iſſue, but alſo many other. Be not thou therefore diſmaied, but remember thy ſelfe that thou art reſerued to make warre againſt the Romans. After I had this dreame, I awaked; and ſo prepared as I was, went I downe into the Plaine: and as ſoone as I came thither, all the people of Galilee, with their wiues and children, humbling themſelues vpon the earth, and weeping, beſought mee that I would not leaue them for a prey to their enemies: neither that I would abandon their countrey to ſerue for a prey and mockery to their aduerſaries. But ſeeing that I made ſmall reckoning of their praiers, they conſtrained me by oath to remaine amongſt them, and vttered diuers iniurious outrages againſt the people of Ieruſalem, that enuied them the peace and happineſſe which they enioyed. Ioſephs admirable dreame. A number of Galileans beſought Ioſeph that he would not forſake them.

After I had heard theſe words, and ſeene the deſolation of the people, my heart was broken with compaſſion, and I reſolued my ſelfe that in reſpect of ſo great a multitude, my life could not be better hazzarded then for their contentment: I therfore gaue my conſent to remaine with them. I gaue order that fiue thouſand of their beſt ſouldiers, with their prouiſion, ſhould attend me: as for the reſt, I ſent them backe euery one to his owne houſe. When theſe fiue thouſand preſented themſelues, I annexed them to the other three thouſand that I had with me, and drew out with them foureſcore horſemen, and marched on towards Chabalon a borough vpon the Ioſeph conſenteth to ſtay in Galilee.

marches of Ptolemais, where I vndertooke to prepare them for the battell, expecting some assault from Placidus, who was come with two companies of footmen and one of horsemen, sent by Cestius Gallus to burne the countrey townes of Galilee, and other little boroughs that bordered on Ptolemais. And for that he was entrenched before the City of Ptolemais, I encamped mine army likewise not farre from the borough Chabalon, some sixty stades off: and diuers times drew I out my forces to bid him battell, but neuer would he offer any thing but skirmishes. For Placidus, perceiuing my forwardnesse to fight, was abashed thereat, and retired himselfe: yet departed he not from Ptolemais.

Placidus against Ioseph.

About that time came Ionathan with the other Embassadors, who (as we haue heretofore declared) were sent by Simon, and the high Priest Ananus, who laboured to entrap me by policy, for that they durst not assaile me in open field. They therefore wrote a letter vnto me to this effect: Ionathan and the Embassadours with him, who are sent by those of Ierusalem to Ioseph, Greeting. We are certified by the chiefest men of Ierusalem, that Iohn of Gischala hath oftentimes sought to betray you: for which cause we are sent to represse his malice, and to exhort him hereafter to submit himselfe vnto you: and being desirous to conferre with you, as touching that which cõcerneth the publike profit, we pray you to resort vnto vs as soon as you can, with some few attendants, because the borough is not able to entertain many. To this effect wrote they vnto me, hoping that one of these two effects would fall out: either that I cõming disarmed, should be easily surprized by them; or that bringing with me a great company, I should be condemned for an enemy to my countrey. The messenger that brought me this letter was a valiant young man, mounted on horseback, who had in times past borne armes for the King. The time wherein he came vnto me, was two houres within night, & euen then was I banquetting with my friends, and the chiefest Gouernours of Galilee. After that one of my houshold seruants had certified me, that a certain Iew on horseback came to speak with me, I commanded he should be brought in; who enbracing me but coldly, and deliuering me the letter, said vnto me: They that are come from Ierusalem, send you this letter; giue them a speedy answer: For I am commanded to make a speedy return. They that sate at the table with me, were amazed at the souldiers boldnesse. But for my selfe, I willed him to sit downe, and to make merry with me: but he refusing the same, I kept the letter in my hand in such manner, as I had receiued the same, and began to talke with my friends of other affaires: and not long after rising from supper, and dismissing the rest to their rest, I only retained with me some of my most inward friends, and commanding my page to fill me wine, I opened the letters before any many perceiued the same: and conceiting incontinently what they meant, I sealed them anew, and as if I had knowne nothing of the contents, hauing the letter in my hands, I gaue order that the souldier should receiue 20. drachmes for to beare the charges of his voyage. He hauing receiued the same, and giuing me thankes, I perceiued well that he was addicted to gaine, and might easily be wrought with money. Wherupon I said vnto him, If thou wilt drinke with mee, thou shalt haue a drachme for euery glasse thou drinkest. To this the souldier listned willingly, and hauing drunke good store of wine, to get him the greater store of money, he grew drunken; so that he was vnable any longer to conceale his secrets: but of his owne accord he declared the treason that was prepared, and how the sentence of death was giuen by them against me. Which when I vnderstood, I answered them to this effect: Ioseph to Ionathan, and those that accompany him, Health: I am very glad to heare that you are arriued in Galilee in good health, especially for that I may now redeliuer into your hands the gouernment of the affaires thereof, to the end (according as I haue long time desired) I might returne into my country. I will not onely therefore visit you at Xallon: but in any further place also, notwithstanding you had neuer sent for me. Notwithstanding pardon me, though I come not at this present: for I am now at Chabalon to confront Placidus, who pretendeth to inuade Galilee. Resort you therefore vnto mee, who shall reade my letters. Farewell.

Ionathans letters to Ioseph.

A horseman brought the letters.

Iosephs policy.

Iosephs answer to Ionathan.

After I had written this answer, and deliuered it to the souldier to carry it vnto them, I sent by the same way thirty of my most approoued friends of Galilee, commanding them to salute them that were come, without any further speech. I assigned also to each of these one of my most resolute and best souldiers to take heed lest any of those I sent should conferre with Ionathans men. They therefore set forward on their way: and Ionathan and the other seeing their first purpose failed them, they sent me another letter after this tenour which ensueth: Ionathan and his company to Ioseph, Health: We command you that within three daies, you make your appearance before vs, without any of your souldiers, in the borough of Gadara, to the end you may Ionathans message and letter to Ioseph.

A may answer to that which Iohn hath obiected against you. As soon as they had written this, and saluted those whom I had sent, they went to Iapha, which is the greatest town of Galilee, defenced with strong wals, and peopled with many inhabitants. Against these the people of that City, their wiues and children came forth, exclaiming against them with huge cries, charging them to returne back, & not to depriue them of the good Gouernour they had. Ionathan and his companions were prouoked with these cries; yet durst they not make any open shew of their displeasure, but without returning them any answer they resorted to other Cities, where they met with no lesse effectuall exclaimes from the multitude, protesting with a loud voice, that no man should be able to disswade them from continuing Ioseph in authority in their gouernment. Wherupon B Ionathan with his followers marched forth without any further speech, and came to Sephoris, the greatest citie of Galilee. But the inhabitants thereof being addicted to the Romans, came forth to them: but for my part they neither praised nor blamed me. Departing from Sephoris, they came to Asochim, where the citizens sung the same song, that the Iapheans did. Whereupon they being vnable to containe their displeasures, commanded their souldiers to beat them with their truncheons, who exclaimed against them, and claimed me for their Gouernour. And when they drew neere to Gabara, Iohn came out to meet them, accompanied with three thousand souldiers: and I hauing intelligence by their letters, that they were resolued to make warre against me, departed from Chabalon, accompanied with three thousand souldiers; and hauing committed the campe to the charge of my trustiest friend, I went to Iotapata, because I would C be within foure stades of them, and sent them this letter: If your will be that I must needs come vnto you, there are in Galilee two hundreth and foure cities and boroughs, I will meet you in any one of them, which you please, except Gabara or Gischala: for that the one is the place of Iohns natiuity, and the other is his associates and friends.

The Embassadors of Ierusalem coldly entertained in Galilee.

Ioseph writeth againe to them.

As soone as Ionathan had receiued this answer, he replied not any more, but sought the means to entrap me. Iohn was of the opinion to write vnto all the cities and boroughs of Galilee, supposing that without question there were one or two in them that were mine enemies, whom they might incense against me, as against their common enemy. Hee gaue order also, that this his resolution should be sent to Ierusalem, to the end that those of the city vnderstanding that I was adiudged an enemy by the Galileans, might in like sort confirme that their decree by their D opinion. For he said, that by this meanes it would come to passe, that the Galileans, who were well affected towards me, should forsake me for feare they had of them. This aduice of Iohns maruailously pleased them all, and was presently brought vnto me about the third houre of the night, by one Sacchæus, who flying from them, came and brought me the newes, and particularly related to me their intent. For which cause perceiuing that the time required no longer delay, and supposing that Iacob was one of my most assured and trustiest seruants, I commanded him to take two hundreth men with him, and to belay the waies betweene Gabara and Galilee, and to send me those whom he should surprize, that came that way; and especially those that carried letters. I sent Ieremy also, who was one of my friends, to the marches of Galilee, with fiue hundreth men at armes, to keep the passages that way towards Ierusalem, commanding him E to lay hands on all those that carried letters, and to commit the men to prison, and to send mee their packets.

The consultation of the Embassadors against Ioseph.

Ioseph besetteth the waies of Galiloe.

After I had in this sort instructed those whom I sent, I willed and commanded the Galileans the next day following, to take their armes, and to furnish themselues with victuals for three daies, and to attend me at the borough of Gabaroth. Those souldiers that I had, I distributed in foure companies, and kept those with me in whom I reposed most confidence for the guard of my person: and hauing appointed captaines ouer them, and commanded them to be carefull, I charged them to suffer no vnknowne souldier to enter in among them. The next day I came to Gabaroth, the fifth houre of the day, where I found all the fields about the Citie full of men of warre, of those of Galilee, who resorted thither to assist mee, according as I had commanded F them. Thither also came there a multitude of other men from other boroughs. As soone as I came to their presence, and was ready to speake vnto them, all of them bgan to cry out, calling mee their benefactour, and maintainer of their countrey. After I had solemnely giuen them thanks for this fauour they had shewed me, I charged them neither to offer war, or attempt any spoile in the champaine countrey, but to encamp amidst the fields, contenting themselues with that prouision they had brought with them. For I told them all in generall, that I would extinguish those troubles without effusion of blood. It hapned the same day that Ionathans messenger and letters fell into their hands, who had the guard of the passages by my appointment, and according to my direction the men were kept in ſecurity, as I gaue order: and finding the letters that were brought me, to be full of nothing but ſlanders and lies written by the Embaſſadors; I ſaid not a word to any man, but thought it beſt policy to ſet vpon them. But Ionathans ſouldiers hauing intelligence of my comming, retired both themſelues and their goods, and with them Iohn alſo into Ieſus houſe, which was a great tower, nothing different from a cittadell, in which they hid a number of men of warre, and locked vp all the other gates ſaue one; expecting that I ſhould come that way, to ſalute them. In a word, they had commanded their ſoldiers that when I ſhould enter, they ſhould ſuffer no man elſe to enter with me, but exclude all the reſt. For they made no other account, but that by this means they might eaſily lay hold on me. But they were deceiued of their hopes: for hauing notice beforehand of their intents, as ſoone as I came thither, entring into a lodging that was right ouer againſt theirs, I fained that I went to take my reſt. Whereupon Ionathans ſouldiers ſuppoſing that I was aſleepe, and that in troth I was ſafe; they came forth in all haſte into the Plaine, labouring to diſſwade my ſouldiers from their loue and alleageance, and detracting my Gouernment. But all things fell out contrary to that they thought: for as ſoon as they were diſcouered, the Galileans gaue a great ſhout, teſtifying the good will they bare vnto me, who was their Gouernour, and they blamed the Embaſſadours, for that without any cauſe of iniury, they were come to diſturbe the publike peace, willing them to be gone, for that they intended to admit no other Gouernour. When theſe things were ſignified vnto me, I made no doubt to aduenture my ſelfe among them: for which cauſe I ſpeedily went out to heare what theſe Embaſſadors could alleadge againſt me. Vpon my arriuall the whole troupe ſhouted for ioy, and applauded me with a loud voice, giuing me thanks for my happy and peaceable gouernment.

Iohn and the Embaſſadors forces retire to Ieſus houſe.

Ioſeph preſenteth himſelfe among his enemies.

Ionathan and his adherents hearing this, were affraid, leſt if the Galileans ſhould ſet vpon them, they ſhould grow in danger of their liues, and began to bethinke themſelues how they might eſcape. But perceiuing that they might not retire, for that I required them inſtantly to ſtay, they were altogether diſmaied, and paſt their ſenſes. I therefore commanded the people to ſurceaſe their ſhouting, and planted the ſouldiers of greateſt truſt in euery paſſage, to preuent leſt Iohn ſhould charge them vnawares. After this, I exhorted the people to betake them to their weapons, to the end that if the enemy ſhould ſuddenly aſſaile them, they might not bee driuen to diſorder. This done, I firſt of all began to rippe vp to Ionathans followers and fellowes, what letters they had written, and how they had certified him, that they were ſent by the communalty and inhabitants of Ieruſalem, to make an end of thoſe debates that were betweene me and Iohn; and how they had incited me to come vnto them: Afterwards in the ſequell of my diſcourſe I produced their letters in open view, to the end they might not deny any thing, ſeeing themſelues conuicted by their owne hand-writing, and ſpake thus vnto them:

Ioſeph obiecteth trechery againſt the Embaſſadors.

In the mouth of two or three witneſſes, conſiſteth truth.

If being accuſed by Iohn, I ſhould produce two or three witneſſes that were men of reputation, to teſtifie for my life, it were a matter moſt euident that thou ſhouldeſt be compelled, O Ionathan and you my Lords Embaſſadors (after you had foreinquired of their liues) to acknowledge mine innocency, and to acquit mee of that whereof I am accuſed. But to the intent you may know that I haue faithfully gouerned the eſtate of Galilee, I ſuppoſe that three witneſſes are too little for an vpright man, for which cauſe I produce all theſe. Enquire of them how I haue liued, and whether I haue gouerned this countrey in all honeſty and iuſtice. I adiure you all therefore, who are my fellowes and friends of Galilee, that you hide nothing of the truth, but that before theſe men, as before your Iudges you profeſſe, if I haue done any thing that is contrary to right. Whileſt I ſpake after this manner, all of them with one accord called me their benefactor and defender, and gaue teſtimony of my forepaſſed gouernment, and exhorted me to continue the ſame hereafter. And all of them affirmed by a publike oath, that I had carefully preuented leſt any woman ſhould be violated, or any man by my meanes ſhould be drawne into any iniury, or inconuenience. This done, I publikely read the two letters in the preſence of all the Galileans, which were taken from Ionathans meſſengers by thoſe, who were appointed by me to beſet the waies, and were by them ſent to me, which were full of iniuries and falſhoods, alledging that I rather behaued my ſelfe like a tyrant then a gouernour towards them: and beſides that, there were diuers other things written & vrged very impudently. Theſe letters (ſaid I) were voluntarily offered me by thoſe that carried the ſame. For I was vnwilling that mine aduerſaries ſhould know that I had beſet the waies, fearing leſt they ſhould forbear to write hereafter.

The Galileans teſtimony of Ioſephs good gouernment.

Ioſeph openly readeth Ionathans Epiſtles

The people hauing heard this, were diſpleaſed & animated againſt Ionathan and his followers, and

A and flocked on to murther them; and they had surely done it, had I not pacified the displeasure of the Galileans. As for the Embassadors that accompanied Ionathan, I told all of them that I pardoned whatsoeuer was past, if so be they would repent themselues of that which was done, and if vpon their returne into their countrey, they would truely report vnto those who had sent them, how all things had past vnder my gouernment. This said; I dismissed them, notwithstanding that I knew they would perform nothing of that which they had promised. But the whole multitude prosecuted their displeasure against them, requiring me to giue them leaue to punish those with all rigour, who had committed this slanderous act. But I laboured all that I might to perswade them, to lay no hands vpon them, knowing full well that whatsoeuer mutiny it bee, it cannot but breed preiudice to the common-weale. This notwithstanding, the multitude would by no means be satisfied, but all of them ran in heaps with great fury to the lodging, where Ionathan & the Embassadors kept. Whereupon seeing that it was impossible to restraine their fury, I incontinently betooke me to my horse, and commanded the people to follow me to Sogan a borough of the Arabians, distant from thence some twenty stades. By this stratagem I brought to passe, that the beginning of the ciuill warre might not be imputed to me.

The wrath & fury of the people against Ionathan and his fellowe Embassadors.

Ioseph pacifies the sedition without blood-shed.

After I came neer to Sogan, I assembled the people, and told them that they should not violently submit themselues to their froward displeasures, nor entertain their vnquenchable desire of reuenge: & I commanded them to pick out an hundreth of the chiefest & oldest men amongst them, who should make their repaire to the citie of Ierusalem; and there complain vnto the people against those that had kindled sedition in their country. And I said vnto them, If the people be fauourable & listen to your discourse, you shall perswade them to write vnto me, that according to their command I remain in Galilee; & that Ionathan & his partners depart from hence. After I had giuen them this charge, and that they were furnished with all things necessary for their iourney, in all expedition on the third day after the generall assemblie, I dispatched them and sent fiue hundred armed men with them. I wrote also to my friends in Samaria, so to further them that they might finish their iourney in al security. For Samaria was already in subiection to the Romans: and it behoued my men of necessity, who would make a short iourney, to passe that way. For from Galilee by this means a man may in three daies arriue at Ierusalem. Furthermore, I guarded the Embassadors my selfe as farre as the frontiers of Galilee, laying forces and guards vpon the waies, to the end that no man might easily discouer or know of their departure. Which done, I soiourned for a certaine time at Iapha.

Ioseph sends one hundreth Embassadors to Ierusalem.

But Ionathan and his companions hauing failed of their purpose intended against me, dismissed Iohn to Gischala: as for themselues they went to Tiberias, hoping to bring the same vnder their obeysance; for that Iesus, who was President at that time, had written vnto them, and promised them to perswade the people to entertain them, & take their part if they came: and vnder this hope they also retired themselues thither. Sylas, who (as I declared) was left by me as mine Agent in Tiberias, certified me of all this by his letters, requiring me to vse all diligence: and I condescending thereunto, was brought in danger of my life vpon this occasion that ensueth: Ionathan and his followers being come to Tiberias, perswaded diuers who were mine enemies, to reuolt from mee; but after they were certified that I was there in person, they were affraid, and came vnto me, and saluting me, told me that they reputed me happy, for that I had so wisely behaued my selfe in Galilee: and they reioyced also in appearance, for that I was returned with honor, telling me that the honor that was done vnto me, was their ornament, for that they were my instructors and fellow citizens, & that the friendship which I bare them, was more iust then that of Iohns: they therfore required me to repaire vnto my house, promising very shortly to deliuer Iohn into my hands: & these speeches of theirs they seconded with dreadfull oaths, which made me think that I had no cause to misbelieue them. Furthermore, they required me to take vp my lodging in another place, for that on the morrow was the Sabbath day, & it were an incõuenient that the city of Tiberias should be drawne into trouble on that day. I that suspected nothing, repaired to Taricheas, leauing notwithstanding certain of my friends behind me in Tiberias, who might curiously obserue what the common talke was of me: & all along the way betwixt Taricheas & Tiberias I laid certain men in wait, who frõ one to another might certifie me of that which was discouered by them who remained in the citie. The next day therfore they al assembled in the Proseucha or Oratory, which was an ample house wherein they praied, and was able to contain a great multitude. When Ionathan was entred into this place, he durst not manifestly speake vnto them of a reuolt, but only told them that their citie had need of a better Gouernor. But the President Iesus without dissembling, spake plainly after this manner vnto them:

The Embassadors hope to get Tiberias into their hands and possession.

Ioseph falleth in danger.

Ionathan and his confederates policy.

The people assemble in the Proseucha.

It

„ It were better for you(my friends)that you were ſubiect to foure men of nobility & great wiſ-
„ dome,then to one: and thereupon he ſhewed them thoſe who accompanied Ionathan.Hereupon Iuſtus aroſe and praiſed that which Ieſus had propoſed,and drew ſome of the people to his opinion. But the greater part tooke no pleaſure therin:and there had preſently followed a mutiny, had not the aſſembly bin diſmiſſed, by reaſon it was midday, which is the ordinary houre amongſt them to take their repaſt in. Thus did Ionathans conſorts remit the determination of the matter vntill the next day, retiring themſelues without any good done. Which being preſently reported vnto me,I reſolued with my ſelfe the next morning to repaire to the citie of Tiberias:and on the morrow I arriued there in due time,for I found the people already aſſembled in the place of prayer, and they that were drawne to the conuocation, knew not the cauſe why they were aſſembled. Ionathans partners ſeeing me there in perſon contrary to their expectation, were very ſore troubled, and bethought themſelues of this ſubtilty. They told the multitude that a certain friend of theirs had informed them, that he had diſcouered certain Roman horſemen vpon the frontiers of that territory, ſome thirty ſtades from the citie, in a place called Homonœa: and that the newes being brought to them, thoſe of Iohns faction had preſently ſignified the ſame vnto them, to the intent they ſhould not endure their countrey to be ſackt by the enemy.They vſed this ſpeech,ſuppoſing that vnder pretext of reſcuing the country, they might driue me abroad, and ſtrengthen the city for themſelues.

The Iewes ſixt houre is to vs eleuen or twelue a clock at noone.

Ionathans & his aſſociates ſubtilty.

Now although I knew very well what their intent was, yet gaue I eare vnto them, leſt I ſhould driue the Tiberians into an opinion,that I was negligent and careleſſe of their ſecurity: I therfore rode out,& came to the place of which they had ſpoken:where finding ſcarce a foorſtep or appearance of an enemy, I returned ſpeedily without delay to Tiberias.When I came there,I found the whole councell aſſembled with a multitude of people, and Iohns partakers vrging againſt me a very vehement accuſation, that I made no account to relieue them in their warres, but that I ſtudied nothing but mine own pleaſure. And whileſt they ſpake theſe words, they produced foure letters, as being written vnto them by thoſe who were vpon the marches of Galilee, requiring them to come & ſuccor them, for that the Roman horſemen and footmen would within three daies forrage and ſpoyle their country: for which cauſe they made haſte, and would not neglect their ſuit who beſought them. The Tiberians hearing theſe allegations, and ſuppoſing them to be true,cryed out ſaying,that it behoued them not in that manner to dallie time, but to go and ſuccor their countrimen inuironed with great dangers. Whereunto I anſwered, that I was ready to obey them,and promiſed to march forth againſt the enemy with all expedition. Now knew I well the pretence of Iohns partakers;and was of the opinion, that ſince thoſe letters ſaid that the Romans gathered head in foure diuers places,it was requiſite to diuide our power into fiue companies,appointing euery one of them a chieftain ouer them. For it is an honour for good men not only to giue counſell,but alſo when need requireth,to be the firſt and formoſt in action: For I told them that it lay not in my power to lead any more then one company. This my aduice was pleaſing vnto all the people,who preſently conſtrained theſe men to march out vnto the warre:whereby it came to paſſe,that they were greatly confuſed to ſee that they might not finiſh that which they had imagined, becauſe I croſſed all their enterprizes. Hereupon one amongſt them called Ananias, a wicked & peruerſe man,counſelled the people to celebrate a ſolemne faſt the next day in honor of God,and gaue direction at the ſame houre that all of them ſhould gather together in that place in armes,to proteſt before God that if they obtained not ſuccors at his hands, they held all ſort of reſiſt vnprofitable. He ſpake this not for any piety that was in him,but to the end to ſurprize both me and my followers vnarmed.To this aduice of his was I enforced to condeſcend, to the end it might appeare that I contemned not that which appertained to the ſeruice of God. As ſoone therefore as we were retyred euery one of vs to our ſeuerall lodgings,Ionathan and his partakers wrote to Iohn,to reſort vnto them early in the morning with his men of war,& all the power he could make: for that they might eaſily lay hands on me, and accompliſh that which they had ſo long time longed after. He receiuing this letter, willingly obeyed. The next day I commanded two of my ſtrongeſt and faithfulleſt ſouldiers to hide their ſhort ſwords vnder their gownes, and to attend mee, to the end that if in any ſort we were aſſailed by the enemy,we might defend our ſelues.I put on my curets alſo,and girt my ſword by my ſide in ſuch ſort, as no man might perceiue the ſame, and came with them to the place of prayer.

Ioſeph diſcouereth the ſubtilty of the Embaſſadors.

Ananias one of the Embaſſadors, a wicked man.

Ionathas writeth to Iohn to come vnto him.

But Ieſus,as ſoone as I was entred with my friends, hauing the guard of the gate, would not permit the reſt of my followers to enter with me: & at ſuch time as we were ready to begin our prayers,

A prayers, according to the custome of our countrey, Iesus arising, demanded of me what was become of the houshold stuffe that was taken out of the Kings Palace when it was burned, & where the bullion of siluer was, and with whom I had left the same: of all which he therefore made mention, that he might delay the time till Iohns approach. I answered, that Capella had all, and those ten of the chiefest nobility of Tiberias, and willed him to aske of them whether it were true that I spake: who confessed that they had it. What (said hee) are become of those twenty pieces of gold, that you receiued by the sale of a certain waight of massiue siluer, where are they? I answered him, that I had deliuered the same to the Embassadors, to defray their charges in their voyage towards Ierusalem. Hereupon Ionathans partakers said, that I had done amisse, in employing the publike treasure to the vse of priuate Embassadors. The people being displeased herewith (for I very easily perceiued the wicked disposition of these men) & seeing that a sedition was likely to arise, I thought it best to whet & animate the people the more against them: I said, that if I had done amisse in rewarding the Embassadors on the common stock, they should need to take no further displeasure for that: for said I, I will repay those twenty pieces of gold out of mine own purse. Hereupon the people were incensed the more against them, in that they manifestly discouered what hatred they wrongfully bare vnto me. Whereupon Iesus fearing lest some change might arise, commanded the people to depart, and required the councell to stay, for that it was vnpossible to examine matters discreetly, where so much trouble and turmoile was. The people cried out, that they would not leaue me alone among them. Wherupon there came one vnto Iesus, who secretly informed him that Iohn with his armed men was at hand, who for that cause being vnable to containe and conceale his ioy, God so prouiding for the conseruation of my life (for had their purpose taken effect, Iohn and his followers had vtterly ouerthrowne me.) Forbeare (said he) ye Tiberians, to enquire of the twenty pieces of gold: for Iosephi meriteth not punishment for this matter, but because hee affecteth the tyranny, and that by his words he hath deceiued the people of Galilee, and gotten the soueraignty to himselfe. Whilest he spake these words, they sought suddenly to lay hands on me, intending to murther mee. But those two, whom I had with me, perceiuing their intent, drew their swords, threatning those who should dare attempt to offer me violence. The people likewise gathered stones to cast at Ionathans partakers, and puld me away violently from mine enemies: and for that if I should D haue gone but a little further, I had met with Iohn and his army, through the feare I had, I turned another way. For crossing down a priuy way that led me to the lake, I betooke mee to a boate and went by water to Tarichea, auoiding this danger beyond all hope.

Iosephs debate with Iesus for twenty pieces of gold.

The peoples loue to Iosephi

Iosephi almost suddenly surprized by the enemy, is deliuered from perill.

Whereupon I incontinently sent for the chiefest men of Galilee, and told them how contrarie to all law and right I had almost been murthered by Ionathan and the Tiberians. For which cause the Galileans were grieuously displeased against them, and willed mee without delay to make war against them; or if I list not my selfe, to suffer them with all expedition to cut off both Iohn and Ionathan, with all their followers. Yet did I restraine them the best I could, and pacified their displeasure, and prayed them to expect vntill such time as wee knew what newes our Embassadors would bring that were goone to Ierusalem. For I told them wee ought to execute E no kinde of thing without their approbation and consent: and by these meanes I perswaded them. But Iohn seeing at that time that his policy had but very slender successe, returned backe againe to Gischala.

Iosephi certifieth the Galileans, how traiterously Ionathan and the Tiberians had dealt with him.

Some few daies after, our Embassadors, who were returned from Ierusalem, certified vs, that the people of Ierusalem were sore displeased with Ananias the high Priest, and Simon the sonne of Gamaliel, for that without their common consent they had sent Embassadors into Galilee, & sought to displace mee of the gouernment there, and their displeasure was so kindled, that they were ready to set their houses on fire. They brought me also letters, by which the Gouernor of Ierusalem vpon the instant request that the people had made vnto them, cõfirmed me in the Gouernmnt of Galilee, commanding Ionathan and his associates to returne backe againe with all F expedition. After I had receiued these letters, I repaired to the borough of Arbela, where I assembled the Galileans: before whom I commanded the Embassadours to report how much the people of Ierusalem were displeased and discontented, in regard of those things which Ionathan had iniured me in; and how they confirmed me in the gouernment of this countrey, and had called and commanded both Ionathan and his confederates backe againe to Ierusalem, to whom I speedily sent that letter that was directed to them, commanding the messenger to obserue very carefully both their actions & acceptance. After they had receiued the letters, they were greatly troubled, & sent for Iohn and those of the councell of Tiberias, with the Gouernor of Gabara, and consulted with them what they were best to doe. The Tiberians opinion was, that they should continue and maintain their estates, and that they should not forsake the Citie which had already subscribed to their authority, especially for that I would inuade them: for that I had so threatned them, they were not ashamed to faine and imagine. This aduice not onely pleased Iohn, but hee furthermore gaue this counsell, that some two Embassadours should be sent from them to the people of Ierusalem, to accuse mee for that I had vniustly gouerned the commonweale of Galilee, telling them that they might very easily incense the people against mee, both in regard of their authoritie, as also for that the common people are by nature variable and inconstant. This counsaile that Iohn gaue was allowed by them all: whereupon it was thought fit that Ionathan and Ananias should in person repaire to Ierusalem, and that the other two should remaine at Tiberias, and for their conuoy they gaue them a hundreth armed souldiers.

ment to all the citizens to take armes, & afterwards sent for some supplies to Iohn to strengthen their garrison, if they should any waies be prouoked by me. For Iohn kept at Gischala. Meane-

while Ionathan trauayling onwards of his iourney, came to Dabaritta, a Citie situated vpon the vttermost borders of Galilee in a great Plaine: and there met hee about midnight with some of my troupes that kept the watch, who commanded them to lay by their armes, and kept them safely bound, as I had commanded them. Hereof Leui, who had the charge of this quarter, certified me by his letters: wherefore dissembling the matter for some two daies, I sent letters to the Tiberians, by which I counselled them, that laying their armes aside, they should dismisse euery one to his owne dwelling place. But they returned me an iniurious answer: for they supposed that Ionathan and his traine were already arriued in Ierusalem. But I setting light by their iniuries, resolued to circumuent them by this cunning stratagem: For I thought it a dangerous matter to kindle warre against the citizens. Being therefore very willing to draw them out of their wals, I chose out ten thousand of my best souldiers, whom I distributed into three bands, and lodged one company of them secretly at Dora, to lie there in ambush: I encamped also another thousand in a certaine borough situate in a mountainous place, some foure stades distant from Tiberias; cõmanding them that as soon as I gaue them a watchword or signe, they should break forth: as for my selfe, I withdrew my selfe and kept in the open field, and sate me downe on the grasse. Which when the Tiberians perceiued, they made continuall excursions towards me, vsing many bitter and iniurious taunts against me: and so great folly possessed them, that they spred a magnificent couch in the open Plaine; and marching round about the same, they scornefully seemed to lament me, as if I had lien therein, whilest in the meane time I took pleasure to laugh and looke vpon their follies.

But being very desirous to surprize Simon by some policie, and Ioazar also with him, I sent vnto them, requiring them that they would march forth a little without their wals, attended by their friends and guard for their security sake; for that I was determined to conferre with them vpon a peace, & to confirme the one halfe of the gouernment vnto them. Hereupon Simon deceiued by his folly, and ouercome and blinded with greedy desire, came forth with all expedition: but Ioazar suspecting some stratagem, would not aduanture without the wals. As sonne as I saw Simon attended by his friends and guard, I went out to meet him, and embraced him kindly, giuing him thanks for that he was come downe; anon after walking along with him, as if I intended to communicate somewhat with him in secret, I withdrew him from his friends, and laying hands on him, I deliuered him to my friends to lead him into the borough, and gaue a signe vnto my souldiers that they should come down, and with them I assaulted the Citie of Tiberias. There was a sharpe skirmish on both sides, and the Tiberians had welnie gotten the victorie: For my souldiers began to flie; but perceiuing how the matter went, I animated those of my company, and with them gaue a valiant onset on the Tiberians, who almost had the better, and chased them into their citie, and sent another company by the lake, to set on fire those houses which they should first fall vpon. Hereupon the Tiberians thought that their citie was taken by force, and cast downe their weapons for feare, praying me to haue compassion of their wiues and children, and to pardon their citie. For this cause being moued with compassion, I restrained the fury of my souldiers; and for that it was late, I retyred my selfe with my souldiers, both to the intent I might spare the citie, and relieue my wearied and wounded souldiers. Hereupon I sent for Simon to come and banquet with me, and comforted him in his misfortune, promising him to send him to Ierusalem, and to assure him in his iourney homeward, and to furnish him for his

A his ordinary expences with all things neceſſary. The next day I aſſembled ten thouſand ſouldiers, and preſently made mine entry into Tiberias; and hauing aſſembled the chiefeſt Citizens in the horſe-race, I commanded them to diſcouer vnto me who they were that were the authors of that rebellion: who hauing ſatisfied me, I laid hands on them and bound them, and ſent them incontinently to Iotapata. As for Ionathan and his conſorts, I ſet them at liberty, and gaue them money for their charges, and ſent them backe to Ieruſalem with Simon & Ioazar, & fiue hundreth ſouldiers for their guard. Hereupon the Tiberians reaſſembled themſelues before mee, beſeeching me to pardon their miſdeeds, promiſing me to recompence by their future fidelity their forepaſſed & foule faults: beſeeching me alſo to reſtore thoſe goods vnto the citizens, which in B way of pillage were taken from them. Whereupon I gaue a preſent command, that all the prey ſhould be brought and laid before me: and whereas the ſouldiers delaied to performe the ſame, I ſpying one of thoſe ſouldiers that ſtood by me, better apparelled then he was wont to be, asked him where he had gotten that garment: who confeſſing that he had taken it in the ſpoile of the citie, I chaſtiſed him with ſtrokes, and threatned a worſe puniſhment to all thoſe that would not reſtore that which they had taken away: whereby recouering a great part of the prey together, I gaue euery citizen that which he knew to be his owne.

Ioſeph ſends the authors of the ſedition to Iotapata.

Thoſe goods that were taken from the citizens are reſtored.

In this place I cannot chuſe but in ſome ſort I muſt reprehend Iuſtus, who wrote vpon this argument; and others, who promiſing a Hiſtory, are not afraid in contempt of truth, either for fauour or hatred, to commit lies to their poſterity. For they differ nothing from counterfeiters of C euidences, and razers of records; but that theſe men are more corrupted by impunity. For he, to the end he might ſeeme to imploy his time well, vndertaking to ſet downe the euents of this warre, hath belied me in many things, and hath not beene aſhamed to belie his owne countrey. For which cauſe I am neceſſarily inforced in this place to diſcouer that which hitherto I haue concealed, and to reproue that which he hath falſely teſtified of mee: neither is it to be wondered at, that I haue ſo long time deferred the performance thereof. For whoſoeuer writeth a Hiſtory, ought of neceſſity to ſpeake the truth; yet is it not lawfull for him to inueigh againſt the wickeder ſort too vehemently; not for that they are worthy of this fauour, but for his owne modeſties ſake.

A reproofe of Iuſtus the Hiſtoriographer, that falſly accuſed Ioſeph.

Tell me therefore Iuſtus (for thou deſireſt to be held for the man of greateſt note amongſt all D other Hiſtorians, and art not aſhamed to vaunt and boaſt thy ſelfe of that title) tell mee I pray thee in familiarity (for I muſt ſo talke with thee as if thou wert preſent before me) how I and the Galileans haue bene the authors of that rebellion, which thy countrey began both againſt the Romans & their King. For before I was choſen gouernor of Galilee by the people of Ieruſalem, both thou and all the Tiberians were not onely vp in armes, but had already made warre againſt the ten Cities of Syria. Thy ſelfe hadſt burnt their villages, and one of thy ſeruants died in that E countrey: yet not I alone proteſt this, but it is extant alſo in writing in the records of the Emperor Veſpaſian, how the inhabitants of theſe ten cities cried out to Veſpaſian in the city of Ptolemais, requiring that thou mighteſt be puniſhed, as the author of their miſchiefes: and aſſuredly thou hadſt beene puniſhed by the Emperour, had not Agrippa, who had receiued commiſſion to execute thee, vpon the inſtant requeſt of his ſiſter Bernice ſpared thee life, and kept thee bound in priſon for a long time. Furthermore, thy politike behauiours do ſufficiently expreſſe what the reſt of thy life hath beene, and how thou haſt cauſed thy countrey to rebell againſt the Romans: wherof I will produce hereafter moſt euident arguments, and for thy cauſe will I vrge ſomewhat againſt thoſe other Tiberians; and I will make it plaine to thoſe that ſhall reade theſe Hiſtories, that thou haſt been no friend to Rome, nor faithfull to thy King. And I enforce theſe my authorities from the greateſt cities of Galilee, Sephoris and Tiberias, in which thou Iuſtus wert borne. For Sephoris is ſituate in the heart of Galilee, hauing round about it a number of villages, and being a city ſufficiently able in it ſelfe to attempt and execute any noble action at their pleaſure, yet notwithſtanding the citizens therof reſolued to obſerue their faith to the Romans, F and thruſt me out of doores, forbidding euery man among them to beare armes for the Iewes. And to the end they might be more aſſured in my behalfe, the inhabitants deceiued me, in that they entreated me to encompaſſe their citie with a wall: and that done, they willingly entertained a Garriſon which was ſent them from Ceſtius Gallus, who was Generall of the Roman Legions in Syria in contempt of me, although at that time I had a great power, and terrified the countrey round abouts. But when our great city of Ieruſalem was beſieged, and that Temple which was common to all our Nation, was in danger to fall into the enemies hands, the Sephorites ſent no ſuccours, to the end it might not be ſaid that they took armes againſt the Romans:

Tiberias, Iuſtus country.

Sephoris and Tiberias two chiefe cities of Galilee.

But

But thy countrey, Iustus, being situate vpon the lake of Genazareth distant from Hippus thirty stades, from Gadara sixty, from Scythopolis sixscore, in a country obedient to the King, hauing not any city of the Iewes round about it, might haue very easily kept their faith to the Romans, if they had listed. For both the city & people were furnished with munition in all abundance: But as thou saist, I was the cause at that time. And who afterwards? For thou knowest that before the siege of Ierusalem, I was in the Romans hands, & that Iotapata was taken by force, and diuers other castles; and that many other Galileans were spent in diuers battels. At that time shouldest thou haue deliuered thy self of that fear thou hadst of me, laying thine armes aside, and presenting thy self to the King & the Romans, when thou vndertookest armes not of thine own accord, but inforced. But the truth is, you expected Vespasians comming, euen vntill such time as he begirt your city with a siege, & then laid you your armes aside for feare of danger: yea euen then had your city bin ouerthrown, except the King in excuse of your folly, had obtained your pardon at Vespasians hands. It was not therefore my fault, but your offence, that behaued your selues like enemies. Do you not remember how often times I haue obtained the victory against you, and how few times you could complaine of blood-shed? But you falling at dissention one with another, haue been the instruments of your own ruine; and not for the loue you bare either to the King, or the Romans, but of your own malice slew 185. citizens, at such time as I was besieged by the Romans in Iotapata. Nay more, is not this true, that during the siege of Ierusalem, wherof I haue made mention, there were more then two thousand Tiberians slaine, or otherwise taken prisoners? But perhaps thou wilt alledge, that at that time thou wert no enemy, for that thou wert fled to the King; but I tell thee that thou fleddest thither for the feare thou hadst of me. I am a wicked man, as thou saist: but what art thou? whom King Agrippa, vpon many presents deliuered from punishment, at such time as thou wert condemned by Vespasian to lose thy head. For what cause hauing made thee prisoner twice, and hauing so many times past the sentence of banishment against thee, and hauing once commanded thee to be thine owne murtherer, hath he giuen thee life vpon the importunate sollicitation of his sister Bernice? And after so many crimes committed by thee, hauing entertained thee for his Secretary, when he found thy corruption in that office, he banished thee from his presence.

Iustus condēned to death.

But I will not too exactly touch thee with these matters, yet notwithstanding I wonder at thine impudence, that hast openly protested, that thou hast written more exactly and perfectly of this matter, then any man: whereas thou art vtterly ignorant of those things that were done in Galilee. For at that time wert thou at Berytum with the King, and wert no waies priuy to the siege of Iotapata; seeing thou didst not follow vs. Neither couldst thou be able to learne how I behaued my selfe therein, for that there was no one left aliue to giue thee certaine intelligence. Thou wilt perhaps say, that thou hast carefully described that, which hapned during the siege of Ierusalem. And how may this be possible? For thou wert neither agent nor looker on in that warre; neither hast thou read the commentaries of Vespasian. But I coniecture hereby that thou hast not read them at all, forasmuch as thou hast written cleane contrary to that which is contained therein. And if thou art so confident, that thy History is truer then other mens, why didst thou not publish it during Vespasians and Titus liues, who were the Generals of that warre; neither before King Agrippa and those of his race, who were all of them very expert in the Greeke tongue? For thou hast kept it written by thee aboue twenty yeeres, and mightst haue produced witnes of thine exact diligence before them, who were priuy to all things. But now when they are dead, and thou thinkest that no man liueth that may reproue thee, thou hast vndertaken this boldnes to publish thy work. But I haue vsed no such policy or feare in my books, but haue presented them to the Emperors themselues, who haue beene eye-wittnesses and actors therof. For I knew in mine owne soule that I had set downe all things truely: Whereupon I obtained my expected approbation. Moreouer, I communicated the same History with diuers others, whereof some of them were present in the warre, as was King Agrippa, and some of his kindred. And Titus the Emperour himselfe was so desirous that men should search for the truth of that History out of these bookes, that he placed them in a Library, and caused them to be published, being subscribed with his owne hand. As for King Agrippa, he sent me seuenty two Epistles, testifying the truth of my books, whereof two of them are vnderwritten, to the end that the truth may appeare thereby; King Agrippa to his deare friend Ioseph, Health: I haue with great contentment ouer-read thy book, wherein thou seemest in my opinion to haue handled this matter more exactly, then any other. For which cause I pray thee send me the rest. Farewell my deare friend. King Agrippa to Ioseph his deare friend, Health: I perceiue by thine owne writing, that thou needest

The second Epistle.

A needeſt no intelligence from me, how matters haue paſſed from the beginning: yet when wee meet next, I will betweene me and thee certifie thee of certaine things which thou knoweſt not. Thus was he a witneſſe of the truth of my accompliſhed Hiſtory: not flattering me, for it became him not; neither deriding mee, as you perhaps may obiect; for farre was it from ſo noble a minde to be ſubiect to ſo ſeruile a folly: but only to this end, that the truth of my writings might be commended to the reader by the worth of his teſtimony. And thus much haue I thought good to ſet downe in way of anſwer to Iuſtus. cc cc Ioſephus proſecuteth his Hiſtory, and leaueth to debate with Iuſtus.

Now as ſoone as I had pacified theſe troubles in Tiberias, and had eſtabliſhed a councell of ſuch as were well affected towards me, I bethought my ſelfe of that which concerned me to doe B in reſpect of Iohn. All they of Galilee were of the opinion, that I ſhould arme them all, and that in battell array I ſhould march againſt Iohn, and doe iuſtice vpon him, as hee that had beene the author of all this miſchiefe. But for mine owne part, I miſliked their counſels, for that my deſire was to extinguiſh theſe troubles without blood-ſhed; and for that cauſe I incited them with all diligence that was poſſible, to learne the names of all thoſe who ſerued vnder him: which being done, and I made priuy what they were, I publiſhed a Proclamation, by which I promiſed both ſafety and pardon to all thoſe, that would forſake Iohn, aſſigning them the terme of twenty daies, to determine of that which ſeemed beſt for their owne ſecuritie: and I threatned to ſet fire on their houſes, and confiſcate their goods, except they gaue ouer their armes. They hearing theſe things, were greatly troubled, and forſooke Iohn: and after they had laid downe their weapons, C they came vnto me to the number of foure thouſand: ſo that onely fifteene hundreth men remained with Iohn or thereabouts; either of Citizens, or ſtrangers of Tyre. When Iohn perceiued that he was circumuented by this policy, hee euer after remained quiet in his countrey in great feare. Foure thouſand of Iohns followers forſake him, and follow Ioſeph.

At that time the Sephorites grew ſo bold, that they tooke armes vnder the confidence and ſtrength of their wals, and for that they ſaw me diſtracted with other buſineſſe. They therefore ſent to Ceſtius Gallus Gouernour of Syria, praying him to repaire vnto them, with all expedition, to take poſſeſſion of their Citie, or to ſend them a Garriſon of men at the leaſt. Gallus promiſed to come vnto them, but he ſet downe no certaine time of his approach: whereof when I was aduertiſed, I tooke the men of warre that I had, and marched againſt the Sephorites, and tooke D their Citie by force. The Galileans very glad of this opportunitie, and ſuppoſing the time was come wherein they might ſatisfie the inſatiable hatred that they bare againſt that citie, marched on with that intent; as if they would haue wholly ruinated the Citie, with all the inhabitants. They therefore trauaiſed the ſtreets, and ſet fire on the houſes, which they found wholly deſolate: For the inhabitants were fled away for feare, and were retired into a fortreſſe. They therefore ranſackt all things, and left nothing vnſpoiled: neither was there any kinde of miſery which they inflicted not on their countrimen. Which when I ſaw, I was ſore grieued; and commanded them to giue ouer, ſignifying vnto them that it was impietie in them, to ſhew themſelues ſo ſauage towards their countrimen. And ſeeing that neither by any prayer or command that I made, I could draw them to obedience, for that their hatred ſurpaſſed my counſels, I commanE ded thoſe that were about me, and whom I moſt truſted, to ſpread a rumour that the Romanes charged vs on the other ſide of the Citie, with great force. All which I did, to the end that by this rumour I might pacifie the fury of the Galileans, and ſaue the Citie of Sephoris: and this policie tooke good effect. For when they heard this newes, they were affraid, and forſooke their pillage, to truſt to their heeles, in eſpeciall for that I who was their Generall did the like. For I made a ſhew, that I beleeued the rumour to be as true, as they beleeued it: and by this ſtratagem the Citie Sephoris was ſaued beyond all hope. Sephoris ſpoiled.

And hardly eſcaped Tiberias from being ſpoiled by the Galileans, through this occaſion which enſueth: The chiefeſt of their councell wrote vnto the King, that he ſhould come vnto them, and take poſſeſſion of their Citie. The King promiſed to ſatisfie them very ſhortly, and F anſwered them by his Letters, and deliuered them to one of his chamber, called Criſpus a Iew borne, to carry them to the Tiberians. The Galileans knowing this meſſenger, tooke him and brought him vnto mee: which when the common people vnderſtood, of meere ſpleene they fell to armes, and the next day diuers of them aſſembled themſelues from all parts, and came to the Citie of Aſoch where I made my abode, and made huge exclamations, calling the Tiberians traytors, and the Kings friends, and demanding of mee licence and libertie that they might repaire to Tiberias, and raze it to the ground, being as much diſpleaſed againſt the Tiberians, as they were againſt the Sephorites. Tiberias in danger of ruine.

Which

Which when I heard, I ſtood in great doubt how I might deliuer the Tiberians from that G diſpleaſure, which the Galileans had conceiued againſt them: for I could not deny but that the Tiberians had written and ſent for the King: for the anſwer which he made them, did euidently expreſſe the truth. And hauing a long while debated the matter with my ſelfe, I ſaid vnto them, I know as well as you, that the Tiberians haue offended: neither will I hinder you from ſpoiling their Citie, yet muſt you proceed to the execution thereof with ſome iudgement. For the Tiberians alone doe not betray our libertie, but others alſo, who are more accounted of in the countrey of Galilee. Stay therefore vntill ſuch time as I am throughly enformed, who they be that are authors of this treaſon; and then you ſhall haue them all vnder your hands, with all thoſe amongſt them, whom you may particularly thinke worthy puniſhment. By theſe perſwaſions I wonne the people, who departed from mee wholly contented and pacified. As for the meſſenger that was ſent by the King, I cauſed him to be impriſoned, hauing reſpect to an vrgent neceſſitie of mine owne, which conſtrained mee to depart out of the Kingdome within a little while. And calling Criſpus ſecretly vnto me, I charged him to make thoſe ſouldiers drunke, who had the charge of him, to the end that he might in all ſecuritie flye backe to the King. Thus Tiberias being ready to be deſtroyed, the ſecond time by my gouernment and prouidence, auoided at that time a great and fatall danger.

Iuſtus deſireth to command Galilee.

At the ſame time Iuſtus, the ſonne of Piſtus, fled vnto the King without my knowledge: the cauſe of which flight of his, I will orderly expreſſe. As ſoone as the Romanes had begun their warre againſt the Iewes, the Tiberians concluded to obey the King, and in no ſort to rebell againſt the Romanes. But Iuſtus egged them on to take armes, thirſting after alteration, and hoping both to obtaine the gouernment of Galilee, as of his owne countrey: but his hope failed him of a ſucceſſefull end. For the Galileans being enuiouſly bent againſt the Tiberians, for thoſe iniuries they had ſuffered at their hands before the warre, could not allow Iuſtus to be their Gouernour. My ſelfe alſo, whom the people of Ieruſalem put in truſt with the gouernment of Galilee, was oftentimes ſo much mooued, that I failed little of killing Iuſtus; ſo intolerable was his wickedneſſe. Hee therefore fearing leſt my diſpleaſure ſhould ſhorten his daies, went vnto the King, ſuppoſing that he might liue more freely and ſecurely with him. The Sephorites beyond their expectation hauing eſcaped this firſt danger, wrote vnto Ceſtius Gallus the ſecond time; requiring him to come vnto them, to the end that he might be the ſooner ſeized of their Citie; or that he ſhould ſend them forces to withſtand the incurſions of their enemies: and finally they wrought ſo much, that Gallus ſent them ſtore of horſemen, and after them footmen, who came by night, and were receiued into their Citie. But ſeeing that the countrey round about them was but in poore eſtate, by reaſon of the Romane horſemen, I tooke my ſouldiers, and came to Garizim, where I encamped ſome twentie ſtades off from Sephoris, and by night I approached the ſame, and ſet ladders to the wall, with which I entred a great number of my ſouldiers, and became maſter of the better part of the Citie; from whence notwithſtanding we were afterwards conſtrained to retire, for that we knew not the place, killing before our departure twelue Romane footmen and two horſemen, with ſome Sephorites, to the only loſſe of one of ours. Afterwards a fight hapning betweene vs and their horſemen in open field, wee fought for a long time with diſaduantage: For the Romanes hauing inuironed mee on all ſides, my rereward through the feare they conceiued, began to retire. In this skirmiſh I loſt one of my guard, called Iuſtus, who in times paſt had ſerued in the very ſame place vnder the King. At that very time the Kings forces both of horſe and foote came thither, vnder the gouernment of Silas Captaine of the guard, who encamping ſome fiue ſtades off from Iulias, beſet the hie wayes that bended towards Cana with men of warre, and the fort of Gamala, to hinder the inhabitants from receiuing any commodities from the countrey of Galilee.

As ſoone as I receiued newes hereof, I ſent out two thouſand ſouldiers, with Ieremy their Coronell: who ſhrowding themſelues within a ſtade of Iulias, neere vnto the floud Iordan, offered nothing elſe but light skirmiſhes, vntill ſuch time as I had gathered three thouſand ſouldiers more, and was come vnto them. The next day hauing planted an ambuſh in a certaine trench neere vnto the encloſure of their campe, I touled out the Kings ſouldiers to skirmiſh, hauing firſt forewarned my ſouldiers to faine a flight, vntill ſuch time as they had drawne their enemies as farre as the ambuſh; which they cunningly executed. But Silas ſuppoſing that our men fled for cowardize, ſet forward to follow them as faſt as he might poſſible: but they that lay in ambuſh charged him on the backe, and diſcomfited his army: and I preſently turning and making head againſt them, conſtrained the Kings forces to truſt to their heeles. At that time the eſtate of the countrey countrey was at a good point, had not ſome curſed ſpirit thwarted mine honeſt purpoſes. For the horſe whereon I roade, falling into a certaine bog, caſt mee on the ground: whereby mine hand being thruſt out of ioynt about the wriſt, I was carried into a borough of Cepharnom. My ſouldiers hearing hereof, and fearing leſt ſome more ſiniſter misfortune had befalne mee, then indeed had done, reſtrained themſelues from purſuing the enemy any further, and turned their backs through the griefe they had conceiued by reaſon of mine accident. Hauing therefore ſent for Phyſicions, and cauſed my ſelfe to be dreſſed, I ſtayed there for that day; and being ſeized with a feuer, I was carried by night to Taricheas, according to the aduice of my Phyſicions.

Silas and his ſouldiers hauing newes of mine accident, recouered their courages: and vnderſtanding that we kept but ſlender watch in our campe, they laid an ambuſh by night on this ſide Iordan, with their horſemen, and as ſoone as the day appeared, hee drew out our ſouldiers to fight: who willingly condeſcended thereunto; and being come into the Plaine, they perceiued the men that lay in ambuſh, by whom they were put to flight, and ſixe of our men were ſlaine. But they purſued their victory no further: For hauing newes that certaine ſouldiers had paſt the water of Taricheas to Iulias, they were affraid and returned backe.

Ioſephs misfortune animateth the enemy.

Not long after, Veſpaſian arriued at Tyre, accompanied with King Agrippa. Againſt whom the Tyrians began to vtter many reproaches, telling Veſpaſian that the King was both an enemy to the Tyrians & the Romanes, alleaging that Philip his Generall had betrayed the Kings palace and the Romane army in Ieruſalem, and that by the Kings Commiſſion. Which when Veſpaſian vnderſtood, he reprooued this impudent boldneſſe of the Tyrians, for blaming a King of that power, and a friend to the Romanes: and aduiſed the King to ſend Philip to Rome, to yeeld account of his actions. But notwithſtanding that Philip was ſent thither, yet preſented he not himſelfe before Nero; for finding him extremely buſied with troubles and ciuill warres, he returned vnto the King without doing any thing. When Veſpaſian was arriued at Ptolemais, the gouernors of the ten cities of Syria cried out againſt Iuſtus the Tiberian, accuſing him for burning of their boroughs. Veſpaſian therefore deliuered him bound vnto the King, to the end that the ſubiects of his kingdome might haue him puniſhed. But the King before that time, vnwitting to Veſpaſian, had kept him priſoner, as it hath beene heretofore declared. The Sephorites alſo reſorted to Veſpaſian, to ſalute him, and receiue a garriſon from him, with their Commander Placidus, who made many roades into the countrey, and purſued them vntill ſuch time as Veſpaſian arriued in Galilee: of which arriuall I haue amply ſpoken in my bookes of the Warres of the Iewes, how he came, how he fought againſt me, the firſt time neere to the Citie of Tarichea: how I departed from thence to repaire to Iotapata, my taking, my deliuerance, and all my actions and fortunes during the warres of the Iewes, and the ſiege of the Citie of Ieruſalem. But now mee ſeemeth that it is neceſſary, that I deſcribe other things exploited by mee during my life time in other places then in the wars of the Iewes. After the ſiege of Iotapata was ended, I was priſoner with the Romanes and kept very carefully: yet notwithſtanding, Veſpaſian did mee much honour. For by his commandement I married a virgin, that was one of thoſe that had beene taken captiue in Cæſarea. But ſhe remained not long time with me: for after I was ſet at libertie, and that I followed Veſpaſian, ſhe retired her ſelfe to Alexandria. After which, I married another woman in Alexandria, from whence I was ſent to Titus to the ſiege of Ieruſalem, where I was oftentimes in danger of death. For the Iewes laboured what they might to take and puniſh mee: and the Romans ſuppoſing that as many and oftentimes as they were repulſed, it was by my treaſon, cryed out continually to the Emperour to execute me for a Traitor. But Titus well experienced in the changes of warre, pacified the violence which his ſouldiers intended againſt mee, by his ſilence. And after the Citie of Ieruſalem was taken, Titus often ſollicited mee to take that which I liked among the ruines of Ieruſalem, promiſing to giue it me. But I making but ſmall account of any thing after the ruine of my countrey, beſought him that hee would giue me certaine free men, and the ſacred Bible, which I receiued for a great conſolation in my miſeries. All which he graciouſly granted me. Not long after hauing beg'd my brother and fifty other of my friends, they were giuen me, and I was refuſed in nothing. Entring into the Temple by Titus permiſſion, I found a great number of priſoners ſhut vp therein, and all thoſe women and children of my friends and familiars, whom I knew, I deliuered them, to the number of one hundreth and ninetie, without paying any ranſome: and I reſtored them to their former free condition. Being ſent with Cerealis and one thouſand horſe into the Citie of Thecoa by the Emperour Titus, to eſpie if the place were fit for a Camp; in returning from thence I ſaw diuers priſoners, who were on the gibbet, amongſt which were three of my familiars; whereat I was grieued in my ſoule, and

and I came and ſignified the ſame vnto Titus with teares: who incontinently commanded that they ſhould be taken downe, and as carefully dreſt and cured as might be: two of which dyed notwithſtanding the vtmoſt diligence of the Phyſicions, and the third ſuruiued.

Ioſeph repaireth with Titus to Rome, and is honourably entertained by Veſpaſian.

After that Titus had appeaſed the troubles of Iudæa, coniecturing with himſelfe that the poſſeſſions which I had in Ieruſalem, would yeeld mee but little profit, by reaſon of the Romane garriſon that ſhould be placed there; he planted me in a poſſeſſion in a champaine countrey: and intending to embarke himſelfe to depart for Rome, he tooke me with him in his owne ſhip, and did me great honour. As ſoone as we came to Rome, Veſpaſian had great care of mee; for hee lodged me in his owne houſe, where he kept before he was Emperour, and honoured mee with the title of a Citizen of Rome, and gaue me an annuall penſion in money; and as long as he liued, continued his good affection towards mee, forgetting no kinde of bountie which he might vſe towards mee. Whereupon I was ſo much enuied, that I grew in danger thereby to loſe my life: For a certaine Iew called Ionathan, hauing ſtirred vp a ſedition in Cyren, and gathered about him ſome two thouſand inhabitants of the countrey, was the cauſe of their ouerthrow: and as touching himſelfe, being bound by the gouernour of that country, and afterwards ſent vnto the Emperour, he ſaid it was I that had ſent him armes and money. But Veſpaſian knew his falſehood, and condemned him to death, and commanded him to be executed. After this, mine enemies obiected diuers crimes againſt mee in regard that I was in good reputation: but God ſo wrought that I eſcaped them all. Moreouer, I receiued in gift from Veſpaſian an ample poſſeſſion in Iudæa, and at that very time I forſooke my wife, becauſe her manners pleaſed me not, although ſhee were the mother of my three children, of whom two are deceaſed, and the third, who was called Hircanus, is yet aliue. After this I married a wife that was borne in Candie, and was by nation a Iew, and by birth noble, and one of the greateſt reputation amongſt the inhabitants, endowed with as laudable manners as any other vertuous woman whatſoeuer; as her after-life moſt plainely expreſſed. By her I had two ſonnes, Iuſtus, who was the eldeſt, and Simonides, who alſo was ſurnamed Agrippa. Thus farre as touching my domeſticall affaires. That bountie which I receiued from the hands of the Cæſars, hath alwaies continued mine. For after Veſpaſians death, Titus, who ſucceeded him in the Empire, continued the ſame fauour which his father had ſhewed mee. For although I were oftentimes accuſed, yet were not mine aduerſaries beleeued. Domitian, who ſucceeded him, augmented mine honours. For he puniſhed thoſe Iewes that accuſed mee, and gaue order that the Eunuch and ſlaue whom I kept to teach my ſonne, and by whom I was accuſed, ſhould be puniſhed. He granted mee exemption alſo from all the tributes of Iudæa, which is one of the moſt greateſt honours that a man may receiue. And as touching Domitia the Emperours wife, ſhee alwaies continued her good affection towards mee. Behold heere the ſhort recitall of my whole life: whereby let each man coniecture of my manners as him liſteth. But O thrice excellent Epaphroditus, after I haue giuen and offered thee all this ancient Hiſtorie of our nation, I will for this preſent pauſe in this place.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVL HIS esteemed friend, M. Anthony Palmer Esquire.

SIR, my affection, that had rather bee an Actor than an Orator (do well, then speake well,) hath pickt you out to be the Patron of this tragicall historie of the wars of the Iewes. The reasons that draue me hereunto, are neither the expectance of worldly benefits, nor the fruitlesse vp-shot of ostentation: but your vertue (which is not beloued respectiuely, but onely for it selfe) hath created this good conceit in me, which (if you so please) your acceptance may continue. Now since, as the Philosopher supposeth, it is an action worthy a good man, to doe good vnto his friend; so it is no lesse commendable to accept an office of kindnesse from a friend. For by giuing, wee bewray our well-wishing; and by receiuing, wee proportion and continue friendship: vpon this ground I pray you build the good entertainment of my Present, and nourish this good custome in mee (which was vsuall both amongst Grecians and Latins) I meane my Translation: which if it please you, I haue my wish. As for my maligners, I expect no worse from them then Iason the Thessalian, who being assailed and wounded by an enemie (who had an intent to kill him) had an impostumation opened, that saued his life: their stab and stroke of disgrace shall cure and heale the hidden and neglected infirmities of my mind; and notwithstanding, I shall both Genio & ingenio liue to loue you, and lament their want of charity. Thus heartily commending me, I hastily take my leaue, being tied prentise of late to other mens importunities.

Your louing Friend,

THO. LODGE.

THE FIRST OF THOSE SEVEN BOOKES, WHICH WERE written by FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS, the ſonne of MATTHIAS, as touching the Warre, and deſtruction of the Iewes.

THE PRÆFACE.

In which the Author taxeth diuers Hiſtoriographers, of vntruth; and declareth his intent, and ſpecifieth the principall points of this Hiſtorie.

FOR as much as the warre which was enterprized betwixt the Iewes and Romanes, hath (amongſt all other) beene the greateſt that either hath beene attempted in our age, or heard of in any other; either betweene citie and citie; or nation againſt nation: there haue beene ſome, who (rather building their diſcourſe on the vaine and improbable report of others, then their owne iudgements) haue (according to the manner of Orators) made a Hiſtory of their heareſay, and haue filled their diſcourſes not onely with vanitie, but alſo with contradiction. Others there were (who for that they were witneſſes or actors of the ſame) haue according to their owne fancies preferred many lyes; either to flatter the Romanes, or exerciſe their hatred againſt the Iewes: forging ſomewhiles accuſations, otherwhiles breaking out into praiſes, without any obſeruation of hiſtoricall veritie. The dutie of an Hiſtoriographer, and how things that are paſt ſhould bee written.

For this cauſe, I Ioſeph the ſonne of Matthias, by birth an Hebrew and a Citizen and Prieſt of Ieruſalem: who in the beginning of theſe warres bare armes againſt the Romanes, and afterwards (being thereunto forced by neceſſitie) was preſent at all thoſe things, which were attempted and proſecuted in thoſe warres; haue thought good to diſcourſe in the Greeke tongue (in fauour of all thoſe who acknowledge the ſoueraigntie of the Romane Empire) all that which heretofore in my owne language I haue imparted to thoſe Barbarians that inhabit the Eaſt. For at ſuch time (as I haue already ſpoken) as theſe moſt bitter and buſie warres tooke their beginning, the Romanes were at ciuill warres among themſelues: and as touching the Iewes (who were in yeeres valiant, and in wits turbulent) they being both ſtrong in power, and rich in money, did ſo inſolently abuſe the time, that being animated by the greatneſſe of thoſe ſeditions and troubles; they ſomewhiles ſwamme in hope, ſometimes ſweltered in feare of poſſeſſing or loſing certaine ſoueraignties in the Eaſt. For the Iewes hope was, that all thoſe of their nation (euen they who inhabited the parts beyond Euphrates) would haue both followed them in their rebellion, and ſeconded their follies with their forces. Moreouer, at that time the Frenchmen (who bordered vpon the Romans) ſuffred them not to liue in peace: and the Germanes alſo began to take armes. Finally, after the death of Nero ſeditions raigned euery where: ſo that by reaſon of the opportunitie of theſe times many men went about to make themſelues kings, and the ſouldiers whetted on with the couetous deſire of gaine, deſired nothing more then trouble and alteration. For which cauſe, I thinke it a matter both worthy reproofe, and ill-beſeeming my reputation, if in ſo waightie affaires, I ſhould ſuffer the truth to be ſmothered in incertainties, and ſhould permit the Parthians, Babylonians, and the furtheſt diſtant Arabians, and thoſe of our nation inhabiting beyond Euphrates, together with the Adiabenites, to obtaine the true knowledge of thoſe euents by mine induſtry; whileſt the Grecians, and diuers of thoſe, who haue not borne armes with the Romanes, being diſtracted with factions, and deceiued by adulation, ſhould be ignorant hereof. Yet ſome of theſe there be, who (notwithſtanding their falſe informations) Ioſeph himſelfe had a hand in the warres of the Iewes.

After Neros time all things full of trouble.

Ioſeph had written this hiſtory in the Hebrew tongue before.

sticke not to write histories, not onely voide of all truth, but also no waies answerable to the subiect which they vndertake. For whilest they labour to dignifie and extoll the Romanes, they altogether suppresse the fame and fortunes of the Iewes: yet cannot I coniecture by what meanes they may be held great, who triumph in the conquest of men so obscure and abiect. Nay whilest they thus extoll the Romanes valour in conquering the Iewes, they nothing at all respect the continuance of the warres, nor the multitude of the Romane souldiers, nor the honour of their Captaines; whose titles are much embased, if they (hauing laboured so much to conquer Ierusalem) should haue any thing derogated from the honour and prosperitie of their attempts. For mine owne part, I am not resolued to contradict those who shall enhance the glory and noble actions of the Romanes, neither to extoll and dignifie the deserts of mine owne nation, but my resolution is in all truth and sinceritie to set downe each occurrent, without respect or partialitie towards either part. In performance whereof I will fashion my discourse according to the matter I entreate of, and as my griefe and sorrow shall inuite mee to lament the miseries of my countrey: For the ciuill dissension that dismembred the same, was the cause that brought it to confusion: and those tyrants that raigned amongst vs, were such, who forcibly drew the Romanes with sword and fire to seeke the desolation of our holy Temple. The truth whereof Titus Cæsar himselfe can iustifie, who destroyed the same; who during all those warres still pitied the people, for that they (as he well perceiued) were kept in awe by the seditious: And who oftentimes of his owne accord deferred the surprizall of the Citie, purposely protracting the siege, to the intent that in the meane time the authors of the sedition and bloody wars might haue leasure to repent and submit themselues. Now if any man thinke that I write this, as one that exclaimeth against the tyrants and their theeueries; or that in bewailing the miseries of my lost countrey, I accuse their villanies, and thereby transgresse the limits of a historie, let it be imputed to my griefe, and so pardoned. For amongst all the Cities that were euer gouerned by the Romanes, our Citie onely attained to the top of felicitie, which now alas is brought into extreme misery, captiuitie, and desolation. Nay, if all the misfortunes and calamities which the world from the beginning hath seene, be compared with the infelicitie and fall of the Iewes, they are slight and of no moment.

The glory of the Romans is diminished, if you derogate from their labours at the siege of Ierusalem.

Titus his pietie towards the Iewes.

All calamities that hapned sithence the beginning of the world, being compared with those the Iewes suffred, are of no moment.

And to increase our sorrow, no forrainers, but our owne familiar friends and countrimen haue bin the actors of our tragedy. This considered, if any man of too seuere and stoicall iudgement shall reprehend this my lamentation, let such a one attribute the deeds I recount, to the History which I write; and reserue the lamentations and sorrowes thereof to me, who am the Historiographer: although in my minde I may iustly challenge the smooth-tongued Grecians, for that (notwithstanding these our so miserable, and so memorable warres happened in their daies, in respect whereof all other former troubles were obscure and of no reckoning) they haue restrained their tongues and pens; and vndertaken an ouercurious silence, to the end they might carpe at these with greater libertie, who vndertake the publishing thereof: whom though in learning and eloquence they both exceed and out-strip, yet are they inferiour vnto them in the matter and subiect they intreate of. For they forsooth discipher and set downe the valiant acts of the Assyrians and Medes, as who should say, the ancient writers had but coldly and scarce conceitfully handled the same: and yet God knoweth they come so farre behind those ancient authors in their writings, as they neither second them in sense, nor equall them in vnderstanding. For such as in times past published any worthy History, endeuoured to write that which they themselues had seene: and for that each of them were eye-witnesses of those affaires they committed to writing, they more effectually performed all that which they promised; the rather for that they accounted it to bee an act of dishonestie, to report and publish lies in stead of a History. And truly in my opinion that man is both worthy commendation and praise, who striueth by his studious indeuours, to register not onely the occurrences of times past, but also those memorable euents that haue happened in his daies: and he onely and truly is to be accounted industrious, not that altereth and pruneth at his pleasure another mans works, but he that of himselfe compileth a History, whereof no man hath before-time written. For mine owne part (the rather for that I am a stranger) I haue beene inforced to my no small labor and expence, to refresh the memory and truth of these euents in the eares of the Greekes and Romanes. For as touching their owne learned men, their mouthes are alwaies open to gaines and controuersies, and to this purpose their tongues still runne on pattens: mary if they come to a History wherein they should both tell truth, and with great labour enquire of those things that are past, here are they mum, the trauell is too tedious, the bit is in their teeth, so that they leaue the matter to their performance, who are incapable and vnapt both in stile and study, to register the noble actions of royall Princes.

The Grecian Historiographers ouerpasse the wars of the Iewes with silence.

Who may rightly bee called a Historiographer.

Since therefore the Grecians make no account of the truth of history, it behoueth vs both to esteeme and honour it. Now to discouer vnto you the originall of the Iewes, what their estate hath beene in times past, and after what manner they departed out of Aegypt, to shew what countries they conquered, and what Colonies they planted, were in my iudgement both impertinent and to little purpose; considering that diuers

A of mine owne nation haue before my time made and written an exact Hiſtory of the noble attempts of our anceſtors: yea many Greekes alſo haue tranſlated theſe mens writings into their owne tongue; and haue as truly, as rhetorically exemplified the ſame. I will therefore begin my Hiſtory in that time where theſe writers and our own Prophets ceaſed, and ſet downe at large all thoſe warres that hapned in my time: and as for thoſe things that exceed my knowledge and remembrance, I will onely touch them briefely, and in a word or two. Firſt, how Antiochus ſurnamed Epiphanes, tooke the Citie of Ieruſalem, and poſſeſſed the ſame for the ſpace of three yeeres, and ſixe moneths: and finally how he was driuen out of that countrey by the Aſmoneans. After this I will ſet downe the diſſenſions that hapned amongſt Antiochus ſucceſſors for the kingdome, and how by this meanes they drew Pompey and the Romanes into the managing and med- B ling with their affaires. How Herod likewiſe the ſonne of Antipater, being aſſiſted by Soſius, vtterly ouerthrew and canceld their felicity and authoritie: and how in Auguſtus Cæſars time and after the death of Herod, and during the gouernment of Quintilius Varo, a ſedition was raiſed among the people: and how in the twelfth yeere of Neros raigne the warre began to take head and continuance. That likewiſe which hapned in Ceſtius time, and what warlike executions the Iewes performed in their firſt attempts and reuolts, how they ſtrengthened the cities and forts about them, and Nero (hearing of the great ouerthrow which his army receiued vnder Ceſtius their Generall, and fearing leſt he ſhould loſe all) made Titus Veſpaſian the Generall of his army: who being attended by his eldeſt ſonne, came into Iudæa accompanied with as great a company of Romans as he could poſſibly gather; what number of their allies inuaded and ſpoiled Galilee, what cities they ſurprized in that place, either by forcible aſſault, or by any C other compoſition. Beſides all theſe things, I will expreſſe what order and diſcipline the Romans obſerue in their warres, and wherein they are accuſtomed to exerciſe their ſouldiers. I will note downe alſo the places and nature of the countrey of Galilee, and the deſcription of Iudæa, together with the mountaines, lakes and fountaines thereof, with all the properties of the ſame; not forgetting thoſe miſeries which the captiue cities ſuffered: neither how they were ſurprized. All which (together with all thoſe euils and miſeries which during thoſe troubles befell me) will I diſcouer, and diſcourſe with all truth and diligence, the rather in that I publiſh them in their eares, who are no waies ignorant of them. After this I will ſet downe how (vpon the declining and downfall of the Iewes) Nero dyed, and how, at ſuch time as Veſpaſian had vndertaken the expedition to Ieruſalem, he was withheld from the action, to receiue and enioy the imperiall D dignitie: how at that inſtant when he returned himſelfe into Egypt to eſtabliſh that eſtate, the Iewes began to mutiny among themſelues, how many tyrants aroſe among them, who hatched much ciuill diſcord and debate in their gouernment. Againe, how Titus departing out of Egypt, came the ſecond time into Iudæa, and ranged ouer the countrey, and how and where he lewied and encamped his armies. How and how oftentimes the citie hath beene vexed by ſedition, eſpecially at ſuch time as he himſelfe was preſent. What E onſets he gaue, and how many mounts he raiſed in begirting the citie with a treble wall: the ſtrength and prouiſion of the citie, the ſituation and plat-forme of the Temple, and the altars therein: the rites and ceremonies which were vſed vpon feſtiuall daies, the ſeuen purifications and offices of the prieſts: the garments alſo of the high Prieſt, & the holy ſanctuary of the Temple. All which I will recount without any diſſimulation, or ſwaruing from the truth of hiſtory. After this I will relate what cruelty the tyrants vſed againſt their owne countrymen, and what humanitie the Romanes ſhewed vnto ſtrangers, and how often- times Titus (who deſired the ſafety both of the Citie and Temple) prouoked and inuited the ſeditious to mutuall amitie. Furthermore, I will report how the people of the Iewes (after theſe many and grieuous wounds which they both ſuffred and ſunke vnder, ſometimes by warre, otherwhiles by ſedition, and many times by hunger) were at length ouerthrowne to their vtter confuſion. Neither will I omit the ſlaughter of ſuch as reuolted, neither the puniſhment inflicted on thoſe that were captiue: but I will ſet downe how the Temple was burned againſt Cæſars will, and what an infinit maſſe of ſacred treaſure was deuoured by the fire. But to ſhut vp the Hiſtory, I will annex the ſurprizall of the citie, and what ſignes and wonders hapned before the ſame: the captiuitie alſo of the tyrants themſelues, and the number of thoſe that were led away into captiuitie: and what miſery euery one of them endured: how the Romans continuing their warres, vtterly razed the fortreſſes of their captiues; finally, how Titus in trauailing thorow the whole F countrey, eſtabliſhed a forme of gouernment therein; and afterward returning into Italy, triumphed with much honour. All theſe things haue I comprehended in ſeuen Bookes: endeauouring as much as in mee lyeth, to flye and auoide all occaſion of reproofe and reprehenſion from thoſe men, who knew theſe affaires and were actors in the warres. All which I haue done for their ſakes, who rather affect truth, then follow their pleaſure: and according to that order and forme I haue propoſed, I will begin and proſecute my ſtyle and hiſtory.

CHAP. I.

How Ierusalem was destroyed by ANTIOCHVS.

The yeer of the world, 3802. before christs birth, 162.

Ant. li. 12. c. 6. Antiochus being stirred vp by Tobias sons, inuadeth Iudæa, and surprizeth Ierusalem.

AT such time as Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, made war against Sextus Pompeius for the whole gouernment of Syria, there arose a sedition among the Iewes: wherein euery one indeauoured himselfe to haue the Soueraignty ouer others; and those of chiefest authority and nobility amongst the rest, disdained to submit themselues to such as were their equals. At that time a certaine man called Onias (who was one of the High Priests) hauing gotten the vpper hand, did driue the sonnes of Tobias out of the City; who flying to Antiochus for refuge, besought him in all humility that he would lead his forces into Iudæa; offering themselues to be his guides in that expedition and voiage. Antiochus (who long before that time desired such an occasion) easily condescended to their requests; and leuying a great army, entred

A entred their countrey, and tooke the City by force, and slew the most part of them; who fauoured Ptolomy: and giuing his souldiers liberty to sacke the City, he himself spoiled the Temple also; and for the space of three yeers and sixe moneths, forbad all sacrifices and ceremonies, which before-time were accustomed and vsed in that place. Wherupon Onias the high Priest fled vnto Ptolomey, and hauing obtained a grant of a piece of ground from him, within the liberties and precinct of Heliopolis, he built a towne and Temple in that place, resembling the City and sanctuary in Ierusalem.

But neither was Antiochus satisfied with the vnexpected surprize of the city, nor with the pillage and slaughter of the citizens, but was so far transported by his passions, & incensed with the B remembrance of those euils which he sustained during the siege of the City, that he compelled the Iewes to forsake the customes of their country; commanding them from that time forward to vse no more circumcision of their children, but that they should immolate swine vpon the Altar: which when al of them iointly refused to obey, the most constant among them were for that cause put to death. Bacchides being made chiefe of the garrisons by the appointment of Antiochus, what with his innated cruelty, and the impious commandement that was left him, omitted no occasion to further his wicked impiety, insomuch as he particularly tormented such as were of noble birth, and quality: that each day for the most part, he represented vnto them the fresh face and memory of the desolation of their City: till all of them at the last being prouoked and whetted on through the grieuousnes of that which both themselues and others indured, addreC sed themselues with confidence to prosecute their reuenge. At length Matthias the son of Asmonæus, one of the Priests, who was borne in a village called Modin, accompanied with his fiue sons and his owne household armed with swords, slue Bacchides: and fearing the power and multitude of the enemies garrisons, speedily retired himselfe into the mountaines. Thither resorted diuers of the people vnto him: for which cause he waxing more confident and courageous, came downe from the mountaines, and ouercomming the Captaines of Antiochus, draue them out of the borders of Iudæa. At such time therefore as through his happy successe he became potent, and was by common consent of the people (for that he had deliuered them from the subiection of strangers) made their Ruler: he died, leauing his eldest sonne who was called Iudas, to succeed him in the gouernment. Who fearing lest Antiochus would still continue warres against him, gatheD red together an army of his countrimen, and was the first among the Iewes that made a league with the Romanes; and draue backe Antiochus Epiphanes at such time as he enforced himselfe once more to inuade the borders of Iudæa, repulsing him with a great ouerthrow. And whereas the remembrance of this victory was yet fresh in mens minds and memorie, he assaulted the garrison of the city: For as yet they were not destroied (in which conflict he forced them to forsake the highest part thereof, which is called holy) and to betake themselues into the lower part: and hauing obtained the Temple, he made euery place cleane, and compassed it with a wall, and made new vessels for the seruice of the Temple, and planted them therein, because those that had bin before-time consecrated there, were prophaned. He builded likewise another Altar, and began to renue the accustomed sacrifice, and obserue the rites of Religion.

E Scarcely was the City brought to the former estate, but Antiochus died, who left a sonne and heire behind him, who was not onely inheritour of his Kingdome, but also of his hatred against the Iewes: who hauing gathered together fifty thousand footmen, and almost fiue thousand horsmen, and fourescore Elephants, entred by the mountaines of Iudæa; and tooke a towne named Bethsara, neere which Iudas met him in a place called Bethzacharie, where the passage was somewhat streight: and before the armies ioyned battell, Eleazar, Iudas brother, seeing one Elephant higher then the rest, bearing a great tower on his backe, and adorned with golden furniture, thinking Antiochus had beene there, ran from his company, and breaking the ranks of the enemies, came vnto the Elephant: but he could not reach him (whom he deemed to be the King) he was so highly mounted; for which cause wounding the Elephant in the belly, the Elephant fell vpF on him, and pressed him to death: which act of his had no other successe but this, that by attempting so great a matter, he gaue a manifest testimony that hee preferred his renowne, before his life.

Now he that gouerned the Elephant was but a priuate person, and although by hap Antiochus had beene there, Eleazar had atchieued nothing else in this valiant attempt; but yet he aduentured his life, vnder hope to performe some valiant exploit. And this act of his was a presage vnto his brother of the euent of the whole war that ensued. For the Iewes fought stoutly, and a long time: but yet Antiochus army (being both more in number and more prosperous) obtai-obtained the victory; so Iudas therfore after the losse of many of his company, fled vnto the Gophonits, with those of his side who escaped: And Antiochus went to Ierusalem, from whence after some stay he departed for want of necessaries, leauing a sufficient garrison; as for the rest of his armie, he led them for the winter time into Syria. Yet notwithstanding the Kings departure Iudas rested not: but encouraged by many of his nation, who daily came vnto him, and gathering also together those who escaped out of the former battell, at a village named Adasa, he fought with Antiochus Captains, where after much & many approbations of his valour in assaulting & slaughtering a great number of his enemies, he himselfe at length was slaine, and within a few dayes after, his brother Iohn also was betraied, and slaine by their treacheries who fauoured Antiochus.

Of the succession of Princes, from IONATHAS vntill ARISTOBVLVS.

The yeere of the world, 3805. before Christs birth, 159.

AFTER him succeeded his brother Ionathas, who carefully studied for the peace and securitie of his people, and fortified himselfe by the friendship of the Romans, and was reconciled to Antiochus his son; yet did none of all these things profit him, or acquit him from danger. For the tyrant Tryphon (who was tutor to Antiochus) laying wait for him, and seeking to spoile him of his friends, tooke Ionathas at such time as he came with a small company to Antiochus who was at Ptolemais, and binding him, led an armie against Iudæa: from whence being repulsed by Simon, Ionathas brother, and ouercome by him, in displeasure and reuenge thereof, he slew Ionathas.

Ionathas, taken by Tryphons subtilty, is slaine.

But Simon valiantly bestirring himselfe in the gouernment and guide of the affaires of the common-wealth, tooke Zara, Ioppe, and Iamnia (which were bordering townes:) and ouercomming the garrison at Accaron, he destroyed the City, and assisted Antiochus against Tryphon who besieged Dora, before that expedition which he made against the Medes. Yet would not the greedy mind of the King be satisfied, notwithstanding that Simon had thus faithfully serued and assisted him in the death of Tryphon; but that within short time after, he sent vnto Cendebeus (who was the Generall of the army) commanding him to sacke and spoile Iudæa, and to take Simon, and make him a slaue. But Simon though aged in yeers, fought both youthfully and valiantly, and sent his sons with the most resolute men he had, before, against Antiochus, and himselfe with the residue of his army, assaulted another quarter of their enemies campe; and hauing laid many ambushes euen in the mountaines, he in euery place was victorious: and after this his most famous victory, he was proclaimed high Priest, and deliuered the Iewes from the gouernment of the Macedonians, vnder which they had bin 270. yeers. Finally, by the treachery of Ptolomæus his son in law, he was murthered at a banquet; who imprisoning his wife and two sons, sent certaine men to kill the third son, whose name was Iohn, otherwise called Hircanus. But the young man vnderstanding the successe of his fathers voiage, hasted vnto the city accompanied with a great multitude; for he greatly hoped that the people would remember his fathers prowesse, especially because Ptolomæus iniquity was hated of all men; Ptolomæus also hasted to enter the city at another gate: but he was speedily repulsed by the people who had already receiued Hircanus. For which cause he presently retired himselfe into a Castle named Dagon, situate beyond Iericho.

Simon by the treachery of his son in law Ptolomæus, is taken & slain.

Iohn, otherwise called Hircanus, the son of Simon.

The yeere of the world, 3831. before christs Natiuitie, 133.

After that Hircanus had obtained the office of the high Priest, which was left him by his father, and had offred sacrifices vnto God, he led forth his forces with all speed against Ptolomæus, hoping to helpe and deliuer his mother and brethren that were detained prisoners with him: and assaulting the Castle, notwithstanding that in all other things he had the better hand, yet was he ouercome by iust griefe and compassion. For at such time and so often as Ptolomæus perceiued himselfe to be in danger, he brought Hircanus mother and brethren vpon the wals, and beat them where hee might behold them in their torments, threatning to cast them downe from the wall, except Hircanus would presently depart. For which cause Hircanus was more moued with compassion and feare, then with anger & wrath. But his mother being no waies dismaied with stripes which she endured, nor with death wherewith she was threatned, lifted vp her hands to her son, beseeching him that in regard of her miseries, he would not be moued to spare so impious a person, for she esteemed her death threatned by Ptolomæus, dearer then immortality it selfe; if so be he might receiue iust punishment for the villany which he had impiously committed against their house. But when Iohn had perceiued the resolute mind of his mother and heard her intreaty, he was moued to assault the Castle, and straightway seeing her beaten and torne, he relented with

In the meane while, Antiochus beeing grieuouſly vexed at that which Simon had done vnto him, ſent his army into Iudæa, and beſieged Hircanus in Ieruſalem, who opening Dauids Sepulcher (who had beene one of the richeſt amongſt all the Kings of Iudæa) tooke more then three thouſand talents of money from thence; and wrought ſo much with Antiochus, that vpon the pai-

But ſo ſoon as Antiochus had bent his power and forces againſt the Medes, he took hand-faſt of that opportunity he had offred him, to reuenge himſelfe, & preſently aſſaulted the townes of Syria, aſſuring himſelfe he ſhould find them (as indeed they were) void of ſouldiers to defend them. Moreouer, he tooke many Cities of Idumæa, and amongſt the reſt Doreon, and Mariſa: and comming into Samaria (where now Sebaſte is ſituate, which was builded by Herod) he beſieged it on euery ſide, and left

For which cauſe, they required aide of Antiochus, ſurnamed Spondius, who willingly aſſiſted them, but he was ouercome by Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, and was purſued by the aforeſaid brethren vnto Scythopolis, whither he then retired himſelfe: but they retiring againe vnto Samaria, beſieged the Citie, and at laſt taking it by force, deſtroyed the ſame, and led away their inhabitants captiues. Whileſt thus fortune fauoured them more and more, they ceaſed not to purſue their good ſucceſſe, but led their army to Scythopolis: and taking it, they diuided and ſpoiled all the countrey.

CHAP. III.

of Ariſtobulus, Antigonus, Iudas Eſſæus, Alexander, Theodorus, and Demetrius.

THIS felicitie and good hap of Iohn and his ſonnes, was accompanied with the enuy of many of his countreymen: and this diſcontent of theirs, was the cauſe of a mutinie. For diuers of the Iewes riſing vp in armes againſt them, were ſo much ouer-ruled by their ambicious paſſion, that they could not containe themſelues from the proſecution of an open and bloody warre: wherein notwithſtanding they were put to the worſt. From that day forward Iohn paſſed the remainder of his life in all felicitie and happineſſe; and after he had gouer-
E ned the Common-weale for the ſpace of thirtie three yeeres, he departed this life, leauing behind him fiue valiant ſons. He was a man truly happy, & ſo fauoured by Fortune, that he had no occaſion to complaine of her niggardice in bountie. Finally, he alone might iuſtly boaſt himſelfe of three excellent endowments: firſt of all, that he was the Prince of his countrey: ſecondly, that he was high Prieſt: thirdly, a Prophet, to whom God ſo ſpake, that he was ignorant of no future accidents: he foreſaw and foretold that his two eldeſt ſonnes ſhould not continue long in the gouernment (whoſe liues are worth rehearſall, although they much declined from their fathers felicitie) for the eldeſt ſonne Ariſtobulus, after his fathers death tranſlated the principalitie into a kingdome; and was the firſt that put a Crowne on his head; foure hundreth, eightie and one yeeres and three moneths, after the deliuerance of the people from the captiuitie of Babylon. As F for Antigonus (who was his ſecond brother, and whom in appearance he ſeemed to loue moſt intirely) he made him partaker of his dignitie, and committed the reſidue of them to priſon. Hee impriſoned his mother alſo, for that ſhee had contended with him as touching the principalitie, (which Iohn had ſolely committed to her diſpoſe) and was ſo farre giuen ouer to all kinde of crueltie, that he not onely kept her priſoner in bonds, but alſo put her to death by famine. But the reuenge of this his impietie was this, that hee ſlaughtered his owne brother Antigonus whom hee intirely beloued, and made both a competitor and partner with him in the kingdome. For by reaſon of thoſe ſcandalous ſlanders, which his enuious and malignant courtiers contriued & inuen-

ted against him, he commanded him to be put to death. Natheleſſe, vpon their firſt information, Ariſtobulus (ouermaſtered by brotherly affection) gaue them no credit; the rather for that he was certainly aſſured, that all things for the moſt part which were obiected against him, were rather enforced vpon enuie, then alleadged on good ground.

But when as Antigonus returned from the warre, attended with many teſtimonies of his valour and proweſſe, vpon that feſtiuall time, wherein according to the cuſtome of our countrey, we celebrate the feaſt of Tabernacles; it hapned at that time, that Ariſtobulus fell ſicke and was diſeaſed. Antigonus therfore about the end of thoſe feſtiuall daies being attended by his armed men, aſcended vp into the Temple to offer ſacrifice, and the rather reſorted he thither in greater pompe and maieſty, becauſe he intended to honour his brother. Hereupon, certaine curſed and wicked detractors repaired to the King, buzzing in his eares, that this great guard of ſouldiers which accompanied Antigonus, and that his haughtie reſolution and Kingly preſence, was rather for a Soueraigne, then a ſubiect: inferring hereby, that he entred the city in this Equipage, with an intent to murther him, not contenting himſelfe to haue the onely honour of the kingdome, except he might reduce the power and poſſeſſion thereof into his owne hands. Ariſtobulus though vnwillingly, yet at laſt being wonne to beleeue them, deſirous (in ſeeming not to ſuſpect) to ſhew himſelfe prouident, commanded his guard to hide themſelues in a certaine obſcure place vnder the ground: as for himſelfe, he tooke vp his lodging in a certaine Caſtle, which in times paſt was called Bari, and afterwards Antonia: giuing his archers this commiſſion, that if Antigonus came vnarmed, they ſhould let him paſſe; if otherwiſe, that they ſhould kill him. He ſent certaine meſſengers alſo to Antigonus, requiring him to repaire vnto him diſarmed. But the enuious Queene preuented this good intent of his by a ſubtill ſtratageme complotted and acted by thoſe, that with her conſpired againſt him. For ſhe perſwaded thoſe that were put in truſt to diſcharge this meſſage, to diſcouer nothing of that, which the King had commanded them: but to ſignifie vnto Antigonus, that his brother hauing intelligence, that he had made himſelfe many accompliſhed and compleat armours, with other faire and worthy furniture for the war in Galilee (which by reaſon of Antigonus ſudden departure from that place, & his own inſtant infirmity he might not behold) would count it no little fauour and felicity to behold & ſee him in his warlike ornaments. Which when Antigonus vnderſtood (who by reaſon of his brothers diſpoſition ſuſpected no miſchiefe) he armed himſelfe, and reſorted vnto him, intending to delight and content him with his muſters. But no ſooner arriued he in the ſtreight which is called the tower of Straton, but the guard of Ariſtobulus ſet vpon him, and ſlaughtered him, yeelding by this meanes a demonſtratiue and certain teſtimonie, that detraction diſtracteth and deſtroyeth all good nature and friendſhip, and that amongſt all our moſt accounted affections, there is no one ſo defended and fortified as may abate the edge of enuie.

At this time alſo who would not wonder at a certaine man called Iudas? who being by birth an Eſſean, was bleſſed with this felicity in his prophecies, that his predictions were neither touched with miſtaking, nor tainted with lying. This man perceiuing how Antigonus paſſed thorow the Temple, cried out to his familiars who attended him in no ſmall number (for ordinarily diuers of his diſciples did attend vpon him:) Ah, how happy were it for me at this preſent, if I were dead, ſith that truth dieth before me; and ſome one of my predictions are found faulty and deficient? For behold, Antigonus yet liueth, who ſhould this day haue dwelt with death. The place which was deſtinated for his departure is the tower of Straton, which is diſtant from this place ſome ſixe hundreth ſtounds, and yet notwithſtanding there are but 4. houres of the day to be paſt: now therfore is the time wherein my diuination ſhall be falſified. Hauing ſpoken to this effect, the old man ſate him downe being altogether diſconſolate and penſiue, vntill ſuch time as within a while after it was told him that Antigonus was ſlaine in a place vnder ground, which was called the tower of Straton, being of the ſame name with Cæſarea which is ſituate vpon the ſea-coaſt; which was the occaſion that Iudas ſtaggered in his diuination.

The ſorrow which incontinently ſeized Ariſtobulus, for committing this hainous murther, augmented and increaſed his ſickneſſe in ſuch ſort, that his ſoule was continually troubled with the thought of his ſin, & his body through extreme heat of paſſion dried vp; & the griefe that he felt was ſo vehement, that his entrailes became exulcerate, ſo that he voided bloud in great aboundance. And it ſo fell out by the diuine prouidence, that one of his ſeruants, who was deputed to that office, bearing out that blood which came from him, miſſed his way, and came to that place where Antigonus had bin ſlain, wherin as yet there appeared ſome ſignes & ſtaines of the bloudſhed of Antigonus, on wch he powred out the bloud of the murtherer Ariſtobulus. Which when they

A they perceiued who ſtood hard at hand, they began to cry out with a loud voice, as if the ſeruant had purpoſely ſpilled the bloud in that place. Ariſtobulus hearing this cry, demanded the cauſe thereof: and the more that each man fled and feared to diſcouer the ſame vnto him, the more inſtantly ſought he to vnderſtand the truth; ſo that at length after he had vſed threats and violence, he was certified by ſome one of that which had paſt. Whereupon his eyes were ſuddenly filled with teares, ſo that in vehement agonie of mind, he at laſt cried out and ſaid: It is impoſſible, but that the great eye of the diuine Maieſty ſhould ſee my wicked acts, and the ſudden vengeance of my brothers bloudſhed ſhould purſue and ouertake me. How long, O thou impudent body, wilt thou detaine a ſoule already condemned and adiudged to my mother and dead B brother? How long ſhall I thus lingeringly languiſh in ſpending a parcell of my blood vnto them? Let them take it all at once, and let not the diuine vengeance laugh any longer to ſee the effuſion of mine entrailes. This ſaid, he died after he had ſcarely raigned one yeere.

His wife after his death deliuered his brother Alexander from priſon, and anointed him King, who was both the eldeſt and ſeemed to be the moſt ſtaied among the reſt of his brethren. Who growing by this meanes to be both proud and potent, put one of his brethren to death, for aſpiring and hunting after the kingdome: as for the other that remained aliue, in that he contented himſelfe with a priuate and contemplatiue life, he kept him neere about him. He made warre alſo againſt Ptolomey that was called Lathyrus, who had ſurprized the City of Aſoth, and put a great number of his enemies to the ſword: natheleſſe, Ptolomeys ſide obtained the victory, who re- C tyring himſelfe into the country of Egypt, by reaſon that his mother Cleopatra purſued him with open warre; Alexander forcibly entred the City of Gadara, and the fort of Amathunt (which was one of the greateſt of all thoſe that were round about Iordan) in which place Theodore, Zenos ſon had hoorded vp his chiefeſt and moſt precious moueables, who ſuddenly ſetting vpon him, recouered all that which was his, and furthermore laid hands on the Kings carriage: in ſeizing which, he ſlaughtered many Iewes, to the number of tenne thouſand. But Alexander, after he had recouered this loſſe, inuaded the frontier towns vpon the ſea-coaſt, and won Raphia, and Gaza, and Anthedon, which afterwards by King Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had con- D quered & ouercome theſe places, the common ſort of the Iewes raiſed a mutiny againſt him during a certain ſolemne and holy feaſt: for all mutinies and ſeditions are commonly raiſed at banquets: and it is thought that he could not haue preuailed againſt thoſe treacheries, had he not bin aſſiſted by the Piſidians and Cilicians, whom he hired to helpe him; for the Syrians, he refuſed to hire them, by reaſon of their naturall hatred they bare againſt the Iewes. Hauing therefore ſlaine eight thouſand of the rebels, he warred vpon Arabia; and ouercomming the Galaadites, and Moabites (and impoſing vpon them a tribute) hee returned to Amathunt: and whereas Theodorus was daunted with his proſperous ſucceſſe, he finding the Caſtle without any to defend it, raſed it vnto the ground: After this, he preſently aſſaulted Oboda, King of the Arabians: who hauing laid ambuſhments in the country of Galaad, in a place fit for ſuch a purpoſe, diſcomfited him and his whole armie, being driuen thence into a deepe valley, where they were peſtered with a multitude of Camels.

E But Alexander eſcaped vnto Ieruſalem, where the people who had conceiued a hatred againſt him, being encouraged by his great loſſe and ſlaughter of men, began againe to rebell: but then alſo he ouercame them, and in ſixe yeeres ſpace, at ſundry battels he ſlew aboue fiftie thouſand Iewes; notwithſtanding, hee neuer reioyced in his victory, becauſe the ſtrength of his countrey was conſumed thereby. For which cauſe giuing ouer his wars, he began to ſeeke the peoples fauour by ſweet and mild ſpeeches: but they ſo much hated his inconſtant and variable manners, that when he demanded of them what he might doe to win their fauours, they anſwered, If he would die, for that ſcarcely they would pardon him if ſo be he were dead, who had committed ſo many hainous crimes. And thereupon the Iewes ſent vnto Demetrius, ſurnamed Acærus for helpe, who in hope of great rewards came and ioyned his forces with the Iewes about Sichem: F where Alexander met them both, with a thouſand horſmen and ſix thouſand footmen, that were hired (hauing at that time ten thouſand Iewes his fauourites) and of the contrary part there were three thouſand horſemen, and forty thouſand footmen. Before the fight began, the two Kings ſent meſſengers one vnto anothers army, perſwading one anothers men to forſake their colours and Captaines: for Demetrius hoped that Alexanders hired men would haue forſaken Alexander and come vnto him, & Alexander hoped that the Iewes that followed Demetrius, would haue left Demetrius and come to him. But when both parts perceiued that the Iewes continued obſtinate in their purpoſe, and the Greekes kept their fidelity, the two armies encountred; in which encounencounter Demetrius had the vpper hand (although Alexanders hirelings euidently shewed great strength and courage.) But the end of this victory was such as neither party expected: for they who sent for Demetrius, after his victory did forsake him; and fortune changing her colours, sixe thousand Iewes fled vnto Alexander into the mountaines, whither for safety hee had betaken himselfe. This reuolting much displeased and discouraged Demetrius, for he now thought that Alexander vniting his forces, was able to bid him battell; and he feared that all the Iewes would at that present follow Alexander: for which cause he returned home. Yet the rest of the Iewes hauing thus lost the helpe of Demetrius, would not for al this desist from their rebellion; nay they so long warred with Alexander, till at last (the most of them being slaine) he draue the rest into the city of Bemeselin, and when he had surprized and sackt the City, he led them captiues into Ierusalem. But immoderate anger turned his cruelty into impiety: for hauing crucified eight hundreth captiues in the midst of the City, he killed their wiues, and the children he massacred before their mothers faces; and this pittifull spectacle he beheld with pleasure, drinking and making merry with his concubines. Whereat the people were so terrified, that the night after, eight thousand of the contrary part fled out of the countrey of Iudæa, who staied in banishment during the life of Alexander. Thus, after he had by those actions sought for the tranquillity of his kingdome, which he obtained not but with long time and great difficulty, he ceased to make warre against his countrey.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the warre of ALEXANDER with ANTIOCHVS, and ARETAS, and of ALEXANDRA, and HIRCANVS.

Alexander feareth Antiochus, Demetrius brother.

AFTER this, Antiochus (who likewise was called Dionysius, the brother to Demetrius, who was the last of all the race of Seleucus) raised vp new broiles against Alexander, who fearing him because he had prepared war against the Arabians, drew a deepe trench along that ground which lyeth between Antipatris, and the Sea-coast of Ioppe: and before the trench he builded a very high wall, and raised towers of wood to hinder his enemies passage. But all this could not keepe out Antiochus, but that burning the towers, and filling vp the trenches, he entred and passed ouer them with his forces. And not tarrying at that time to reuenge himselfe of him who had thus forbidden him passage, he presently marched forward against the Arabians. But the King of Arabia retyring himselfe into certaine places of his countrey which were fittest for defence, and returning suddenly to battell with his horsmen (who were in number 10000.) rushed hastily vpon Antiochus souldiers, and found them vnprouided: so that a hot skirmish began betwixt them, in which the souldiers of Antiochus, whil'st he liued, shewed themselues valiant (though they were on euery side massacred by the Arabians) but so soone as he was slaine (who was alwaies ready to assist those that were in danger) all of them fled: and the greatest part of them were slaine in the battell and in flight: as for those that escaped, they fled into the towne of Cana, where they all (except very few) died for hunger. After this, the people of Damascus being incited by the hatred they bare to Ptolomey the son of Mineus, sent for Aretas, and established him King ouer Cœlosyria: who warring against Iudæa, and ouercomming Alexander in battell, retired himselfe vpon composition. Alexander hauing taking Pella, resorted once more to the towne of Gerasa, in that he was desirous of Theodorus riches: and tooke the place, notwithstanding that it was fortified with three wals: and that vpon euery wall there was planted a garrison. He tooke Gaulan and Seleucia and that town which is called the valley of Antiochus. Moreouer, hauing taken Gamala, which was a most strong Castle, and imprisoned the Gouernor thereof, who was called Demetrius, becaus he was a wicked person, he returned into Iudæa, after he had spent 3. yeers in war: where for his prosperous successe he was ioyfully receiued of his nation. But no sooner ceased he from war but he fell sicke, and falling into a quartane ague, he thought that he should driue away his sicknes, if he employed himselfe in some businesse: for which cause being not rid of his disease, he applied himselfe to war, and labouring aboue his strength, amidst those tumults yeelded vp the ghost in the 37. yeere of his raigne: leauing the kingdome to Alexandra his wife, fully accounting that the Iewes would in all things obey her, becaus that she alwaies by misliking and seeking to hinder his cruelty and iniquity, had won the hearts of the people. Neither was he deceiued; for she being admired for her piety amongst them, obtained the principality: the rather for that she was well acquainted with the crstomes of her country, and euen from her

Alexandra Alexanders wife, through the opinion of vertue, obtaineth the kingdome.

A her childhood deteſted them, who violated the holy law. She had by Alexander two ſons, the eldeſt was called Hircanus: whom by reaſon of his yeers ſhe proclaimed high Prieſt, and becauſe of his dull nature, ſhe thought that though he were in Princely authority, yet he would moleſt no man: and therefore alſo made him King. As for the youngeſt ſon Ariſtobulus, becauſe he was of a hot ſpirit, ſhe was willing that he ſhould lead a priuate life.

Hircanus firſt made High Prieſt, and afterward king.

Now there was a certaine ſect among the Iewes, which were called Phariſes, who ioyned themſelues with the Queene: theſe people were thought to be of the godlieſt ſort, and to be more skilfull then other in interpreting the Scriptures: and for that cauſe Alexandra fauoured them the more, becauſe ſhe was ſuperſtitiouſly giuen to religion. Theſe hauing by little and little B inſinuated themſelues into the fauour of a ſimple woman, now did domineere at their pleaſure, diſplacing, diſpoſing, impriſoning, and reſtoring to liberty whom they pleaſed, for no other purpoſe, but that they might inioy the profits and commodities of the Kingdome; and Alexandra bare all charges. This Queen was alwaies deſirous of high attempts, and daily ſtudied to increaſe her wealth: ſhe leuied two armies, and hired a great many ſtrangers; whereby ſhe did not onely ſtrengthen her owne country, but alſo made her ſelfe to be feared of other nations. She ruled others, but her ſelfe was ruled by the Phariſes, who at laſt killed Diogenes, who was a gallant man, and highly in fauour with King Alexander; affirming that through his counſell the King commanded thoſe eight hundred before mentioned to be crucified: and further, they perſwaded the Queene Alexandra, that ſhee ſhould put to death all others, through whoſe counſell Alexander C her husband had beene incited againſt thoſe eight hundred. The Queene being blinded with ſuperſtition, thought it vnlawfull to deny any thing which they requeſted: ſo that they put to death whom they pleaſed, till ſuch time as the chiefeſt of thoſe, who were in this danger, in humble wiſe came to Ariſtobulus, who perſwaded his mother to ſpare them for their dignity, and baniſh others, whom ſhe thought had deſerued puniſhment: who hauing obtained their liberty, diſperſed themſelues thorow the whole countrey. Now Alexandra ſent an army to Damaſcus, and becauſe Ptolomeus daily vexed the City, ſhe tooke it without doing any thing worthy of memory: ſhe did ſollicite Tigranes King of Armenia with gifts and promiſes (who with an army had beſieged Ptolemais wherein Cleopatra was) but he for feare of troubles in his owne country, in that Lucullus had entred into Armenia, withdrew himſelfe from thence.

D In the meane time Alexandra being ſicke, her youngeſt ſonne Ariſtobulus with his ſeruants (which were many in number, all truſty, and in the heat of their young yeers) got all the Caſtles: and hiring ſouldiers with the money he found in thoſe Caſtles, he proclaimed himſelf King. But Alexandra (pitying the complaints of Hircanus) impriſoned the wife and children of Ariſtobulus in a caſtle neer vnto the North part of the Temple, which in old time was called Baris (as we ſaid before) afterwards Antonius being Emperour, it was called Antonia, as in like manner Sebaſte and Agrippias other Cities, were named of Auguſtus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before ſhe could reuenge Hircanus of the wrongs which Ariſtobulus had done him. This Queene raigned nine yeeres, and left Hircanus in poſſeſſion of all, whom during her life time ſhe had aduanced to the Kingdome. But Ariſtobulus being both ſtronger in power, and more eſteemed in authority, E encountred with his brother about Iericho, where many of Hircanus ſouldiers forſaking their King, fled vnto Ariſtobulus: for which cauſe, both he and the remnant of thoſe that followed him, were forced to fly into the caſtle called Antonia, where he found hoſtages to redeem them. For (as we haue already ſaid) Ariſtobulus wife and children were impriſoned in that place: and leſt any worſe miſ-hap ſhould betide him, he concluded a peace, vpon condition that Ariſtobulus ſhould be King, and that he as brother to the King, would content himſelfe with other dignities. Vpon theſe conditions they were made friends in the Temple, where in the preſence of all the people, they in moſt friendly ſort embraced each other: which when they had done, they changed houſes, and Ariſtobulus went into the Kings Palace, and Hircanus vnto Ariſtobulus houſe.

canus to flie vnto Aretas King of Arabia, and craue his helpe to ſet him in his Kingdome. Furthermore, he perſwaded Aretas likewiſe to receiue Hircanus, and to help him to recouer his kingdome, ſpeaking much againſt the manners of Ariſtobulus. and praiſing Hircanus; adding that he being King of ſo famous a nation, ought to aſſiſt thoſe who were vniuſtly oppreſſed; and that Hircanus had manifeſt iniury offered him, being forced to forſake his Kingdome, which by the right of ſucceſſion was due vnto him. After he had thus made his way, he in the night time took Hircanus and fled with him forth of the City: and making all haſte poſſible, they arriued at a towne called Petra, with ſafety (which is a town where the Kings of Arabia were accuſtomed to keepe their Court) there he deliuered Hircanus into the Kings hands, and through many gifts and intreaties obtained the fauour that he might be conducted into his kingdome. And to the effecting of the ſame, Aretas gaue him an army of fifty thouſand horſe and foot: which power ſince Ariſtobulus was not able to reſiſt, he was ouercome vpon the firſt onſet, and was forced to flie vnto Ieruſalem: and he had bin ſurely taken, if Scaurus a Captaine of the Romans by taking opportunity at thoſe troubles, had not raiſed the ſiege. For Pompey the Great (who warred againſt Tigranes) ſent him out of Armenia into Syria: who comming to Damaſcus, found it newly taken by Metellus and Lollius; who diſmiſſing them from thence, and finding how matters ſtood in Iudæa, haſted thither in hope of a booty. So ſoone as he entred into the confines of the country, both of the brethren ſent Embaſſadors vnto him, deſiring him to take their parts: but Ariſtobulus hauing ſent him 300. talents, he neglected to doe Iuſtice; for hauing receiued that ſumme, Scaurus ſent meſſengers vnto the Arabians and Hircanus, threatning the diſpleaſure of the Romans and Pompey, except they would preſently raiſe their ſiege: for which cauſe Aretas being much abaſhed, returned out of Iudæa vnto Philadelphia, and Scaurus repaired vnto Damaſcus. Yet ſufficed it not Ariſtobulus, that he had eſcaped from being taken, but that gathering all his forces together, he purſued his enemies: and ioyning battell with them about Papyron, he ſlew ſixe thouſand of them, in which number was Cephalon Antipaters brother. But Hircanus and Antipater being deſtitute of the Arabians helpe, were driuen to hope for ſuccour euen at their aduerſaries hand. For which cauſe, as ſoone as Pompey after he had entred Syria came to Damaſcus, they in humble manner came to him, and giuing him many gifts, proteſted vnto him that which before they had done to Aretas; earneſtly requeſting him, that he would conſider the violence offered by Ariſtobulus, and reſtore Hircanus to the Kingdome: to whom both by yeers and manners it was due.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 6. 7.

Meane-while Ariſtobulus ſlept not, but hauing corrupted Scaurus, came in as royall pompe as he could; but not abiding to debaſe himſelfe, and thinking it diſparagement in more abiect maner then beſeemed a King to ſeeke his owne commodity, returned from Dioſpolis. Wherat Pompey being angry, at the requeſt of Hircanus and his followers, hee went againſt Ariſtobulus, accompanied both with the Roman army and the Syrians, who aſſiſted them. When they had paſſed Pella and Scythopolis, and came to Corea (where the confines of Iudæa begin) as they paſſed thorow the midſt of the countrey, they vnderſtood that Ariſtobulus was fled to Alexandrium (which was a Caſtle richly built and ſituate vpon a very high hill.) Pompey arriuing in that place ſent meſſengers vnto him, commanding him to deſcend; but he becauſe he was called in queſtion about the kingdom, determined rather to hazzard himſelf, then obey. But when he ſaw that the people began to feare; and that his friends willed him to think of the power of the Romans, whoſe ſtrength he was no waies able to reſiſt; hee allowed their counſell and came vnto Pompey: where hauing alleadged many reaſons to ſhew that he had iuſt title vnto the Crowne, he returned again into the Caſtle. And afterwards being vrged by his brother to come & plead his title, hee came and returned thither againe, without contradiction from Pompey. Thus wandred he betwixt hope and feare, and doubting how the matter would goe with him, hee came to Pompey as it were to entreat him to pardon all, and returned againe vnto the mountaine, leſt hee ſhould ſeeme to derogate any thing from the maieſty of a King; yet becauſe Pompey willed him to depart from his Caſtles, and to warne his Gouernors therof to do the like (whom he had commanded to diſobey, except they receiued letters written by his owne hand) in this he fulfilled Pompeis minde: yet being angry and diſcontented he departed into Ieruſalem, and now fully determined to fight with Pompey. But Pompey not thinking it beſt to let him haue time to prepare himſelfe, followed him with all ſpeed, and ſo much the willinger, becauſe that neere vnto Iericho he had newes of Mithridates his death, euen in the fruitfulleſt place of Iudæa, where there are great ſtore of palmes and balme. This balſam is a ſhrub whoſe ſtemme being cut with ſharpe ſtones, droppeth balme out of the wounds thereof, which men gather as it droppeth from the wounds

After he had reſted there that night, he in the morning haſted to Ieruſalem: At whoſe ſudden arriuall Ariſtobulus being daunted, in humble manner came vnto him; and promiſing him money, and to yeeld himſelfe and the City into his hands, he by this meanes appeaſed Pompeis anger. But he performed no part of his promiſe; for Ariſtobulus his aſſociates would not ſuffer Gabinius (who was ſent for the money) to enter into the City: For which cauſe Pompey being mooued to diſpleaſure, put Ariſtobulus in hold: and comming neere the City, he tooke a view at what place it might be eaſilieſt entred, for he did not lightly perceiue how he might batter the wals, they were ſo ſtrong. Moreouer, there was a huge ditch before the wall, and hard by he beheld the Temple ſo ſtrengthened, that although the City were taken; yet it might be a ſe-
B cond refuge for the enemy. Whileſt thus he long deliberated what to doe, there aroſe a ſedition within the City, wherein Ariſtobulus confederates thought it meet to fight, and deliuer the King out of priſon: but thoſe that fauoured Hircanus, would that the gates ſhould be opened to Pompey. At laſt Ariſtobulus friends hauing the worſt, fled into the Temple; and to the end that they might fight it out to the laſt, they cut downe the bridge, by which men goe out of the City, into the Temple. When the reſt had receiued the Romans into the City, and deliuered vnto them the Kings Palace, Pompey ſent a Captaine called Piſo with ſouldiers to ſeize the ſame; who leauing a garriſon in the town (ſeeing he could perſwade none of them that were in the Temple to peace) prepared all places about it to batter it. All which time Hircanus and his friends ſhewed themſelues ready to helpe them with counſell, and to doe whatſoeuer they were commanded. Pompey
C at the North ſide filled the ditch and valley with all kind of matter, which his ſouldiers carried: although that by reaſon of the huge depth, and for that the Iewes made reſiſtance, it was a thing hard to be done: and it had beene left vndone, had not Pompey (obſeruing the ſeuenth day, wherein the Iewes religion forced them to abſtaine from all labour,) cauſed it to be filled vpon thoſe dayes; forbidding the ſouldiers to fight at that time, to the intent he might fill the ditch more conueniently (for it is lawful for the Iewes onely to fight for their bodies vpon the Sabbath.) At laſt when the ditch was filled, and the towers were built vpon the rampire, he beat the wals with thoſe engines which he brought from Tyre; but they were beaten backe by thoſe who reſiſted from the top of the wals, who darted diuers ſtones at them. Againſt the violent power whereof, the towers that were builded in that quarter, being of a great and goodly building, reſiſted as va-
D liantly, and as long as they poſſibly could. But the Romans found but hard meaſure in this place, and Pompey admired the conſtancy of the Iewes; who being amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies darts, yet omitted not any ceremony: but (as though they had firme peace) they euery day obſerued their ceremonies, offered ſacrifices and offerings, and moſt diligently obſerued all honour and diuine ſeruice: yea in the very taking of the place, although euery day they were killed at the Altar, yet did they not ceaſe from the lawfull rites of their religion. At laſt in the third moneth of the ſiege, whereas ſcarcely one tower was beaten downe, they brake into the Temple, and the firſt that attempted to climbe ouer the wall, was Fauſtus Cornelius Silas ſonne, and after him two Centurions, Furius and Fabius with their regiments; who compaſſing the Temple about (while ſome ſought to hide themſelues, and other ſome reſiſted) they ſlew them all. There were E many Prieſts alſo among the reſt; who, although they ſaw the enemies with naked ſwords ruſhing vpon them, yet being nothing at all diſmaied thereat, continued ſtill their ſacrifices; and were ſlaine euen whileſt they offred and incenſed in the Temple: preferring the duty they ought to religion, euen before their owne ſafety. Many alſo were ſlaine by their owne countrimen that fauoured the aduerſe part: and many caſt themſelues downe headlong vpon the rockes; otherſome in their fury hauing deſperately fired all things vpon the wals, burned themſelues for company. So that there twelue thouſand Iewes were ſlaine, but very few Romans: yet many were hurt, and amongſt all that maſſacre there was nothing ſo lamentable, as that the holy Sanctuary (which neuer any man ſaw before that time) was reuealed to ſtrangers. Finally, Pompeius accom-
F panied with his followers, come into the Temple, where it was lawfull for none but the High Prieſt to come, and ſaw the candleſtickes, lamps, table, cenſers, and all the golden veſſels, and whatſoeuer was within the Temple. Moreouer, he beheld the great quantity of odoriferous drugges which were kept in ſtore in that place, and two thouſand talents of holy money: yet did he not take away theſe things, nor any thing elſe belonging to the Temple. But the day after it was taken, he commanded the Sacriſtans to purge and make cleane the Temple, and to offer ſolemne ſacrifice. He likewiſe proclaimed Hircanus high Prieſt (who had in all things ſhewed himſelfe very forward, and eſpecially at the time of the ſiege:) as alſo for that he hindred a multitude of ſwaynes (who addreſſed for warre) from ioyning themſelues with Ariſtobulus: and there-

Amongſt others that were captiues there was Ariſtobulus father in law, who was alſo his vncle: as for thoſe that had bin the chiefe cauſe of theſe wars, Pompey cauſed them to be beheaded. And in fauour of Demetrius of Gadara (a libertine of his) he reedified Gadara, which the Iewes had deſtroied: he deliuered the Mediterranean Cities from their gouernment (for they had not as yet deſtroyed them, becauſe they were ſuddenly preuented) namely, Hippon, and Scythopolis, and Pella, and Samaria, and Mariſa, and Azotum, and Iamnia, and Arethuſa. And of this place and Iudæa, and of all places from the borders of Egypt vnto Euphrates, he made Scaurus Gouernor, leauing him two legions of ſouldiers. Alexander Ariſtobulus ſon gathers a great power againſt Hircanus.

The yeere of the world, 3904. before christs Natiuitie, 60.

In the meane time Alexander the ſonne of Ariſtobulus (who in the way to Rome eſcaped from Pompey) gathered together a great army, and deſperately ſet vpon Hircanus, waſting all Iudæa, which he hoped quickly to winne; yea the wall which was deſtroyed by Pompey at Ieruſalem, had been builded vp againe as he hoped, had not Gabinius (who was ſent into Syria to ſucceed Scaurus) who had oftentimes before ſhewed his valour, at that time alſo with an army come againſt Alexander. Who fearing the worſt, aſſembled all the forces that he could to make reſiſtance, ſo that he had tenne thouſand footmen, and a thouſand and fiue hundreth horſemen: he fortified alſo the commodions places of the countrey, to wit, Alexandrium, Hircanium, and Machærunt, which were neere vnto the mountaines of Arabia. Gabinius ſent Marcus Antonius before him with part of the army, and followed after with the reſt; and certaine choſen men out of Antipaters company, and other companies of the Iewes, whereof Malichus and Pitholaus were made chiefe, ioyned themſelues with Marcus Antonius; and preſently after them followed Gabinius with all his company, who all went to meet Alexander.

But Alexander perceiuing himſelfe vnable to encounter with all their vnited forces, fled: but drawing neer vnto Ieruſalem, he was conſtrained to hazzard the fight; where loſing to the number of ſixe thouſand (whereof ſome three thouſand were taken aliue, and other three thouſand ſlain) he eſcaped with the reſt. But Gabinius as ſoon as he came to the Caſtle called Alexandrium, vnderſtanding that many had forſaken their places, he by promiſing them pardon ſought to vnite them vnto him before the war began: but when he perceiued that they hammered on no abiect reſolution, he ſlew the moſt of them; as for the reſt he ſhut them vp in the Caſtle. In this battell Captaine Marcus Antonius did many things worthy of renowne, and although he had alwaies and at all times ſhewed himſelfe valiant, yet there eſpecially his valour appeared. Gabinius leauing ſome to winne the Caſtle, went vnto the Cities, and ſtrengthened thoſe that were not yet aſſaulted, and reedified thoſe that were deſtroied, and by his commandement Scythopolis and Samaria, and Anthedon, and Apollonia, and Iamnia, and Raphia, and Mariſa, and Dora, and Gadara,

A Gadara, and Azotus, and many more began to be inhabited; ſo that their inhabitants ioyfully peopled and dwelt therein. Which when he had done, he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more vrgent ſiege: whereat Alexander being terrified and made deſperate, he ſent Embaſſadors to him, beſeeching him to pardon his offences, promiſing to render vnto him the caſtles of Macherunt and Hircanium, which were in his power, and beſides them Alexandrium: All which Gabinius by counſell of Alexanders mother deſtroied, leſt they might be occaſion of new warres. This woman accoſted and flattered Gabinius, for that ſhee feared leſt her husband and the reſt of the captiues at Rome ſhould be any wayes damnified. After this, Gabinius carried Hircanus to Ieruſalem: and committing the Temple vnto his charge, he made others of the Nobility rulers of B the Commonwealth, and diuided the whole nation of the Iewes into fiue parts and gouernments, whereof one was eſtabliſhed at Ieruſalem, another at Doris, the third at Amathunt, the fourth at Iericho, the fift at Sephoris a city of Galilee: and the Iewes being deliuered from the gouernment of one man only, willingly ſuffred themſelues to be ruled by the Nobility. But ſhortly after, Ariſtobulus eſcaping from Rome raiſed new troubles: who gathering a great army partly of thoſe that deſired a change, partly of them that loued him before, tooke Alexandrium and began to compaſſe it againe with a wall: but hearing that Gabinius had ſent Siſenna, Antonius, and Seruilius againſt him with an army, he went to Macherunt; and forſaking thoſe that were not fit for war, he tooke with him almoſt 8000. armed men, amongſt whom was Pitholaus gouernor of them that were reuolted, who with 1000. men fled out of Ieruſalem. But the Romans followed and purſued C them: and ioyning battell with them, Ariſtobulus with his men fought valiantly, till being by force ouercome, the Romans ſlue fiue thouſand of them, & almoſt two thouſand fled into a mountaine; and the other thouſand breaking the rankes of the Romans with Ariſtobulus, were forced to Macherunt; where the King hiding himſelfe the firſt night amongſt the ruines, hoped that hauing reſpit, he might gather another army, and fortifie the caſtle: but hauing for two daies ſuſtained the forces of the Romans, although vnable to do it; at laſt was taken: and with his ſon Antigonus, who had bin impriſoned with him at Rome, he was carried to Gabinius, and from thence to Rome, and the Senate put him in priſon: but his ſons they ſent into Iudæa, becauſe Gabinius writ that he had ſo promiſed Ariſtobulus his wife vpon condition the caſtles might be yeelded. Now Gabinius being prepared to war againſt the Parthians, Ptolomeus hindred him, who returning from Euphrates D went into Egypt, leauing Antipater and Hircanus his friends to diſpoſe of all things belonging to the warre: for Antipater helped him with money, weapons, corne, and men, and he perſwaded the Iewes who kept the wayes that lead vnto Peluſium, to ſuffer Gabinius to paſſe. Now in the other part of Syria, at the departure of Gabinius there began a commotion, and Alexander Ariſtobulus ſonne once more incited the Iewes to rebellion, and hauing gathered a mighty power, purpoſed to deſtroy all the Romanes that were in that countrey: which Gabinius fearing (who was returned out of Egypt at the beginning of theſe tumults) he ſent Antipater before, who perſwaded ſome of the rebels to be quiet, yet 30000. remained with Alexander. For which cauſe he was very forward to fight, and went out to battell: the Iewes came againſt him, and neere vnto Itabyrium they fought, where 10000. were ſlaine, and the reſt were put to flight: and Gabinius returned to E Ieruſalem through the counſell of Antipater: who hauing eſtabliſhed that eſtate, went frō thence and ouercame the Nabathæans in battell: he likewiſe permitted Mithridates and Orſanes priuily to depart, who were fled from the Parthians, ſaying that they had eſcaped from the ſouldiers. In the meane time Craſſus, who was appointed to be his ſucceſſor, had Syria deliuered him, who toward the maintenance of the Parthian wars tooke all the gold that was in the Temple of Ieruſalem, and 2000. talents which Pompeius had forborne to doe: who paſſing ouer Euphrates, was both himſelfe and his whole army vtterly ouerthrowne: of which thing it behooueth vs not to ſpeake in this place. After the death of Craſſus, the Parthians endeauoured themſelues to enter Syria; but Caſſius who ſucceeded him in the gouernment, repulſed them: and hauing gotten the vpper hand he ſpeedily reſorted into Iudæa, and taking Tarichea, he carried away about 3000. men F captiues; and put Pytholaus to death, for gathering a company of ſeditious people vnto Ariſtobulus his part. He that cauſed and counſelled his death was Antipater, who was married vnto a noble woman of Arabia called Cypris, by whom he had foure ſonnes, Phaſaelus and King Herod, Ioſeph, and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome; who ſought the friendſhip of all Potentates round about him by courteſie and hoſpitality, and eſpecially he got the good will of the King of Arabia by affinity, vnto whoſe fidelity he committed his ſonnes, becauſe he had vndertaken the wars againſt Ariſtobulus. But Caſſius made a truce with Alexander, and in the meane time went to Euphrates to hinder the paſſage of the Parthians, of which we will ſpeake hereafter.

Of the death of ARISTOBVLVS, and the warre betweene ANTIPATER and MITHRIDATES.

Ant.lib.14. cap.14. Cæsar deliuereth Aristobulus from his bonds. Aristobulus and his sonne slain by Pompeis friends.

AFter that Cæsar had forced the Senate and Pompey to flye beyond the Ionian sea, and by that meanes made himselfe sole Master of all at Rome, hee set Aristobulus at liberty, and with two legions of men sent him in haste into Syria, hoping through his meanes speedily to win both it and also all places adioyning to Iudæa: but both the hope of Cæsar and the forwardnesse of Aristobulus was ouerthrowne through enuy: for he was poisoned by Pompeis fauourites, and euen in his owne countrey his body lay vnburied, which notwithstanding was preserued from putrefaction with hony, till such time as Antonius sent it vnto the Iewes, commanding them to bury it in the Kings sepulcher. His sonne Alexander also was beheaded at Antiochia by Scipio, being first according to the tenor of Pompeis letters accused before the tribunal seat, of such things as he had committed against the Romans, Ptolomæus the son of Minæus, who ruled Chalcis which was vnder Libanus, hauing taken his brethren, sent his sonne Philippio with them to Ascalon; and he violently taking away Antigonus and his sisters from the wife of Aristobulus, brought them to his father, and falling in loue with the yongest, took her to wife: for which cause he was afterward put to death by his father. For Ptolomæus hauing slaine his sonne, married Alexandra; and for that affinity sake, was more carefull for her brethren. After the death of Pompey, Antipater sought all meanes to get Cæsars fauour: and when Mithridates of Pergamenus was hindred by the Garrison at Pelusium to passe any further with an army into Egypt, and was by that meanes staied at Ascalon, he perswaded the Arabians to assist him, the rather, because he was but a stranger, and he himselfe also seconded him with almost three thousand armed Iewes.

Moreouer, he incited the Potentate of Syria, and Ptolomæus who inhabited Libanus, and Iamblicus and another Ptolomæus to assist him; for whose sakes the cities of that country did willingly vndertake the wars. And now Mithridates strengthned by Antipaters meanes, came to Pelusium, and because they would not suffer him to passe, he besieged the city, in which siege Antipater shewed his valour: for making a breach on that side of the wall, where his quarter was, he first of all with his company brake into the city, and so Pelusium was taken. But the inhabitants of Onias country who were Egyptians and Iewes, suffred him not to passe any further: yet did Antipater handle the matter so discreetly with them, that they did not onely suffer him to passe, but also prouided victuals for his army. Wherupon the city of Memphis would not fight, but yeelded of their owne accord vnto Mithridates: so that passing thorow Delta, he fought with the other Egyptians in a place called the tents of the Iewes; and being with all his company in danger, he was rescued by Antipater, who marching along the riuer side, set vpon and discomfited the left wing of the enemies battell, and rushing vpon them that pressed vpon Mithridates, he slew many, and pursued the rest that fled, till he got their tents & all with the losse of fourescore men. But Mithridates flying, lost eight hundreth men, and being against all hope preserued out of those wars, was without all enuy a true witnes before Cæsar of al that which Antipater had both done & deserued. Wherupon Cæsar redoubled his courage with praise and promises vnto him, and made him forward to hazard himselfe for him. In a word, he prooued and shewed himselfe a stout warriour, and hauing many wounds in euery part of his body, he bare a badge and testimony of his valour and vertue. Afterward when the state of Egypt was quiet, he returned into Syria, where he made him a citizen of Rome, and granted him the immunities therof: and did so honour him in other things and vse him so friendly, that he made him a patterne for all to imitate: and for his sake confirmed Hircanus in the high priesthood.

A as though they had vniuſtly driuen him and his brethren out of their natiue ſoile, and grieuouſly iniured the people, to obtaine their intent; alledging that they had ſent aide into Egypt to Cæſars forces, not for good will, but for feare of ancient enmity, and that hereby they might acquite themſelues of the good will they bare to Pompey. At theſe words Antipater (caſting away his veſture) ſhewed the number of his wounds, ſaying, it was not needfull to vſe words to prooue what affection hee had borne to Cæſar; for his very body would ſhew it, although hee himſelfe held his peace: adding, that he admired the impudent boldneſſe of Antigonus, who being ſonne to an enemy of the Romanes, and a fugitiue from the Romanes, and ſtill continued his fathers purpoſe of nouelty and ſedition, ſhould dare to accuſe others before the Romane Emperour; B demanding of him how he durſt hope to obtaine any good thing, who ought to bee contented with his life onely: alleadging, that hee craued not maintenance for that hee wanted, but that he might raiſe a rebellion amongſt the Iewes, and againſt them who ſhould beſtow any thing vpon him.

Which when Cæſar heard, he ſaid that Hircanus was moſt worthy to be High Prieſt, and bade Antipater wiſh what dignity he would haue: who leauing that to the pleaſure of the giuer, he was made Gouernour of all Iudæa. And moreouer, he obtained to reedifie the razed wals of his coun- trey, and Cæſar commanded that thoſe honours ſhould be engrauen in the Capitoll, that it might be a token in time to come of Antipaters iuſtice and vertue. Antipater hauing attended Cæſar out of Syria, firſt of all repaired the ruined wals of his countrey which Pompey had razed: and going C thorow out all the countrey, he threatned the obſtinate, and perſwaded the ſeditious to obedience, admoniſhing them, that if they obeyed Hircanus, they might liue in wealth and peace, and enioy happineſſe and an vniuerſall felicity: but if they ſuffred themſelues to be led with the vaine hopes of thoſe, who for their priuate commodities ſought for alteration, that then they ſhould find him inſtead of a Procurator, the Lord of all; and Hircanus inſtead of a King, a Tyrant, and the Romans and Cæſar, inſtead of friends, deadly enemies: for that they would not ſuffer his power to be o- uerthrown, whom they themſelues had eſtabliſhed for King. But notwithſtanding he ſpake theſe words, yet (becauſe he ſaw Hircanus more dull, and not of ſo feruent aſpirit as the care of a King- dome required) he himſelfe ſettled the eſtate of the countrey, and made Phaſaelus his eldeſt ſonne Gouernour of the army, and the Lord of Ieruſalem and of his owne liuing, and ſent Herod his D yongeſt ſonne to gouerne Galilee (although he was very yong:) who being by nature of a valiant courage, found out a preſent occaſion to ſhew his braue minde: for he tooke Ezechias which was captaine of theeues, who as he vnderſtood was woont to prey vpon the confines of Syria with a great multitude, and put him to death with many other theeues: which thing was ſo gratefull vnto the Syrians, that in all townes and villages they made ſongs of Herod, as though he had re- ſtored them to peace, and to their poſſeſſions.

Herod baniſheth the theeues out of Syria.

At length, the glory of this fact came to the eares of Sextus Cæſar, who was Cæſar the Empe- rours kinſman, who then ruled Syria. Phaſaelus alſo did ſtriue to ouercome the towardneſſe and good reputation of his brother, by daily increaſing and winning to himſelfe the good wils of the inhabitants of Ieruſalem: ſo that during the time he gouerned the City, he did nothing inſolent- E ly through might or power: for which cauſe the people honoured Antipater as their King, and reuerenced him as Lord of all, yet was his fidelity and good will neuer the leſſe towards Hirca- nus. But it is impoſſible that any man that liueth in proſperity, ſhould not be enuied. For Hircanus, although beforetime he were moued ſomething at the glory of theſe young men, and eſpecially with the proſperous ſucceſſe of Herod, being often annoyed with frequent meſſengers, who ſpred his praiſe for euery thing he did: yet in particular hee was ſtirred vp by many enuious perſons, who are woont to haunt the Courts of Princes, who were grieued that Antipater and his ſonnes ruled without offence. Theſe men told Hircanus that he onely enioyed the bare name of a King, and that Antipater and his ſonnes ruled all; and that he ſo long would permit and winke at them, till that at the laſt they would make themſelues Kings; for they now did no more ſo much as F pretend themſelues to be Procurators. But leauing that title, they tooke vpon them the digni- ties of Lords and Maſters, without any regard or reuerence towards him; for Herod had put to death a great multitude of Iewes againſt the law, whereas neither by word of mouth, nor by writing, the King had giuen him any ſuch authority: and that Herod, if he were not a King, but a priuate perſon, was to be brought into iudgement, there to anſwer the matter, and ſhew the King a reaſon, and ſatisfie the lawes of his countrey; which permitted no man to be put to death before by law he was conuicted. By theſe perſwaſions Hircanus grew angry: ſo that not concealing his wrath, he cauſed Herod to be ſent for to anſwer the matter: who both for that his father aduerti-ſed him thereto: and becauſe he truſted to the equitie of his cauſe, firſt leauing a Garriſon in Galilee, he repaired vnto the King; and came accompanied with a ſtrong guard, leſt either he ſhould ſeeme to derogate from Hircanus dignity, if he ſhould lead forth many; or that for want of defence, he ſhould expoſe himſelfe to the enuy of his aduerſaries. Sextus Cæſar alſo fearing the yong man leſt any euill ſhould betide him amongſt his enemies, ſent vnto Hircanus, manifeſtly warning him to free Herod from the crime of murther. For which cauſe Hircanus who loued Herod, and was willing ſo to do of his owne accord, did acquite him. Whereupon, he ſuppoſing that he had eſcaped againſt the Kings will, went to Damaſcus vnto Sextus, purpoſing not to obey, if hereafter he were ſent for. Natheleſſe, Hircanus was once againe incited by bad people againſt Herod, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, and that he would enterprize ſomething againſt him: which Hircanus beleeuing, knew not what to doe, ſeeing his enemy more potent then himſelfe.

Hircanus abſolueth Herod.

Hircanus once more incited by the wicked.

Shortly after, Sextus Cæſar proclaimed him Generall of the army, both in Syria and Samaria: ſo that now he was greatly to be feared, not only for that he was highly in fauour with the communality, but alſo for the forces which he cõmanded. So that hereupon Hircanus fel into an extreme feare, verily perſwading himſelfe that Herod with his whole army would preſently come againſt him. Neither was his ſuſpition in vaine: for Herod angry at the pretended crime whereof he was accuſed, came with a great army to Ieruſalem, intending to depoſe Hircanus; which he had effected, had not his father and brother gone forth to meet him, and pacified him, intreating that hee would account that terror (wherein he had put his enemies) and his owne indignation for a ſufficient reuenge, and that he ſhould ſpare the King, by whoſe fauour he came to be ſo potent: adding moreouer, that he ſhould not thinke it a diſdaine that he was called to anſwer his accuſations; but ſeeing that he was acquited of them, he ſhould ſhew himſelfe gratefull to the King. Neither ought he ſo to reuenge the diſcontent he had taken, that he ſhould ſhew himſelfe vnthankfull to him who had ſaued his life. Moreouer, he was to conſider the fortune of warres, together with the cauſe thereof, and thinke that the warres he now pretended, were very vniuſt; bidding him not to be too confident of the victory, being to fight againſt his owne King, who had alwaies bin gracious vnto him, and neuer cruell; onely being as it were vrged thereunto by ſome of his councell, who being meerely enuious, rather to ſatisfie their owne miſlikes, then in regard of his diſgraces, framed a ſhadow of an accuſation. Herod pacified herewith, ſuppoſed it to be ſufficient for him to obtaine the thing he hoped for, to haue ſhewed his forces vnto his nation.

Herod diſſwaded by Antipater from attempting againſt Hircanus.

At this time began ciuill war among the Romanes neere vnto Apamia: for Cæcilius Baſſus, for the loue he bare to Sextus Pompey, ſlue Sextus Cæſar at vnawares, and made himſelfe Gouernour of his army: and other captaines of Cæſars, to reuenge his death, made after Baſſius with all their forces, vnto whom Antipater by his two ſonnes ſent aide both for Cæſars ſake that was ſlaine, as for Cæſars ſake that was yet aliue: for he was an entire friend and well-willer vnto them both, and theſe warres continuing long, Marcus came out of Italy to ſucceed Sextus.

At this time aroſe great and bloody ciuill warres amongſt the Romanes, at ſuch time as Cæſar was traiterouſly ſlaine by the treaſon of Caſſius and Brutus, after he had ruled the Empire three yeeres and ſeuen moneths. By reaſon of which murther their troubles daily increaſed, and the nobility being at variance amongſt themſelues, euery one followed that courſe, that they thought moſt expedient for themſelues. Whereupon Caſſius preſently marched into Syria, to take poſſeſſion of the gouernment of the army which was about Apamia, where hee made Marcus and the legions that were at variance, and Baſſus friends: and raiſing the ſiege from Apamia, and leading the army in his owne perſon, he forced euery city to be tributary: ſo that he grew to exact without meaſure. Whereas therefore he commanded the Iewes to contribute ſeuen hundreth talents; Antipater, who feared his diſpleaſure, appointed his ſonnes, and other of his friends preſently to gather the mony; and eſpecially among the reſt he gaue this charge to one Malichus a friend of his, being by neceſſity enforced thereunto. But Herod firſt of all got Caſſius his fauour, who brought a hundreth talents which he had collected out of Galilee, which was his part or Prouince: for this cauſe Caſſius accounted him as a deare friend. But Antipater (preſently disburſing vnto Caſſius a hundreth talents) ſaued both him and all the reſt of the Cities. Yet Malichus after Caſſius was departed, did no more remember how beneficiall Antipater had beene vnto him, but oftentimes did treacherouſly lye in wait for to murther Antipater, who hindred and withſtood his villanous pretence; notwithſtanding that himſelfe had often confeſſed that Antipater had ſaued his life. Antipater, fearing both his power and ſubtiltie, paſſed ouer the riuer Iordan to gather an army that he might reuenge thoſe treacheries.

Malichus forgetfull of Antipaters kindneſſe.

B But Malichus being diſcouered, by his impudencie ouercame Antipaters ſonnes: for through many oathes and excuſes, hee wonne Phaſaelus chiefe of the garriſon in Ieruſalem, and Herod alſo who was maſter of the armory, that they ſhould bee a meanes to reconcile him to Antipater. Whereupon, Antipater intreating Marcus (who was Generall of the armie in Syria, and had determined to kill him) he was ſaued. The reaſon that Marcus would haue put him to death, was becauſe Malichus ſought to make an alteration.

Antipater gathereth an army againſt Malichus.

Now Cæſar being young, and Antonius warring againſt Caſſius and Brutus; Brutus and Caſſius hauing gathered an army in Syria, in conſideration that Herod had ſtood them in ſtead where need required, they made him Procurator of all Syria; giuing him a band of horſemen and footmen. Moreouer, Caſſius promiſed him that if the warres had a happy end, hee would make him C King of Iudæa. But it ſo came to paſſe, that the power and expectation which all men had of Herod, was the cauſe of Antipater his fathers death. For Malichus being hereby put in feare, hired one of the Kings officers for a certaine ſumme of mony to poiſon Antipater, by which meanes he dyed, being thus vniuſtly rewarded for his good will toward wretched Malichus. He was a worthy man and fit to gouerne, who had recouered the kingdome being loſt, for Hircanus. Malichus (perceiuing that the people was incenſed againſt him, becauſe they ſuſpected that hee had poyſoned Antipater) pacified and moderated their diſpleaſure by denying the fact; yet to the intent he might be ſtronger, he gathered about him a guard of armed men: for he thought that Herod would not let the matter ſlip ſo, but that he would preſently come with an army to reuenge his fathers death. But by the counſell of his brother Phaſaelus (who ſent him word that he ſhould D not openly be reuenged vpon Malichus, leſt a ſedition might ariſe among the people) he patiently permitted it ſo to be, and ſuffred Malichus to purge himſelfe, and permitted him to be freed from ſuſpicion, and celebrated a moſt ſolemne funerall for his father: which done, hee went vnto Samaria, and appeaſed the ſedition, wherewithall the Citie was diſquieted. After this, he returned to Ieruſalem, intending in that place to celebrate the feſtiuitie, ſending certaine of his armed men before him, and appointing the reſt to accompany him. But Malichus, who feared this approach of his, had ſolicited Hircanus to giue order, that no ſtrangers ſhould intermingle themſelues among the people who were at that time purified.

Herod intendeth to reuenge his fathers death.

But Herod, contemning both him that commanded, and his commiſſion, entred the Citie by night: whereupon Malichus once more came vnto him, and wept for Antipater. Herod, although E he could very hardly bridle his diſpleaſure, yet diſſembled he the ſame: and ſent letters vnto Caſſius, wherein he complained of his fathers death: the memory of whoſe hate being refreſhed by this offence, he writ againe vnto Herod, willing him to reuenge his fathers death: which that he might the better effect, he ſecretly commanded the Captaines of his Regiment that they ſhould aſſiſt Herod. Now for that after the ſurprizall of Laodicea, all the beſt of the citie came to Herod, bringing gifts and crownes, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended reuenge. Now Malichus, ſuſpecting that Herod would worke reuenge at Tyre, purpoſed ſecretly to get away his ſon, who was there a pledge, and he himſelfe purpoſed to flye into Iudæa: But deſpaire of his owne ſafetie vrged him to greater matters; for hee hoped to incite the Iewes to take armes againſt the Romanes, for that Caſſius was now buſie in the warres againſt Antonius: ſo that he thought he F might eaſily depoſe Hircanus, and ſo make himſelfe King. But he was preuented by the deſtinies: for Herod ſuſpecting his purpoſe, inuited him and Hircanus to ſupper: at which time he made a ſhew as though he had ſent one of his ſeruants, to cauſe a banquet to be prepared, but indeed he ſent him to the Captaines to foretell them that they might lie in wait for Malichus: who remembring what charge Caſſius gaue them, came forth of the Citie vnto the ſhore next adioyning vnto the towne, all armed with ſwords; where compaſſing Malichus round about, they killed him with many wounds. Hircanus hereat aſtoniſhed, fell in a ſwoune, and being ſcarcely come to himſelfe, he demanded who killed Malichus? CHAP. X.

How HEROD was accused and reuenged.

AFTER Cassius was departed from Syria, there arose another sedition amongst them in Ierusalem: for Fœlix came with an armie against Phasaelus, thinking so to bee reuenged vpon Herod for killing Malichus. It chanced that Herod at that time was at Damascus with Fabius a Romane Captaine, who comming to assist Phasaelus, by the way fell sicke; so that he could not succour him: but it so fell out, that Phasaelus without any helpe, did of himselfe ouercome Fœlix, and therwithall reproued Hircanus as vngratefull, who had both fauoured Fœlix, and suffered Malichus his brother to take and keepe his castles (for already had he seized many of them, and especially one of greatest strength called Massada) yet all these did not protect him from the violence of Herod, who was no sooner recouered of his sickenesse, but presently he tooke all the rest, and Massada: and at Hircanus humble sute, permitted him to depart from thence. He also chased Marion the tyrant of the Tyrians out of Galilee, who occupied 3. castles in that country: as for all the Tyrians that he took, he spared their liues, and sent some away with rewards; wherby he got the good will of the city, and the hatred of the Tyrant. This Marion was made Tyrant of Tyria by Cassius, who through the meanes of such like instruments had gotten into his hand all Syria: & Marion for the hatred he bare to Herod, tooke with him Antigonus, Aristobulus his son: & by Fabius his meanes, whom Antigonus had gained vnto himselfe for mony, he also got Ptolomæus to assist him in this expedition. Now Ptolomæus, who was father in law to Antigonus, furnished him with all necessaries: Herod likewise preparing himselfe against them, gaue them battell in the entrance into Iudæa, and got the victory: & hauing put Antigonus to flight, he returned into Ierusalem, where he was honoured by all men for his desert in that victory, so that euen they that before despised him, by reason of his affinity newly cõtracted with Hircanus, sought his friendship & familiarity. This Herod long before this time had a wife which was a noble woman of that country, named Doris, & had by her a son named Antipater: but he then married Mariamme, Alexanders daughter, who was Aristobulus his son, & Hircanus his neece, by reason whereof he came to be familiar with the king. But when Cassius was slaine neere vnto Philippi, Cæsar departed into Italy, & Antonius into Asia: at which time the chiefe of the Iewes came and accused Phasaelus and Herod, alledging that they by force got vnto themselues the rule & disposition of the country, & left Hircanus onely the bare name of a king. But Herod being thẽ present, so won & wrought himselfe into Antonius fauor by a great sum of money, that he permitted not his enemies to speak one word more; who thereupon returned home. Afterward, a hundreth men of the most honourable amongst the Iewes, repaired to Daphne neer Antiochia vnto Antonius (now doting on the loue of Cleopatra) who being chosen frõ amongst the rest, because of their eloquence & nobility of birth, propounded an accusation against the two brethren. Messala presented himselfe to returne thẽ answer, being assisted by Hircanus by reason of the affinity that was betweene him and Herod. Antonius hauing heard both parties, demanded of Hircanus whom he thought to be the fittest to gouerne their Common-wealth: who answered, Herod and his brethren. Whereat Antonius was exceeding glad (for he had bin their fathers guest, and was most courteously entertained by Antipater, when he came with Gabinius into Iudæa) and thereupon he made them both Tetrarchs, leauing vnto them the rule of all Iudæa: which when the Iewes Embassadours misliked, he tooke 15 of them and put them in prison, where he almost killed them, and reiected and derided the rest: whereupon there arose greater tumults amongst them in Ierusalem. At last the Iewes sent another Embassage of a thousand men vnto Tyre, where Antonius soiourned with an intent to come to Ierusalem with violence. Antonius hearing their exclaimes, sent out the Magistrates of Tyre against them, commanding them to kill all they could catch of the Iewes, charging them also to confirme their authority, whom he himselfe had constituted Tetrarchs. But Herod & Hircanus went before thẽ toward the Sea shore, admonishing them earnestly to be cõtented, lest they by this their indiscreet proceeding should become not onely the cause of their owne deaths, but also of war against their country: but for that they would not be reclaimed by these admonitions, Antonius sent out certaine armed men, who killed many of them, and wounded the rest. Hircanus after this disaster both caused the dead to be buried, & the wounded to be cured: notwithstanding all this, they that escaped would not containe themselues in peace, but they so troubled the city, that Antonius in his displeasure slew those that he had in hold.

CHAP. XI.

The yeere of the world, 3923. before Christs birth, 41.

TWO yeeres after this, Barzapharnes Gouernour of the Parthians, accompanied with Pacorus the Kings sonne, seized vpon Syria, and Lysanias who succeeded his father Ptolomæus, sonne of Minæus, promising a thousand talents and fiue hundreth women, perswaded him to put Antigonus in possession of the kingdome of Iudæa, and depose Hircanus. Pacorus induced by these promises, went himselfe along the Sea-coast, giuing commandement to Barzapharnes to passe thorow the midst of the countrey; but amongst the rest of the places bordering on the Sea, the Tyrians would not receiue Pacorus (notwithstanding that the Citizens of Ptolemais and Sidon had giuen him entertainment) wherefore he gaue part of his horsemen vnto one who was the Kings Butler, called Pacorus, as himselfe was; commanding him to passe into Iudæa, and learne what their enemies meant to doe, and to helpe Antigonus where need required. Who as they wasted the countrey about Carmelus, many Iewes came of their owne accord and ioyned with Antigonus, shewing themselues very prompt to fight: for which cause he sent them before to take a place called Drymos; where hauing fought with his enemies and put them to flight, he pursued them with all speed as farre as Ierusalem: and his number being augmented, he came vnto the Kings house. But Hircanus and Phasaelus met them with a strong company, and fought with them in the market-place: where the enemies were forced to flye, and part of them were by Herod shut vp in the Temple; and he appointed sixty men to keep them, which he placed in the houses next adioyning; but the people bearing a grudge to his two brethren, burnt them with fire: whereat Herod being angry (for that his men were consumed with fire) set vpon the people, and killed a great many of them, and euery houre one laid wait for another: so that euery day some was murthered. Now the feast of Pentecost drawing nigh, all places about the Tẽple, & all the whole city was filled with people of the country, wherof the most part was armed, and Phasaelus kept the walles, and Herod with a small company kept the Kings palace, who assaulting their enemies vpon a sudden as they were in the suburbs, kild a great many of them, and put all the rest to flight: part of them he couped vp in the citie, others he shut in the Temple, & the rest betweene the vttermost Rampire. Whereupon Antigonus requested that Pacorus might come and conclude a peace betwixt them. Phasaelus moued by these his prayers, receiued the Parthian into the citie, and entertained him into his house, accompanied with fiue hundreth horsemen, who came vnder a pretence to make peace; but in effect he resorted thither to help Antigonus: he craftily conspiring against Phasaelus, perswaded him to repaire vnto Barzapharnes as an Embassador to treat a peace; notwithstanding that Herod altogether disswaded him, willing him to kill the Traitor, and not to trust his subtiltie: adding that the Parthians were naturally vnfaithfull.

Pacorus departing out of the citie, tooke Hircanus with him that he might be the lesse suspected, and leauing some horsemen with Herod named * Eleutheri, he followed Phasaelus with the rest. When they came neere vnto Galilee, they found the inhabitants at variance and vp in armes, and met with Barzapharnes (who craftily with pretence of courtesie and friendship hid his treachery) who after he had bestowed gifts vpon them, and that they were retired, laid an ambush for them: whereof they had intelligence at such time as they came to a place of the Sea-coast named Ecdippon. For in this place they vnderstood of the thousand talents that were promised, and how that Antigonus had giuen the Parthians more then fiue hundreth women of those that were amongst them, and that oftentimes they had beene laid wait for, and that they had beene lately taken, but that delay was made till such time as Herod was surprized in Ierusalem, for feare lest he hearing what was become of them, might prouide for himselfe. Now they might perceiue that these were not only words: for they might behold their Keepers not farre off, yet would not Phasaelus forsake Hircanus, notwithstanding that Offilius often exhorted him to flye (vnto whom Saramalla the richest among the Syrians had declared all the plat-forme of their treason:) but he chose rather to goe vnto Barzapharnes, and to vpbraid him to his face that he had treacherously laid wait for him: but especially for that in regard of mony he had suffred himselfe to be corrupted, whereas he himselfe would haue giuen more for his life & libertie, then Antigonus had done for the kingdome. At these words the Parthian with othes & protestations craftily freed himself frõ suspicion, & no sooner repaired he to Pacorus, but presently the Parthians, who stayed ſtayed behinde, and had charge ſo to doe, laid hands on Phaſaelus and Hircanus, who openly exclaimed againſt their falſehood and periury.

The yeere of the world, 3924. before Chriſts birth, 40.

In the meane time a Butler was ſent out for that purpoſe, who ſought to ſurprize Herod, & by ſome ſtratagem to toule him out of the Citie, who wrought by all the meanes he could, according as he was inſtructed. But Herod, who was alwaies wont to miſtruſt the perfidious practices of barbarous nations, being certaine that thoſe letters which diſcouered the treaſons, were falne into the enemies hands, would not goe foorth; though Pacorus pretended a iuſt cauſe, inciting him to ride out and meet them that brought the letters: wherein was contained neither the taking of Phaſaelus, nor the treaſons, but onely what Phaſaelus had done. But long before this, Herod by others vnderſtood, that his brother Phaſaelus was taken; and Mariamme a very wiſe woman, Hircanus daughter, with many intreaties perſwaded Herod not to goe forth: but that hee ſhould beware how he truſted himſelf to the mercy of that barbarous people, who did now as it were openly aſſault him. Whileſt Pacorus was conſulting with his accomplices how he might priuily effect his treaſons (ſeeing it was not poſſible openly to circumuent a man of ſo great wiſedome) Herod in the night time, whileſt his enemies neither knew nor ſuſpected his intent, tooke his neereſt kinsfolke and fled into Idumæa: which being once knowne, the Parthians followed him. For which cauſe, he made his mother, his brethren, and the young maiden deſpouſed, and her mother and youngeſt brother to keepe on their iourney, and he with his ſeruants warily aſſaulted the Parthians; and hauing in euery aſſault killed a great number of them, he haſted towards the Caſtle of Maſſada, and in his retreat ſuſtained more harme by the Iewes, then by the Parthians: who as they had bin alwaies troubleſome, ſo now ſome threeſcore furlongs from the towne, ſet vpon him; where Herod obtaining the victory, killed a great many of them, and in remembrance of that valiant act, he builded vpon that place a moſt rich palace for the King, and erected there a moſt ſtrong tower, which by his owne name he called Herodium. And when he fled, many ioyned with him: but when he came to Threſa, a towne of Idumæa, his brother Ioſeph met him, and perſwaded him to leſſen the number of his followers: for Maſſada would not receiue ſuch a multitude (for the number of the multitude was aboue nine thouſand:) for which cauſe Herod according to his counſell diſmiſſed thoſe that were vnfit for his turne, and ſent them into Idumæa, giuing them neceſſaries for their iourney. As for thoſe that were choſen men and fit for his purpoſe, hee retained them with him, and ſo was he receiued into the Caſtle: where leauing eight hundred ſouldiers to defend the women, and prouiſion ſufficient for thoſe that were within, he himſelfe went vnto Petra, a citie of Arabia.

Now the Parthians at Ieruſalem began to ſack the houſes of them that were fled, & the Kings palace; they onely abſtained from Hircanus money, which did amount to more then three hundred talents: as for other mens goods they found not ſo much as they expected; for Herod long before that time ſuſpecting the infidelitie of the Parthians, had carried all his riches & iewels into Idumæa; & euery one of his followers did the like. When the Parthians had taken the ſpoile, they were ſo impious that they left no place of the whole countrey free from their tyrannous war. They deſtroyed the citie of Marſa alſo, and bound Phaſaelus & Hircanus, and deliuered them to Antigonus to be ſcourged, who preſently with his teeth bit off Hircanus eares, to the end that if by ſome alteration he chanced hereafter to get looſe, he might be no more high Prieſt: for none might offer ſacrifice that wanted any member of his body. But Phaſaelus his fortitude preuented the crueltie of Antigonus; who hauing neither weapon nor his hands at libertie, beat out his owne braines againſt a ſtone and dyed, demonſtrating himſelfe by that act, to be the true brother of Herod, and that Hircanus had degenerated: he dyed manfully by a worthy death, and anſwerable to ſo famous a life. Yet ſome reported that he recouered after that hurt, and that Antigonus ſent a Chirurgion vnder pretence to cure the wound, who filled the ſame wtth venemous medicines, and ſo killed him. Well, be it as it was, it was in him a gallant reſolution.

It is reported likewiſe, that vnderſtanding before his death by the meanes of a certaine woman that Herod was eſcaped, he ſpake theſe words: Now I ſhall die with a courage, who leaue behind me one that will take vengeance of my enemies, and ſo he dyed. Although the Parthians had not yet receiued the women (which was the chiefe thing they lookt for) yet leauing them, they eſtabliſhed Antigonus in Ieruſalem, and led Hircanus priſoner into Parthia. But Herod with all ſpeede haſted into Arabia, as if his brother had beene yet aliue, to the intent he might borrow money of the King of Arabia, wherewith onely he hoped that the crueltie of thoſe barbarous Parthians might be mitigated towards Phaſaelus: for his opinion was that although the Arabian had now forgot his fathers friendſhip, and were hard hearted, yet at leaſt he would lend him

Phaſaelus words before he dyed.

A him money, ſeeing it was to redeeme his brother, whoſe ſonne he meant to leaue in pawne for it. For Herod tooke with him a ſon of his brothers into Arabia that was ſeuen yeeres old, and purpoſed to haue giuen three hundreth talents for his ranſome, and had made the Tyrians interceſſors for him to the Parthians: but fortune preuented his endeuours, ſo that his loue and care for his brother preuailed nothing. He found alſo that the Arabians had now caſt away the league of amitie: for Malichus their King ſent to him as he was yet in the way, charging him with all ſpeed to depart out of his dominions, framing an excuſe that the Parthians had ſent Embaſſadors vnto him, to requeſt him to driue him out of his countrey; but indeed the cauſe was, that he would not repay that which Antipater had deſerued, nor recompence his ſonnes now com-
B fortleſſe, for thoſe good turnes that he had receiued at their fathers hands: and thoſe who counſelled him to this, were ſuch as offered to forſweare thoſe ſummes, which Antipater had put them in truſt with, who were the chiefeſt men about him. For which cauſe, Herod perceiuing the Arabians to be his foes, for that which he thought would haue procured him friendſhip, anſwered the meſſenger according as griefe mooued him, and tooke his iourney towards Ægypt: and the firſt night he lodged in a countrey temple, to the intent that thoſe of his company that were behinde him might ouertake him. The next day comming to Rhinocolura, his brothers death was told him; where, after he had there mourned his fill, he went forward.

Animaters to impudence. Herod perceiueth the Arabians to be his enemies.

Now the King of Arabia (though too late) repented himſelfe of that which he had done to Herod, and ſent ſpeedy meſſengers after him, to will him to returne, repenting himſelfe that hee
C had ſo iniuriouſly intreated him. When Herod was come to Peluſium, the watchmen of the citie would not permit him to paſſe: for which cauſe he himſelfe in perſon went to the gouernours, who reuerencing the fame and dignitie of the man, conducted him to Alexandria; whither he no ſooner reſorted, but Cleopatra receiued him very honourably, intending to make him the Generall of Her army which Shee was preparing at that preſent. But he neither regarding the offers and requeſt of the Queene, nor yet diſcouraged by the hard winter ſeaſon, nor the dangers of the Seas, tooke his iourney towards Rome; and being in great danger of ſhipwracke neere vnto Pamphilia, both he and the reſt of the paſſengers were inforced to caſt away the moſt part of their loading: with much adoe he arriued ſafe at Rhodes, which had beene ſore moleſted by Caſſius warres; there was he intertained by certaine of his friends, Ptolomæus and Saphinius: and D although his money grew ſcant, yet there he builded a great galley with three rankes of oares, and in it (being accompanied with his friends) he ſayled to Brunduſium, and from thence went preſently to Rome. Where firſt of all (in regard of familiaritie betweene his father and him) he went to Antonius, declaring vnto him both his owne calamitie, and the miſerable deſolation of the whole countrey; and how leauing his deareſt friends beſieged in a Caſtle, himſelfe in humble manner through the ſtormy winter ſeas was come vnto him, humbly crauing ſuccour at his hands. Whereupon Antonius compaſſionating his calamitie, and remembring his familiaritie with Antipater, and contemplating the vertue of Herod who ſtood before him, determined vpon the preſent to make him King of the Iewes, whom before he himſelfe had made Tetrarch: for E he loued not Herod ſo well, but he hated Antigonus as much: for he held him both for a ſeditious perſon, and for an enemy to the Romanes. Now to the accompliſhing of this, hee found Cæſar farre more ready then himſelfe, who called to minde the ſeruice that Antipater did in Ægypt vnder his father, and his entertainment and friendſhip in all things: and beſide all theſe, he was wrought and wonne by Herods courage and valour. For which cauſe, hee procured the Senate to be aſſembled; at which time Meſſala, and after him Aratinus in the preſence of Herod recounted his fathers deſerts and fidelitie towards the Romanes, declaring Antigonus to be an enemy; not only becauſe that not long before he had reuolted, but for that now laſtly in deſpite of the Romanes he had by the aſſiſtance of the Parthians vſurped the kingdome. Vpon which conſiderations the Senate being mooued, and Antonius affirming it to be expedient for the Romane warres, that Herod ſhould be created King, the whole Senate condeſcended: and after the Senate
F was diſmiſſed, Antonius and Cæſar went forth with Herod betweene them, and the Conſuls went before accompanied with other Magiſtrates to offer ſacrifice, and to regiſter the decree of the Senate in the Capitoll. And Antonius feaſted Herod the firſt day of his raigne.

Of Herods warre after he returned from Rome to recouer Ieruſalem, and againſt the theeues.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 23. Antigonus getteth Maſſada.

AT this time Antigonus beſieged thoſe that were left in the caſtle of Maſſada, who had great ſtore of victuals; and wanted nothing but water. For which cauſe Ioſephus Herods brother purpoſed to flye vnto the Arabians with two hundreth of his deareſt friends, for that hee had intelligence that Malichus repented him that hee had giuen Herod no better entertainment. Yea hee had forſaken the Caſtle, had not great ſtore of raine falne that very night, wherein he intended to flye: for the welles and ciſternes being now filled with water, there was no cauſe to flye: ſo that voluntarily iſſuing out of the Caſtle, he aſſaulted Antigonus ſouldiers, and killed very many of them; ſometime in open warre, and ſometime by policy: yet fought they not alwaies with fortunate ſucceſſe, but returned ſometimes with loſſe. In the meane time, Ventidius (who was Generall of that Romane army which was ſent to expulſe the Parthians out of Syria) after he had repulſed them, reſorted into Iudæa, vnder pretence to ſuccour Ioſeph and the reſt that were beſieged, but in effect to get Antigonus money. When as therefore he drew neere vnto Ieruſalem and had receiued the money he looked for, he departed with the greateſt part of his army, leauing Silo behinde him with a few to colour his pretence: and Antigonus hoping for a ſecond ſupply from the Parthians, fee'd Silo not to moleſt him for the preſent, ſeeing he was in great poſſibilitie. By this time Herod hauing ſayled from Italy to Ptolemais, and gathered a great army of ſtrangers and his owne countreymen together, came into Galilee againſt Antigonus, being aſſiſted with the forces of Ventidius and Silo, whom Delius who was ſent from Antonius, perſwaded to eſtabliſh Herod in his kingdome. But Ventidius was buſie in appeaſing the broyles that the Parthians had made in the cities, and Silo was corrupted by Antigonus: yet did not Herod want ayde, for euery day the further he marched into the countrey, the more his army increaſed, for all Galilee (a very few excepted) yeelded vnto him. Whereupon he purpoſed firſt of all to goe to Maſſada, to deliuer his friends that were there beſieged, but Ioppe hindered his purpoſe; which for that it was an enemy towne, hee thought it beſt to take it before he went further, leſt that whileſt he was going to Ieruſalem, his enemies ſhould haue a place behinde him to flye vnto. Now Silo ioyned armies with Herod, reioycing that he had found occaſion to reſiſt, becauſe he was perſecuted by the Iewes; whom Herod with a looſe wing of his army and a ſmall company of men, terrified, and preſently put to flight, and ſaued Silo alſo who had much adoe to make reſiſtance againſt them. This done and Ioppe taken, hee haſted to Maſſada, and the people of the countrey (ſome of them for his fathers ſake, other-ſome for his owne, and many for both) ioyned themſelues vnto him: many alſo came vnto him for hope, becauſe hee was now King; ſo that now he had a very puiſſant army: but Antigonus hindred his iourney, by planting certaine ambuſhes in places conuenient where Herod was to paſſe, and yet for all this he little harmed him.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 24. Herod againſt Antigonus.

Herod intendeth, after he hath taken Maſſada and Ioppe, to beſiege Ieruſalem.

Herod hauing eaſily taken Maſſada, and reſcued his friends from thence, he went to Ieruſalem; where both Siloes ſouldiers, and many of the Citie came and followed him, being now terrified with the greatneſſe of his forces: there pitching their tents at the Weſt ſide of the towne, they that guarded that part aſſaulted them with darts and arrowes; and others iſſuing by troupes foorth of the Citie, aſſaulted the forefront of the army. Whereupon Herod cauſed one to goe about the walls of the Citie, and to proclaime how that he was come for the good of the whole Citie, and that he would not take reuenge of any, though hee were his open enemy, and that he would pardon euen them that had beene moſt ſeditious. But when Antigonus his followers with loud exclamations hindred the cryers voyces from being heard, leſt any man ſhould alter his minde: Herod preſently commanded his men to beat the enemies off from the wall, who with their arrowes ſpeedily forced all that were in the towers to flye. At this time Silo was detected to haue bin hired with money: for he ſollicited many ſouldiers to cry out, that they wanted all things; and to aske money and victuals, and to craue to be diſmiſſed and ſent into ſome place of opportunitie, there to abide during the winter, nay he himſelfe ſought to be gone. But Herod went vnto the Captaines that ſerued vnder Silo, and called many of the ſouldiers together, requeſting them not to forſake him at that exigent, whom Cæſar, Antonius, and the whole Senate as they knew had ſent thither, promiſing them that within one day he would relieue all their neceſſities. When he had thus entreated them, himſelfe went about the fields, and brought them ſo

A so much prouision that he cut off all Siloes excuses: and forecasting lest hereafter there should be any want, he sent letters to Samaria (for that citie about this time had rendred it selfe vnto him) willing them to bring victuals, and wine and oyle, and cattell vnto Iericho. Antigonus hearing this, presently sent certaine of his men to lye in ambush in the fields, and suddenly to set vpon those that came for prouision, and kill them, and so hinder them from carrying any victuals to the campe: who obeying his commandement, went with a great number of souldiers to Iericho, and placed themselues vpon the mountaines, with an intent to espy if any body carryed prouision to the army. In the meane time Herod rested not; for taking with him ten companies (fiue of the Romanes, and fiue of the Iewes, amongst whom were mixed three hundreth that were hired, B and besides them a few horsemen) he came to Iericho, where he found the citie without inhabitants, and 500 with their wiues and families had placed themselues vpon the tops of the mountaines; whom when he had surprized, he permitted them to depart. But the Romanes brake into the citie, and sacked it, where they found the houses stored with all manner of riches: and the King leauing a garrison at Iericho, returned. He sent likewise the Romane souldiers to the cities which were on his side, to wit, Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria, that they might abide there till winter was past. Antigonus also through Silo his meanes (whom he by money had made his friend) obtained that a part of his army might (during the winter time) abide at Lydda, for Antonius sake: and the Romanes being now discharged from the warres, abounded in all things.

The Romanes got a great prey.

All this time Herod was not idle, for accompanied with two thousand footmen, and fiue hun-C dreth horse, he went about Idumæa, & sent also his brother Ioseph, lest by Antigonus his meanes the people should rebell. And he himselfe hauing carried his mother and the rest of his kindred, whom he tooke from Massada, into Samaria; and hauing placed them where no danger might betide them; himselfe went into Galilee, to subdue that part of the country, which as yet was not in his hands, and to expell from thence the garrisons left by Antigonus. And when he was come to Sephoris, notwithstanding it shew mightily, he easily took it; for the garrison before he assaulted it fled; and finding there great store of prouision, he refreshed his souldiers, which now with winter weather were sore tyred, and then sent them against the theeues, that lay lurking in dens and caues; who making often incursions vpon the country, molested the inhabitants no lesse then if they had bin an army of enemies. And sending before three companies of footmen, and one D troupe of horsemen, into a village called Arbela, himselfe fortie dayes after came thither with the whole army. For all this the theeues feared him not, but arming themselues, came to meet him, trusting to their experience in warlike affaires, and their owne desperate courage: and ioyning battell, the right wing of their battell put the left wing of Herods to flight: but he with his right wing presently succoured them, and recalled his men that fled; and rushing violently vpon his enemies, he a little asswaged the forces of the enemy, till at last the forefront of their battell, not able to stand any longer, fled. Herod pursued them euen vnto Iordan, and killed many of them; those that escaped fled ouer the riuer; and thus he freed Galilee from that feare, saue that yet he had left some lurking in the caues, and therefore he was constrained there to make a longer abode. Wherefore first of all he gaue the souldiers the fruit of their labours, and distri-E buted to euery one of them an hundreth and fiftie drachmes of siluer, and vnto the Captaines more, and so sent them where they should passe the winter. Also he writ vnto his youngest brother Pheroras to prouide necessaries for them in the market; and to build a wall about the Castle of Alexandrium: which he performed.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 24. Herod taketh the citie of Sephoris.

Herod fetteth forth against the theeues.

In the meane-while Antonius passed the time about Athens, and Ventidius sent for Silo and Herod to assist him in the warre against the Parthians, charging them, that before their comming they should settle the estate of the Iewes. Now Herod gladly & willingly sent Silo vnto Ventidius: and in the meane time he with his army went against the theeues in the caues. These caues were in very steepe mountaines, so that there was no way to come vnto them, saue onely by crooked and very narrow passages: and these mountaines were all rocks of stone cleane throughout, han-F ging ouer the vallies; so that the King a great while was doubtfull what to doe, seeing the place was so difficult to come to. At last, Herod deuised a way scarcely heard of before; for he put the valiantest of all his men into coffers, and so let them downe into the edge of the caues, and they killed the theeues and their families, and cast fire at them that resisted. And Herod seeking to saue some of them, caused a cryer to bid them come vnto him: but there was not one that willingly came vnto him, and those that were forced chose rather to dye, then be his captiues. So that an old man hauing seuen sons and a wife, who all requested that they might goe forth to the King, and saue their liues, killed them all after this manner: Himself stood before the doore of the caue, and bade them come forth one by one, and alwaies as one of them came forth, hee killed him. And Herod being in a place where he might behold this spectacle, being mooued with compassion, stretched forth his hand and requested him to spare his children: but hee beeing nothing mooued to compassion by Herods words, vpbraided Herods base minde: and hauing butchered his sonnes, he also killed his wife, and casting the dead bodies downe into the vallies, finally he cast himselfe likewise downe headlong.

Herod hauing thus taken the caues, and slaine those that were in them, leauing a part of his army, so much as he thought might suffice to represse any that should attempt any rebellion, and making Ptolomæus chiefe ouer that part; returned into Samaria, carrying with him three thousand footmen, and sixe hundreth horsemen against Antigonus. After whose departure those that were accustomed to trouble Galilee, and molest it, hauing now (as they thought) opportunitie, assaulted Ptolomæus at vnawares and killed him: and wasted the country, retiring themselues into marish grounds and secret places. Which when Herod vnderstood, hee presently came to succour the country, and killed the most part of the enemies; and hauing taken all the castles by force, he exacted a hundreth talents for recompence of that reuolt to be payed by the cities. Now the Parthians being put to flight, and Pacorus slaine, Ventidius being willed thereto by letters from Antonius, sent vnto Herod a thousand horsemen, and two legions of footmen to assist him against Antigonus. Now Antigonus writ letters to the Generall of the foresaid company named Machæra, desiring him to helpe him; and complaining that Herod iniured him, promised him a summe of money. But he thinking it not best to forsake him he was sent to succour, especially seeing that Herod would giue more, would not be suborned by him: yet counterfeiting himselfe to be Antigonus his friend, meaning vnder that pretence to creepe into the knowledge of his secrets; which not regarding Herods counsell he went to discouer, notwithstanding that Herod dissuaded him from it: But Antigonus perceiuing his intent, shut him out of the Citie, and like an enemy draue him away from the walles, till such time as Machæra was ashamed of that he had done; and so returned to Amathunt vnto Herod. And being in a rage that things fell out against his expectation, he killed all the Iewes he found, not respecting whether they fauoured Herod or Antigonus. Herod hereat was mooued, and thought to be reuenged vpon Machæra as vpon an enemy; yet he bridled himselfe and hasted to Antonius to let him vnderstand Machæras crueltie. Machæra remembring how he had offended, followed the King, and with many entreaties besought him to be friends, and obtained it. Yet Herod kept on his iourney to Antonius, and hearing that he was now with a great armie besieging Samosata (which was a very strong Citie neere vnto Euphrates) he made the more haste; thinking it now a fit time to shew his vertue, and that hereby he might winne Antonius fauour the more. So soone as hee came to Antonius hee ended the siege, killing a great number of enemies, and had for his labour a great part of the spoile: and Antonius though before hee admired his vertue; yet then was his opinion encreased, so that hee had a greater hope of his honour and attaining to the kingdome. So Antigonus was constrained to render the Citie.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the death of IOSEPH: how HEROD besieged Ierusalem: and how ANTIGONVS was slaine.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 25.

IN the meane season Herods affaires in Iudæa went backward: for hee left his brother Ioseph Gouernour of all, commanding him to doe nothing against Antigonus till his returne. For he little trusted to Machæras helpe, because of the parts hee had played before. But Ioseph vnderstanding his brother to bee farre off, not regarding what charge was left him, went to Iericho accompanied with fiue companies which Machæra sent with him, thinking now in haruest time to haue taken away their corne: but being assaulted by the enemy vpon the mountaines and in difficult places, himselfe was there slaine, shewing himselfe in that fight a worthy and valiant man: and there was not one left aliue of all the Romane souldiers; for they were all newly gathered out of Syria, and they had no old souldiers amongst them to assist them who were ignorant in warfare. Antigonus not contented with the victory, became such a tyrant, that he caused the dead corps of Ioseph to be scourged: and hauing the dead bodies in his power, hee cut off Iosephs head, although Pheroras his brother offered fiftie talents to redeeme the same.

Antigonus crueltie against Iosephs carcasse.

After Antigonus had obtained this victory, there was such a change in Galilee, that those who

A who fauoured him, tooke the chiefeſt of Herods fauourites, and drowned them in a pond. Alſo there aroſe a great change in Idumæa; where Machæra repaired the wals of a certaine caſtle called Githa. All this while Herod heard nothing of the newes; for after Samoſata was taken, Antonius made Soſius Gouernour of Syria, leauing order with him, that hee ſhould helpe Herod againſt Antigonus, and ſo he departed into Egypt. Soſius ſent two companies of Souldiers with Herod into Iudæa to helpe him, and he himſelfe with the reſt of the army followed. When Herod was at Antiochia neere Daphne, his brothers death was manifeſted vnto him in a dreame: And whileſt he was troubled thus, ſo that he leapt out of his bed, euen at the ſame inſtant the meſſengers who brought tydings of his death, entred into the houſe: and weeping a little for griefe, B as it were deferring his ſorrow till another time, he went towards his enemies; ſo that he haſted aboue his ſtrength. When hee came to Libanus, hee tooke eight hundreth inhabitants of that mountaine to helpe him, and ioyned vnto them one of the Romane legions; and not expecting the day-time, with them he entred into Galilee, and meeting with his enemies, he forced them to flye vnto the place from whence they came: and euery day he aſſaulted their Caſtle: But before he could take it, being wearied with cruell winter, he was conſtrained to lead his army into the next village. Within a few dayes his number being increaſed by one other legion which Antonius ſent, he put his enemies in ſuch a feare, that they in the night time fled and forſooke the Caſtle. And now he haſted to Iericho to bee reuenged vpon thoſe that killed his brother: where there befell him a moſt ſtrange accident, from the which being againſt all hope deliuered, C he perſwaded himſelfe that God bare an eſpeciall loue vnto him. For when many Nobles that night had ſupped with him, ſupper being ended, and euery one being gone forth, incontinently the houſe wherein hee ſupt fell downe: Herod tooke this as a Præſagium both of the dangers and proſperous ſucceſſe he was to haue in his warres. And the next morning early he remooued from thence, and about 6000. of the enemies deſcending from the mountaines, aſſaulted the vantguard, but they durſt not ioyne battell with the Romanes, but moleſted them ſtanding afarre off with ſtones and darts, and they wounded many: ſo that alſo Herod himſelfe paſſing along, was wounded in the ſide with a dart. Antigonus deſirous to ſhew himſelfe moſt potent, as well in multitude of men, as alſo in courage, ſent Pappus a friend of his, with an army into Samaria, who there got the victory of Machæra. Herod went about the enemies countrey and tooke there D fiue townes, and deſtroyed two thouſand of the inhabitants, and firing the houſes, he returned to his army neere vnto a village called Cana.

Herod certified of his brothers death in a dreame.

Herods dining roome fell after he had forſaken it, and gone to bed.

Euery day there came flocking vnto him a very great number of Iewes, both from Iericho and from other parts of the countrey, ſome of them hating Antigonus, other ſome louing Herod for his valiant deeds: for many without any reaſon deſired an alteration. Whileſt thus he haſted to fight, Pappus with his men neither fearing the multitude, nor ſtrengh of their enemies, came fiercely vpon them, and offered battell. The battell being begun, the others a while abſtained, onely Herod remembring his brothers death, ventured more then the reſt, to the end to bee reuenged vpon them that were the authors thereof: and ſo he eaſily ouercame the enemies army; and ſtill aſſaulting the freſh men, hee put them all to flight. There was a mighty ſlaughter: for E many being forced to flye into the village from whence they came, he purſued them and ſlew an infinite number. Laſtly, ruſhing amongſt the enemies that fled, he brake into the village, where all the houſes were full of armed men, and euery houſe toppe full of men to defend it: and becauſe he eaſily ouercame thoſe that were abroad, he ouerthrew the houſes, and ſo forced them that were within to come forth. Others hee killed in companies with the ruines of the houſes wherein they were; and if any one chanced to eſcape, the ſouldiers without that were already armed, with ſwords kild them: ſo that there were ſuch heaps of dead bodies, that they who had the victory could not paſſe thorow the ſtreets for them. The enemies were ſo diſcouraged with this ouerthrow, that the whole multitude of them (ſeeing thoſe that were ſlaine in the village) fled away: and Herod by the benefit of his good fortune had euen then come to Ieruſalem, had not F winter ſtormes hindred him, which was the onely cauſe that he at that time got not a full conqueſt; and that Antigonus was not vtterly ouerthrowne, who through feare and deſperation was purpoſed to leaue the City. But Herod towards night hauing giuen his friends leaue to depart to reſt their wearie bodies, being himſelfe heated with his armour, after the manner of ſouldiers, went to waſh himſelfe, accompanied onely with one Page. And before hee came to the bath, one of his enemies met him hauing a ſword drawne in his hand; and then another; and afterwards a third; and after them more: and theſe eſcaped out of the battell, and came to the bath to hide themſelues; and ſeeing the King there, they were ſore afraid, and ſought to hide themſelues, and ſo paſſed by him being aſtoniſhed and amazed, although the King at that time was naked and weaponleſſe: and in ſo much as none were preſent there to ſurprize them, they eſcaped; and Herod was very well contented that he had no harme by them. The next day after, hee beheaded Pappus, who was the Generall of Antigonus his army, and ſent his head to his brother Pheroras, who was ruler of his army, in reuenge of his brother that was ſlaine: for Pappus was he that ſlew Ioſeph.

Herod beheadeth Pappus Antigonus captaine. Ant. l. 14. c. 12.

The winter being paſt, hee with his army came to Ieruſalem, and beſieged it, pitching his tents before the Temple, where it was eaſieſt to take the City, and where beforetime Pompey had entred it (which was about the third yeere after Herod was made King in Rome.) Now when he had quartered his army as he thought beſt for his purpoſe, and cut off the ſuburbs, he cauſed three rampires to be raiſed, and towres to be builded vpon them: and leauing there his truſty friends that would not ſlack their buſineſſe, he went into Samaria to viſit his betrothed, which was the daughter of Alexander, who was ſon to Ariſtobulus, who (as we before made mention) was deſpouſed vnto him: and he wedded her euen in the time of the ſiege, as who ſhould ſay, now he contemned his enemies: after his marriage rites were performed, he returned to Ieruſalem with a farre greater army: Soſius alſo ſeconded him with a great army of footmen, and horſmen, whom he ſent before him thorow the midſt of the countrey; and he himſelfe came after by Phœnicia. Now when all his whole army was aſſembled together, to the number of about ſome 11. legions of footmen, and ſix thouſand horſemen, beſides the Syrians that came to helpe him, which were no ſmall number, he laied his aſſault and battery to the northermoſt wall; and the rather becauſe he thought himſelfe warranted by the decree of the Senate, wherby he was declared to be King. Soſius alſo was warranted by Antonies letters, whereby he commanded him to helpe Herod with all the army that was vnder his gouernment. Meane while thoſe Iewes that were within the city were diuerſly troubled: for a multitude of the weaker ſort, gathering themſelues together about the Temple, grew to this reſolution; that whoſoeuer ſhould fortune to die in this attempt, ſhould bee moſt happy and beloued of God. But thoſe who were hardieſt amongſt them, ioyning themſelues together, robbed and tooke away from the reſt what they could, but in eſpeciall they tooke victuals from that part that was next the city: ſo that they neither left meat for horſes nor men, and the valianteſt of them all being ſet to defend the wals againſt thoſe that beſieged them, hindred the aduerſary from erecting their rampires; ſo that they ſtill found ſome new deuice to hinder the force of their engines; neither did they any wayes preuaile ſo much as by their mynes which they made. As for the theeues, the King ſought to repreſſe their incurſions, by placing an ambuſh of men to intercept them; by which meanes hee relieued the want and ſcarcity of victuals, by fetching prouiſion from places farre diſtant: But notwithſtanding they in their fight failed in no ſort to expreſſe their incredible valour; yet did that military experience which the Romans had, ouer-maſter them by ods. Natheleſſe, notwithſtanding the imminent danger wherin they were plunged, they fought with them in open field: but where it chanced that the Romans by digging two ſeuerall mynes, brake all at once into the midſt of them; yet ſuddenly repaired they the breach that was made in the wall, and fortified the other part thereof. In a word, they neither ſpared hands nor engines, but were all of them determined to fight it out euen vnto the laſt caſt: and although they were beſieged with ſo huge an army, yet they defended the town from them fiue moneths, till ſuch time as certaine of Herods choſen men, valiantly ſcaling and clearing the wals, brake into the City, and after them Soſius his Centurions. Thoſe places that neereſt adioyned the Temple, were the firſt of all that they intercepted; and the whole army entring the city, it was lamentable to ſee how in euery corner the people were maſſacred: for the Romanes being diſpleaſed that the ſiege continued ſo long time, became more cruell, and Herods army endeauoured to let no one of the aduerſe part eſcape. By which meanes many were ſlaine, both in the narroweſt places of the ſtreets, as alſo in their owne houſes: yea euen then alſo when they fled into the Temple, without reſpect of age or woman-hood. For although the King intreated the ſouldiers to ſpare the people: yet for all that, they neuer reſtrained their cruell hands, but like mad men they raged againſt all; men, women, and children. At that time alſo Antigonus neither reſpecting his former condition, nor his preſent eſtate, came and proſtrated himſelfe at Soſius his feet, beſeeching him to be mercifull vnto him; but Soſius nothing compaſſionating his calamity, cruelly derided him, and called him Antigona: yet did hee not permit him to depart free as a woman, but put him in priſon.

Now when Herod had conquered his enemies, hee endeauored to the vtmoſt to appeaſe the fury of the ſouldiers; for all the whole multitude were deſirous to ſee the Temple, and the holy

A holy veſſels therein: but he reſiſted them, appeaſing ſome by threatnings, reclaiming others by force, and the reſt by intreaties, ſuppoſing that it had been better for himſelfe to haue beene conquered, then by obtaining the victory, to miniſter a meanes whereby thoſe things ſhould be diſcouered which were not lawfull to bee reuealed. Hee therefore preſently repreſſed the ſouldiers from ſacking the city, inueying much againſt Soſius, and obiecting againſt him, that the Romanes would deſolate the city both of men and money, and leaue him King of a place without ſubiects: adding further, that he eſteem'd not the Empire of the whole world to be a recompence for ſuch a maſſacre of his citizens. Hereunto Soſius replied, that in equity the ſouldiers were to haue the ſacking of the towne, in recompence of that labour they had ſpent in the ſiege. But Herod gaue B him this anſwer, that he had rather recompence euery man out of his owne treaſury; and by this meanes he redeemed as it were the reliques of his deſolate countrey: and in the end performed that which he had promiſed. For he bountifully rewarded euery ſouldier and captain, according to his merit, and gaue Soſius a Kingly reward: ſo that no man went away without money. This done, Soſius dedicated a golden crowne vnto God, and ſo departed, leading Antigonus captiue with him, to the end to preſent him vnto Antonius. This man deſirous to continue his life, and entertaining himſelfe with this cold hope euen vntill the laſt, receiued in the end that reward which his faint heart deſired, and was beheaded.

Antigonus beheaded. Ant. l 11. c. 1.

Herod being now King, made a diſtinction betweene the citizens; and thoſe who had fauoured him, he vſed very honourably, and put thoſe to death who had followed Antigonus: and C when money failed, he diſtributed all his kingly ornaments, and ſent them to Antonius and his company. Yet did he not quite redeeme himſelfe from all annoyances: for Antonius being now captiuate through Cleopatra her loue, in all things yeelded vnto her deſire: and Cleopatra hauing raged ſo againſt her owne kindred, that ſhee had not left one of them aliue, now turned her fury vpon ſtrangers, and accuſing the Nobility of Syria vnto Antonius, ſhee perſwaded him to put them to death, that ſhe might thereby the eaſier obtaine their poſſeſſions. Afterward, her couetous mind ſought to effect the like againſt the Arabians, and the Iewes alſo: inſomuch that ſhee ſecretly went about to cauſe the Kings of thoſe places, Malichus and Herod, to be put to death. Antonius made a ſhew as though he would haue granted her requeſt; yet he thought it great impiety to kill good men, and ſo great Kings: yet notwithſtanding, he no more accounted them his D friends, but tooke a great quantity of ground from the limits of both their countries, and a vineyard in Iericho, where Balme grew; and gaue her all the Cities on this ſide the riuer Eleutherus, (Tyre and Sidon onely excepted.) Now when ſhee had obtain'd the dominion of theſe cities, ſhee followed Antonius vnto Euphrates, who ſet forward to make warre againſt the Parthians, and afterward by Apamia and Damaſcus ſhee came into Iudæa: where Herod, hauing ſomething pacified her angry minde with great gifts, obtained to pay her yeerly two hundreth talents for that part of his countrey, which Antonius had giuen her; and ſeeking by all meanes poſſible to get himſelfe an intereſt in her fauour, he conducted her vnto Pelluſium: and not long after, Antonius returned out of Parthia, and brought Artabazes, the ſonne of Tigranes, captiue, and gaue him to Cleopatra: for all the money and riches which he had got, and the captiues likewiſe, were be-E ſtowed on her.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the treacherous practice of CLEOPATRA againſt HEROD: of HERODS warre againſt the Arabians, and of a very great earthquake.

ABout ſuch time as the Actiacum warre was afoot, Herod prepared himſelfe to attend Antonius; ſeeing for the preſent all troubles were pacified in Iudæa, and he had already got the caſtle of Hircanion, which Antigonus ſiſter had in her poſſeſſion. But Cleopatra craf-F tily preuented him in this his iourney; ſo that hee could not go with Antonius: for ſhee deſiring the ruines of both the Kings (as was before mentioned) perſwaded Antonius that he ſhould cauſe Herod to make warre againſt the Arabians: whom if he ouercame, then ſhe ſhould be made Queene of Arabia; and if ſo be himſelfe were ouercome, then ſhee ſhould be Queene of Iudæa: intending hereby, that one of theſe Potentates ſhould ruinate the other. But this practice of hers was greatly to Herods gaine: for firſt of all, making head againſt thoſe of Syria that were his enemies, with all the power of horſemen he could make, which was very many, and meeting them at Dioſpolis, he ouercame them, though they valiantly reſiſted: who hauing the ouerthrow, ſtirred vp a mighty army of the Arabians to helpe them, ſo that an infinite company was gathered together about Cœloſyria, expecting the Iewes neere vnto the city called Canatha. Where King Herod meeting them, purpoſed not to fight vnaduiſedly, but to compaſſe his owne army round about with a wall: but his army remembring their former victory, would not be counſelled, but violently aſſaulted the Arabians, & at the firſt onſet put them to flight. Herod purſuing his enemy, was greatly endangered by the treaſon of the inhabitants of Canatha (who were ſet on by Athenio, that was one of Cleopatras captains, who had alwaies borne him ill will) for the Arabians encouraged by their help, returned againe to battell; and they two ioyned their forces together, and ſet vpon Herod in ſtony and difficult places, and put his army to flight, and ſlew many of them: and thoſe that eſcaped fled into a little village hard-by, cald Ormiza; where the Arabians compaſſing them about, tooke both the men and their tents with all their furniture. Not long after this ouerthrow of Herods ſouldiers, he came and brought helpe, but too late, and to little purpoſe: but the cauſe hereof was, for that the captains of his army would not obey his commandement: for if they had beene obedient, Athenio had not had opportunity to worke him that iniury; yet was he reuenged vpon the Arabians, and daily made incurſions vpon their borders, and ceaſed not to inuade and ſpoile them, vntill by many, he had cried quittance with them for their one victory.

The Arabians defeat Herods army.

The Actian warre betweene Antonius and Auguſtus.

While thus he purſued his enemies, a great calamity befell him in the ſeuenth yeere of his raigne, and in the midſt of the Actian warre: for about the beginning of the ſpring time, there chanced a great earthquake, which ſlew an infinite multitude of beaſts, and thirty thouſand people: yet the army had no harme, for it lay in an open place. With the report hereof, the Arabians were highly encouraged (for ſuch as report an euill occurrent, doe alwaies redouble the miſery thereof in relating it) for which cauſe, the Arabians, making account that all Iudæa was ouerthrowne, and that there was no man left aliue to reſiſt them, entred into Iudæa, aſſuring themſelues to conquer the countrey: and before their comming, they ſlew the Embaſſadours of the Iewes that were ſent vnto them. Herod, perceiuing his countriemen terrified by the ſudden approach of their enemies, and not onely broken, but wearied with the greatneſſe and continuance of their calamities, rowzed vp their drouping ſpirits that were tired with ſuſpect, and encouraged them on this wiſe: I ſee no reaſon of your preſent feare, neither do I admire, that you were terrified with the puniſhment of Gods indignation: but it is a cowardly mind to be daunted by the comming of your enemies, who are but men; and whoſe violence, if your ſelues pleaſe, yee may repreſſe. For mine owne part, I am ſo farre from being diſcouraged by the approach of my enemies, that I rather thinke that God hath of his prouidence ſent this earthquake as a bait to allure and incite the Arabians to inuade vs, to the end, that through our meanes he may puniſh them: for the cauſe that moueth them to aſſault vs, is, not the truſt they repoſe in their owne valour and great army, but it is our miſery that inuiteth them. Yet who knowes not that the hope is fruſtrated that is founded not vpon a mans priuate vertue, but vpon another mans misfortune? There is nothing aſſured in humane affaires, in reſpect either of proſperous ſucceſſe, or aduerſe fortune, which a man may perceiue to alter vpon all occurrents: as we our ſelues may witneſſe by our own experience. For in the firſt conflict ye ouercame; in the ſecond yee were ouercome; and now the third time (for ought I can coniecture) they, thinking themſelues ſure of the victory, ſhall by vs be ouercome: for they who miſdoubt nothing, are raſh in their proceedings, whereas they that are feareſull and timorous, prouidently ſeeke to preuent their dangers: ſo that I am encouraged to hope for victory euen by your feare.

Another calamity of Herods.

Herods oration to his diſmaied ſouldiers.

Feare giueth confidence.

For when as you were too confident, and againſt my will and direction ruſhed in vpon your enemies, Athenio found opportunity to hurt vs: but now ſith I perceiue in your minds a certaine remiſneſſe and a forecaſt, it is an euident token vnto me of an aſſured victory. It behoooueth you therefore not onely before the conflict to continue your accuſtomed mindes, but alſo in the conflict to ſhew that ye are men, armed both with hearts and hardineſſe; to the end, that our impious enemies may well ſee, that neither any humane calamity, nor diuine puniſhment can daunt the courage of the Iewes, whil'ſt their breath is in their bodies: and that neuer a one of you all will ſuffer the Arabians to domineere ouer your goods and poſſeſſions, whom many times you haue almoſt made your ſlaues. Bee not therefore terrified with this motion of a body that hath no ſoule: neither yet perſwade your ſelues, that the earthquake portendeth any maſſacre, for euen the elements themſelues by their owne nature are ſubiect to ſuch defects, and portend no other miſhappe, but that which they bring with them. Perhaps the plague, and famine, and earthquake, haue ſome tokens demonſtrating them before they come: but when they are once come, they ſignifie nothing elſe; but at laſt, end and ceaſe of themſelues. But ſay we ſhould

A be ouercome, can war enforce more harme against vs, then the earthquake hath done? Truely, it is an euident token of our enemies ruine, and that by their owne cause, who most cruelly, contrary to the law of all nations, butchered our Embassadors, offring to God such sacrifice for the good successe of their wars. They cannot hide themselues from the sight of God, and from his mighty power, but presently they shall feele punishment for their offence, if filled with the courageous spirit of our nation, we be stird vp to reuenge that impious violating the law of all nations, and so euery one march on to fight, not for his wife and children, or country; but to reuenge the murther of our Embassadors: who will lead our army, and know better then we that are aliue to direct the same. For mine owne part (if you will be ruled by mee) I will be the first that B will lead you, and will hazzard my selfe for you: for you know full well, that if your valour be not eclipsed by some headlong rashnesse, there is nothing that may make head against you.

After he had by these or such like perswasions sounded his souldiers, and found them in some sort encouraged therby, he offred sacrifice to God. And presently after, with all his army he passed ouer Iordan: and pitching his tents at Philadelphia, not far from his enemy, he made a shew to assault a Castle that was between them and him, and so skirmished with them afarre off, desirous to draw them to the battell: for the enemies had sent to intercept the castle; but Herods forces gaue them the repulse, and in despight of them kept the hill. Thus euery day made he an offer to fight, brauing the Arabians: and seeing they would not come to the shocke (for they were in great feare, and Athemus their Generall for very feare was ready to giue vp the ghost) he as- C saulted them in their trenches, and cast down their rampier, so as they were constrained to come forth to battell, without any order; and their horsemen and footmen were confusedly mixt together. And although the Iewes in number were inferiour vnto them, yet they were inferiour to the Iewes in courage; yet they became now more hardy, because they despaired of the victory: and so long as they stood to it, they had no great losse: but when they turned their backes, then many were slaine by the Iewes, and many perished being troden on by their fellowes. Those that escaped, were forced to retire themselues into their trenches, where Herod besieged them: and although they were all ready to be put to the sword, yet was there such penury of water, that for drinke they were all like to perish. For which cause, they sent Embassadors to the King, offring him fifty talents to let them goe: but he contemned them, and so much more earnest was he, by D reason that their want of water was so great, that comming out by flocks of their owne accord, they offred themselues to the Iewes: so that in this sort there came forth foure thousand in fiue daies, and the sixt day the whole multitude (despairing of their liues) came out to fight, with whom Herod conflicting, slew about seuen thousand. Hauing in this sort weakned the Arabians, that he had now extinguished all their strong men, the countrymen admired him, and were so much daunted at his puissance, that they wished him for their Ruler.

Herod sacrifi-ceth to God before the battell.

The Arabians through extreme thirst are enforced to yeeld to the Iewes.

CHAP. XV.

How HEROD was exalted to the Kingdome.

INcontinent after this his prosperous successe, there did betide vnto him a sea of cares and griefes, in respect of the loue which he bare vnto Antonius, whom Cæsar had now lately ouerthrowne at the battell which was fought at Actium: yet was hee more affraid then hurt by this his suspicion: for Cæsar accounted not Antonius fully conquered, so long as Herod and he kept together. Wherefore, the King timely foreseeing those dangers that might ensue, went to Rhodes, where at that time Cæsar abode: in which place, in the habit of a priuate man, and without a Crown, but with a Kingly courage, he presented himselfe before him, and with vnfained constancie spake vnto him in such manner as followeth; I was, O Cæsar, made King of Iudæa by Antonius his meanes: and I must confesse, that I haue beene a King, who, what in me lay, F haue serued his turne, and sought his profit: yea, I must not deny, but that (had not the Arabians hindred me) I had with all the power I could haue made, seconded and assisted Antonie against thee: yea, although personally I could not goe, yet did I what I could to helpe him, and sent him many thousand measures of corne. Nay, though he had the ouerthrow at Actium, yet did not I forsake him, who had deseru'd wel at my hands: & althogh I was not able to assist him with force of armes, yet I confirmed him by my counsell the best I could, inculcating oftentimes vnto him, that there was one onely way to redresse his aduersity, to wit, by the death of Cleopatra, whom if he killed, I promised him to assist him with money, strong holds, and an army; yea, and with mine mine owne person against thee: but the loue of Cleopatra, and God who had already designed the victory vnto thee, stopped his eares. For which cause, O Cæsar, I am conquered with Antonius, and haue forsaken my Crowne and dignity with his fortunes: and I am come vnto thee, hoping that at thy hands I may obtaine pardon. To this Cæsar answered: Liue in safety, and raigne now with greater security then before; for thou deseruest to rule others, who with such constancy didst defend and maintaine thy friendship. At this time endeauour thy selfe to continue faithfull toward them that are more fortunate then Antonius was: for, for my part I haue conceiued a great hope and expectation of thy valour and prowesse; yet did Antonius well, in that he rather obeyed Cleopatra then thee: for by his follies haue we now purchased thy friendship. That thou hast begun to doe well, it hereby appeareth, because Ventidius hath signified vnto me, that thou hast sent him succours against his enemies. For which cause, by this my present decree, be thou established in thy kingdome, and I will shortly let thee know, that I will be beneficiall vnto thee: so as thou shalt haue no cause to bewaile the losse of Antonius. By this speech he exhorted the King not to misdoubt of his friendship, and withall put a Crowne vpon his head, and made a decree, and sealed it, testifying how he had remitted all things done by Herod, and confirmed him in his kingdome, and rehearsed many things therein, greatly tending to Herods praise. Herod (hauing first pacified Cæsar with many gifts) requested him to pardon Alexander, one of Antonius his friends, who earnestly and in humble manner desired the same: but Cæsar being very angry, answered, that he for whom he entreated, had greatly and many times offended, and so repeld Herod with this answer.

Cæsars answer to Herod.

Herods gratulation toward Cæsar.

Afterward, Cæsar, trauailing into Egypt through Syria, was entertained by Herod with all royall pompe possible: and that was the first time that he shewed himselfe to take part with Cæsar, when neere vnto Ptolemais he took a view of the souldiers with Cæsar, and made a banquet for him and all his friends, and feasted the whole armie likewise. And in as much as he trauailed to Pelusium thorow dry grounds, when they returned againe, he prouided water for them, and furnished the army with all necessaries: so that both Cæsar and the souldiers thought the kingdome a small recompence for his deserts. For which cause, after he came into Egypt, and that Antonius and Cleopatra were now dead, hee did not onely increase his honour, but also restored vnto him that portion of his country which was taken away, and giuen to Cleopatra: and besides that, Gadara, and Hippon, and Samaria, and other cities, about the sea-coast; to wit, Gaza, and Anthedon, and Ioppe, and Stratons tower: and moreouer gaue him foure hundreth Galathians, which before were Cleopatra her guard: and there was nothing that so much moued Cæsars liberalitie, as the courageous minde of him vnto whom he was so liberall. After the first Actian solemnity, he added vnto Herods dominion Trachon, and Batanæa, and Auranitis bordering vpon it. For this cause Zenodorus (who for money hired Lysanias his house) continually sent theeues out of Trachon to robbe the people of Damascus: who in humble manner went to Varus (who was at that time Gouernour of Syria) entreating him to informe Cæsar of their calamity. Cæsar, vnderstanding thereof, writ backe againe, commanding him to extinguish all the theeues: whereupon Varus with an armie went to those places which were most suspected, and rid the countrey of the theeues, and tooke the territory from Zenodorus: and Cæsar (lest it should againe be a refuge for theeues to spoile Damascus) gaue it to Herod, and made him ruler ouer all Syria. And tenne yeeres after, returning to his owne countrey, he commanded the Gouernours to doe nothing without Herods counsell: and after Zenodorus his death, he gaue him all the country between Trachon and Galilee. But that which Herod esteemed aboue all the rest, was, that Cæsar loued him best of all next to Agrippa: and Agrippa loued him most of all men next vnto Cæsar. Thus now he touched the very top of felicitie: and so increasing in high mind, he imployed himselfe chiefely to piety.

Of the Cities and buildings reedified and built by HEROD, and of his liberality towards strangers, and of his felicity.

The yeere of the world, 3947. before Christs birth, 17.

IN the fifteenth yeere of his raigne hee repaired the Temple, and enclosed twice so much ground as was before about the Temple with a strong wall, whereon hee bestowed great costs and charges to beautifie it: as the great porches will testifie, which hee built about the Temple, and a Castle on the North-part thereunto adioyning, which he built euen from the foundation. The Castle was so rich and sumptuous, that it was equall vnto the Kings Palace, and in

Ant. li. 15. ca. 10. 12, 13, 14. Herods buildings.

A in the honour of Antonius, he named it Antonia. He builded himselfe also a Palace in the vpper part of the City, and in it two houses, huge, and richly adorned: so that the Temple was not to be compared vnto them. And calling them by his friends names, he tearmed one of them Cæsarea, and another Agrippa; whose names and memories he did not onely solemnize, and write in his priuate houses, but also throughout the whole country, and in euery part of the city. For in the countrey of Samaria he compassed a towne with a wall, which was about twenty stounds, and called it Sebaste; and he sent thither six thousand inhabitants, giuing them a most fertill soile and demeasnes. There also amongst other buildings, he erected a very huge Temple, and dedicated it to Cæsar, and gaue the inhabitants of that place especiall priuiledges. About the Temple The yeere of the world, 3947. before christs birth, 17.

B was there a piece of ground containing three stounds and a halfe. For this monuments sake, Cæsar added vnto his dominion another country; for which cause he erected another Temple vnto him, neere vnto the head of Iordan, of white marble, in a place called Panium, where there is a mountaine rising an infinite height into the aire, at the side whereof there is an obscure valley, where there are high rocks, that (by drops of water falling on them) are made hollow: so that the water, standing in their concauity till they run ouer, falleth down with a streame of such a length as is admirable. At the foote of this valley on the outside, there spring certaine fountaines, and many thinke this to be the head of the riuer Iordan; which, whether it be true or no, we will declare hereafter.

C At Iericho also (between the castle of Cyprus, and the other ancient Kings houses) he erected other buildings, fairer and more commodious for them that came thither, calling them after the names of his friends. Finally, there was no conuenient place in the whole kingdome, wherein he erected not some thing in honour of Cæsar: and hauing in euery place of his owne kingdome deuised and dedicated Temples vnto him, he in Syria also where he ruled did the like, founding in very many Cities, Temples, which he called by the name of Cæsar. And perceiuing, that amongst the Cities of the sea-coast, there was one called Stratons tower, which, being very old, was ruinated; and for the situation thereof deserued reparation and cost: he repaired it all with white stone, and built a very royall Palace therein, wherein chiefly he shewed a mighty minde. For this City standing in the midst betweene Dora and Ioppe, there was no port or hauen in that coast: so that whosoeuer sailed from Phœnicia into Egypt, were in great danger, by reason of the violent The fountain-head of Iordã.

D winds that blew from Africa; which blowing but a very easie gale, inforce the water with such a violence against the rocks on the shore, that the waues, rebounding back again a good way within the sea, make the whole sea tempestuous. But the King, with his liberality and cost ouercomming nature, builded a port or hauen in that place, far bigger then that of Piræum, and within it made most safe stations for ships. And although the nature of that place was altogether contrary to his intent, yet he so ouercame that difficulty, that the sea could do that building no harme: and it was so gallant and beautifull to behold, as though there had bin no let any way to hinder the adorning thereof. For hauing measured out such a place (as we haue spoken of) for the port, he laid a foundation in the bottome twenty elles deepe of stone, whereof most of them were fif- Herod makes a greater port then that of Piræum.

E ty foot long, nine foot thicke, and tenne foot broad, and some bigger; and all the bottome of the hauen where the water came, was laid with these stones. Which done, he raised a wall of two hundreth foot; whereof a hundreth foot was builded to breake the violence of the waues, and had a name according to the vse it serued for. The other hundreth foot serued for a foundation of the wall whereof the hauen was compassed, which was repleniſhed with many goodly towers; the greatest and faireſt whereof he named Drusius, after the name of Cæsars kinsman. There were very many vaults also to conduct such things into the towne as were brought into the hauen, and about them a paued place for them to walke in, that came out of the ships: The entrance therunto was on the North side; for by reason of the situation of the place, the North-wind there is the calmest. An apt description of a hauen.

F Before the entrance were 3. great colossus held vp on euery side with pillars: they wch are on the left hand, are propt vp by a tower being a solid rock of stone. But at the entrance on the right hand were two huge stones ioynd together, which make a greater tower then the other. There is also a house adioyning vnto the hauen built of white stone: The streets of the cities comming to that place, are of one bignes and proportion. Vpon a hill opposite to the mouth of the hauen, was there builded a temple very beautifull and exceeding great, which he dedicated to Cæsar, wherin was placed Cæsars colossus, fully as great as Iupiters at Olympus: for it was made after that example, equal to that at Rome, and that of Iunoes at Argos. The city he builded for the inhabitants of that Prouince, and the port or hauen for seafaring men. The honour and credit he attributed to Cæsar, and by his name called it Cæsarea. He also made other buildings, as the Market, the Theater, and the Amphitheater, which are worth the memory. And he euery fift yeere ordained certaine sports, and called them after the name of Cæsar. And himselfe first proposed very ample rewards in the 192. Olympiade; insomuch that he not only gaue royall gifts to the victors, but also to the second and third after them. He repaired Anthedon also, which was destroied by the wars, and called it Agrippium: and louing Agrippa very dearely, he caused her name to be engrauen ouer the portall he builded in the Temple. Neither was he vnmindfull of his parents: for in the richest soile of the whole kingdome he built a city for a monument of his father: and by his name called it Antipatris, being a very rich soile, both for trees and riuers. At Iericho also he built a very gorgeous and strong Castle, and called it Cyprus, in honour of his mother. He likewise built a tower in memory of his brother Phasaelus, at Ierusalem, and cald it Phasaelus his tower (of the compasse and beauty of this tower we will speake hereafter.) He also called another City Phasaelus, which is situate in a valley beyond Iericho, towards the North.

Cæsarea in time past cald the tower of Straton. Ant. lib. 15. cap. 10. 12. & lib. 17. cap. 5. Agripplum. Antipatris. Cyprus. Phasaelus tower.

Hauing thus eternized the memory of his friends and kinsfolke, he did not forget to doe the like to himselfe: for he built a castle on a mountain neer Arabia, hauing on one side a strong place of defence, and this Castle he called Herodium after his owne name. By the same name also he called a tombe, which he builded sixty stounds from Ierusalem, artificially made in manner of a womans dug, which he richly adorned: for within compasse of the top of it, he caused round turrets to be placed: and round about it he builded princely houses, gallantly adorned both within and without. He also brought water from a great way off, with great cost and charges, and made a paire of staires of pure white marble, to go vp, which had two hundreth steps. For the whole hil was made by art, and it was made of an exceeding height: at the foot thereof likewise he built another Palace, and houses to receiue his friends and their carriages: so that this castle, for the abundance of all necessary places, seemed a city, and yet was it all the Kings Palace. Hauing erected thus many buildings, he shewed his braue mind in strange cities likewise: for at Tripolis, and Damascus, and Ptolemais he builded publike baths, which are called exercises. He builded the wall of Biblus; and seats, porches, temples, and markets at Berytus and Tyre: at Sidon and Damascus he builded a Theater, and a water-conduit at Laodicea, a sea-towne. At Ascalon he built fountaines or lakes very sumptuous, and baths with pillars, that for greatnesse and gallant worke were miraculous. To other places he gaue woods and ports: and to many cities he added fields, as though they had been fellow-cities of his kingdome. Also, toward the maintenance of baths he gaue a yeerely annuity for euer: as namely, to those at Cous, to the intent he might be an eternall benefactor. Moreouer, he gaue all poore people corne; and he often and in sundry places gaue the Rhodians money to build a Nauie of ships. At his owne proper cost he repaired Pythium, which was burnt with fire. What should I say of his liberality which he extended to them of Lycia and Samia? or the magnificent gifts which he vsed toward all the people of Ionia; yea, all things that their hearts could desire: whereby he relieued all their necessities? Nay, both the Athenians, and Lacedemonians, and Nicopolites, and the citizens of Pergamus in Mysia, receiued very many benefits at his hands. He paued also a large street in Antiochia of Syria, which was in length twenty stounds, and that with faire marble. This street before that time was so full of durt, that no man could goe thorow it; and all along it he built galleries, that people might goe dry thorow it in rainy weather.

Some one may say, that these benefits he thus bestowed, were done for the proper vse of those people on whom he bestowed them: but no man can deny, but that which he did for the citizens of Elis, was not onely common to those of Achaia, but to all the world, where the games, called Olympica Certamina, were solemnized. For, Herod seeing them decay onely for want of maintenance, and that this was the onely remainder of all the ancient monuments of Greece, he not onely in his person at that time became one of the proposers of rewards in that Olympiade which he assisted when he went to Rome; but also gaue a yeerely stipend to maintaine the same, least for want it should be left off. It is not to be told what debts and tributes he remitted; for he deliuered the Phasaelites and Balaneotes, and other townes of Cilicia, from the paiment of a yeerely tribute: yet was he not so liberall to them as he would haue beene, fearing least the enuie of some might accuse him of some further meaning, if he should be more bountifull to the cities then those that were the owners thereof. He exercised his body likewise in exercises fit for so valiant a mind: for he was a very skilfull hunter, wherin he had alwaies his purpose, by reason of his skill in riding; so that in one day he kild forty wild beasts. That country hath many Boars, but it hath more store of Harts and wild Asses. He was such a warriour as no man was able to encounter

CHAP. XVII.

Of the diſagreement betweene HEROD and his ſonnes, ALEXANDER and ARISTOBVLVS.

BVt his priuate and domeſticall ſorrowes ſeemed to enuy him his publike felicity, & moſt aduerſe fortune befell him through the meanes of a woman, whom he loued as himſelfe. For being now made King, he put away his wife, which he firſt married (which was a Lady borne in Ieruſalem, whoſe name was Doris) and married Mariamme the daughter of Alexander, who was Ariſtobulus ſon, which cauſed troubles in his houſe, both before, but eſpecially after he returned from Rome. For he baniſhed his eldeſt ſon Antipater, whom he had by Doris, out of the city, only for his childrens ſake that he had by Mariamme; licenſing him only at feſtiual times to come vnto the city in regard of ſome ſuſpicion of treaſon intended againſt him. And afterward he ſlew Hircanus his wiues vncle (notwithſtanding that hee returned out of Parthia vnto him) becauſe after he ſuſpected that he intended ſome treaſon againſt him; whom Barzapharnes, after he had taken all Syria, tooke away priſoner with him. But his owne countrimen that dwelt beyond Euphrates, in commiſeration redeemed him from thraldome; and had he bin counſelled by them and not come vnto Herod, he had not bin killed: but the marriage of his neece cauſed his death: for, for that cauſe, and eſpecially for the loue of his natiue ſoile, he came thither. That wch moued Herod to kill him was, not for that he ſought the kingdome, but becauſe he had right vnto the kingdom. Herod had fiue children by Mariamme, two daughters, and three ſons. The youngeſt was ſent to Rome to ſtudy, where he died. The other two he brought vp like Princes, both for their mothers nobility ſake, and for that they were borne after he was King. But that which D aboue all other was moſt forcible, was the loue he bare to Mariamme, which from day to day tormented him more violently, in ſuch ſort, that he felt not any part of thoſe griefes which this his beſt beloued enforced againſt him. For Mariamme hated him as much as he loued her: and hauing a iuſt cauſe and colour of diſcontent, and moreouer being imboldned by the loue which he bare her, ſhe euery day vpbraided him with that which he had done vnto Hircanus her vncle, and vnto her brother Ariſtobulus. For Herod ſpared him not, although he was a child; but after he had made him high Prieſt in the ſeuenteenth yeere of his age, he preſently put him to death, after he had ſo honoured him: who when he came to the altar clothed in ſacred attire vpon a feſtiuall day, all the people wept: and the ſame night was he ſent to Iericho, and drowned in a lake E by the Galatians, who had receiued commiſſion to performe the murther. Theſe things did Mariamme daily caſt in Herods teeth, and vpbraided both his mother and ſiſter, with very ſharpe and reproachfull words: yet he ſo loued her, that notwithſtanding all this he held his peace. But the women were ſet on fire: and that they might the rather moue Herod againſt her, they accuſed her of adultery, and of many other things which bare a ſhew of truth: obiecting againſt her that ſhe had ſent her portraiture into Egypt vnto Antonius; and that through immoderate luſt ſhee did what ſhe could to make her ſelfe knowne vnto him, who doted vpon womens loue, and was of ſufficient power to doe what wrong he pleaſed.

Hereat Herod was ſore moued, eſpecially for that he was iealous of her whom he loued, bethinking himſelfe vpon the cruelty of Cleopatra, for whoſe ſake King Lyſanias and Malichus King of Arabia were put to death; and now he meaſured not the danger by the loſſe of his wife, but F by his owne death which he feared: For which cauſe being drawne by his affaires into the countrey, he gaue ſecret commandement vnto Ioſeph, his ſiſter Salomes husband (whom he knew to be truſty, and one who for affinity was his wel-willer) to kill his wife Mariamme, if ſo be Antonius ſhould haue killed him. But Ioſeph not maliciouſly, but ſimply to ſhew her how greatly the King loued her, diſcloſed that ſecret vnto her: and ſhee when Herod was returned, and amongſt other talk with many oaths ſware that he neuer loued woman but her; indeed (quoth ſhe) it may well be knowne how greatly you loue me by the commandement you gaue to Ioſeph, whom you charged to kill me. Herod hearing this which he thought to be ſecret, was like a mad man, and presently perswaded himselfe that Ioseph would neuer haue disclosed that commandement of his, except he had abused her; so that hereupon he became furious, and leaping out of his bed, he walked vp and downe the Palace: whereupon his sister Salome hauing fit opportunity, confirmed his suspicion of Ioseph. For which cause, Herod growing now raging mad with iealousie, commanded both of them to be killed. Which done, his wrath was seconded by repentance; and after his anger ceased, the affection of loue was presently renued: yea so great was the power of his affection, that he would not beleeue she was dead, but spake vnto her as though she were aliue, vntill in processe of time being ascertained of her funerall, he equalled the affection he bare her during her life, by the vehemency of his passion for her death. Mariammes sonnes succeeded their mother in her wrath, and recogitating what an impious act it was, they accounted their father as a mortall enemy, both before and after they went to study at Rome, and especially after they came againe into Iudæa. For as they encreased in yeeres, so did the violence of their minde increase. And they being now marriageable, one of them married the daughter of their aunt Salome, who accused their mother; the other married the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. And now to their hatred was there ioyned a liberty to speake more freely against them, and by this occasion of their boldnesse many were animated to calumniate them: so that some did openly tell the King that both his sonnes sought to worke treason against him, and that the one of them prepared an army to helpe the other to reuenge the death of their mother; and that the other (to wit he that was sonne in law to Archelaus) purposed to flye, and accuse Herod before Cæsar. Herod giuing eare vnto those calumniations, sent for Antipater whom he had by Doris, to the end he might defend him against his two sons, and sought to aduance him aboue them. But they thought this alteration intolerable; seeing one, whose mother was but a priuate woman, so preferred: and they moued with their owne nobleness of birth, could not containe their indignation, but vpon euery occasion shewed themselues offended; yet were they euery day lesse accounted of. As for Antipater, he wrought himselfe into fauour: for he knew how to flatter his father, and raised many slanders on his two brethren, partly inuented by himselfe, partly diuulged by some of his fauourites, whom he set aworke about the matter, till that at last he put his brethren out of all hope of hauing the kingdome. For he was now by the Kings Will and Testament declared King, so that he was sent as a King vnto Cæsar in a Kingly habit and pompe, onely he wore no Crowne: and in time he so preuailed, that he wrought his mother into Mariammes stead; and with flatteries and calumniation so mooued the King, that he began to deliberate about the putting to death of his sonnes. For which cause, he conducted his son Alexander with him to Rome, and accused him before Cæsar, that he had giuen him poyson. But hee with much adoe hauing obtained liberty to plead his owne cause, and that before an vnskilfull Iudge, yet more wise then Herod or Antipater, hee modestly held his peace in all things that his father had offended in: and first of all he purged his brother from danger of that crime, and taking the whole matter vpon himselfe, he in very good sort acquitted himselfe thereof. And afterwards he inueighed against Antipaters subtiltie, and complained of those iniuries, which had been offered him, hauing beside the equity of his cause, sufficient eloquence to acquit himselfe: for hee was a vehement orator; and knew well how to perswade. Last of all, he obiected that his father hauing a desire to put both him and his brother to death, had laid an accusation vpon him: wherat the whole audience wept, and Cæsar was so moued, that not regarding the accusations that were laid vnto them, he presently made Herod and them friends, vpon these conditions, that they in all things should be obedient vnto their father; and that their father should leaue the kingdome to whom he pleased.

A reconciliation betweene Herod and his sons.

Hereupon Herod returned from Rome, and though he seemed to haue forgiuen his sonnes; yet laid he not his iealousie and suspicion aside. For Antipater still vrged his argument to make Herod hate his other two sons, though for feare of him that reconciled them, he durst not openly shew himselfe an enemy vnto them. Afterward Herod sailed by Cilicia, and arriued at Elæusa, where Archelaus receiued him very courteously, thanking him for the safety of his son in law, and very ioyfull for that they were made friends: for he wrote vnto his friends at Rome with all speed possible, that they should be fauourable vnto Alexander, when he came to plead his cause. And after this entertainment, he conducted Herod vnto Zephyrius, giuing him gifts to the value of thirty talents, and so tooke his leaue of him. Herod as soone as he came to Ierusalem assembled the people together, & being assisted by his three sons, he shewed vnto them the cause of his going to Rome, and blessed God, and thanked Cæsar, who had appeased the discord of his house, and that had made his sons friends; which he esteemed more then his kingdom: and I (quoth he) will

A wil make their friendſhip firme. For Cæſar appointed me King, and gaue me leaue to chuſe whom I pleaſed for my ſucceſſour, for the which I giue him hearty thanks. And now I here conſtitute all three of my ſons Kings: which purpoſe of mine firſt I beſeech Almighty God, and ſecondly you to fauour: for the one of them for his yeers, the other for their nobility of birth, haue right to the Crowne and kingdome: which is ſo large, that it may ſuffice many; ſo that you for your parts reuerence them whom Cæſar conioyned, and I their father ordained, giuing them not vnfit, nor vnlike honours, but ſuch as they haue deſerued. For a man cannot doe a greater pleaſure vnto him whom he honoureth aboue his yeers, then he ſhall giue diſcontent vnto him whom he diſhonoureth. For which cauſe, I will conſtitute to euery one of them ſuch friends and wel-willers, as with whom they be moſt conuerſant, and of them I will require pledges of a concord and vnity amongſt them. For I know that diſcords and contentions ariſe by malice of thoſe who are conuerſant with Princes, and that if they be well diſpoſed, they will increaſe friendſhip. And I requeſt not onely theſe, but alſo all ſuch as beare rule in my army, that they hope in me onely for the preſent: for I giue not my ſons the Kingdome, but the honour and dignity thereof; and they ſhall haue pleaſure as though they were Kings themſelues, yet I my ſelfe will beare ſway, although I am vnwilling to doe it. Let euery one of you conſider my age, my courſe of life, and piety: for I am not ſo old that any one may quickly deſpaire of me, nor I haue not accuſtomed my ſelfe to ſuch kind of pleaſure, as is wont to ſhorten young mens daies; and we haue bin ſo religious, that we are in great hope of long life. But if any one deſpiſe me, and ſeeke to pleaſe my ſons, ſuch a one will I puniſh. I doe not forbid them to be honoured, whom my ſelfe haue begotten, for that I enuy them: but becauſe I know well that ſuch applauſes nouriſh pride and arrogancy in the fierce minds of yong men. Wherfore if all they that apply thēſelues in their ſeruice, conſider that I will be ready to reward the good; and that thoſe who are ſeditious, ſhall find their malice to haue an vnprofitable euent at their hands, whom they ſo flatter: I eaſily perſwade my ſelfe that all men will be of my mind, that are of my ſons mind. For it is good for them that I raigne, and that I am friends with my ſons. And you O my good ſonnes, retaine in your minds that ſacred nature, which maketh the verie brute beaſt to entertaine naturall affection: then reuerence Cæſar who reconciled vs: and laſt of all obey me who requeſt, and entreate that at your hands, which I might command, namely that you remaine brethren. And I will now giue you both Kingly attire and honour, and I pray God that if you will continue and remaine friends, I may continue in this minde.

Herod giueth not the kingdome to his ſons, but the honors of the kingdome.

Herod conuerteth his ſpeech to his ſonnes.

After he had thus ſpoken, he ſaluted them very louingly, and diſmiſſed the people, ſome praying that it might be as hee had ſaid: others (who deſired alteration) made as though they had heard nothing. Yet for all this, the diſſenſion amongſt the brethren was not appeaſed, but each of them miſtruſting worſer euents, departed from one another. For Alexander and Ariſtobulus ſtomaked the matter, that Antipater had his deſert confirmed, and Antipater was grieued that his brethren ſhould haue the ſecond place after him; yet he could ſo craftily carry himſelfe, that no man could perceiue his hatred towards them. And they deriued of a noble race ſpake all they thought, and many endeuoured to ſet them on; and others as friends inſinuated themſelues into their companie, to learne what newes: ſo that Alexander could not ſpeake a word, but preſently it was carried to Antipater, and from him to Herod with an addition; ſo that when Alexander ſpake any thing ſimply, meaning no harme, it was preſently interpreted in the worſt ſenſe poſſible: and if he chanced at any time to ſpeake freely of any matter, preſently it was made a great thing. Antipater ſuborned men to ſet him on, that ſo his lies might be ſhadowed with colour of truth; and that if he could prooue any one thing true, all lies and tales elſe diuulged, might thereby be iuſtified to be true. Now all Antipaters familiars were either naturally ſecret, or elſe hee ſtopped their mouthes with bribes, leſt they ſhould diſcloſe his intents: ſo that one might iuſtly haue tearmed his life a ſecrecy of malice. All Alexanders friends were either corrupted by money, or flattering ſpeeches, wherewith Antipater ouercame all, and made them theeues and proditors of ſuch things as were either done or ſpoken againſt him: and himſelf doing all things, he dealt ſo warily, that at laſt thoſe calumniations came vnto Herods eare: and he counterfeited his brothers perſon, and ſuborned other tale-carryers, telling what they could againſt Alexander; and pretending good will towards his brother, at firſt fainedly reproued them, and afterward ſeriouſly alleadged their ſayings as accuſations: ſo that hereby Herod was very wroth, but turned all as though Alexander went about treaſon, and ſought to kill his father: and nothing made ſo much credit be giuen to theſe calumniations, as that Antipater colourably excuſed his brother. Herod incenſed hereat, euery day withdrew his affection more and more from the two brethren, and daily encreaſed his loue towards Antipater. The nobility alſo were inclined after the ſame maner: partly of their own accord, and partly for that they were ſo commanded: ſo did Ptolomæus the chiefeſt of all the nobility, and the Kings brethren, and all his kinred; for all mens expectation was vpon Antipater. And that which grieued Alexander the more, was, that all theſe miſchiefes, wrought to his ouerthrow, were done by the counſell of Antipaters mother; for ſhee being a ſtepmother, was cruell, and hated them being borne of a Queene, farre more then a ſtepmother doth her ſons in law. And although all men followed Antipater for the hope which they had of him, yet were they alſo compelled thereunto by the Kings command, who gaue an eſpeciall charge to their deareſt friends, that none ſhould follow Alexander or his brother: ſo that he did not onely terrifie thoſe of his owne kingdome, but alſo thoſe of other forrain nations. For Cæſar had giuen him ſuch authority: for he gaue him licence to take any one that was a fugitiue from him, out of any City, although it were not vnder his dominions. And the young men were ignorant of the offences laid vnto their charge, and ſo were more eaſily entrapped being vnaware of them: for their father did not openly tell them of any matter, but they euery day perceiued their fathers good will towards them to decay, which ſo much the more encreaſed their griefe. In like manner Antipater by little and little mooued Pheroras their vncle and Salome their aunt againſt them, daily conſulting with his wife, whom he ſhould incite againſt them.

Glaphyra Alexanders wife encreaſed their malice euery day, recounting her owne nobility, and bearing her ſelfe aboue all that were in the whole kingdom: for ſhe deriued her pedigree by the fathers ſide, from Timenus; by the mothers ſide, from Hyſtaſpis his ſonne called Darius: inueying very much againſt the baſeneſſe of Herods wiues, and his ſiſter, who were choſen for their beauty, and not for their nobility of birth. For Herod (as we haue ſaid) had many wiues, both for that it was lawfull by the cuſtome of their countrey, and becauſe Herod delighted in many; and all of them hated Alexander, for Glaphyras pride and contumelious ſpeeches. And Ariſtobulus made Salome his enemy, although ſhe was his wiues mother: for ſhee was before mooued by Glaphyras ſpeeches, and he often vpbraided his wife with her baſe birth, ſtill telling her that he had married a priuate woman, and his brother Alexander a Queene. And his wife often with weeping teares told this to her mother: adding moreouer, that Alexander and Ariſtobulus threatned, that if they got the kingdome, they would make their other brethrens mothers weaue with their maides; and that they would make them notaries of villages, deriding that they applied themſelues to learning. Salome mooued hereat, could not containe her ſelfe, but told all to Herod, who eaſily beleeued her, becauſe ſhe ſpake againſt her ſonne in law. Moreouer, another accuſation was laid to their charge, whereat the King was greatly moued: for he was enformed that Alexander and Ariſtobulus did often bewaile their mother, and lament her hard hap with ſighes, and curſed him: and that often when he beſtowed ſome of Mariammes cloathes vpon his latter wiues, they threatned that in ſhort time in ſtead of princely attire, they ſhould weare a black habit. Whereupon Herod, though he feared the conſtant minds of the young men, yet becauſe he would not take away all hope of amendment, he called them vnto him (for he was to ſaile to Rome) and as a King threatned them in few words, and like a father gaue them many admonitions, and requeſted them to loue their brethren, promiſing them forgiueneſſe of their former offences, ſo that hereafter they amended all: But they beſeeching him not to beleeue accuſations forged againſt them vpon malice, and anſwering that the effect of matters would eaſily acquite them, requeſted him not ſo eaſily to beleeue tales, but refuſe to giue malignant people opportunity and recourſe vnto him: for that there would alwaies be ſome that would maliciouſly inuent tales to tell, whileſt there was any one that would giue them the hearing and beleeuing thereof. For they knew that Salome was their enemy, and Pheroras their vncle, and both of them bare cruell minds, and were hard-hearted; and eſpecially Pheroras, who was fellow with his brother of all, ſauing only the Crowne, and had his owne reuenues amounting to a hundreth talents a yeere, and receiued all fruits of the whole countrey beyond Iordan, which was giuen him by his brother. Herod alſo had obtained of Cæſar, to make him Tetrarch, and beſtowed vpon him a Princeſſe for his wife, deſpouſing vnto him his wiues ſiſter, after whoſe deceaſe he deſpouſed vnto him his eldeſt daughter, and gaue him three hundreth talents with her for a dowry. But Pheroras fell in loue with his maid, and forſooke a Princeſſe: whereat Herod being angry, married his daughter vnto his brothers ſonne, who was afterwards ſlaine by the Parthians; but Herod preſently pardoned Pheroras offence. Diuers before this time were of opinion that in the lifetime of the Queene, he would haue poiſoned Herod; and Herod although he loued his brother very very well; yet becauſe many who had acceſſe vnto him told him ſo, he began to miſdoubt: and ſo examining many that were ſuſpected, laſtly he came to Pheroras friends, and none of them confeſſed it: yet they confeſſed that he was determined to flye vnto the Parthians with her whom he was ſo in loue withall, and that Coſtabarus, Salomes husband was priuy thereunto, vnto whom the King married her, after her firſt husband for ſuſpicion of adultery was put to death. Salome her ſelfe alſo was not free from accuſation: for Pheroras accuſed her that ſhe had contracted matrimony with Syllæus, who was Procurator to Oboda, King of Arabia, who was a great enemy of the Kings: and ſhe being conuicted both of this and all things elſe, whereof her brother Pheroras accuſed her, yet obtained pardon, as likewiſe Pheroras did: ſo that the whole tempeſt of all their family was turned againſt Alexander, and light vpon his head.

The King had three Eunuches whom he loued dearly, and euery one knowne by their offices: for one of them was his butler; the other was his cooke; and the third got him to bed, and lay with him: theſe three Alexander with great gifts ouercame. Which the King vnderſtanding, by torments forced them to confeſſe it, and declared with what promiſes they were thereto by Alexander induced, and how he had deceiued them: affirming that there was no truſting to Herod who was a ſhameleſſe old man; and that he died his haire, to make himſelfe ſeeme young: and that he in deſpite of him would be his Succeſſor, and then he would be reuenged vpon his enemies, and make his friends happy, and eſpecially them: and that the whole Nobility did ſecretly obey him, and the Captaines of the army and Gouernours did priuily come vnto him. Hereat Herod was ſo terrified, that he durſt not preſently diuulge their confeſſions, but night and day he ſent ſpies to learne what was ſaid or done; and whom he ſuſpected, them he preſently killed: ſo that his whole Kingdome was full of iniquity. For euery one as his malice mooued him, fained calumniations, and many deſirous of blood-ſhed, abuſed the Kings wrath as they pleaſed againſt their enemies, and credit was giuen to euery lie, and no man was ſo ſoone accuſed, but preſently he was puniſhed; and he who preſently before accuſed others, was now accuſed himſelfe, and carried to be puniſhed with him whom he accuſed. For the Kings perils ſhortned the time of triall for their liues, and he became ſo tyrannous, that he afforded not a good looke vnto them that were not accuſed, and ſhewed himſelfe moſt fierce and violent euen to his deareſt friends: ſo that he baniſhed many out of his Kingdome, and railed againſt ſuch as he had no power ouer. Antipater increaſed this miſchiefe more and more, and gathering together a great company of his friends, he omitted no kind of calumniation. The King likewiſe was terrified by the rumors and tales of pickthankes, that he thought alwayes that hee ſaw Alexander before him with a drawne ſword. For which cauſe hee ſuddenly tooke him and caſt him in priſon, and tortured his friends, many of which died in torments, becauſe they would not confeſſe more then in conſcience was true: others not able to endure the torments, were forced to confeſſe that Alexander and his brother Ariſtobulus thought to haue wrought treaſon againſt their father, and that they expected their time till he went a hunting; reſoluing in themſelues that hauing kild him, they would preſently flie to Rome. Although theſe and ſuch like calumniations were no waies probable, yet extremitie of paine forced men extempore to inuent them, and the King willingly beleiued them, as it were comforting himſelfe thereby, in that hee might not bee thought to haue impriſoned his ſonne vniuſtly. Alexander perceiuing that it was impoſſible for him to aboliſh his fathers ſuſpicion, thought it better to yeeld himſelfe guilty: and ſo wrote foure books againſt his aduerſaries, and confeſſed the treaſon: affirming that he had many partakers therein, namely, Pheroras, and Salome, who were the chiefe; auouching that before that time he had had the vſe of her body in the night time: and how though he himſelfe was vnwilling, yet ſhe forced him therunto. Now the bookes came vnto Herods hands, which charged the greateſt amongſt the Nobility with moſt hainous matters. Archelaus fearing his ſon in law and daughter to be in great danger, ſpeedily came into Iudæa, and ingeniouſly appeaſed the Kings wrath: for ſo ſoone as hee came vnto Herod, he cried, Where is that wicked ſonne in law of mine, or where may I ſee the face of that wretch that goeth about to murther his father, that I may teare him in pieces with mine owne hands, and marry my daughter anew to a better husband? for although ſhee be not priuy to his counſell, yet is ſhee defiled, for that ſhe was wife to ſuch a man. Nay I admire thy patience who art in ſuch danger, and ſuffereſt Alexander yet to liue: for I came thus haſtily out of Cappadocia, thinking hee had beene put to death, to talke with thee concerning my daughter, whom I married to him for thy ſake and honour. Wherefore now let vs take counſell what to doe with them both: and ſeeing thou art too fatherlike and not able to puniſh thy ſonne, thy treacherous ſonne; let vs change roomes, and let me be in thy place to reuenge thee: with ſuch like inuectiues

he deceiued Herod (though otherwise firme in his purpose.) Then Herod shewed him the bookes that Alexander had writ: and reading euery chapter with deliberation, Archelaus took occasion fit for his purpose; and by little and little laid all the fault on Pheroras, and those that were accused in the book. And perceiuing the King to giue eare vnto him, let vs (quoth he) consider whether the yong man was not circumuented by the treachery of so many lewd persons, & not thou by the yong man: for there appeares no cause why he should fall into such wickednes, who now enioyed the kingdome and hoped to succeed thee therein, had hee not beene perswaded thereto by other men, who seeing him a yong man, entised him vnto such naughtines. For wee see that through such men, not only yong men, but also old men, and most noble families, yea, & whole kingdoms are ruinated. Herod vpon these speeches began somewhat to relent, so that he appeased his wrath toward Alexander, and encreased it towards Pheroras; for he was as it were the subiect of the whole booke. Who perceiuing the King so to trust to Archelaus friendship, that hee was led by him to doe what he pleased; leauing Alexander, he in humble manner came to Archelaus, seeking impudently for succor at his hands, of whom he had not deserued any fauour. Archelaus answered him, that he knew no waies to obtain his pardon, who was guilty of so hainous crimes, and conuicted manifestly to haue practised high treason against the Kings owne person, and to bee the cause of all these miseries that had now befallen the yong man, except that hee would lay aside all subtile dealing, and denying of his fact, and confesse the crimes whereof hee was accused; and so in humble wise go vnto his brother who loued him dearely, and craue pardon; promising him that if hee would so doe, hee would do him what good he could. Hereupon Pheroras obeyed Archelaus his counsell, and putting on a blacke attire, he in pitifull manner and with teares prostrated himselfe at Herods feete, and craving pardon, obtained it, confessing himselfe to be a most wicked and vile person, and to be guilty of all that which was obiected against him, and that the cause which moued him to do all those things, was the frantick and mad fits he fell into for the loue of that woman. Now when Pheroras became his owne accuser, and a witnes against himselfe, then Archelaus endeauoured to mitigate Herods wrath towards him, and excuse his faults with fit examples: for he alleadged that his brother attempted greater matters against him, whom notwithstanding for natures cause he pardoned: adding that in euery Kingdome as in mighty bodies, alwaies some part began to swell, which notwithstanding was not presently to be cut off, but to be cured by easie meanes.

Herod is incensed against his brother Pheroras.

Archelaus vsing many speeches vnto Herod to this purpose, at last quite appeased his wrath toward Pheroras, still counterfeiting himselfe to bee angry with Alexander, affirming that hee would take his daughter away with him, till at last he forced Herod of his owne accord to entreat for the young man, requesting him againe to despouse his daughter vnto him. Archelaus after much entreaty answered, that hee was willing that the King should bestow his daughter vpon any saue Alexander, for hee greatly esteemed the law of affinity. Herod replied, that if hee did not diuorce his daughter from Alexander, hee should thinke that hee bestowed his sonne vpon him: for they had no children, and his daughter was dearely loued of the young man; so that if hee would permit her to stay still there, for her sake he would pardon all Alexanders offences. Hereto Archelaus with much adoe agreed, and so was reconciled vnto his sonne in law, and he vnto his father. Yet Herod affirmed that he must needs be sent to Rome to speake with Cæsar, for he had written the whole matter vnto Cæsar. Thus Archelaus craftily deliuered his sonne in law from danger, and after his reconciliation was made, they spent the time in feasting and mirth. Vpon Archelaus departure, Herod gaue him seuenty talents, and a Throne of pure gold, adorned with precious stones, and Eunuches, and a concubine named Panichis; and rewarded euery one of his friends according to their deserts. And all the Kings kinred by the Kings appointment and consent, bestowed rich gifts vpon Archelaus, and both hee and all his Nobility accompanied him to Antiochia.

Eurycles the Lacedemonian secretly accuseth Alexander to his father, and is the cause of his death.

Not long after, there came one into Iudæa far more subtile then Archelaus, who both disannulled the reconciliation made for Alexander, and caused his death also. This man was a Lacedemonian borne named Eurycles, who by mony sought to haue obtained the Kingdome. This man brought vnto Herod rich gifts as it were for a bait of that he intended; hee had so behaued himselfe in Greece, that it could no longer tolerate his excesse: and Herod againe rewarded him with farre greater gifts then those were that he gaue him: but hee esteemed his liberality as nothing, except hee bought it with the blood of Princes. For which cause hee circumuented the King, partly by flattering him, partly by praising him fainedly, and especially by his owne craft and subtiltie: and quickly perceiuing his inclination, he both in word and deed sought to please him;

so

A so that the King accounted him among his chiefeſt friends. For both the King and all the Nobility honoured him the more for his countrey ſake, in that he was a Lacedemonian. But he very eaſily perceiuing the feeble ſtay of Herods houſe, and the hatred betweene the brethren, and how the King was affected towards euery one of them, he firſt of all entertained himſelfe at Antipaters houſe, making a ſhew in the meane while of good will towards Alexander, pretending and proteſting, that in times paſt he had been Archelaus companion; and by this meanes he quickly crept into fauour with him, as an approued friend: which was the cauſe that he was ſuddenly entertained for a faithfull man. He preſently likewiſe brought him into friendſhip with Ariſtobulus; and hauing ſounded euery mans diſpoſition, he accommodated himſelfe to all humors: and to begin

Eurycles by fained friendſhip deceiueth Alexander.

B withall, he became Antipaters penſioner, and a traytor to Alexander. And he often vſed hot words to Antipater, as it were chiding him, that he being eldeſt of the brethren, ſo ſlenderly looked after them, who pretended to put him beſides the Crowne, which was his right. He many times likewiſe vſed the like words to Alexander, admiring him who was borne of a Queene, and husband to a Queen, and yet would permit ſuch a one who was deſcended of a priuate woman to ſucceed in the Kingdome, eſpecially ſeeing he had ſuch occaſion and opportunity to effect the contrary: for he might aſſure himſelfe of Archelaus his helpe in any thing. Alexander ſuppoſed he had ſpoke as he thought, becauſe he counterfeited friendſhip with Archelaus: ſo that hee miſdoubting nothing, diſcloſed vnto him all his mind concerning Antipater, ſaying, that it was no wonder though Herod diſinherited them of the Kingdome, ſith beforetime he had ſlaine their mother.

C Eurycles, counterfeiting himſelfe both to pitty them, and to be ſorrowfull for their miſchance, enticed Ariſtobulus to ſpeake the like: and hauing animated them both to complaine in this ſort againſt their father, he preſently went to Antipater, and diſcloſed to him all their ſecrets, forging alſo the treachery which thoſe two brethren intended againſt him, which was to diſpatch him with their ſwords. For this cauſe Antipater gaue him a great ſumme of money, and commended him to his father, and being hired to effect the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, hee himſelfe became their accuſer: Whereupon hee came to Herod, and told him how in regard of thoſe benefits hee had receiued at his hand, hee would now beſtow his life vpon him, and the light of this world for recompence of his hoſpitality; affirming that Alexander had lately ſtretched out his hand with his ſword drawne to kill him, and hee onely was the cauſe that hee performed it

D not, ſtaying his hand, and promiſing him to aſſiſt him in the matter: adding that Alexander vſed theſe ſpeeches; That Herod was not contented to enioy a Kingdome which was another mans right, nor yet as it were to diſmember his Kingdome after Mariammes death, but hee would alſo leaue the Kingdome, belonging vnto their anceſtors, vnto a pernicious baſtard, Antipater: and for that cauſe hee would reuenge Hircanus and Mariammes death: And that it was not conuenient to receiue the Kingdome from ſuch a father without blood; and euery day hee had occaſion giuen him ſo to do: for he could ſpeake nothing without calumniation. For if any mention were made at any time of any ones Nobility, preſently he was vpbraided without cauſe, for his father would preſently ſay, There is none noble but Alexander, whoſe fathers baſe birth is a ſhame and diſcredit vnto him. And that going a hunting, if he held his peace, his father was offended; if

E he praiſed, then it was ſaid he mocked: ſo that in euery thing he found his fathers affection turned from him, and that he was onely fauourable to Antipater: ſo that he would die with all his heart, if he failed of his purpoſe; if he kild him, his father in law Archelaus would worke his ſafety, to whom he might eaſily flee. And after, he would goe to Cæſar (who as yet knew not Herods manners) for he would not ſtand before him then, as hee did before, being terrified becauſe his father was preſent: neither would he onely ſpeake of his owne wrongs, but of the wrongs of the whole nation, who were oppreſſed by exactions euen vnto death. And then he would lay open in what pleaſure, and after what ſort the money gotten with blood was conſumed: and who and what kind of men they were, that were thereby enriched; and what was the cauſe of the affliction of the city: and that there he would bewaile the death of his vncle, and his mother, and vn-

F fold all Herods wickedneſſe: which being once made manifeſt vnto the world, no man would account him a murtherer of his father. Eurycles hauing falſely reported this of Alexander, fell preſently to praiſe and extoll Antipater, affirming that he onely loued his father, and hindered ſuch practices.

Another falſe accuſation of Alexander and his brother, moues Herod to indignation.

The King, yet not thorowly appeaſed for that which had paſt, grew into an exceeding agony, and Antipater once againe ſuborned other falſe witneſſes againſt them, who affirmed that they were wont to haue ſecret talke with Iucundus and Tyrannius, who ſometime were Generals of the Kings horſemen, who were then diſplaced for ſome offence they had committed. Whereupon

Herod being very angry, presently tortured them: and they affirmed, that they were ignorant of G all that which was laid to their charge. But there was found and brought to the King a letter, as though it had beene written by Alexander, vnto the Gouernour of the castle of Alexandrium; requesting him, that he would receiue him and his brother Aristobulus into the Castle, when he had killed his father, and to assist them both with weapons and other necessaries. Alexander af-firm'd, that this letter was counterfeited by Diophantus, the Kings Secretary, who was both bold, and could counterfeit any ones hand; and hauing counterfeited many, was at last for the same put to death.

Diophantus the Kings notary, writeth fained letters in Alexanders name.

Herod caused the Gouernour of the Castle to be tortured, but he confessed nothing that was laid against him: and although he had no good proofe of any thing, yet he commanded his two H sonnes to bee kept in hold. He likewise called Eurycles (who was the bane of his house, and the breeder of all the mischiefe) author of his safety, and one who had well deserued at his hands, and gaue him fifty talents: who, departing from Iudæa before matters were well knowne, went to Archelaus, and faining that hee had reconciled Alexander and Herod, hee receiued there a piece of money. From thence he went into Achaia, and spent that he had euilly gotten, in as bad manner as he got it. Lastly, hee was accused vnto Cæsar, that he had caused dissension in all Achaia, and spoiled the cities: for which cause he was banished. And this was the punishment which was inflicted vpon him for Alexander and Aristobulus troubles.

Cous Euaratus.

It is not amisse heere in this place, to compare Euaratus of Cous, vnto this Eurycles: who being a deare friend vnto Alexander, and arriuing about the same time that Eurycles did, being I put to his oath, sware that he heard the young men say nothing: yet his oath nothing preuailed nor profited them poore soules. For Herod would onely heare and giue eare vnto accusations; and he highly esteemed them that would beleeue them with him, and shew themselues moued thereat.

Ant. l. 16. c. 12.

Moreouer, Salome increased his cruelty towards his sonnes: for Aristobulus minding to bring her into the same trouble with himselfe, who was his mother in law and his Aunt, sent vnto her, willing her to looke to herselfe, as though the King was minded to put her to death. Who being now cald in question for the matters whereof shee was before accused, to wit, that shee purposed to marry with the Kings enemy, Syllæus the Arabian, to whom she priuily reuealed the Kings secrets: this was the vtter ruine of the young men, wherewithall they were ouerthrowne, as it were K with a violent tempest. For presently Salome went vnto the King, and told him what Aristobulus had admonished her of: and he being now outrageous, caused both his sonnes to bee bound and imprisoned in seuerall places. Then sent he Volumnius, who was the Generall of his Army, and Olympus, one of his familiar friends, vnto Cæsar, to carry the informations against his sonnes in writing: who saying to Rome, after their arriuall deliuered the Kings letters. And Cæsar was very sorry for the young men, yet he permitted the father to doe what he would with his children:
and so wrote vnto him, that he should haue licence to doe what he thought good: yet he signified vnto him, that he should doe better to call his Nobles together, and let them make enquiry concerning the treasons: and then if he found them guilty of those things whereof they were accused, to put them to death. L

Ant. l. 16. c. 13. Herod gathereth a councell against Alexander & Aristobulus.

Hereupon Herod, according to Cæsars letters and appointment, came vnto Berytum, and there gathered an assembly to sit in iudgement; the chiefe in that iudgement were the Gouernours that Cæsar in his letters appointed, Saturninus and Pedanius Embassadours, and with them Volum-nius, Procurator: next, the Kings kinred, and Salome and Pheroras: and then the Nobility of Syria, Archelaus onely excepted, who because he was father in law to his sonne, Herod suspected him to be partiall. But he suffred not his sonnes to come into iudgement: for he knew that the very sight of them would haue moued all men to compassion. And moreouer, if they were permitted to speake for themselues, that then Alexander would easily haue acquited them both: for which cause they were kept in Platan, in a castle of Sidonia. The King beginning his oration, was as vehement, as though they had beene present against whom he spake; and he was halfe afraid to ob- M iect any treason against them, for that he had no proofe thereof: and therefore he prosecuted their opprobrious words, iniuries and offences, which they had committed against him, the which he affirmed to be more grieuous then death.

Herod accuseth his sons in open iudgement.

At last (when no man contradicted him) hee began to lament, as though by ouercomming in such sort, himselfe was also ouercome, and thereupon requested euery one to giue their verdict.
And first of all Saturninus condemned his sons, but not to die: saying, that he had three sons present, and he thought it not lawfull to adiudge other mens sons to death. The two Legats also affirmed,

firmed the ſame, and many followed their aduice: But Volumnius was the firſt that pronounced the ſorrowfull ſentence: after whom all the reſt followed, ſome to flatter Herod, ſome for hatred they bare him, but none for any indignation againſt the yong men. Then all Iudæa and Syria expected an end of this tragedy; yet no man thought Herod to be ſuch a tyrant, as that he would haue put his two ſonnes to death. Herod cauſed his ſonnes to be brought to Tyre, and from thence by ſhip he conuayed them to Cæſarea, bethinking himſelfe what death he ſhould put them to. In the meane time, there was an old ſouldier of the Kings, named Tiro, who had a ſonne belonging to Alexander, and highly in his fauour, and he himſelfe greatly loued the two young men: who being very much grieued in minde at that which had paſt, went about, crying, that iuſtice was troden vnder foot, truth oppreſt, that nature was confounded, and the life of man full of iniquitie; and whatſoeuer elſe griefe put into his minde, who nothing eſteemed his owne life. At laſt, this Tiro came boldly to the King, and ſaid vnto him: O King, thou ſeemeſt to me moſt vnhappy, who doeſt giue credit to wicked and vile perſons againſt thy deareſt ſons. For Pheroras and Salome thou beleeueſt before thine owne children, whom notwithſtanding thou haſt often found to haue deſerued death; and thou perceiueſt not that they doe this, to the intent to make thee want lawfull ſucceſſors, and leaue thee none but Antipater, whom they with their hearts would haue King, becauſe they can rule him as they liſt. But bethinke thy ſelfe (O King) how all thy ſouldiers will hate him for the death of his two brethren; for there is no man that doth not pitie the two young men, and many of the Nobilitie are diſpleaſed hereat. After he had ſpoken this, he named them who were diſpleaſed: whereupon the King commanded them, and him, and his ſonne to be laid hold on: and preſently one of the Kings Barbers, named Tryphon, ſhewing himſelfe to be in I know not what fury, came forth, and ſaid vnto Herod; Tiro perſwaded me to kill thee with my razour, promiſing me, that if I would ſo do, Alexander would giue me great rewards. Herod hearing this, cauſed Tiro and his ſonne, and the Barber to be tortured; and they denyed all, & the Barber affirmed nothing more then he had already ſaid. Then he commanded Tiro to be more tormented. Whereupon his ſonne, mooued with compaſſion towards his father, promiſed to diſcloſe all the matter to the King, ſo that he would pardon his father: who being releaſed of his torments, preſently declared how his father through Alexanders meanes and procurement was purpoſed to haue kil'd him. Many that were preſent thought this was a deuice of the young man, to free his father from torments: and yet others were perſwaded that it was true. Vpon this, Herod made a ſpeech vnto the people, wherein he inueighed againſt the Gouernours of his army, and Tiro, and made the people arme themſelues, and kill both them and the Barber with ſtaues and ſtones. Now he ſent his ſonnes vnto Sebaſte, which was not farre from Cæſarea, and there he cauſed them to be ſtrangled: and hauing quickly diſpatcht the matter, he cauſed them to be brought into the Caſtle Alexandrium, there to be buried with their mothers vncle. And this was the end of Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

BVT Antipater now hoping without all controuerſie to ſucceed in the kingdome, was generally hated of the whole nation: for it was openly knowne, that he by falſe calumniations had cauſed his brethrens deaths. And on the other ſide, hee ſtood in no little feare of his brothers children, whom he perceiued now to begin to grow to yeeres: for Alexander had by Glaphyra two ſonnes, Tigranes and Alexander: and Ariſtobulus had by Bernice, daughter to Salome, fiue children, to wit, three ſonnes, Herod, Agrippa and Ariſtobulus, and two daughters, Herodias and Mariamme. Herod, after he had put Alexander to death, ſent away Glaphyra with her dowry into Cappadocia, and married Bernice Ariſtobulus his wife vnto Antipaters vncle: for Antipater deuiſed this match to become friends with Salome, whom he before-time hated and enuyed. Hee alſo by his great gifts ſought to get Pheroras fauour, and the friendſhip of ſuch as were friends vnto Cæſar, ſending to that end great ſummes of money vnto Rome. Hee gaue Saturnius and all the reſt great riches in Syria. But the more he gaue, the more he was hated of all men: for euery one iudged that he did not conſume ſuch wealth, for that he was liberall, but that he lauiſhed it out for feare, ſo that he got not the loue of them, vpon whom he beſtowed it; & they to whom he gaue nothing, were ſo much the more his enemies. Yet he became euery day more bountifull, ſeeing, againſt his expectation, Herod made much of their children, whoſe parents he had ſlaine; intending to ſhew how much he repented their deaths, by the pitie and and compassion he tooke vpon their children. For assembling together his friends, he caused the children to be placed by him, and the teares standing in his eyes, he said: Hard, cruell, and sinister fortune tooke away from me the fathers of these children: but I pitie to see them orphans, and naturall affection commendeth them vnto me. Wherefore I will endeuour, that seeing I haue bin an infortunate father, I may be a wiser and happier grandfather, and leaue them who are most deare vnto mee, to raigne after me. Wherefore brother Pheroras, I betroth thy daughter vnto Alexanders eldest sonne, that for that cause thou maist be carefull to prouide for him, and assist him: and vnto thy sonne Antipater I assure the daughter of Aristobulus, that so thou maist bea father to her who wants a father; and my sonne Herod, whose mothers vncle was high Priest, shall marry with her sister. And this is my will and pleasure touching this matter, and let no man who loueth mee seeke to alter this. And I beseech Almightie God, for the good of my countrey, and of these my nephews, to prosper these marriages, and to looke vpon these children with a more fauourable eye then he did their fathers. Hauing thus spoken, he wept, and ioyned the childrens hands, and courteously saluting euery one, he dismissed the Councell.

Vpon this, Antipater was amazed, and all the Orphans well perceiued how sorrowfull he was. For now he thought himselfe dishonored by his father, and that his good fortune was endangered, seeing that Alexanders sonne was like to haue both Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrarch to assist him. Moreouer, he considered how he was hated, and how the people did compassionate the children, for that they were fatherlesse; and affected them, remembring their fathers who were dead, & were terrified at his wickednesse. Wherefore he attempted all meanes possible to breake off the marriages, yet hee feared to insinuate any thing to his father cunningly, who was now very seuere, and wary, and mistrustfull. And therefore went openly vnto him to make his humble sute, and request him, that he would not leaue him without honour, nor depriue him of that dignitie, which before-time he had iudged him worthy of, giuing him onely the bare Title of a King, and leauing the substance of the kingdome in other mens powers. For it would bee impossible for him to obtaine the kingdome, if Alexanders sonne (beside Archelaus his fauour) were by marriage made sonne in law vnto Pheroras. Wherefore he earnestly besought him, that seeing he had a great many daughters, to change the marriages: for the King had nine wiues, and by seuen of them he had children: Antipater by Doris, Herod by Mariamme, daughter of the high Priest, and Antipas and Archelaus by Malthace, the Samaritane, and his daughter Olympias, whom his brother Ioseph married: and by Cleopatra of Ierusalem, Herod and Philip; and by Pallas, Phasaelus: he had two other daughters also, Roxane and Salome; one of them by Phædra, and the other by Elpis. He had likewise two wiues, by whom he had no issue, his cousin, and his neece: and beside these, he had two daughters by Mariamme, sisters to Alexander and Aristobulus. Wherefore Antipater seeing his father had such choice of daughters, hee requested the marriages to be altered.

Herods children by his seuen wiues.

The King, well perceiuing his minde and purpose towards the Orphans, was very angry: and calling to remembrance the misfortune of his sonnes, whom he had put to death, he greatly feared, lest Antipater by some false accusations should ouerthrow them, and so with sharpe words did driue him off for that time; yet afterward he so flattered Herod, that he got the marriages to be altered. And first of all he ioyned Aristobulus daughter with Antipater himselfe, and his son to Pheroras daughter. Heere one may see what Antipater could doe by flattering speeches: for Salome in the like matter could not speed, although shee was his sister, and procured many times Iulia, Cæsars wife, to speake for her, that she might marry with Syllæus the Arabian: yet was not she permitted so to doe. But Herod sware that he would account her as an vtter enemy, except she would desist from that purpose, and afterward against her will he married her vnto one Alexas, a friend of his: and one of her daughters to Alexanders sonne, and the other to Antipaters vncle.

Herod is perswaded by Antipaters flatteries so breake off the marriages.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 3. Antipater buildeth vpon the kingdome.

As for Mariammes daughters, one of them was married to Antipater, his sisters sonne, the other vnto Phasaelus, his brothers sonne. When Antipater had quite ouerthrowne the hope of the Orphans, and ioyned affinitie as he thought good, he now held himselfe on a sure ground: and adding confidence to his malice, he became intolerable to all men. And seeing he could not auoide their hatred, he now sought by feare to worke his owne safety; and so much the more, because Pheroras now assisted him, as one that was confirmed and established for King. Also the women in the Court fell at variance, and raised a new broile: for Pheroras wife, with her mother and her sister, & the mother of Antipater did vse themselues very insolently in many things, abusing also two of the Kings daughters very contumeliously: to which matter she was chiefly set on by Antipater, who hated them, hauing the others at his command, onely Salome hindered their agree-

The women vnderſtanding how ſhe had informed the King, & that Herod was offended thereat, they came no more together openly, and abſtained from their wonted familiarity, and in the Kings hearing fained themſelues to fall out one with another. Antipater alſo made the ſame ſhew, ſo that he ſtucke not openly to offend Pheroras: notwithſtanding, they had meetings and banquets in the night, and the vnity was the more confirmed becauſe they perceiued themſelues to be noted: for Salome knew all this, and told it to the King. The King was very angry, and eſpecially againſt Pheroras wife, whom chiefly Salome blamed: and hauing called together his kinred and friends, he laid many accuſations againſt her before them; and told them how contumeli- Ant. lib. 17.

and that by her poyſon ſhe had made his brother his enemy. And turning himſelfe vnto Pheroras, he asked him whether he had rather haue him for his brother, or haue his wife. And he anſwering, that he had rather dye then loſe his wife: Herod doubtfull what to doe, turned him to Antipater, and commanded him neuer to talke with Pheroras, nor his wife, nor any one belonging to them after that time. But he obeyed his fathers command openly in ſhew, but ſecretly lay in their houſe: and fearing that Salome ſhould perceiue it, he by his friends in Italy cauſed himſelfe to make a voyage to Rome, by letters brought to Herod, wherein it was commanded, that ſhortly after the receit thereof, Antipater ſhould be ſent to Rome vnto Cæſar. But Syllæus the Arabian, neglecting Cæſars commandement, at the ſame time ſayled to Rome, there to contend with Antipater, about matters which were before in controuerſie betweene him and Nicholaus. He had alſo a great contention with Aretas his King, whoſe friends he had ſlaine, and alſo Soemus, the moſt potent in all the towne of Petra: and ſeeing Fabatus, Cæſars Procurator, he vſed his fauour alſo againſt Herod. But Herod giuing Fabatus a greater ſumme of money, alienated him from Syllæus, and by this meanes diſpatched that which Cæſar commanded: and becauſe Fabatus reſtored nothing to him, he accuſed him that he was Procurator, not for Cæſar, but for Herod: wherewith Fabatus was mooued; and being as yet in great Fabatus, Cæſars Gouernour, diſcouereth Syllæus ſecrets.
D eſtimation with Herod, he did diſcloſe Syllæus his ſecrets, and ſignified to the King, how that Syllæus corrupted Corinthus, one of his guard, whom he willed to be taken and kept in hold. And the King followed his counſell: for this Corinthus, though hee was alwaies brought vp in the Kings Court, yet was he borne in Arabia. Wherefore he preſently tooke him, and two other Arabians that were found with him; one of them was Syllæus friend, and the other, Phylarchus: who vpon their examination, confeſſed that Corinthus for a great ſumme of money was hyred to kill the King. After this, they were ſent to Saturnius, Gouernour of Syria, and from him to Rome.

How HEROD ſhould haue beene poyſoned, and how it was knowne.

At which time Herod ſhewed his patient and humble minde: for he ter he dyed: and although Herod loued him vntill his dying day, yet was it bruted abroad that he poyſoned him. Herod cauſed his body to be brought vnto Ieruſalem, and commanded all his nation to mourne, and buried him with a ſumptuous funerall. And thus one of the murtherers of Alexander and Ariſtobulus came to his end: but ſhortly after, the reuenge of that wicked fact did fall vpon Antipater, who was the chiefe author thereof: it did but begin with Pheroras. For Ant. l. 17. c. 5.

certaine that belonged to Pheroras came in mournefull wiſe vnto Herod, and complained vnto him, how that his brother Pheroras was poiſoned, and that one of his wiues gaue him meat that was not seasoned after the accustomed manner: which when he had eaten, he presently fell sicke. And that two daies before his death, there came a Witch out of Arabia, who was sent for by his mother and his sister, to giue Pheroras a loue potion, and shee in stead thereof, through Syllæus inducements, gaue him poyson, for shee was of Syllæus acquaintance.

The confession of the women in their tortures.

The King daunted with so many suspicions, caused diuers of Pheroras maids and libertines to be put to torments, and one of them impatient herein, exclaimed in this wise: O thou God, Ruler of heauen and earth, reuenge vs vpon Antipaters mother, who is the cause of these our euils! When the King vnderstood thus much, he ceased not to search out the truth: and then the women disclosed Antipaters mothers familiaritie with Pheroras and his women, and their secret meetings: and that Pheroras and Antipater, after they came from the King, vsed to drinke with them all night long, not suffering any seruant or maide to be in the roome with them; and one of the Libertines wiues reuealed this. And when euery one of the maids were tortured apart, all their examinations agreed; so that now it was euident wherefore Antipater had compacted to goe to Rome, and Pheroras beyond the riuer Iordan. For they were often wont to say, that Herod hauing killed Alexander and Aristobulus, now he would come to them and their wiues: and that it was vnlike that he would spare any one, who spared not Mariamme and her sonnes: and therefore it was best to flee as farre as it was possible from such a beast. And that Antipater was wont often to complaine vnto his mother, that now he grew gray-haired, and his father waxed young and lusty; and that it might so chance, that he should neuer liue to be King; or if euer his father dyed, he should enioy the pleasure of the kingdome but a short time. And moreouer, the heads of Hydra, that is to say, Alexanders and Aristobulus sonnes, began to spring vp againe: and that his father had iniuriously cut off all hope from his sonnes, appointing none of them to succeed him but the sonne of Mariamme: wherein he was perswaded that he doated, if so be he thought his will should be of force; for hee would take such an order, that hee would haue none of all his progeny aliue, and that Herod was the greatest hater of his sonnes of any father in the world: and was not therewithall contented, but he also hated his owne brethren. Furthermore, that he not long agoe gaue him an hundreth talents that hee should haue no conference with Pheroras: and when Pheroras asked wherein they hurt him, Antipater answered, I would to God that he would take away all men else, and leaue onely vs two naked, so that he would grant vs life: but, quoth hee, it is impossible to escape this dangerous beast, who will not suffer men openly to shew friendship to one another. Lastly, though wee now secretly meet, yet if wee beare the hearts and hands of men, the time will be when we may talke and meet openly. The maids in torments disclosed these speeches, and that Pheroras was determined to flee with them into Petra. Herod beleeued all their sayings, and the rather for that which was said concerning the hundreth talents. For he said nothing of them to any one but to Antipater.

Doris, Antipaters mother is spoyled of her iewels, and thrust out of the palace.

And first of all hee bent his fury against Doris, Antipaters mother: and taking from her all the ornaments which he had bestowed vpon her, and bought with many talents, he banisht her. When his wrath was somewhat appeased, he released Pheroras maids from torments: and now he became timorous & fearefull, and prone to any suspicion, torturing many that were innocent, for feare he should let any escape that were guiltie. Hereupon he set vpon Antipater the Samaritane, who was Procurator for his sonne Antipater; who through torments confessed that his sonne Antipater had procured poyson out of Ægypt to kill him, by the meanes of a friend of Antiphilus; which poyson Theudion, Antipaters vncle, tooke of him, and deliuered to Pheroras: whom Antipater charged to dispatch Herod whilst he was at Rome, far from suspicion, and that Pheroras gaue his wife the poyson to keepe. Wherefore the King calling for her, commanded her to bring forth that which was deliuered vnto her. And she, making as though she would haue gone forth to fetch it, cast her selfe downe from a house toppe, thereby to preuent the torments, which, if shee were conuicted, they would inflict vpon her. But by the prouidence of GOD (as it should seeme) it came so to passe that she fell not on her head, but on her side, and so escaped death, to the end that God might inflict punishment vpon Antipater. And being brought vnto the King, so soone as she began to come to her selfe (for she was amazed with the fall) the King demanded of her, wherefore shee had done so, and sware vnto her, that if she would truly disclose all, hee would pardon her for all; but if shee told an vntruth, her body should be torne in pieces with torments, and not be buried. Shee awhile held her peace, and at last said: Wherefore should I keepe any thing secret, seeing Pheroras is dead, to saue Antipater, who hath caused all our ouerthrowes? Heare O King, & God be witnes of the truth hereof, who cannot be deceiued: When I sate weeping by Pheroras, as he lay a dying, he cald me vnto him and said; See, wife, how much

Pheroras wife freely confesseth what was become of the poyson.

A I am deceiued concerning my brothers loue towards me, for I hated and ſought to kill him, who thus loueth me, and ſorroweth ſo much for me, though I am not yet dead: but truly I am iuſtly rewarded for my iniquitie. And now (wife) bring me hither the poyſon which was left by Antipater in thy keeping for my brother, and make it away before my face, that I carry not with me to hell a guiltie conſcience for that crime. So I brought it as he willed mee, and the moſt part of the poyſon I caſt into the fire, where it was conſumed, and kept a little thereof to my ſelfe, for feare of miſchances, and of thee. And hauing thus ſaid, ſhe brought forth a box which had in it a very little of the poyſon. And then the King tortured the brother and mother of Antiphilus, and they alſo confeſſed that Antiphilus brought a box out of Ægypt, & that he receiued poyſon B from his brother, who practiſed Phyſicke at Alexandria. The ghoſts alſo of Alexander and Ariſtobulus went all about the whole kingdome, and became as it were ſpies, to giue notice of ſuch things as were vncertaine; who alſo cauſed thoſe that dwelt in the vttermoſt parts of the kingdome, to come and giue euidence of ſuch things as were ſuſpected. At laſt it was prooued that Mariamme the daughter of the high Prieſt was acquainted with theſe conſpiracies, for her brethren being tortured did confeſſe it. Wherefore the King reuenged the mothers fault vpon her childe: for hauing writ in his Will, that Herod her ſonne ſhould ſucceed Antipater in the kingdome, now for her fault hee blotted that out.

CHAP. XX.

C How Antipaters malicious practices againſt Herod were knowne and reuenged.

AFTER all this, Bathyllus ioyned himſelf with Antipater, as it were to adde the laſt hand vnto all his practices. This Bathyllus was one of his libertines, who brought another ſort of poyſon, to wit, of Aſpes, and the poyſon alſo of other Serpents; that if the firſt prooued too weake and tooke not effect, that then Pheroras and his wife ſhould make an end of the King with theſe. And beſide theſe ſhamefull practices of his againſt his father; hee alſo had letters which he had counterfeited againſt his brethren. For Archelaus and Philip, two of the Kings ſonnes, were at that time at Rome to ſtudy, who were very toward young men: and for that D Antipater feared they might be ſome hinderance to him, in that which he expected, he haſted by all meanes poſſible to make them away. And the better to effect his purpoſe, he counterfeited letters in his friends names that were at Rome, and he for money got others to write, that theſe two young men vſed in taunting wiſe to raile againſt their father, and openly to complaine of the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus: and that they tooke it in bad part that they were ſent for home (for their father ſent word that they ſhould come away) & thereat Antipater was moſt troubled. For he before his departure from Iudæa to Rome, procured ſuch like letters to be forged againſt them at Rome; and ſo deliuering them to his father, that he might auoide all ſuſpicion, ſeemed to excuſe his brethren, affirming ſome things that were written to be lyes; other things to be offences, whereunto young men were prone. At which time he gaue great ſummes of mo- E ney to them in whoſe names he had counterfeited the letters againſt his brethren: hereby as it were hyring them to be ſecret. He gaue them alſo rich apparell, and Tapiſtrie of curious worke: alſo ſiluer and golden cups, with many things more, to the end that by the precious gifts and rewards which he beſtowed, he might haue all things kept cloſe: ſo that at his returne hee made his fathers account that he had ſpent two hundred talents, the greateſt portion whereof was conſumed in following the law againſt Syllæus. Antipaters ſmall faults were all hid by a greater: for all they that had bin tortured, gaue euidence againſt him, how that he practiſed his fathers death, and the letters witneſſed how againe hee went about to make away other two of his brethren: and yet for all this, none of thoſe who came out of Iudæa to Rome, bare him ſo much good will as to giue him intelligence what troubles were in the Court at home, although it was ſeuen F moneths after hee was conuicted, before hee came to Iudæa from Rome. Peraduenture they who were minded to tell him all, were forced to hold their peace by the ghoſts of them who were put to death. At laſt he ſent letters from Rome to his father, that now he would ſhortly returne home, and that Cæſar had diſmiſſed him very honourably. The King deſired greatly that the Traitor were in his power; and fearing that if he had an inkling of any matter, that he would looke to himſelfe, fained great kindneſſe towards him, and ſent backe againe vnto him very louing and familiar letters, willing him to haſten his returne: for if he made haſte, it might be he ſhould obtaine pardon for his mothers offence: for Antipater vnderſtood that ſhe was baniſhed.

Antipater is ſollicited by Herod with many kinde words to haſten his returne.

About this time he receiued a letter at Tarentum, whereby he vnderstood the death of Pheroras; and greatly lamented it, which diuers thought well of. Yet as farre as one may coniecture, the cause of his griefe was, that his treason went not forward as he wished, and he did lament Pheroras so much, as though he had lost one to effect his treachery. Moreouer, he feared lest that which had passed should come to light, and lest the poyson should be found: yet when he came to Cilicia, and there receiued his fathers letters, which before we mentioned, hee then made great haste homeward: yet when he came to Celenderis, he began earnestly to thinke vpon his mothers mishap, his minde as it were presaging some sinister fortune. And the wiser sort of his friends about him counselled him not to goe to his father, till such time as he were certaine for what cause his mother was banished and diuorced. For it was to be feared, that he should be accused also of the same that was laid to his mothers charge: But the vnwiser sort being more desirous to see their countrey, then to bethinke themselues what was expedient for Antipater, admonished him to make haste, lest that his long delay should breed any suspicion in his father, and lest thereby he should giue occasion vnto malignant people to raise vp slanders. For (said they) if any thing hath passed against you, it was in your absence, & were you in presence, no man durst doe nor speake against you; and it were a very vnwise part, for vncertaine suspicions to depriue himselfe of certaine felicity, and not to returne speedily vnto his father, and receiue the kingdome at his hands, who had him in whom onely his hope was. This counsell (for fortune would haue it so) Antipater followed, & so arriued in the hauen of Cæsarea passing Sebaste, where contrary to his expectation, he fell into great sorrow and admiration: for all men eschewed his company, and no man durst come neere him. For although that he was alwaies hated of them, yet then they had liberty to shew their hatred. Many abstained from comming to him for feare of the King: and now the rumour of those things which Antipater had done was knowne in euery Citie, and to euery man, only Antipater himselfe was ignorant thereof. For there was neuer any man brought thither with more maiestie then he, when he was to saile to Rome, nor neuer any man more basely entertained at his returne. And now vnderstanding of the massacre at home, he craftily made himselfe ignorant thereof; and notwithstanding that he was almost dead for feare, yet in his countenance hee counterfeited confidence. For he could not now possibly make any escape, nor rid himselfe out of those present dangers: and yet hee heard no certaine newes of matters at home, nor there: for the King by an Edict had forbidden all men to giue him notice thereof: So that many times he comforted himselfe thus, that either all matters concerning him were yet secret, or if any thing was come to light, that he by policie and impudencie could acquit himselfe thereof; for these two were his refuge and hope. Being thus determined, he went into the Kings palace alone without any of his friends and followers; which at the very first gate were most contumeliously repulsed. And by chance Varus the Ruler of Syria was there within: then hee boldly going in to his father, came neere vnto him, as though hee would haue saluted him. But Herod stretching forth his hand and shaking his head, cryed out, O thou that hast attempted to murther thy father, darest thou yet presume to offer to embrace me, who art guiltie of so many treacheries! God confound thee, wicked wretch, and come not neere me till thou hast cleared thy selfe of all that which is laid against thee: for thou shalt haue iustice, and Varus shall be thy Iudge, who is by good fortune now here. Go and premeditate how to acquit thee against to morrow, for I will giue thy subtill and craftie braine sometime to doe it.

Hereat Antipater was astonished with feare, that he was not able to reply any thing, but so went his way. Presently his mother and his wife came vnto him, and told him all the proofes of treasons against him. Then he calling his wits together, bethought himselfe how to answer euery point. The next day the King caused an assembly of his friends and kinsfolks, and to them admitted Antipaters friends: and he and Varus sitting in iudgement, commanded all proofes to be brought, and witnesses to appeare: amongst whom were certaine of Antipaters mothers seruants, lately apprehended, who had letters from her to carry vnto him, to this effect: Forasmuch as all those things are now known vnto thy father, beware that thou return not vnto him, before thou hast obtained some warrant of thy safetie from Cæsar. These and others being brought in, Antipater also came in with them, and prostrating himselfe before his fathers feet, he said: I beseech thee, O father, beare no preiudicate opinion against me, and lend me an open eare whilest I purge my selfe: for if thou please to giue me leaue, I will proue my self guiltlesse. But Herod with a vehement voice commanding him to hold his tongue, spake thus vnto Varus: I know, Varus, that both thou, or any other iust and indifferent Iudge, will adiudge Antipater to haue deserued death: and I feare me lest you also should disdaine me for my bad fortune, and thinke me worthy

A of all calamities, who haue begotten ſuch ſonnes as you ſee. And yet this ſhould mooue thee ſo much the more to pity mee, who haue beene ſo mercifull and carefull for ſuch wicked caitifes. For I had already appointed thoſe young men that are dead to be Kings, and brought them vp at Rome, and gotten them Cæſars fauour: but they whom I had ſo much honored, and exalted vnto the Crowne, became traitors againſt mine owne life, whoſe death was much auailable to Antipater. For his ſecurity I ſought therin, becauſe he was a young man, and the next that ſhould ſucceed me: but this cruell beaſt being more then full gorged with my ſufferance and patience, hath emptied his ſtomake euen vpon my ſelfe, and thinketh my life too long, and is grieued that I liue to be old, and hath attempted to make himſelfe King, not any other way but by murthering his father.

B And for what cauſe did this come to paſſe? for that I recalled him out of the field, where he was contemptible; and caſting them off whom I had begotten of a Queene, appointed this to be heire of my Kingdome. I confeſſe vnto thee, Varus, my errour: for I incited them againſt me, becauſe that for Antipaters ſake I depriued them of their right. For wherein had I ſo well deſerued of them, as at this mans hands? vnto whom, being yet aliue, I committed the ſway and rule of my Kingdom, and openly in my will and teſtament declared him to be my heir and ſucceſſor, whoſe charges I with mine owne money haue ſtill ſupported, notwithſtanding that I had beſtowed vpon him the yeerely reuenues of fifty talents. And lately when he was to ſail to Rome, I gaue him three hundred talents, and commended him vnto Cæſar, as the onely man of all my houſe, who had preſerued his fathers life. And what was their offence, if it be compared with Antipaters? and C what proofe was there of that, for which they ſuffered? none but that which this man treacherouſly inuented. Nay, I may boldly ſay ſo of him, who hath attempted to murther his father, and now doth hope to colour all againe with craft and deceit: Beware, Varus, that he deceiue not thee: for I know this beaſt, and I euen now ſee by his fained teares, how probable a tale hee will tell. This fellow once warned me, that whileſt Alexander liued, I ſhould beware of him, and not put euery one in truſt with my perſon. This is he who was woont to go before mee in my bedchamber, and looke about in euery corner, leſt ſome ſhould haue lien in wait to haue effected any treaſon againſt me. This is he who watched me in my ſleepe, and through whom I thought my ſelfe ſecure: who comforted mee when I mourned for them that were put to death. This is hee who cenſured the good will of his brethren when they were aliue. This was my defender and D champion. O Varus, when I remember his crafts and ſubtilties, and all his counterfeitings, I ſcarcely thinke my ſelfe aliue, admiring how I eſcaped the hand of ſuch a traitor: and ſeeing that Fortune ſtirreth vp thoſe of mine owne houſe againſt mee, and that thoſe whom I moſt eſteeme of, are my greateſt enemies, I will bewaile mine owne fortune, and alone lament mine owne deſolation; and not one that hath thirſted after my blood ſhall eſcape, although proofe bee brought againſt euery one of my children. And thus his heart being ſurcharged with ſorrow, he was forced to breake off his ſpeech: and preſently he commanded Nicholaus, one of his friends, to ſhew all the proofes and euidences.

Herod loued Antipater aboue the reſt, and beſtowed many benefits on him.

All this while Antipater lay proſtrate at his fathers feete, and lifting vp his head, hee cryed aloud: Thou thy ſelfe, O father, ſufficiently purgeſt me. For how ſhould I bee one who ſought to E murther thee, when thy ſelfe doſt confeſſe, that I alwayes haue preſerued thee from all dangers? Or if, as thou ſaiſt, I did it fainedly, was it probable that I would bee ſo circumſpect in other affairs, and at other times, and now in ſo weighty a matter, play the part of a fooliſh and ſenſeleſſe man? Nay, I might well think, that although ſuch a thought might haue beene kept ſecret from men, yet it could not be hidden from God, who ſeeth all things. Was I ignorant what befell my brethren, whom God ſo puniſht for their wicked intents towards thee? Or what ſhould cauſe me to enuy at thy life? The hope of the Kingdome? Why? I had the Kingdom. Or a ſuſpicion of thy hatred towards me? I knew thou louedſt me. Or any feare which I had of thee? Nay: in obeying thee, I was feared of others. Perhaps want might cauſe me thereto. Much leſſe. For who might ſpend more then I? Truly, if I had been the wickedſt perſon in the world, or the cruF elleſt beaſt vpon the earth, yet ſhould I haue relented, being ouercome by the benefits of ſo louing a father; ſeeing, as thy ſelfe haſt ſaid, thou didſt recall and prefer me before ſo many ſonnes. And thou yet aliue, didſt proclaime me King, and made me a ſpectacle to all men for to emulate, through the benefits thou beſtowedſt vpon me. O wretch that I am! O vnhappy time of my abſence out of my countrey! what a head did I giue to enuy, and what opportunity to malicious and deceitfull people? Yet, O father, it was for thy ſake, & about thy affaires that I went to Rome, that Syllæus might not triumph ouer thy old age. Rome can witneſſe my piety, and Cæſar the Prince of the whole world, who often called mee a louer of my father. Receiue here, O father, his letter, farre truer then these fained calumniations against me: let these shew my affection towards thee: remember how vnwilling I was to saile to Rome, knowing I had heere in thy countrey many secret enemies. Thou like an vnwise father hast cast me away: thou forcedst me to giue enuy time to frame accusations against me: but now I will come to the proofes of these matters. Behold here I am, who notwithstanding a murtherer of my father, yet did I neuer suffer any misfortune by sea nor land: Is not this, O father, a sufficient argument of my innocencie? For I know, father, that before God and thee I am condemned: and being condemned, I beseech thee, giue not credit to reports extracted by torments: let me be burned, inflict all torments vpon me, spare not my wicked body. For if I be a murtherer of my father, I must not die without torments: crying out aloud after this manner, and weeping, he mooued all that were present, and Varus also to compassion; but Herod onely abstained from teares, for his anger gaue attention to the truth. And presently Nicholaus at the Kings commandement making a long speech of Antipaters craft and subtiltie, tooke away all hope of mercy, and began a very bitter accusation, ascribing all mischiefe which had befallen that Kingdome, vnto him, and especially the death of the two brethren, who through his calumniations were made away: affirming also, that he vsed treacherous practices against those who were yet aliue, fearing lest they should seeke to succeed in the Kingdome: for hee who had prepared poyson for his father, would much lesse spare his brethren. And then comming to the proofe of his pretence to poison his father, hee declared in order all euidence thereof, aggrauating his offence by Pheroras; as though Antipater also were the cause why hee purposed to murther his brother; and how hee had corrupted the Kings deareſt friends; and so filled the whole Court with wickednesse. And when he had accused him of many other things, and brought proofe thereof, he ended his speech.

Nicholaus peroration.

Then Varus when he had commanded Antipater to make answer vnto those things, and that he said nothing more, then God is a witnesse of my innocency, hee called for the poyson and gaue it to one that was condemned to die, who hauing drunke thereof, presently dyed. Then Varus talked secretly with Herod, and what was done there in that councel hee wrote vnto Cæsar. Yet notwithstanding when Herod had sent Antipater to prison, he sent messengers vnto Cæsar, to shew him his hard fortune and calamitie. After this it was prooued that Antipater wrought treason against Salome. For one of Antiphilus seruants came from Rome, and brought letters in the name of Acme, who was one of Iulia her maids, which she writ vnto the King, telling him that she found a letter of Salomes amongst Iulias letters; and so for good will shee had sent it him: the letter which she affirmed to be Salomes, contained many bitter inuectiues against Herod, and many accusations. But these letters were written and fained by Antipater, who for money had perswaded Acme so to do, as we haue said: for the letter which she writ to Antipater euidently shewed it to be so: for she wrote as followeth: I haue written vnto thy father as you requested mee, and sent also other letters: and I assure my selfe he will not spare his sister, if he doe but read the letters: and you may do well, seeing I haue performed all your requests, that now you would be mindfull of your promise. This letter against Salome and others being found to be counterfeited, the King began to doubt that Alexander was made away by such counterfeited letters: and hee was very angry that he had almost put his sister to death, through Antipaters deuice. Wherefore he no longer delayed to punish him for all, yet he was hindred by a great sickneſſe from accomplishing his purpose. He also sent letters vnto Cæsar concerning Acme the maid, and Salomes false accusation, and changed his testament, and blotted out the name of Antipater, and in his roome wrote Antipas, leauing out Archelaus and Philippus, who were the elder brethren, becaus Antipater had accused them. And he bequeathed vnto Cæsar a thousand talents, beside many other rich gifts: and to his wife and children, and kinred, and libertines, about fiue hundreth, and gaue euery one a great gift, either in ground or money, and honoured his sister Salome with most rich gifts. And thus he corrected his will.

Another proofe against Antipater.

Herod intendeth Antipaters punishment, & therfore blotteth his name out of his testament.

CHAP. XXI.

Ant. l. 17. c. 8.

Herods disease encreased, partly through age, and especially for his griefe and sorrow: for he was now threescore and ten yeeres old; and his mind was so troubled by the death of his children, that though he were in health, yet he tooke no pleasure in any thing: and his sickneſſe was so much the more grieuous vnto him, because that Antipater was yet aliue; for he purposed to put him to death when he was recouered of his sickneſſe. To encrease his calamitie

A tie, there aroſe a tumult amongſt the people. For there were in the Citie two ſophiſters, who made a ſhew as though they were very skilful in their countrey lawes, and for that were renowmed all ouer the countrey. One of them was named Iudas who was ſonne vnto Sepphoræus: the other was called Matthias ſonne vnto Margalus. Theſe two were followed by a great many young men, ſo that when they expounded the law, they had an aſſembly like a great army, all yong men. Theſe two hearing that the King partly by griefe, and partly by his diſeaſe was very like to die, ſpake vnto their acquaintance, ſaying, that it was now a fit time wherein God might be reuenged, and thoſe things which were made againſt their countrey lawes taken away: for it was a great offence to God to permit the Images or ſhapes, or likeneſſe of any liuing thing to be in the B Temple. This they ſaid, becauſe the King had ſet a golden Eagle vpon the chiefeſt porch of the Temple, which the Sophiſters now willed the young men to take away, ſaying, that it was meritorious, although danger might enſue thereon, yea, euen to dye for their country lawes. For they that dyed for ſuch a cauſe, ſhould haue their ſoules immortall and enioy euerlaſting bliſſe: and that many vnwiſe men ignorant of that doctrine, ſo loued their liues, that they choſe rather to die by ſickneſſe then to ſpend their liues in a vertuous quarrell. Whileſt they ſaid thus, there was a rumour ſpred that the King was now at the laſt caſt: whereat the young men being incouraged, about noone when many were walking in the Temple, they let themſelues downe from the top of the Temple with great ropes, and ſo with hatchets cut downe the Eagle: Whereof the Captaine of the ſouldiers being aduertiſed, accompanied with a great many ſouldiers, went C ſpeedily to the Temple, and tooke almoſt forty of the young men, and carried them to the King. Who firſt of all asked them if they were ſo bold as to cut downe the golden Eagle: and they confeſſed they had done it: then he demanded by whoſe commandement? they anſwered, By the commandement of their countrey lawes. After this it was asked them why they who were preſently to die were ſo ioyfull? they anſwered, For that after death they hoped to enioy many good things & eternall bliſſe. The King hereat greatly mooued with anger, ouercame his diſeaſe and went forth and made a ſpeech to the people, wherein he inueighed againſt them as Church-robbers, and that vnder pretence and colour of their country lawes and religion they attempted great matters, and adiudged them as impious people worthy of death. The people fearing that he would torture many to learne who fauoured that act, requeſted him that firſt the authors of D that crime, and then thoſe that were found guiltie therein ſhould receiue puniſhment: and that he would remit the offence to all the people beſides. The King with much ado entreated, cauſed the young men that let themſelues down in cords, and the Sophiſters to be burned, & the reſt which were taken in that act to be beheaded. After this the Kings ſickneſſe ſpred ouer his whole body, and he was afflicted with moſt grieuous paine: for he had a vehement ague, and an itch ouer all his body, which was intolerable, and a daily collicke, and his feet were ſwollen, as though he had the dropſie: his belly was ſwollen, and priuie members putrified, ſo that wormes bred in the putrified places. He was alſo ſhort-winded, and he was grieuouſly tormented with difficultie of breath, and a conuulſion of the whole body: ſo that ſome ſaid that this was a puniſhment laid vpon him for the death of the two Sophiſters. Herod notwithſtanding he was afflicted with ſo E many and grieuous ſickneſſes, yet was he deſirous to liue, and ſought remedy whereby he hoped for health. At laſt he paſſed ouer Iordan, where he vſed the warme waters of Calliroe which run into the lake of Aſphaltites, and are ſo ſweet that men vſe to drinke of them. There the Phyſicians cauſed his body to be bathed in hot oyle, and it was therewith ſo diſſolued that his ſight failed, and he was as though he were dead: whereat thoſe that were about him being troubled with their cries, cauſed him to looke vp, and now deſpairing of life, he willed fifty Drachmes to be diſtributed vnto euery ſouldier, and great ſummes of money to the Captaines and his friends.

As he returned, when he came to Iericho, hee was in very great likelihood to die of melancholy, and there he deuiſed a wicked fact: for he cauſed the chiefe men of euery towne and village in all Iudæa to be aſſembled together, and then he ſhut them vp in a place called the Hippo- F drome: and calling vnto him Salome his ſiſter, and Alexas her husband; I know, quoth he, that the Iewes will make feaſts for ioy of my death, yet if thou wilt do my command, I ſhall be mourned for, & I ſhall haue a princely funerall. Therefore ſo ſoon as I haue giuen vp the ghoſt, cauſe ſouldiers to compaſſe theſe men, whom I haue here in hold, and kill them all: for ſo all Iudæa, and euery houſhold thereof ſhall againſt their will bewaile my death. As thus he commanded this to be done, the Legates came which he had ſent to Rome, bringing him letters, wherein was ſhewed how Acmes Iulia her maid, was by Cæſars command put to death, and Antipater condemned to die: yet Cæſar writ that if his father had rather baniſh him, he would condeſcend thereun-

to alſo. Herod with this newes was ſomething refreſhed, yet preſently with paine he was ouercome: for he both was troubled with a vehement cough, and almoſt pined with faſting, ſo that he thought to haſten his owne death; and taking an apple in his hand, he called for a knife: for he was accuſtomed to cut the meat which he did eate; and then looking about him, leſt any ſtanding by might hinder him, he lifted vp his arme to ſtrike himſelfe. But Achiabus his couſin ranne haſtily vnto him, and ſtayed his hand: and preſently there was made great lamentation throughout the Kings palace, as though the King had bin dead. Antipater hauing ſpeedy newes hereof, was glad, and tooke courage, and promiſed the Keepers a piece of money to let him goe. But the chiefeſt of them did not onely deny to doe it, but alſo went preſently to the King, and told him all what Antipater requeſted. Herod hearing this, lifted vp his voice with more ſtrength then was meete for a ſicke man, and commanded his guard to goe and kill Antipater, and bury him in the Caſtle called Hircanium. And then againe he altered his teſtament, and writ Archelaus his eldeſt ſonne, who was brother to Antipas, for King, and appointed Antipas for Tetrarch. Fiue daies after the death of his ſonne Antipater, Herod dyed: hauing raigned thirty and foure yeeres after he ſlew Antigonus, and thirty ſeuen yeeres after that the Romanes had declared him King. And in all other things he was as fortunate as any man; for hee being but a priuate perſon, got the Crowne and kept it, and left it vnto his poſteritie: but in his houſhold affaires he was moſt infortunate. Salome, before it was knowne that the King was dead, went forth with her husband, and releaſed all thoſe that were in hold, whom the King commanded to be ſlaine; ſaying, that the Kings minde was not altered, and therefore hee gaue them all licence to depart: and after their departure the Kings death was publiſht to the ſouldiers, who together with the other multitude were aſſembled in the Amphitheater at Iericho. Where Ptolemæus Keeper of the Kings Seale made a ſpeech vnto them, and began to ſay that Herod was now happy; and comforted the multitude, and ſo he read vnto them a letter which the King left, wherein he earneſtly requeſted the ſouldiers to fauour and loue his ſucceſſor. After the Epiſtle read, he recited the Kings teſtament, wherein Philip was appointed heire of Trachon, and the places thereunto adioyning; Antipas deſigned Tetrarch, and Archelaus King. Him alſo he commanded to beare his Ring vnto Cæſar, and withall notice and intelligence of the eſtate of the kingdome, whereof he had beene gouernour, faſt ſealed in writing: for he appointed Cæſar to be ouerſeer of all his ordinances, vnto whoſe pleaſure he left the performance of his teſtament.

This done; euery one was buſied about the Kings funerals: where Archelaus ſpared no coſt, but buried the King with all royall pompe poſſible. The Beere whereon he was carried, was adorned with gold and precious ſtones: vpon it lay a bed wrought with purple, whereupon was laid the dead corps of the King couered alſo with purple, with a Crowne on his head, and a Diadem of pure gold, and a Scepter in his right hand. About the Beere were his ſonnes and kinsfolke: and the Guard, and bands of Thracians, Germans, and Gauls all went before in order, as though they had gone to warres. The reſt of the ſouldiers in warlike order did follow their Captaines and Leaders, and fiue hundreth ſeruants and libertines carryed perfumes. And thus the corps was carryed the ſpace of two hundreth furlongs into the Caſtle named Herodion: where, as himſelfe had appointed, it was interred. And this was the end of King Herod.

CHAP. I.

Of HERODS ſucceſſour ARCHELAVS, and how he entred into the Temple, and the mutinie that aroſe for the reuenge of thoſe that were executed for taking downe the golden Eagle.

ARchelaus being appointed ſucceſſor in the kingdome of Herod late dead, neceſſity conſtrained him to goe to Rome, which iourney gaue occaſion of new broyles. For after that for ſeuen daies ſpace he had celebrated his fathers funerals, and largely feaſted the people (for this is a cuſtome amongſt the Iewes, which bringeth many of them to pouerty; yet he that doth not ſo, is reputed impious) hee went vnto the Temple attired in a white garment, where he was with great ioy receiued of the people; and he himſelfe ſitting in a tribunal ſeat & a Throne of gold, did very courteouſly admit the people to his preſence: and than-thanked them for their diligent care vſed in his fathers funerals, and for that they exhibited honour vnto him, as though he were already King. Yet he ſaid that he would not take vpon him the authority nor name of a King, till ſuch time as his ſucceſſion was approued by Cæſar, who by his fathers teſtament was Lord and maſter of all: and for that cauſe he withſtood the ſouldiers at Iericho, when they would haue crowned him. But he promiſed, that if he were confirmed King by thoſe who were in authority, he would largely recompence both the ſouldiers and the people for their good will; & that he fully purpoſed to be better vnto them then his father was. The multitude hereat greatly reioyced, and made preſent triall of his minde and purpoſe; for ſome cried out, requeſting that the tribute might be no more exacted. Others deſired that the yeerely paiments might ceaſe. Others requeſted to giue all priſoners liberty. Archelaus in fauour of the people granted all their requeſts: and then offring ſacrifices, he banquetted with his friends: when ſuddenly after the noone time of the day a great multitude deſirous of alteration (the common lamentation for the Kings death being ceaſed) began a priuate mourning, bewailing their miſchance whom Herod had put to death for pulling down the golden Eagle from off the porch of the Temple. This ſorrow was not ſecret, but the whole City did reſound with laments for them, that were thought to haue loſt their liues for the Temple and their country lawes. They alſo cried that reuenge was to be taken vpon them, whom Herod for that fact rewarded with money. And that firſt of all, he who by Herod was conſtituted high Prieſt, was to be reiected, and another more holy and deuout to be put in his place. Archelaus, although he was hereby moued to reuenge, yet becauſe he was preſently to take ſuch a iourney, abſtained frō it, fearing leſt that if he brought the multitude into hatred of him, they might hinder him. Wherfore he ſought rather by admoniſhing them, then by force to reclaime thoſe that were ſeditious, and ſent the Gouernour of the ſouldiers to requeſt them to be pacified. But the authors of that ſedition ſo ſoone as he came to the Temple, before he ſpake one word, threw ſtones at him: and in like maner they vſed others ſent after him to appeaſe them (for Archelaus diſpatcht many meſſengers vnto them) whom they ſpitefully intreated, making a ſhew that if they had beene more in number, they would not haue bin appeaſed. Therefore when the feaſt of vnleauened bread drew nigh, which the Iewes call Eaſter, wherein an infinite number of ſacrifices were appointed; an innumerable multitude of people came out of all villages thereabout for deuotion ſake to that ſolemnitie: and they who ſo lamented the death of the Sophiſters, remained in the Temple, ſeeking by all meanes to nouriſh their ſedition. Which Archelaus fearing, ſent a band of ſouldiers and a Tribune with them, to take the chiefe of the ſeditious, before ſuch time as they had drawne vnto them the multitude of the people: againſt whom the whole number being ſtirred vp, ſlew a great many of them with ſtones; and the Tribune himſelfe being ſore hurt, had much adoe to eſcape. And when they had ſo done, they preſently went and offered ſacrifice, as though that no hurt had beene done. But Archelaus perſwaded himſelfe that the multitude would not be appeaſed without ſlaughter: wherefore he ſent vnto them the whole armie, the footmen into the citie, and the horſmen into the field, who inuading the ſeditious people as they were ſacrificing, ſlew of them almoſt three thouſand, and ſcattered the reſidue into the mountaines neere adioyning. There were alſo Criers who followed Archelaus, and proclaimed by vertue of his command that euery one ſhould depart home to his houſe: ſo euery one notwithſtanding the holineſſe of the day departed. But he accompanied with his mother Popla, Ptolemæus and Nicholaus his friends, went vnto the ſea-coaſt, leauing Philip for Gouernor of the Kingdome, and ouer his houſhold: with them departed Salome and her children, and the Kings brethren and kindred, vnder pretence to aſſiſt Archelaus to the Crowne, but indeed it was to informe Cæſar of that which was done in the Temple againſt the law.

When they came to Cæſarea, they met with Sabinus Gouernour of Syria, who was comming toward Iudæa, to take into his cuſtodie Herods treaſure: whom Varus forbad to go any further, being ſent for by Archelaus, and Ptolemey requeſting him thereunto. And ſo Sabinus for the loue of Varus, neither entred the Caſtles, nor ſhut vp Herods treaſure from Archelaus, but promiſed that he would let all alone till Cæſar vnderſtood thereof. But ſo ſoone as one of them that hindred him was gone to Antiochia, and the other, to wit, Archelaus, to Rome; he ſtill remaining at Cæſarea, now haſted vnto Ieruſalem, and took the Kings Palace: where calling for the chiefe of the Guard, and the Purueyors, he exacted of them an account, and ſought to take into his cuſtodie the Caſtles and ſtrong holds. But the Captaines of the garriſon, mindfull of the charge which Archelaus gaue them, kept vnto themſelues the cuſtodie of all, affirming that they kept them more for Cæſar then Archelaus. At this time Antipas made a claime to the Crowne

A Crowne, alledging that Herods firſt teſtament was of more force then the laſt, and that he in the firſt was declared King; and both Salome and many more of his kinred, who ſayled with Archelaus, promiſed him their aide. He tooke with him his mother, and Ptolemæus, brother vnto Nicholaus, perſwading himſelfe, that they for their truſtineſſe and loyalty vnto Herod, would ſtand him in great ſtead: for this Ptolemæus was Herods deareſt friend. Hee had alſo great confidence in Ireneus his Orator, becauſe he had an excellent grace in pleading, in ſo much as he refuſed the counſell of them who ſought to perſwade to yeeld vnto Archelaus, both for his age, and for the laſt teſtament of his father. Now hee was well beloued of all his kinred at Rome, becauſe they hated Archelaus, and eſpecially thoſe that deſired to liue at libertie, and either to bee gouerned by the B Romanes, or elſe to haue Antipas for their King. And to further him the more, hee vſed Sabinus letters vnto Cæſar, wherein Archelaus was accuſed, and Antipas commended. Therefore Salome, and the reſt of their complices, brought the accuſations vnto Cæſar. And after them Archelaus deliuered all that which hee had done, in writing, and withall, his fathers ring by Ptolemæus; and the reaſons of that which he had done he ſent incloſed vnto Cæſar. Cæſar pondering with himſelfe what both parties alleadged, and the greatneſſe of the Kingdome, and large reuenues, and number of Herods children, reading alſo the letters of Varus and Sabinus, hee called the chiefe of the Romanes to counſell. Wherein Caius the ſonne of Agrippa, and his daughter Iulia, by his aſſignement, ſate in the firſt place (this Caius was Cæſars adopted ſonne) and ſo he licenced the parties to plead their rights. Then Antipater, Salomes ſonne, being the moſt eloquent of all Archelaus C aduerſaries, offered himſelfe to be his accuſer, for that Archelaus ſeemed now in words to contend for the Kingdome, which he had already poſſeſt himſelfe of: and that he did now trouble Cæſars eares with vaine cauillations, whom hee would not wiſh to iudge of his lawfull ſucceſſion. For after Herods death, he ſuborned ſome to put a diadem vpon his head: and then ſitting in a throne of gold in kingly manner, he partly changed, partly aduanced the orders of the ſouldiers, and granted vnto the people their requeſts, which could not be effected but by a King. He had alſo ſet at liberty many men, who for great crimes were impriſoned by his father: and hauing done all this, he came now vnto Cæſar, to craue the ſhadow of the Kingdome, the ſubſtance and body whereof he already occupied: ſo that herein hee left nothing vnto Cæſar but a bare title. Moreouer, he alledged that Archelaus did but counterfeit ſorrow for his fathers death, faining himſelfe D to mourne in the day-time, and in the night he would be drunke, and rioted. Finally, he ſaid, that the ſedition of the people came by hatred thereof. But the force and drift of his ſpeech was altogether bent to declare the multitude ſlaine about the Temple: for he ſaid, that they onely came againſt that feſtiuall day to offer ſacrifice, and that they themſelues were ſacrificed, as they were offering their ſacrifices which they brought; and that there were ſuch heapes of dead bodies in the Temple, as neuer by any forraine warres were ſlaine the like. Therefore Herod foreſeeing his cruelty, neuer iudged him worthy of the Kingdome, till ſuch time as his memorie failed him: and that now being more ſicke in minde then bodie, he knew not whom he named his Succeſſor in his laſt will, eſpecially for that hee had nothing wherein hee could blame him, whom in his former will hee appointed his ſucceſſor, when hee was in health both of minde and body. Yet E (quoth he) put caſe Herod in his extremitie knew what he did, yet (ſaid he) Archelaus hath depriued himſelfe of all kingly dignitie, hauing committed many things againſt the Lawes. For (ſaid he) what will he be after he hath receiued authority from Cæſar, who before he receiued any, hath murdered ſo many? Antipater hauing ſpoken much to this effect, and at euery accuſation taking witneſſe of his kinred that ſtood by, ended his ſpeech.

Then Nicholaus ſtood vp, and firſt of all, hee ſhewed that the ſlaughter of them in the Temple was neceſſarie. For they, for whoſe death Archelaus was now accuſed, were not only enemies of the Kingdome, but alſo of Cæſar: and for other crimes obiected, he ſhewed how that they were done euen by the counſell and perſwaſion of the aduerſaries. He alſo requeſted that the ſecond teſtament might be of force, for that therein Herod requeſted Cæſar to be a confirmer of his ſucceſF ſour. For he who had ſuch remembrance, as to leaue the performance of his will to the diſcretion of him who was Lord of all, did neither miſtake himſelfe in appointing his heire, nor yet was depriued of his ſenſes, ſeeing he knew by whom hee ſhould bee eſtabliſhed. When Nicholaus had ended his ſpeech, and declared all that he thought might make for Archelaus, Archelaus comming into the midſt of the Councell, proſtrated himſelfe at Cæſars feet: whom Cæſar curteouſly taking from the ground, ſhewed that hee was worthie to ſucceed his father. Yet did he not pronounce a definitiue ſentence: but the ſame day, the Councell being diſmiſſed, he deliberated with himſelfe, according to the euidence he knew, whether any of thoſe nominated in the two wils ſhould ſucceed

CHAP. II.

Of the fight and massacre at Ierusalem betweene the Iewes and the Sabinians.

Ant. l. 17. c. 14. Sedition in Ierusalem.

BEfore such time as Cæsar determined any thing concerning this matter, Malthace the mother of Archelaus fell sicke and dyed; and many letters came out of Syria, signifying that the Iewes had rebelled. Which Varus foreseeing after the departure of Archelaus from thence, went vnto Ierusalem to represse and resist the authors of that sedition: and because the multitude would not bee quiet, hee left one legion of the three which hee brought out of Syria, in the Citie, and so hee returned vnto Antiochia. But Sabinus comming afterward to Ierusalem, was the cause that the Iewes began a new broyle. For one while hee forced the Garrisons to render to him the Castles, another while hee rigorously made search for the Kings treasure: and hee was not onely assisted by those that Varus left there, but also hee had a great multitude of his owne seruants all armed to further his auarice. And in the feast of Pentecost (so called because of the number of seuen weekes) the people assembled themselues together, not for Religion sake, but for anger and hatred: so that there was an infinite multitude of people which came out of Galilee and Idumæa, and Iericho, and the Countries beyond Iordan. Yet the Iewes which were inhabitants of the Citie, surpassed the rest both in number and courage: and they therefore parted themselues into three bands, and made three camps: one vpon the North part of the Temple; the other on the South part, neere vnto the Castle called Hippodromus; the third on the West part neere the Palace, and so they besieged the Romanes on euery side. Sabinus greatly fearing them, both for their multitude, and for their courage, sent many letters vnto Varus, earnestly requesting him with all speede to bring succour: for if hee did not, the whole legion would bee extinguished. Hee himselfe got him into the highest Tower of the Castle Phasaelus, which is so called by the name of Herods brother, whom the Parthians killed; and from thence hee gaue a signe vnto the souldiers to issue out suddenly vpon their enemies: for himselfe was in such a feare, that hee durst not come downe to the Souldiers of whom hee was Gouernour. The Souldiers obeying his command, issued into the Temple, and there fought a sore battell with the Iewes: who hauing no bodie to assist them, being vnexperienced in warlike affaires, were soone conquered by them that were skilfull. At last, many Iewes got vpon the Porches, and cast darts at them from the toppe thereof, so that they killed many: but the other could not reuenge themselues of them, who fought against them from so high a place; neither could they sustaine the force of them who ioyned battell with them; till at last they fired the Porches, which for greatnesse and curious worke were admirable. And so, many were either destroyed with the sudden fire, or else leaping downe amidst their enemies, were by them slaine: others going backeward, were cast headlong from the wall: others despairing of life, killed themselues with their owne swords: and they who priuily came downe the walles, and assaulted the Romanes, being astonished with feare, were easily ouercome: till at last, all being either put to the sword, or cast downe through feare, the treasure dedicated to God, was left destitute of keepers; so that the souldiers tooke away thereof about foure hundred talents, and that which they left Sabinus got.

But this losse of men and money stirred vp many moe Iewes, and those more warlike then the first, against the Romanes; who besieging the Kings Palace, threatned all their destructions, vnlesse they would presently depart from thence: promising Sabinus and the legion leaue to depart if hee so liked. Part of the Kings souldiers, who of their owne accord fled vnto them, did assist them. But the most warlike and valiant amongst them were three thousand of Sebaste, whose rulers were Rufus and Gratus; one, Leader of the foot-men, and the other of the horse-men; both which, although they had had no souldiers with them, for their valour of body, and counsell, might yet haue beene a great helpe vnto the Romanes in those warres. The Iewes earnestly continued the siege, and assaulted the castle wals, crying vpon Sabinus to depart, and not to hinder them now after so long time to haue their countries liberty. Sabinus though with all his heart he wished himselfe away, yet durst he not trust them; but he suspected that their courtesie was but

A a plot to entrap him: and on the other ſide hoping that Varus would come and helpe him, ſtill indured the danger of the ſiege. At the ſame time there were tumults in many places of Iudæa, and many through opportunitie of the time aſpired to the kingdome. For in Idumæa two thouſand old ſouldiers, who had borne armes vnder Herod, gathering together, and hauing armed themſelues, came and fought with the Kings forces, whom Achiabus the Kings conſin reſiſted in the ſtrongeſt villages; alwaies eſchewing to fight in the open field. At Sephoris alſo a towne of Galilee, Iudas the ſonne of Ezechias the Captaine of the theeues, who before was taken by King Herod, and had waſted that countrey, gathered together a great multitude, and brake into the Kings armory, and armed all his company, and fought againſt them who affected the royall B dignitie. Alſo beyond the riuer, Simon one of the Kings ſeruants being faire and of a huge ſtature, put a Crowne vpon his owne head, and gathering together a company of theeues, went about with them vnto Iericho and burned the Kings palace and many faire and ſumptuous houſes there, and ſo got great prey by burning the houſes: and he had ſurely fired all buildings of account, had not Gratus Captaine of the Kings footmen made haſte to meet him with the bowmen of Trachon, and the moſt warlike men of Sebaſte, where many footmen were ſlaine. But Simon though he fled into a ſtreight valley, yet he ouertooke him, and cut him ouerthwart the necke, and ſo he fell downe. In like manner other of the Kings palaces neere Iordan by Bethara were burned, by a multitude of others gathered together in bands from beyond the riuer. At this time a ſhepheard named Athrongæus preſumed to vſurpe the Crowne: he was thereunto in- C duced by the courage he bare, and the diſdaine of death. With this reſolution he armed his foure brethren, and euery one of them had a company armed, and they were as his Captaines and Champions to make incurſions: and he like a King medled onely with great affaires, and then he put a Crowne vpon his head; and thus he continued a long time waſting the countrey, and killing eſpecially the Romans, and alſo the Kings ſouldiers; ſo that none of the Iewes eſcaped if they were in hope to gaine by them. They alſo preſumed to meet a company of the Romans at Ammaus, who carried corne and armour vnto the legion, where they killed with darts one Arius a Centurion, and fortie of the moſt valiant amongſt them: and the reſt, being in like danger, through the helpe of Gratus with the ſouldiers of Sebaſte eſcaped. When they had done many things in this manner againſt the inhabitants and ſtrangers, at laſt three of them were ta- D ken: the eldeſt by Archelaus: and the two others who were eldeſt after him, fell into the hands of Gratus and Ptolemæus: and the fourth yeelded himſelfe vnto Archelaus vpon compoſition: and thus at laſt they came to their end. And all Iudæa by their example was filled with theeues.

Of VARVS his deeds concerning the Iewes that were crucified.

E WHEN Varus had receiued the letters of Sabinus, and of the nobles with him, fearing the whole legion, hee haſted to ſuccour them: Wherefore hee came to Ptolemais with two other legions and foure cornets of horſemen, where he willed the kings forces & the nobles to meet him. Moreouer, as hee paſſed by Berytum, they accompanied him with 1500. armed men. Aretas alſo the king of Arabia, for the hatred hee bare to Herod, was come with a great number of horſemen and footmen. Aſſoone as the hoſt was aſſembled, Varus incontinently directed part of his army into Galilee adioyning thereto, and appointed a friend of his the ſonne of Caius for their gouernor, who preſently put them all to flight againſt whom he was ſent; and hauing taken the caſtle of Sephoris, he fired it, and made the inhabitants thereof bond-ſlaues. Varus with the reſt of the army went into Samaria, and tooke it; yet hee did the City no harme, becauſe he found that amiddeſt all thoſe tumults they had been quiet. When he had pitched his tents at a village called Aun, which was in the poſſeſſion of Ptolemæus, the Ara- F bians ſacked it, for they hated them who loued Herod. Frō thence they went to Sappho another ſtrong borough, which they in like manner ſacked & deſtroied, with all the fruits & reuenewes they found there. All was filled with the ſlaughter and fires which the Arabians made, and there was no end nor hinderance of their auarice. Alſo Varus commanded Ammaus to bee burned, being angry for the death of Arius, and the reſt that were ſlaine there: and the inhabitants thereof were ſcattered, euery one by flight ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe. From thence hee went to Ieruſalem, and at the ſight of him the Iewes fled and ſcattered themſelues, ſome here, ſome there, all about the country: they that remained in the City excuſed themſelues, that they were not conſenting senting to that tumult, but that for the celebration of the feasts sake, they permitted them to come into the City, affirming that they had rather bin besieged together with the Romans, then to haue conspired with those of the sedition: and so they laid the cause of that tumult vpon others. But first, Iosephus Archelaus his cousin, with Gratus and Rufus came to meet him, leading the Kings army, and the Sebastians and the Roman souldiers adorned in their accustomed apparell. Sabinus durst not be seene of Varus, and therefore got him out of the towne before, and went vnto the sea-coast. Varus diuided his army, and sent it into the fields against the Authors of that tumult: and those that were brought vnto him who were in lesse fault, he committed to prison, and those who were the chiefest he crucified, to the number of two thousand.

Varus crucified two thousand of the seditious.

And vnderstanding that in Idumæa there yet remained ten thousand of armed men, he presently sent the Arabians home, becausse he perceiued that they did not warre as those that came to helpe him, but as they themselues pleased, wasting the countrey against his will: and so accompanied with his owne army, he hastned against the enemies. But they without any fight, through Achiabus counsell, yeelded themselues to Varus. And he pardoned the common souldiers, and sent the Captaines to Cæsar to answer the matter. Who pardoning the most of them, yet punished some that were the Kings kinsmen (for some of them were a kinne to Herod) becausse they altogether rebelled against their King. Varus hauing thus quieted the estate of Iudæa and Ierusalem, leauing the same legion that was there before, departed to Antiochia.

Chap. IIII.

How the Iewes had an Ethnarcha constituted ouer them.

Ant. l. 17. c. 17. Ethnarcha, Ruler or Gouernour.

NOw Archelaus had a new processe at Rome against the Iewes, who before the sedition with the leaue of Varus were gone to Rome to craue the liberty of their country. These who came as Embassadours in their countries behalfe, were fifty in number, and they were assisted by more then eight thousand Iewes that liued at Rome. Wherefore Cæsar called a Councell of the Nobility of Rome in the Temple of Apollo, which was situate vpon mount Palatine, and ioyned to Cæsars priuate Palace, which was most sumptuously adorned: and the multitude of Iewes appeared with the Legats against Archelaus and his friends. Archelaus kindred neither came with him, nor with the rest of the Iewes: with him they would not ioyne, for enuie; and with the Iewes they durst not, for shame. Amongst them also was Philip the brother of Archelaus, whom Varus sent in courteous maner to assist his brother; or if that it pleased Cæsar to diuide Herods kingdome amongst his children, that then he might haue a part. The aduersaries were commanded to shew what Herod had committed contrary to the lawes: First of all they answered, that they found him not a King, but the most cruell tyrant that euer was, and that he murdred many; and those whom he left aliue endured such misery, as they thought themselues far vnhappier then those were so butchered. For (said they) he was not onely contented to teare his subiects bodies with torments, but also defacing and ruinating the cities of his owne country, he adorned and reedified the cities of strangers: and permitted forrainers to massacre the Iewes without reuenge. And in stead of their ancient and wonted happines, and their lawes inuiolated, their country was by him made so poore, and so filled with iniquity, that within those few yeeres that Herod raigned, they had sustained more murders and massacres then all their ancestors had, from the time of their departure out of Babylon, vntill the beginning of his raign: being then prouoked to take armes when Xerxes was King of Persia. Yet they by enduring such misery, being now accustomed thereunto, would willingly be subiect to such a successour of his as they knew would make them liue in most bitter seruitude: for they, when Herod his father was dead, presently called Archelaus King, notwithstanding he was the sonne of such a tyrant, and with him mourned for the death of Herod, and offred sacrifice for the prosperity of his successor. But he to shew himselfe Herods son, began his raigne with the slaughter of three thousand Citizens; and becausse he had so well deserued the kingdome, hee offered so many men to God for sacrifice, and on a festiuall day filled the Temple with so many dead bodies. Wherefore they who had escaped that massacre, had iust occasion to consider their calamitie, and after the law of armes, to turne their faces to them who wounded them, and beseech the Romans, that they would thinke the remnant of the Iewes worthy of compassion, and not to abandon and expose the residue of their nation as a prey to them, by whom they should be most cruelly butchered: but that it might please them to adioyne their country to the borders of Syria, & to let them be ruled by the Romans, and so they shold find that the Iewes, who now were accounted seditious,

After this, Nicholaus stood vp against them, and first of all acquitted the Kings of the crimes laid to their charge: and then reproued his countrimen, for that they would not be easily gouerned, and by their owne nature would not, except they were forced, obey their King: and he also blamed the kinsmen of Archelaus, who ioyned with his accusers. Cæsar hauing heard what both parts could say, dismissed the Assembly. And within few daies after he gaue Archelaus halfe of the kingdome, vnder the title of an Ethnarch, promising him moreouer to make him King, if he behaued himselfe well: the other halfe he di-

B uided into two Tetrarchies and gaue them to the rest of Herods sons: one vnto Philip; the other vnto Antipas, who contended with Archelaus for the Crowne. Antipas his part lay from Galilee beyond the riuer Iordan, the reuenues wherof was two hundreth talents a yeere. And Philip had Batanæa and Trachon, and Auranitis, and part of Zeno his house neere Iamnia, the renenues wherof amounted to one hundreth talents a yeere. Archelaus had in his Ethnarchy Idumæa and all Iudæa and Samaria, which was freed from the fourth part of their tribute, because they rebelled not with the rest. And these Cities were giuen him, ouer which he was Lord, Stratons Tower, Sebaste, Ioppe and Ierusalem. The rest, Gaza and Gadara, and Hippon, Cæsar took from the Kingdome, and ioyned them to Syria. Archelaus yeerely reuenues amounted to foure hundreth talents a yeere. Cæsar also (beside that which Herod left her) made Salome Lady of Iamnia,

C Azotus and Phasaelis, and the Palace at Ascalon, all which amounted to threescore talents a yeere. But Cæsar made her house subiect vnto Archelaus his Ethnarchy. D Of the false supposed ALEXANDER, and how he was taken.

AT the same time a certaine young man, a Iew borne, brought vp by a Libertine of Rome in the Towne of Sidonia, being very like vnto Alexander whom Herod put to death, went to Rome, hauing one of his countrimen for his companion, who knew very well all the estate of the Kingdome: by whom he receiuing instructions, affirmed, that they who should haue put him and Aristobulus to death, being mooued to compassion, let them goe, and tooke two others in their roome like them. With this tale he deceiued many Iewes liuing in Creete, where he was honourably receiued, and from thence hee sailed to

E Melos, where he was yet entertained with greater pompe: and enriching himselfe, he vsed such meanes, that hee got his hostes (which gaue him entertainment) to saile with him to Rome: and after arriuing at Dicæarchia, he receiued all manner of rich gifts of the Iewes which dwelled there, and there by his fathers friends was honoured as a King. For he was so like vnto Alexander, that they that had seene Alexander, and knew him well, would haue sworne he had beene Alexander. Wherefore all the Iewes at Rome desired to see him, so that an infinite multitude followed him whithersoeuer he went in the streets, and they so doted vpon him, that they carried him in a horselitter, and at their owne proper cost and charges prepared for him a royall traine.

Of the baniſhment and death of ARCHELAVS.

Ant.l.17.c.19.

Archelaus being now made Prince, remembred the diſcord paſt, and in reuenge thereof he tyrannized not only ouer the Iewes, but alſo ouer the Samaritanes: and in the ninth yeer of his raigne, the Iewes and Samaritanes ſent Embaſſadors againſt him vnto Cæſar: and finally he was baniſhed and ſent to Vienna, a City of Gallia, and all his patrimony was confiſcate to Cæſar. Before he was ſummoned to appeare before Cæſar, he reported that he had a maruellous dreame: for he ſaw nine great eares full of corne deuoured by oxen; and preſently ſending for Prophets and Chaldæans, he demanded what that dreame betokened. Some interpreted it one way, and ſome another: but one Simon an Eſſean told him that the eares of corne betokened yeers, and the oxen ſignified the changes and mutations of this world, for as much as in labouring the land, they turned vp and altred it: and therfore he was to raigne ſo many yeers as there were eares of corne in number; and then, after he had bidden many mutations, he ſhould die. Fiue dayes after this interpretation, Archelaus was ſent for to Rome, to anſwer that before Auguſtus, whereof he was accuſed. I alſo thought it worth rehearſing, to ſet downe the dreame of his wife Glaphyra, daughter to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, who was firſt married vnto Alexander brother vnto this man, and ſon to King Herod, by whõ he was put to death, as we haue ſaid before: after whoſe death ſhe was married to Iuba King of Lydia, and he being dead, ſhe returned home to her father: and liuing in her widowhood at home with her father, Archelaus the Ethnarch beholding her, was ſo inflamed with her loue, that preſently being diuorced from his wife Mariamme, he married her. Who ſhortly after ſhe came into Iudæa, dreamed that ſhe ſaw Alexander her firſt husband ſtanding before her, and ſaying vnto her, It had bin enough for thee to haue married the King of Lybia: but thou not contented therewtth, commeſt againe to my houſe, greedy of a third husband; and which is worſt of all, now married to mine owne brother. I will not conceale nor diſſemble this iniury which thou doſt me, but I will recouer you againſt your will. And ſhe ſcarcely liued two daies after ſhe had recounted this dreame.

Of SIMON the Galilean, and the three ſects amongſt the Iewes.

Ant.l.18.c.12.

The yeere of the world, 3972. after Chriſts Natiuitie, 11.

After that Archelaus his dominions were made a Prouince, a certain Roman knight called Coponius was made Gouernor therof, receiuing authority from Cæſar to puniſh and put to death. In his time a Galilean named Simon incited his countrimen to reuolt, reprouing them for paying tribute to the Romans, and for being ſubiect to any mortall men, but God. This Simon was a Sophiſter, hauing a ſect of his owne deuiſing, nothing like other ſects. For there are three ſects of Philoſophers amongſt the Iewes: one is that which the Phariſes do follow; another which the Sadduces do follow; the third is that which the Eſſeans follow, which is the moſt famous of the three. The Eſſeans are Iewes borne, but they are moſt friendly to one another, who beſide all other pleaſures do eſchew witchcraft: neither do they ſuffer themſelues to be led with their own affections, but account it a great vertue to abſtaine from all vices and to keep chaſtity. For they refuſe marriage, and account other mens childrẽ, put to them to be taught whil'ſt they be young, as their kinſmen, whom they do diligently inſtruct in their manners and opinions; not for that they condemn marriage and propagation of mankind, but for that they think men ſhould auoid womens intemperance, for they thinke that none of them keepe themſelues truely to one man. Alſo they contemne riches, and all things with them are common, and no man amongſt them

Among the Eſſeans, goods are common.

A them is richer then other. And they haue a law amongſt themſelues, that whoſoeuer wil follow their ſect, he muſt make his goods common to them all: for ſo neither any amongſt them ſhall ſeeme abiect for pouerty, nor any great for riches ſake, but they haue as it were all equall patrimonies like brethren. They account it a ſhame to vſe oyle: and if any man againſt his will be anointed therwith, they vſe all diligence to wipe it away: for they account homelines beſt; and all their clothes are white. They haue amongſt them procurators, to ouerſee and vſe all things for their common benefit, and euery one ſeeketh the good of all, who are choſen from among them by a common conſent. They haue not one certaine city, but are in many cities: and if any of their ſect come vnto them from another place, they giue him any thing they haue, as if he himſelfe B were owner thereof. And in briefe, they goe boldly in to thoſe, whom they neuer in their liues did ſee before, as though they were very familiarly acquainted with them: and therefore when they take a iourney, they only arme thēſelues againſt theeues, and carry nothing with them elſe. In euery city there is one of them appointed, whoſe office is to haue a care of the gueſts, and ſee that they neither want clothes nor any thing elſe neceſſary for them. All children vnder gouernment, brought vp by them, go apparelled alike, and they neuer change their apparell, nor ſhooes, except they haue cleane worne their firſt apparel, or that by reaſon of long wearing they will do no more ſeruice. They among themſelues neither buy nor ſell: but euery man that hath any thing that another wanteth, giueth him it, and taketh that of him which himſelfe needeth: yet euery one of them may take any thing he hath need of from whom he pleaſeth, without any change.

The Eſſeans hoſpitality.

The Eſſeans apparell.

C Aboue all, towards God they are very religious: for before the ſun riſe they haue no prophane talke, but they make certain vowes and praiers after the cuſtome of their country, as it were praying that it may riſe vpon them. After this, euery one is diſmiſſed to practiſe the art he knoweth: and when euery one hath diligently laboured till fiue of the clock, they all gather themſelues together again, and being couered with linnen clothes, ſo they waſh their bodies with cold water: and hauing thus purged themſelues, they haue a ſecret aſſembly, vnto the which no man that is not of their ſect is admitted: and ſo they come into the refectory as into a holy Temple, al ſitting down with ſilence, & the baker ſetteth euery man in order a loafe, & the cook euery man a meſſe of pottage of one ſort. Then before meat the Prieſt giueth thankes, and no man may taſte any meat before they haue made their praiers vnto God. Likewiſe when dinner is ended, they pray D againe: for both before and after they giue thanks vnto God the giuer of all, and then putting off that apparell as ſacred, they apply themſelues vnto their worke till euening. This done, they do as before, cauſing their gueſts to ſup with them, if by fortune any come. Their houſe is neuer troubled with cries or tumults, for euery one is appointed to ſpeake in his turne: ſo that they who are without the houſe, eſteem their ſilence as ſome ſacred myſtery. The cauſe hereof is their continuall ſobrietie, and that euery one is limited how much he ſhould eate or drinke. And although that in all other matters they are ruled by their Gouernor, yet in theſe two, to wit, compaſſionating and helping, they may doe as they thinke good: for euery one may when he pleaſeth, helpe thoſe whom he thinketh deſerue helpe: and when they pleaſe, giue meat to them that are in need. Yet may not they giue any thing to their kinred without the leaue of their Gouer- E nour. Theſe men giue not place to anger, but refraine from wrath, keep their promiſe, and maintaine peace, and account euery word they ſpeake of more force, then if they had bound it with an oath: and they ſhun oathes worſe then periurie: for they eſteeme him condemned for a lyer, who is not beleeued without he call God to witneſſe. They ſtudie diligently ancient Writers, chiefly gathering out of their writings, what is moſt conuenient for the ſoule and the body. Out of them they learne remedies for diſeaſes, and medicinable hearbs, and what is the proper effect of euery ſtone. Thoſe who are deſirous to be of their order, doe not ſtraightway conuerſe with them, but for a yeere before, they liue out of their Colledge, and haue the ſame diet, giuing them alſo a little hatchet, and ſuch a girdle, as is before ſpoken of, and a white garment. But at the yeers end, if they perceiue him to be continent, then they take him into their refectory, and he is made F partaker of purer waters (to the end he may continue chaſte) yet is he not admitted in common amongſt them: for two yeeres after this his triall, they obſerue his life and manners: and at laſt, when he is thought worthy, then is he admitted to their common companie. And before he be receiued to the common table, firſt he proteſteth with great and ſolemne oathes, that hee will worſhip God, and obſerue iuſtice & fidelity towards al men, and neither willingly hurt any man, nor iniure any one for another mans command, but that he will alwaies hate the wicked, and aſſiſt the good, and euer keepe his faith to all, but eſpecially to his ſuperiours. For no man can obtaine the power of principality, without the will and good pleaſure of God: and that if he be put in authority ouer others, he neuer will abuſe it to the preiudice of thoſe that are vnder him, and neither exceed the reſt in apparell, nor in any other ambitious pompe: that he will alwaies loue the truth, and euer endeauour to confute liers: and that he will keep his hands from ſtealing, and his ſoule pure from all vniuſt gaine: and that he will not conceale any myſteries, or ſecrets from his companions, nor reueale them to any ſtrangers, although he ſhould be thereto compelled by death. Adding moreouer, that they will neuer deliuer any doctrine, ſaue that which they haue receiued; and that they will auoid theft, and diligently keepe the books of their doctrine, and the names of Angels. And with theſe oathes they try, and as it were arme thoſe who enter into their order. Thoſe of their congregation, who ſhall be condemned, they thruſt out of their company: and whoſoeuer is ſo puniſhed, for the moſt part dieth a miſerable death; for hauing once taken his oath, it is not lawfull for him to take meat of any ſtranger; ſo that feeding on graſſe like beaſts, at laſt he periſheth through famine. For which cauſe oftentimes they mooued with compaſſion, receiue many into their order againe, euen ready by famine to yeeld vp the ghoſt; iudging them to haue endured penance enough for their offences, who with famine were almoſt brought vnto deaths doore. They are very ſeuere, and iuſt in their iudgement; and to decide any matter, there is neuer fewer of them then a hundreth, and that which by them is agreed vpon, is an irreuocable ſentence. Next after God they reuerence the lawmaker, inſomuch as if one reuile him, they forthwith condemne him to death. They greatly reuerence old men, and a multitude: ſo that if ten of them ſit together, no man of them muſt ſpeake without he be licenced thereto by nine of the company. They alſo muſt not ſpet in the midſt of the aſſembly, nor on the right hand. And they are more ſeuere then any other Iewes in obſeruing the Sabbaths: And they do not only abſtaine from dreſſing meat that day, but alſo they may not remoue any veſſell out of his place, nor go to the priuy. Vpon other daies they dig a pit a foot deep into the ground with the hatchet, which (as we before ſaid) euery one at his entrance into their order hath giuen him, and then couering themſelues diligently with their garment, leſt they ſhould doe iniury to the light of heauen, in that pit they eaſe themſelues; and then couer their ordure with the earth they tooke out of the pit: and this they do in moſt ſecret places.

The Eſſeans circumſpect in iuſtice.

The Eſſeans reuerence the Sabbaths.

And although this purging of their bodies be naturall, yet doe they by waſhing purifie themſelues after it, as after great vncleannes. Furthermore they amongſt themſelues are diuided into foure orders, according to the times which they haue taken to follow this exerciſe of life; & they who are iuniors, are ſo far different from the ſeniors, that if they do but touch one of them, they preſently purifie themſelues, as though they had bin profaned by a ſtranger. They are long liu'd, ſo that moſt of them liue a hundreth yeers, which I iudge is by reaſon of their well ordered diet and their temperancy. They contemne aduerſity, and by counſell and diſcretion ouercome torments. They preferre an honorable death before life. And the wars which the Iewes made againſt the Romans, ſhewed what courage and hardineſſe they haue in all things. For being then compelled by breaking of the members of their bodies, and fiery torments, and all kind of tortures which were laid vpon them, to reuile their lawmaker, and to eat any meat forbidden: yet could they not be forced to any of theſe; neither would they intreat the torturers, nor ſhew any ſorrow amidſt their torments. Nay, in the very midſt of their griefes and paines they ſcoffed at their tormenters; and laughing, ioyfully yeelded vp their ſoules, as though they hoped to receiue them againe. For it is an opinion amongſt them, that the body is corruptible, and that the matter therof is not perpetuall: but yet the ſoules remaine for euer immortall; who paſſing out of a moſt pure & ſubtile aire, wrap themſelues in bodies as in priſons, being as it were drawn therunto by a natural inclination. And when they are deliuered out of theſe carnall bonds, then preſently as freed from a long bondage, they ioyfully mount aloft. And of the good ſoules they ſay, as did the Grecians; that they liue beyond the Ocean ſeas in a place of pleaſure, where they are neuer moleſted with raine, nor ſnow, nor heat, but haue alwayes a ſweet and pleaſant aire comming out of the Ocean. But the wicked ſoules (as they ſay) go into a place very tempeſtuous, where there is alwaies as it were winter weather, alwaies full of lamentations of thoſe, who for euer are to be puniſhed. But I iudge that the Greekes are of this opinion, when they ſay there is an Ile for the vertuous, whom they call Heroes and half-gods: and that the ſoules of the wicked go to a place in hell, wheras it is fained, ſome to be tormented, as Syſiphus, Tantalus, Ixion, and Titius. Which they did firſt inuent for this purpoſe, becauſe thoſe who are of good diſpoſition, are made better in this life, by hope of ſome reward in the life to come: and the wicked are (as they thought) hereby reſtrained for feare of eternall torments, which if they continue in wickednes they ſhall endure. This is the Eſſeans Philoſophy touching the immortality of the ſoule: wherin they propoſe an eneuitable allure-

There is another colledge of theſe Eſſeans agreeing with the former, both in apparell, meat, and kind of life, and obſerue the ſame lawes and ordinances; onely they differ in the opinion of marriage, affirming that they who abſtain from mariage, do cut off the greateſt part of mans life, to wit, ſucceſſion of mankind. For (ſay they) if all men ſhould follow that opinion, preſently all mankind would periſh: yet notwithſtanding theſe people are ſo continent, that for three yeeres ſpace they make triall of the women they are to marry, and when they haue proued them fit to B beare children, then they marry them. None of them muſt lye with their wiues when they are with child, to ſhew that they doe not marry to ſatisfie luſt, but for to haue children. When their wiues waſh themſelues, they are couered with a garment as the men are: and this is the maner and cuſtome of this ſect. Of the two former ſects, the Phariſes are ſaid to be moſt skilfull in interpreting the law, and are of opinion that all things are to be attributed to God, and Fate: and that euery man may of his owne power doe good or ill, yet (ſay they) deſtiny helpeth in euery action: and that the ſoules of men are all incorruptible, but onely the ſoules of good men goe into other bodies, and the ſoules of wicked men are ſent into euerlaſting paine. But the Sadduces deny Fate and Deſtiny, and affirme that God is the author of no euill; auowing likewiſe that a man hath free will to doe well or ill, and euery man may chuſe whether he will be good or bad: and C they generally deny both paines and rewards for the ſoules after this life. The Phariſes are ſociable and louing one to another: but the Sadduces are at diſcord among themſelues, liuing like ſauage beaſts, and as vncourteous to their owne ſect as to ſtrangers. This is all which I haue to ſpeake concerning the Philoſophers among the Iewes. Now I will returne to my purpoſe.

Of the Cities which PHILIP and HEROD builded, and of PILATES gouernment.

D ARCHELAVS his Ethnarchie being now made a Prouince, the reſt of his brethren, to wit, Philip and Herod who was ſurnamed Antipas, gouerned their Tetrarchies. And Salome dying left vnto Iulia by her Teſtament the Toparchie which ſhe ruled, as alſo Iamnia and a ground ſet with palme trees in Phaſaelis. When Tiberius Cæſar after the death of Auguſtus was made Emperour of Rome, after that he had raigned ſeuen and fifty yeers, ſix moneths, and two dayes, Herod and Philip remaining in their Tetrarchies; Philip builded a City neere vnto the head of Iordan in the countrey of Paneade, and called it Cæſarea; and another he built in the lower part of Gaulanitis, and named it Iulias. Herod in Galilee built the City called Tiberias, and another in Peræa on this ſide Iordan, which alſo he named Iulias. Pilate being ſent by Tiberius to be Gouernor ouer the Iewes, cauſed in the night time the ſtatua of Cæſar to be brought into Ieruſalem couered: which thing within three daies after cauſed a great tumult among the E Iewes; for they who beheld it, were aſtoniſhed, and moued, as though now the law of their country were prophaned: for they hold it not lawfull for any picture or image to be brought into the city. At their lamentation who were in the city, there was gathered together a great multitude out of the fields adioyning, and they went preſently to Pilate then at Cæſarea, beſeeching him earneſtly that the Images might be taken away out of Ieruſalem, and that the lawes of their countrey might remaine inuiolated. When Pilate denied their ſuite, they proſtrated themſelues before his houſe, and there remained lying vpon their faces, for fiue dayes and nights neuer mouing. Afterward Pilate ſitting in his tribunal ſeat, was very careful to call all the Iewes together before him, as though there he would haue giuen them an anſwer: when vpon the ſudden a company of armed ſouldiers (for ſo it was prouided) compaſſed the Iewes about with a triple F ranke: the Iewes were hereat amazed, ſeeing that which they expected not. Then Pilate told them, that except they would receiue the Images of Cæſar, he would kil them all; and to that end made a ſigne vnto the ſouldiers to draw their ſwords. The Iewes, as though they had agreed thereto, fell all downe at once, and offred their naked necks to the ſtroke of the ſword, crying out that they would rather loſe their liues, then ſuffer their religion to be prophaned. Then Pilate admiring the conſtancy of the people in their religion, preſently commanded the ſtatues to be taken out of the City of Ieruſalem.

Pilate admiring the conſtancy of the Iewes in their religion, ſent the ſtatues from Ieruſalē. The yeere of the world, 3998. after Chriſts birth, 36.

After this hee cauſed another tumult amongſt them, for they haue a ſacred treaſure called

Corban, which Pilate vſed to bring water in vnto the City, foure hundreth furlongs off: for this cauſe the people murmured; ſo that when Pilate came to Ieruſalem, they flocked about his tribunall, crying and exclaiming. Pilate foreſeeing that tumult, cauſed ſouldiers ſecretly armed to mingle themſelues amongſt the people in priuate apparell, and commanded them not to vſe their ſwords, but to beat thoſe with clubs, whom they ſaw make ſuch clamors. And when he had thus plotted the matter, ſitting in his Tribunall, he gaue a ſigne vnto the ſouldiers; and preſently the Iewes were beaten: and many of them, partly with blowes, and partly trodden vpon by the multitude, died miſerably. The multitude amazed at the calamity of thoſe that were ſlain, held their tongues. For this cauſe Agrippa ſonne to Herod the Tetrarch, whoſe father Ariſtobulus Herod the King put to death, went to Rome, and accuſed him to Cæſar. Tiberius not admitting his accuſation, he remained ſtill at Rome, and ſought the father of other Potentates there, and eſpecially he reuerenced Caius the ſonne of Germanicus, he being yet a priuate perſon: and vpon a certain day being with him at a banquet, he ſtretcht forth his hands, and openly began to beſeech Almighty God that Tiberius Cæſar might quickly die, that he might ſee him Lord of all the world. Tiberius hauing notice hereof by one of his familiar friends cauſed Agrippa to bee impriſoned; where he endured a hard and ſtreight impriſonment, vntill the death of Tiberius, which was ſixe moneths after. After he was dead (hauing raigned 22. yeers, ſixe moneths, and three dayes) Caius Cæſar who ſucceeded him in the Empire, freed him from priſon, and gaue him the Tetrarchie of Philip who was now deceaſed, and the Title of a King. When Agrippa came into his kingdome, Herod the Tetrarch began to enuy his eſtate; and Herodias his wife ſtill vrged him forward to hope that he ſhould be made a King: for (ſaid ſhe) thou wanteſt that dignity onely for ſlouthfulneſſe, becauſe thou wouldeſt not goe to Cæſar: for if Agrippa be made a King, being before but a priuate man, how canſt thou doubt to be made a King, who art already a Tetrarch? Herod herewith perſwaded, went vnto Caius Cæſar, who greatly reproued his auarice, in ſo much as he fled into Spaine; for Agrippa followed him to Rome to accuſe him before Cæſar: and Caius gaue vnto him Herods Tetrarchie. Of the pride of CAIVS, and of PETRONIVS the Preſident.

The yeere of the world, 4002. after Chriſts birth, 40.

Ant. l. 18. c. 15.

CAIVS Cæſar ſo abuſed himſelfe and his authority, that he would be thought to be a god, and be ſo called. Alſo he put many noble men of his countrey to death. He likewiſe extended his impiety euen vnto Iudæa: for he ſent Petronius with an army to Ieruſalem, commanding him to ſet his ſtatuaes in the Temple; and if the Iewes refuſed to receiue them, that thoſe who withſtood him, he ſhould put to the ſword, & lead the reſt away captiue. Almighty God did otherwiſe diſpoſe this proud commandment. But Petronius accompanied with three legions, and many aſſiſtants out of Syria, came with all ſpeed from Antiochia to Iudæa: many of the Iewes would not beleeue any warre towards, notwithſtanding that they heard a generall report thereof: and they that beleeued it, could not bethinke themſelues of any meanes to reſiſt. Suddenly all were in a great feare: for the army was now come to Ptolomais, which City is ſituate by the ſea-ſhore in Galilee, in a faire field, and on the Eaſt ſide it is compaſſed about with mountaines, diſtant from it threeſcore furlongs, which appertaine vnto Galilee; on the South ſide it is inclozed with the Mount Carmel, which is an hundreth and twenty furlongs off from it: on the North ſide it is inuironed with an exceeding high mountaine, which the inhabitants call the Tyrians ladder: this mountaine is an hundreth paſes diſtant from the City. Two miles from this city there is a riuer running by, called Beleus, a very little one, neere vnto which is the ſepulchre of Memnon, hauing adioyning vnto it a place of the compaſſe of an hundreth cubits, worthy of admiration. This place is as it were a round valley couered with ſand like glaſſe, which when many ſhips comming together take away for ballace, ſo that they empty the place of it, that place is preſently after couered with the like ſand againe. For there are winds, which as it were vpon purpoſe carry this ſand from the higher places round about it thither, and whatſoeuer is within the mine of metall there, it is preſently changed into cryſtall or glaſſe. And that which in my mind is more to be wondred at, is, that the ſand being turned into glaſſe, if afterward any part thereof be caſt vpon the brinke of this place, it is againe turned into ordinary ſand. And this is the nature of that place.

Now the Iewes with their wiues and children gathered themſelues together in the field where the Citie Ptolemais is ſituate, and humbly beſought Petronius, firſt not to violate their country

A try lawes; and next, to be good vnto them. Petronius, seeing the multitude of them who humbly sued vnto him, and how earnestly they besought his fauour, left his army and Cæsars statuaes at Ptolemais, and himselfe went from thence to Galilee, and at Tiberias cald all the Iewes & their Nobilitie together, recounting to them the force of the Romane army, and Cæsars threatnings: adding moreouer, that the Iewes supplication was indeed a contumely, seeing all nations vnder the dominion of the Romanes (the Iewes onely excepted) had already placed Cæsars statuaes in their temples among the rest of their gods: and herein they did as it were reuolt from the Empire, and iniure the President. They answered, it was against their lawes and custome of their country: for it was not lawfull for them to haue the Image of God, much lesse of a man; and that B they were not onely forbidden by the law to haue an image in the Temple, but also to haue it in any other prophane place. Petronius suddenly answered: Well, I must doe my Lords command: for if I doe not, but spare you, I shall be iustly punished: and not I, but he that sent me, will fight against you. For I my selfe, as well as you, must doe as I am commanded. At these words the whole multitude cryed out at once, that before they would see their religion violated, they would willingly suffer themselues to be destroyed. When the noise of the people was ceased, Petronius said; Are ye then prepared and minded to fight against Cæsar? The Iewes answered, We euery day offer sacrifices for Cæsar and the Romanes. But if Cæsar would needs place his image in their Temple, hee must first offer their whole nation for sacrifice: for they would willingly with their wiues & children offer themselues to any that would kill thē. Hereat Petronius great- C ly maruelled, being mooued to compassion when he beheld the constancy of the Iewes in their religion, and so great a multitude prepared to dye for it. And for that time they departed, nothing being done. The next day following he assembled only the Nobility of the Iewes, one by one, compelling them to accord to Cæsars command, and spake publikely to the people, sometime admonishing them, otherwhile threatning them, and putting them in minde of the power of the Romanes, and Cæsars indignation, and that he must of necessitie doe as he was commanded. But they were mooued by none of these. And Petronius fearing the ground would be left vntilled (for it was now seed time, and all the people had remained idle in the Citie for fiftie dayes space) calling them together, he said, that he would goe about a thing which might greatly endanger himselfe. For (said he) I will either (God working with me) appease Cæsars wrath, or D else I will lose mine owne life to saue such a multitude as you are. And dismissing the people, who made daily prayers to God for him, he led the armie from Ptolemais vnto Antiochia, from whence he presently sent vnto Cæsar in all haste, recounting vnto him with how great an armie he went into Iudæa, and that all the whole nation made supplication vnto him: whose request and humble suit if he denyed, he must vtterly destroy the men and their countrey; for they had constantly remained in their countrey religion, and vehemently resisted any new law. Caius writ an answer of these letters vnto Petronius, threatning that it should cost him his life, because he made no more haste to execute his command. The messengers that brought these letters, were tossed in a tempest vpon the Sea three whole moneths together: and others comming after them to bring newes of Caius his death, had a prosperous wind; so Petronius receiued the letters of E Caius Cæsars death twentie and seuen dayes before the other threatning letters came.

Of the Empire of CLAVDIVS, and of the raigne and death of AGRIPPA.

CAius Cæsar being slaine by treason, when he had raigned three yeeres and sixe moneths, Claudius was made Emperour by the armie which was at Rome. The Senate by the instigation of the Consuls Sentius Saturnius, and Pomponius the second, commanded three legions of Souldiers to keepe the Citie, during the Councell holden in the Capitol: and for F Caius Cæsars crueltie they determined to fight against Claudius, intending to reduce the Empire to the ancient gouernment; that as before-time, so for euer after, those should rule that the Senate iudged worthy. It chanced that at this time Agrippa came to Rome, and the Senate sent vnto him, requesting him to come and be one of their Councell. Claudius also desired him to take part with the armie, intending to vse his helpe where neede required. Agrippa perceiuing that Claudius was already as it were Emperour for his power, hee tooke part with him: who presently sent him as Embassadour to the Senate, to tell them his purpose; how that first of all, the souldiers, whether hee would or no, set him in that dignitie, and it had beene in him an an vndiſcreet part to haue forſaken ſuch an offer at the ſouldiers hands, who did it for good will: nay, if he had refuſed it, his life ſhould be in continuall danger, for it was ſufficient cauſe of enuy that he had beene elected Emperour. Moreouer, he purpoſed to rule, not as a tyrant, but as a moſt milde Prince: for he would be contented onely with the title of an Emperour, and doe nothing without the common conſent of them all. And although he was not naturally inclined to modeſt and courteous behauiour, yet he had a ſufficient example to beware that he abuſed not his authority, by Caius Cæſars death. Agrippa bare his meſſage to the Senate, who anſwered (as though they truſted to their ſouldiers and learned councell) that they would not thruſt themſelues into wilfull bondage. Claudius, receiuing this anſwer, ſent Agrippa againe to tell them, that nothing could cauſe him to betray them, by whom hee was made Emperour: and that hee was forced to make warre againſt them, with whom hee was very loth to ſtriue, and therefore will'd them to chuſe a place out of the Citie for the battell to be fought in: for it ſtood with no reaſon to deface the Citie with ciuill warres and maſſacres for the obſtinacy of ſome few. Agrippa did alſo this meſſage to the Senate: and one of the ſouldiers that were for the Senate drew his ſword, and ſaid; Fellow ſouldiers, what ſhould mooue vs to maſſacre our friends and kindred, and parents, who follow Claudius? eſpecially, ſeeing we haue an Emperour with whom we can finde no fault, vnto whom we ſhould rather goe forth with intreaties then with armes. When he had ſaid this, he paſſed thorow the midſt of the Court, and all the ſouldiers followed him.

The Senate follow the ſouldiers to Claudius.

The Senate, being thus left deſolate, and the Lords abandoned of their force, began to be in great feare: and ſeeing it was no ſtanding out for them, they followed the ſouldiers, and went to Claudius. Before the Citie walles there met them ſome that endeuoured to ſhew themſelues dutifull to Claudius for his fortune ſake, hauing their ſwords drawne, and they almoſt kild him, before Cæſar vnderſtood the outrage of the ſouldiers: and they had done it, had not Agrippa ranne and told him of the matter, ſaying, that if he did not preſently appeaſe the ſouldiers fury, now raging againſt the Citizens, all his Nobility would preſently be extinguiſhed, and he ſhould be left an Emperour of a deſolate place. When Claudius heard this, hee repreſſed the ſouldiers fury, and very honourably receiued the Senate into his Camp, and went forth preſently with them, and offered ſacrifice to God (as the manner is) for the good eſtate of the Empire. Alſo, he preſently made Agrippa King of all his fathers dominions, giuing him likewiſe that which Auguſtus gaue Herod, to wit, Trachonite and Auranite, and beſide them another kingdome, called the kingdome of Lyſania, and publiſhed this his gift by an Edict vnto the people, and commanded the Senate to engraue that donation in brazen Tables, and to place it in the Capitoll. Moreouer, he rewarded his brother Herod, who was his kinſman, with the kingdome of Chalcis, and married him to the Queene Berenice. Agrippa receiued greater reuenues of his kingdome then he could deſire, which he ſpent not vainely, but in building ſuch a wall about Ieruſalem, as, had he finiſht it, the Romanes could neuer haue taken it: but before he could end that work, he dyed in Cæſarea, hauing raigned three yeeres with the title of a King, and other three yeeres before in the ſtate of a Tetrarch. Hee left behinde him three daughters which he had by Cypris; Berenice, Mariamme and Druſilla, and one ſonne by the ſame wife, named Agrippa: who, becauſe he was very young, Claudius reduced the kingdome into a prouince, and made Ceſtius Feſtus Gouernour thereof. But after him, Tiberius Alexander, who nothing violating the lawes of the nation, ruled them in peace. After this, Herod King of Chalcis departed; leauing behinde him two ſonnes, which he had by his brothers daughter Berenice, to wit, Berenicianus and Hircanus: and by his firſt wife Mariamme, Ariſtobulus. His other brother alſo, Ariſtobulus, dyed a priuate perſon, leauing one daughter, Iotapata. And theſe were the poſteritie of Ariſtobulus, King Herods ſonne, and Herod had Alexander and Ariſtobulus by Mariamme, whom he put to death: but Alexanders poſteritie raigned in the greater Armenia.

Of diuers tumults in Iudæa and Samaria.

The yeere of the world, 4011. after Christs birth, 49.

AFTER the death of Herod, who raigned in Chalcis, Claudius created Agrippa the ſonne of the former Agrippa King of Chalcis in his vncles kingdome: and Cumanus was made Ruler of the other prouince after Alexander, vnder whom there were many tumults and new calamities, which befell the Iewes. For when they were aſſembled together at the feaſt of vnleauened bread in Ieruſalem, the Romane ſouldiers ſtanding in the porch of the Temple (for alwayes

A alwaies armed men kept that place vpon feſtiuall daies, leſt the people gathered together ſhould make any tumult) one of the ſouldiers, taking vp his coat, turned his bare buttockes againſt the Iewes faces, ſpeaking words as vnſeemely as was his geſture. Whereat the whole multitude began to murmure; ſo that they flocked about Cumanus, requeſting him to puniſh the ſouldier for this miſdemeanour: and ſome of them, raſh young men, and as it were prone to ſedition, began to reuile the ſouldiers, and threw ſtones at them. Then Cumanus, fearing that the whole multitude of the Iewes would violently ruſh vpon him, cald vnto him many armed ſouldiers, and ſent them into the porch of the Temple. The Iewes being in great feare fled and left the Temple, and there was ſuch a throng, that as they ruſhed out to flee, aboue ten thouſand people were preſt B and troden to death: ſo that this feſtiuall day was turned into woefull lamentations and mournings in euery place. This calamity was increaſed afterward by a company of theeues: for neere Bethoron one Stephanus, ſeruant vnto Cæſar, carried ſome houſhold ſtuffe, which the theeues tooke from him in the high way. But Cumanus, ſending for thoſe in the villages next adioyning, to make enquiry of theſe theeues, commanded them to be bound and brought vnto him, becauſe they had not taken the theeues: in one of which villages a certaine ſouldier finding the booke of the holy Scripture, cut it in pieces and burnt it. Hereupon the Iewes gathered themſelues together from all places, as though their religion were now violated: and drawne by the force of their ſuperſtition as with an engine, all of them at one call went to Cæſarea to Cumanus, there beſeeching him, that the ſouldier, who had blaſphemed God and their law, might not eſcape vnpu- C niſhed. But Cumanus perceiued, the Iewes would not be appeaſed without ſome ſatisfaction: wherefore he condemned the ſouldier to death, and ſent him to execution before their faces; which done, they all departed.

A Galilean ſlaine in Samaria.

At laſt there aroſe a tumult betweene the Galileans and Samaritanes; for at a village called Geman, ſituate in the great field of Samaria, a certaine Galilean, of the number of the Iewes that came to the feaſt, was ſlaine: for which fact many Galileans ran to fight with the Samaritanes: and the nobilitie of the country went vnto Cumanus, requeſting him, before any more harme were done, to goe into Galilee, and puniſh the authors of this euill. But Cumanus, being buſied in greater affaires, ſent them away without granting their requeſt. When this murther was knowne in Ieruſalem, all the multitude left the ſolemnitie of the day, and went into Samaria D without any guide, refuſing to be reſtrained by the Nobilitie. Of this their tumult and ſedition the ſonne of Dinæus, called Eleazar, and one Alexander, were Captaines; who with violence entring the borders of the countrey of Acrebatena, killed man, woman and childe, ſparing no age, and burning the townes. When Cumanus heard this, he tooke a cornet of horſemen, called the Sebaſtians, to come and helpe them that were thus oppreſſed, and ſo tooke and killed many of them who tooke part with Eleazar. Now the Nobles of Ieruſalem came out to the reſt of that multitude, which ſo waſted Samaria, clothed in ſackcloth and aſhes vpon their heads, beſeeching them not to ſeeke reuenge vpon the Samaritanes, as thereby to moue the Romanes to deſtroy Ieruſalem, and to be mercifull to their countrey, the Temple, their wiues and children, and not at once hazard all, and ouerthrow their whole countrey and nation in reuenging the death E of one Galilean. The Iewes hereby were pacified, and departed. At the ſame time many conſpired together to rob and ſteale (as moſt commonly people by long peace grow inſolent) ſo that they robd in euery part of the country, and they that were moſt ſtrong and able, offred violence to thoſe that were weaker. Then the Princes of Samaria went to Tyre, beſeeching Numidius Quadratus, being Gouernour of Syria, to reuenge them of thoſe that ſo robbed and ſpoyled their countrey. There was alſo the nobilitie of the Iewes, and Ionathas, the ſonne of Ananus, who was high Prieſt, who defended the Iewes againſt the Samaritanes accuſations; affirming, the Samaritanes to haue beene cauſe of that tumult in killing the Galilean: and after, that Cumanus was cauſe of the reſt of their calamities, who refuſed to puniſh the murtherers. Quadratus for that time ſent away both parties, promiſing them that when hee came into their countries, hee F would diligently enquire of the matter: and comming from thence to Cæſarea, he crucified all thoſe whom Cumanus tooke aliue. And departing from thence to Lydda, he heard the Samaritanes complaints, and ſent for eighteene men whom he vnderſtood for certaine to haue beene in that broile, and beheaded them, and ſent the two high Prieſts, Ionathas and Ananias, and his ſonne Ananus, with ſome of the nobilitie of the Iewes to Cæſar, and alſo the chiefe of the Samaritanes. He likewiſe commanded Cumanus and Celer the tribune to goe to Rome, and yeeld account vnto Claudius for that which they had done in that countrey.

This done, he went from Lydda to Ieruſalem: and finding there the multitude celebrating the feaſt

This done, he sent Fælix brother to Pallas to rule Iudæa, Samaria and Galilæa. And he preferred Agrippa from Chalcis to a greater kingdome, making him King of that Prouince whereof Philip had beene Ruler, to wit, Trachon, Batanæa and Gaulanitis, adding thereunto Lysanias kingdome, and the Tetrarchy whereof Varus was Gouernour: And hauing raigned thirteene yeeres, eight moneths, and thirtie dayes, Claudius departed this life, leauing Nero to succeed him, whom by the perswasions of his wife Agrippina he adopted to the Empire, hauing a lawfull begotten sonne of his owne, named Britannicus, by his former wife Messalina, and a daughter called Octauia, whom he married to Nero: he had also another daughter by Agrippina, named Antonia. CHAP. XII.

Of the tumult in Iudæa vnder FELIX.

WHerefore I will begin to recount what Nero did against the Iewes. Hee made Aristobulus, Herods son, King of the lesser Armenia, and ioyned vnto Agrippas kingdome foure cities, and the ground belonging vnto them: two of them, Abila and Iulias, were in the countrey of Peræa; the other, Tarichæa and Tiberias, were in Galilee: and he made Fælix Gouernour ouer the rest of Iudæa. This Fælix tooke Eleazar, Captaine of the theeues, after he had robbed and spoyled the country twenty yeeres, and many more with him, & sent them bound to Cæsar: and he crucified a great number of them, who either were theeues, and his confederates, or else such as assisted him. The countrey was no sooner cleansed from these, but presently another sort of theeues arose in Ierusalem, called Sicarij, with short swords, who at high noone in the midst of the citie killed many in euery place: and especially at the celebrating of holy feasts they mixt themselues with the multitude, hauing short swords vnder their coats, and therewithall kild those to whom they bare any grudge; and when men fell down dead, they among the rest complained of this wickednesse. By this deceitfull meanes they were a long time vnsuspected and vnknowne. And first of all, they kild Ionathan the high Priest, and after him euery day some were slaine; and the citie was put in a feare worse then death it selfe: for each man euery moment expected death, as though it had beene amidst open warres: likewise euery one cast a diligent eye vpon those that came neere him; also no man trusted his familiar friends: and yet were they murthered, whilest they were looking about them to escape danger. So cunningly did these theeues couer and conceale their actions. Moreouer, there arose another sort of mischieuous people, who did not so much harme with their hands as the first, but with their impious counsell more, and did no lesse trouble the quiet estate of the citie then did the theeues. These people being vagabonds and iugglers, desiring alteration vnder pretence of religion, made the people as it were mad: for they went into the wildernesse, affirming, that there God would shew them tokens of their libertie. Fælix, perceiuing that their action tended to rebellion, sent an arme of horse and foot against these people, and kild a great many of them.

But a certaine Ægyptian, a false prophet, caused a far greater massacre among the Iewes then that was: for being a Magician, he came into the country; and calling himselfe a propher, he gathered vnto him almost thirty thousand Iewes, who were by his Magick arts seduced: and leading them from the wildernes to mount Oliuet, he determined from thence to goe to Ierusalem, and to driue backe the forces of the Romans, and to vse his authoritie ouer the people. He had for his guard those that came to follow him. Fælix, foreseeing his intent, met him with his legiõs of armed Romans: whom the other Iewes assisting, and fighting against him, the Ægyptian with a few fled, and many that were with him were taken and committed to prison, and the rest of the multitude dispersed themselues euery one in his countrey. These being thus represt, the other part (as it hapneth in a sicke body) began to rise: for some of the Magicians, and the theeues being gathered together, they brought many vnto misery, and as it were exhorted them to liberty, threatning present death to those that obeyed the Romans; so that they forc't them who were contented

At this time aroſe another tumult at Cæſarea, by a ſedition raiſed betweene the Iewes that dwelt there, and the Syrians. The Iewes challenged the City to be theirs, becauſe it was founded by Herod, who was a Iew. But the Syrians denying not but that the builder of the Citie was a Iew, yet they affirmed that it belonged to the Gentiles: for (ſaid they) it had not beene lawfull for the Founder to haue placed in it ſhrines and ſtatues, if he had meant that it ſhould B haue belonged to the Iewes. So that hereupon there aroſe a great controuerſie among the Iewes and Syrians, inſomuch as the one fought againſt the other, and euery day thoſe that were the hardieſt of both parts fought together. For the eldeſt ſort of the Iewes could not reſtraine thoſe of their nation from being ſeditious: and the Greekes ſcorned to giue place to the Iewes. The Iewes ouercame them in riches and ſtrength of body, and the Græcians ouercame the Iewes by helpe of ſouldiers: for a great company of the Romane army came thither out of Syria, and they were ready to aſſiſt the Syrians, becauſe they were as it were of their kindred and conſanguinitie. The Captaines of the ſouldiers endeuoured to appeaſe the tumult, and tooke thoſe that were moſt ſeditious on both parts, and beat them, and caſt them in priſon. But the puniſhment of thoſe that were apprehended, terrified not the reſt: nay, they were hereby made more ſeditiC ous. When Fælix ſaw this, by a ſtreight Edict hee baniſht thoſe who were moſt ſeditious, out of the Citie: and thoſe that obeyed not, he ſent ſouldiers and ſlew them, ſuffering their goods to be taken by the ſouldiers. The ſedition being ſtill on foot, he ſent the Nobilitie on either part to Nero, to plead their right and title. Feſtus ſucceeded Fælix, who diligently perſecuted them that troubled the countrey, and deſtroyed many theeues.

Of ALBINVS and FLORVS, Preſidents of Iudæa.

D BVT Albinus, who ſucceeded Feſtus, followed not his ſteps: for there was no iniquitie ſo great wherein he was not plunged. Furthermore, hee did not onely take away by force mens goods from them vnder colour of iuſtice, and at his owne pleaſure exact a greater tribute, but alſo freed and let looſe any one whom either the ſouldiers of the Citie tooke, or his predeceſſors had left in priſon, ſo that their friends would giue a piece of money: and they only, who were not able to giue money, were impriſoned as moſt hainous offenders. At this time, they in Ieruſalem that deſired alteration, began to take courage, and thoſe that were rich among them fee'd Albinus with money, to permit them to be ſeditious, and the common people that could not be in quiet, ioyned themſelues with Albinus fauourites: and each of them had a troupe of theeues after him. But Albinus himſelfe was ouer them all as a tyrant, and a prince of theeues; and he vſed the helpe of his guard to rob the meaner ſort: ſo they, whoſe houſes were ſackt and E ſpoyled, were glad to hold their peace; and they, who yet had eſcaped, were glad to be very officious towards thoſe who deſerued death, for feare they ſhould ſuffer the like. In generall, no man could truſt one another: there were then many tyrants, and from that time the ſeeds of captiuitie, which after befell, began to take roote.

Notwithſtanding, that Albinus was of ſuch behauiour, yet Geſſius Florus, who ſucceeded him, ſo behaued himſelfe, that in compariſon of him, Albinus might haue beene thought a good Gouernour. For Albinus did all things ſecretly and craftily, but Geſſius committed any iniquitie how great ſoeuer, ſo openly, as though he gloried in his impietie; and behaued himſelfe, not as a ruler of the countrey, but as a hangman ſent to execute malefactors; omitting no manner of theft, nor any meanes whereby he might afflict the people. Where he ought to haue ſhewed pi-F tie, there was he a tyrant; and where hee ought to haue beene aſhamed, there hee ſhewed himſelfe ſhameleſſe. No man euer could inuent more meanes to obſcure truth, and deuiſe more waies to doe harme then he: for it ſufficed him not, for his owne gaine to abuſe men one by one at his pleaſure, but he waſted and ſpoyled whole cities at once, and deſtroyed the people in great multitude. Nay, he was not aſhamed by the publike voice of a cryer, to proclaime it thorow the whole country lawfull for any one that would, to rob & ſteale, ſo that they would bring him a part of their booty. In briefe, his cruelty was ſuch, that the country was almoſt left deſolate, people forſaking their owne natiue home, and fleeing into ſtrange lands. And all the time that Ceſtius Gallus

But when at the feast of vnleauened bread Gallus came to Ierusalem, there met him a multitude of the Iewes aboue 300000, all beseeching him to helpe and succour their afflicted countrey, and banish Florus, who was the very plague of their nation. Yet Florus was so impudent, that being with Gallus, and hearing these cries against him, he was no whit moued thereat, but laughed at it. Cestius for that time appeased the people, promising that hereafter he would make Florus more gentle vnto them, and so returned to Antiochia. Florus conducted him to Cæsarea to stop his mouth with lies, deuising with himselfe how to make the Iewes rebell, and that he thought was the safest meanes to cloake his villanies: for if they continued in peace and obedience, he feared, that some of them would accuse him before Cæsar: mary, if he could make them reuolt, then he hoped that their great fault would shadow his impieties. Wherefore to bring about his purpose, he euery day oppressed them with new calamities, forcing them hereby to rebell against the Romans. At this time the Gentiles of Cæsarea got the victory ouer the Iewes, and brought letters to testifie that decree before Nero. The yeere of the world, 4030. after Christs Nativitie, 68.

Florus periury and deceit toward the Iewes.

FLORVS had no iust cause for any of these calamities which hee inflicted vpon the Iewes. The Iewes dwelling at Cæsarea, had a Synagogue neere a piece of ground that belonged to a Gentile dwelling in Cæsarea. The Iewes often sought to compound with him for that piece of ground, offring him farre more then it was worth: but the Landlord of the soile did not only contemne their request, but also to their great griefe in that place built Tauernes; so that he left them a very streight and narrow passage to go to their Synagogue. Some young men among the Iewes, being very zealous, resisted the workemen, and would not suffer them to build. Florus, hearing this, commanded the Iewes to let the workmen goe forward in their worke. The Iewes not knowing what to doe, especially one Iohn, a Publican, offered Florus eight talents to hinder the building: he promised for that money to fulfill their request: and now hauing it, he presently departed from Cæsarea, and went to Sebaste without performing any thing, giuing as it were occasion of sedition, & as though he had receiued money of the Nobility of the Iewes to permit them to fight a certain time. The next day, which was the Iewes Sabbath, when they were all assembled to go to the Synagogue, one of Cæsarea, a seditious person, tooke a great earthen vessell, and set it euen at the entry into the Synagogue, & vpon it did offer birds. This fact so moued the Iewes, that they would not be pacified, because it was done in contempt of their religion, and thereby the place was profaned. One part of the Iewes that was most modest & wisest, counseld the Iewes to complaine to them that were in authoritie: but those who for heat of youth were prone to sedition, began contumeliously to reuile their aduersaries. For the most seditious of the people of Cæsarea were also prepared to fight with them, and had caused that to be done before the Synagogue, only to pick a quarrell, & so they fought together. Iucundus, Generall of the horsemen, that was left to keepe all in quiet, presently came with souldiers, and commanded that vessell to be taken away, and so endeuoured to appease the tumult: but not being able to doe it through the violence of them of Cæsarea; the Iewes tooke the bookes of their lawes, and retired themselues to a place called Narbata, belonging to them, which was distant from Cæsarea threescore furlongs. Twelue of the chiefe of them, together with Iohn the Publican, went vnto Florus, being at Sebaste, to complaine of the iniury done vnto them, requesting him to assist them, and modestly put him in minde of the eight talents they gaue him. But he presently commanded them to be bound and imprisoned, because they had presumed to take and carry their law from Cæsarea. Hereat those of Ierusalem were greatly mooued, yet they shewed it not. Florus, as vpon set purpose giuing occasion of rebellion, sent for seuenteene talents out of the sacred treasury, pretending that it was to be employed in Cæsars affaires. At this the people was much troubled, calling and crying vpon the name of Cæsar, praying that he would deliuer them from Florus his tyranny. Some of them being seditious, began to curse Florus bitterly, and tooke a basket, and carried it about, and begged an almes for Florus, which they did in derision, as who should say, he were as miserable as beggers that haue nothing. Florus for all this, left not his auarice, but was more earnest to rob the inhabitants of their goods. So that when he should haue gone

Another cause of warre raised by Florus.

A gone to Cæsarea to haue quieted the sedition,and remooued the cause of tumults,as also he had receiued money so to doe; taking an army of horse and foot, he came to Ierusalem, that with the helpe of the Romane souldiers he might effect his pleasure, and terrifie the whole citie.

The yeere of the world, 4030. after Christs birth, 68.

The people to pacifie his wrath, went out in courteous sort to meet the army, shewing themselues ready to giue them the best entertainment they could,& to receiue Florus with all honour and reuerence. Florus vnderstanding of them,sent before him one Capito a Centurion, with fiftie horsemen;commanding them to depart,and not to mock him with a pretence of honour,whom they had so hainously abused. And that if they were as good as their words, they should flout and reproach him to his face;and not onely in words;but in deeds shew,that they desired liberty.

Another occasion of the warre.

B Herewithall the multitude being terrified, and also that the horsemen that came with Capito assaulted them with violence; euery one fled before they saluted Florus, or did their accustomed duty vnto the army: and going euery one vnto his house, they past the watchfull night in feare and sorrow. Florus for that night lodged in the Kings palace. The next day he caused a tribunall openly to be placed,and the high Priest and all the chiefe of the Iewes resorted thither & stood before the tribunall. Then Florus sitting in the tribunall seat, commanded them to bring forth presently all those,that had vsed any opprobrious words against him, threatning to be reuenged on them except they did it. The Iewes made answer, that the people intended nothing but peace and quietnesse,requesting that they that had offended in words,might obtaine pardon. For it was no maruell in so great a multitude,if there were some rash and foolish young men:and that

C it was vnpossible to discerne all that offended,seeing euery one was now penitent for that which was done,and at least for feare would deny it; and that if he were carefull to conserue and maintaine the quietnesse of the nation, and preserue the citie still to obey the Romanes, he then must rather pardon a few seditious for so many good mens sake; then to reuenge himselfe of a few wicked persons,to hurt and molest so many that thought no harme. Hereat Florus wrath was increased, and presently he commanded the souldiers to sacke the market place (which was the higher part of the citie) where things were sold, and put all they met or found vnto the sword. The souldiers, who were desirous of gaine,hauing now authoritie from their Ruler,did not only sacke the place they were sent vnto, but also all houses, and murthered the inhabitants. All

And there were slaine that day, of men,women and children (for they spared not infants)sixe hundreth and thirtie. Which did not afflict the Iewes so much, as to see the sudden crueltie and tyrannie of the Romans; Florus then doing that none before durst euer presume to doe: for he caused knights before the tribunall seat to be whipped, and after hanged them vp, who though they were Iewes borne, yet receiued they that dignitie from the Romans.

AT the same time King Agrippa was gone to Alexandria, to entertaine Alexander, whom Nero sent to be Ruler ouer Ægypt; his sister Berenice in the meane while remained in Ierusalem, who seeing the crueltie of the souldiers,was much grieued: and often sent the Lieutenants of her horsemen and her owne guard vnto Florus, requesting him to abstaine from the slaughter of the Citizens. But he neither regarding the multitude of them that were slaine, nor the dignitie of her that intreated, but only his priuate gaine, and what he could gather by oppression and rapine, denyed her request: so that the rage of the souldiers extended

F in their way, but they had also killed her, had shee not fled into the palace, where she watcht all night,keeping a trusty guard about her,fearing that the souldiers would breake in vpon her. She came to Ierusalem to fulfill her vow to God:for it is the custom,that if any be afflicted with grieuous sicknes,or be in any other distresse, they must abide in prayer 30.daies before they offer sacrifice,& abstaine from wine,and shaue their haire;which custom Queen Berenice then obseruing, stood also barefoot before Florus his tribunall seat,to entreat him:whom he not only cõtemned, but also put her in danger of her life. This was done the 16.day of May. The day after,the multitude gathered together in the vpper part of the citie in the market place, and with great cryes murmured murmured that ſo many were ſlaine, and eſpecially vſed contumelious words againſt Florus: which the nobility and high Prieſts (fearing their deaths) apprehended, beſeeching them to abſtaine from ſuch words as had already cauſed that calamity in the city, and not to prouoke Florus vnto greater indignation. And ſo the multitude was pacified for their ſakes who entreated, and hoped that hereafter Florus would deſiſt from ſuch cruelty. Florus, when he ſaw the multitude quieted, was ſorry: and that he might againe prouoke them, he aſſembled together the nobility and high Prieſts, telling them that it would be an argument that the people did not ſeeke alteration any more, if they would goe in courteous wiſe and meet the ſouldiers which were comming from Cæſarea, whereof were two legions. Hauing thus aſſembled the Iewes together to go meet the ſouldiers; he alſo ſent and commanded the Centurions not to ſalute the Iewes, who came to meet them: and if therefore the Iewes were offended, and gaue any hard ſpeeches, they ſhould fall vpon them with their weapons. The high Prieſts aſſembling the Iewes together in the Temple, beſought them to goe, & ſolemnly to meet and entertaine the ſouldiers, for feare of a greater inconuenience. Notwithſtanding their counſell, thoſe that were ſeditious, refuſed to doe as they were requeſted: and others for griefe of them that were ſlaine, tooke part with the ſeditious.

Florus renueth the diſcontents of the people. Florus ſubtilty & treaſon.

Then all the Prieſts & Leuites brought forth the holy veſſels & ornaments of the temple, and with Harps, ſongs & muſicall inſtruments came before the multitude, beſeeching them to endeuour, that the honor and pompe of the Temple might ſtill remaine, & not to incite the Romans through contumelious words to ſacke the Temple. There might you ſee the chiefe of the high Prieſts with aſhes vpon their heads, and clothes rent, ſo that their naked breſts were perceiued; and calling euery noble man by his name, & ſpeaking to all the multitude, requeſted them not for a ſmall offence, to betray their whole country to them, who ſtill gaped after the deſtruction thereof. For what commodity ſhould the Romans reape by the Iewes ſalutation, & what amendment of their miſeries could they expect, if they did not go to meet them? Cõtrariwiſe, if they would go to them in ſolemn ſort, then they took from Florus all occaſion of perſecution, & ſaued their countrey from ruine, and themſelues from further calamities. Adding that it was a great ſhame that ſuch a multitude ſhould be led away with a few ſeditious perſons, & that it was more fit that ſo many ſhould force thoſe few ſeditious people to obey them, and ioyne with them in opinion.

The exhortation of the Prieſts and Princes to the people.

With theſe perſwaſions they did mollifie the malice of the Iewes, and alſo perſwade many of the ſeditious people, ſome with threats, and ſome with reuerence of themſelues to be pacified. And ſo they going before, all the people followed, and went out to meet the Romane ſouldiers. And comming neere them they ſaluted them: who anſwering nothing againe, thoſe of the Iewes that were ſeditious, began to raile againſt Florus, by whoſe conſent this was done: and preſently the ſouldiers apprehending them, did beat them with clubs; and the reſt flying, the Romane horſemen purſued them, and trode vpon them with their horſes. Many were ſlaine by the Romans, and more were killed in the throng, one of them tumbling vpon another. There was a great throng in the gates of the Citie: for euery one haſting and ſtriuing to get in, hindred themſelues and others. Many dyed moſt miſerably in that throng, and ſome were ſtyfled, and ſome preſt to death being troden vpon; ſo that their neighbours comming to bury them, could not know them. The ſouldiers alſo cruelly aſſaulted them, killing all that they could come vnto, and forced the people to goe in by the entrance called Bezetha, who deſired to recouer the Temple and the Caſtle called Antonia.

The euent ſheweth Florus intent and counſell. The ſlaughter of the Iewes.

Florus taking the ſouldiers with him, purſued them thither, ſtriuing to get the Caſtle; yet did he not preuaile: for the people made reſiſtance, and threw downe ſtones from the houſe top, and killed many of the Romans: who being ouercome with darts caſt from aloft, and could not reſiſt the people, who on euery ſide came againſt them, retyred themſelues vnto the reſt of the army at the Kings palace. Thoſe that were ſeditious, fearing that Florus would againe aſſault them, and by the Caſtle Antonia make an entrance into the Temple, they got vpon the galleries that reached from the porch of the Temple vnto Antonia, and beat them downe, hereby to repreſſe the couetouſneſſe of Florus, who greedily gaped after the ſacred treaſure, and ſtriued to enter by Antonia into the Temple to take them: but ſeeing the porches beaten downe, he offred no more violence. And calling together the high Prieſts and Nobilitie, hee ſaid that he was content to depart out of the Citie, but hee would leaue them as great a garriſon as they would requeſt. Whereunto they anſwered, that nothing ſhould bee altred, if he would leaue one company to keepe all quiet: ſo he left not that, which a while before did fight againſt the people, becauſe that the people would not eaſily brooke them, for that which they had ſuffred at their hands. So Florus as he requeſted, changing the garriſon with the reſt of the army departed to Cæſarea.

The ſeditious for feare leſt Florus ſhould ſeize their ſpoyles, flye to the Temple. Florus taketh the ſpoyles, and entereth the Temple. Florus ſeeing the Iewes inexpugnable in the Temple, ſurceaſeth his violence, and leauing a band behinde him, goeth to Cæſarea.

of POLITIANVS the tribune, and how AGRIPPA made a ſpeech vnto the Iewes, exhorting them to obey the Romanes.

The yeere of the world, 4030. after Chriſts birth, 68.

FLORVS yet deuiſed another way to ſtirre the Iewes to rebellion: for he reported vnto Ceſtius that the Iewes were reuolted, impudently belying them to haue committed that which indeed they endured at his hands. The nobles of Ieruſalem and Berenice certified Ceſtius of all that Florus had done: he receiuing letters from both parties, deliberated with his nobles what to doe. Some counſelled Ceſtius to goe into Iudea with an army, and puniſh the Iewes, if they were reuolted; and if they were not, then to confirme them in their obedience. Yet it pleaſed him better to ſend ſome about him thither before, to bring him true newes of their eſtate, and what had hapned. So hee ſent Politianus the tribune, who in his way met with Agrippa about Iamnia as he returned from Alexandria, and told him all, for what, and from whom he was ſent. Where alſo were preſent the Prieſts and chiefe of the Iewes, to welcome Agrippa. And hauing ſaluted him as courteouſly as they could, they preſently bewayled the miſery which had befalne their nation, and the crueltie of Florus. Which although Agrippa diſallowed, yet made as if he were angry with the Iewes whom he greatly pitied, purpoſing hereby to bridle their affections; that they, perſwaded that they had had no iniury, might abſtaine from reuenge. So that all the better ſort, who for their lands and liuings deſired quietneſſe, well perceiued that the Kings reprehenſion was not of malice, but for their good.

Ceſtius Gallus, Preſident of Syria conſulteth with the Princes what were beſt to bee done. Politianus is ſent to Ieruſalem, & meets with Agrippa.

The people of Ieruſalem went out to meet them threeſcore furlongs off, and receiued Agrippa and Politianus very courteouſly, yet the women lamented the death of their husbands ſlaine, and with their teares moued the whole multitude to ſorrow, who beſought Agrippa to haue compaſſion on their nation; entreating alſo Politianus to goe into the Citie, and behold what Florus had done: And ſo they ſhewed him the market place deſart, and the houſes deſtroyed, and by the means of Agrippa perſwaded Politianus to go round about the city as far as Siloa, onely with one man, & behold with his eyes what Florus had done, and that they were obedient to the Romans in all thiugs, and only were enemies vnto Florus who had vſed them ſo cruelly. Politianus hauing gone about the whole Citie, aſcended into the Temple, well perceiuing many arguments of the Iewes fidelitie towards the Romans: and calling the people there together, he praiſed their loyalty, and exhorted them ſtill to continue in in like obedience, and worſhipped God and his rites, as farre as the law permitted him: and ſo he returned vnto Ceſtius. The multitude of the Iewes came to Agrippa and the high Prieſts, requeſting them to ſend Embaſſadors againſt Florus vnto Nero, and not to giue an argument of rebellion by not complaining of ſuch murthers: for Florus would make him beleeue that they had rebelled, except they went vnto him to ſhew that Florus gaue firſt occaſion; and it was certaine that the multitude would not be quieted, if any one hindered that Embaſſage. Hereupon Agrippa thought that it would be an hatefull matter to ſend Embaſſadours to Rome to accuſe Florus, and on the other part he perceiued, that it was to no purpoſe to contradict the Iewes, who were ready now to rebell: wherefore calling the people together he made a ſpeech vnto them, and ſeated his ſiſter Berenice in an eminent place in the houſe of the Aſmonæans. The porch wherein he called them together, was in ſuch a place that it ouerlookt all the higher part of the city, for there was only a bridge between it & the temple, which ioyned the Temple and it together, and there ſpake he vnto the Iewes in manner following. If I had perceiued that you were bent to fight againſt the Romans, or that the better part of the people were not inclined to peace, neither would I haue come vnto you, nor haue preſumed to haue counſelled you in any thing. For it is in vaine to giue counſell of ſuch things as are expedient, where all the auditors are already determined to follow that, which is contrary to the counſell giuen them. But for that ſome are ignorant what miſery wars induce, becauſe by reaſon of their yong yeeres they haue not knowne it, others are moued with a raſh and vnaduiſed deſire of their liberty, others are drawne by auarice and hope of gaine in that hurliburly: I thought it good to aſſemble you all together, and declare vnto you what meanes is to be vſed to reſtraine ſuch people, and that the good may the better know how to reſiſt and ouercome the practices of the wicked. But let no man frowne if he heare that which diſpleaſeth him, and I will tell you nothing but that which ſeemeth expedient for you. For they that are ſo bent to rebellion, that they will not be recalled, may for all my words continue in the ſame mind ſtill. And I will ſpeak nothing at all, except you will all keepe ſilence. I know that many doe ſeeke to aggrauate the iniuries that are done by the rulers of the countrey, and doe highly commend and extoll liberty: yet before I begin begin to declare vnto you who you are, and against whom ye purpose to beare armes, I will first diuide and separate such causes as you thinke inseparable. For if you seeke only to reuenge your selues vpon those that haue iniured you, why do you then so extoll liberty? or if you think it not tolerable to obey any other; why then, these complaints against your rulers are superfluous. For although they were neuer so milde, still would subiection be intolerable. Call all things to mind, and consider what a small cause of war is giuen you. And first of all weigh with your selues the crimes and offences of your Rulers: for you ought to shew your selues humble, and dutifull to them that are in authority, and not exasperate, and prouoke them to wrath by reprochfull speeches. For in reuiling them for small offences, you doe incite them against you whom you so reuile: and that whereas before they did only doe you a little iniury, and that secretly, now being moued through bad speeches, they openly set vpon you and destroy you. And there is nothing that so restraineth cruelty as patience; so that oft-times the patience of them who haue suffered iniury, makes them that did the iniury ashamed thereof. Be it so, that they, which are sent into the Prouinces and appointed by the Romans for your Gouernors, are irksome to you: yet all the Romans doe not oppresse you, nor Cæsar, against whom you would take armes. For they command no cruell Gouernors to come to you, nor can they who are in the furthest part of the West, easily know what is done in the East, nor heare thereof. And truly it is a thing most against reason to take armes for so small a cause, especially, when they against whom you take armes, know nothing of the matter. It is an easie way quickly to haue redresse for these matters you now complaine of. For there will be alwaies the same Gouernor; and it is credible, that they who succeed this, will be more gentle and courteous. But if you once begin to make warre, it is not easie to end it or sustaine it without great calamities. And let them who so thirst after liberty, diligently aduise themselues, that they doe not bring vpon their backs a greater bondage. For slauery is a cruell thing, and it seemeth a lawfull cause to make warre, lest you be brought into it: yet he that is already in bondage and reuolteth, is rather a peruerse slaue, then one who desireth liberty. You should therefore haue endeuoured to haue resisted the Romanes, when first Pompeius entred into this Land: but then our ancestors and their Kings farre exceeding you in riches, strength of body, and courage, were not able to withstand a small part of the Romane forces; and doe you thinke who are their successours, and farre weaker then they, hauing succeeded them in subiection, that you are able to resist all the whole power of the Romans?

It behooueth to honour the Magistrate, & not to prouoke him by iniury.

Agrippa excuseth Cæsar and the Romanes.

Depulsion of the Iewes libertie which they so vehemently seeke for.

The Athenians, who sometime to conserue the liberty of Greece, set their owne citie on fire, and pursued that proud Xerxes whom they forced to flie with one ship (which Xerxes made the earth nauigable, and the sea firme land, who had such a nauy that the seas had not roome for one ship to saile by another, nor all Europe able to receiue his army) who also had such a victory ouer Asia, neere the little Ile of Salamina, yet now are subiect vnto the Romans, and that kingly Citie is now ruled at the Romans beck. The Lacedemonians also hauing gotten such a victorie vpon the Thermopyles, and vnder their Generall Agesilaus sacked Asia, acknowledge now the Romans for their Lords. The Macedonians also who still imagine they see Philip and Alexander promising them the Empire of the whole world; now patiently beare this change, and obey them whom fortune hath made their masters. Many other nations, who for their power and strength haue farre more cause then you to seeke their libertie, yet patiently endure to serue the Romans. But you only think it a disgrace to obey them, who are Lords of the whole world. And where are the armies & armes that you trust in, or your nauy to scowre the Roman seas? Where are your treasures to effect that you intend? Thinke you that you are to war against the Ægyptians or Arabians? And doe you not consider the bounds of the Roman Empire? Do you not consider your owne inabilitie? Know ye not that your neighbour nations haue often by force taken your Citie? and that the forces of the Romans haue passed thorow the whole world vnconquered, and as it were searching for some thing greater then the world? Whose dominion towards the East is extended beyond Euphrates, and towards the North beyond Ister, and towards the South beyond the wildernesse of Lybia, and towards the West beyond Gades, hauing found another world beyond the Ocean, and with an armie entred Britaine which is England and Scotland, where neuer any came before. Are you richer then the Frenchmen, stronger then the Germanes, wiser then the Greekes, and are you more in number then the whole world beside? What hope can you haue that may incite you against the Romanes? But some of you will say, that bondage is a grieuous thing. But how much more then you, should the Greekes thinke so, that were thought to bee the noblest nation vnder heauen, and had such large dominions, and now obey the Romane gouernours? as also the Macedonians doe, who haue greater cause then you

The comparison of the Romans force with the Iewes weakenesse.

The Romans haue brought the whole world vnder their gouernment, & haue fought another world beyond the Ocean sea.

A you to ſeeke their liberty? What ſhall I ſay of the fifty cities of Aſia? do they not all obey one ruler, and the authority of the Conſull, without any Garriſon? What ſhall I ſpeake of the Enio-chians, Colchians, the people of Taurus, the inhabitants of Helleſpontus, and Pontus, and about Mæotis, who in times paſt had no ruler of their owne nation, whom now three thouſand ſouldiers keep in awe, and forty long Gallies keepe now peaceably thoſe ſeas, neuer ſailed on before? What thinke you, the Bythinians, Cappadocians, and thoſe of Pamphilia, Lydia, and Cilicia, could ſay for their liberty, who notwithſtanding now peaceably pay tribute vnto the Romanes? What of the Thracians? whoſe countrey is fiue dayes iourney in breadth, and ſeuen in length, farre more hard and ſtronger then your countrey, where froſt would hinder them that ſhould B aſſault them, yet doe they obey two thouſand Romanes, who are in garriſon. After them the Illyrians, whoſe country reacheth vnto Dalmatia, and Iſther, are kept in obedience onely by two legions, with helpe of whom, they alſo reſiſt the Dacians. The Dalmatians themſelues, who hauing ſo often attempted their owne liberty, being oftentimes conquered, and ſtill as their wealth increaſed, rebelling, are now in peace vnder one legion of the Romanes. Nay, if any one haue cauſe to rebell, it is the Frenchmen, whoſe countrey is by nature of the place, ſtrong, being on the Eaſt ſide compaſſed with the Alpes, on the North with the Riuer of Rhene, on the South with the Pyrenæan mountaines, on the Weſt with the Ocean. Who notwithſtanding, hauing amongſt them three hundreth and fiue nations, who haue amongſt them as it were the very fountaine of felicity, and with their goods and commodities inrich the whole world: yet doe they pay tribute C vnto the Romanes, and account their happineſſe to be builded vpon the felicity of the Romanes, and that neither for want of courage nor nobility of blood, who foureſcore yeeres long fought for their liberty; admiring the Romans and fearing them, who ſtill gained more by fortune, then they did by warres: and now obey a thouſand and two hundreth ſouldiers, hauing almoſt againſt euery ſouldier a City.

Fifty cities of Aſia obey the Romans.

The defence of France.

Neither could the Spaniards, though gold grew in their countrey, keepe themſelues from being ſubiect to the Romans. Nor the Portugales and the warlike Cantabrians, for all the diſtance of ſea and land betweene them and Rome. The Ocean, whoſe waues beating againſt the ſhoare, terrifieth the inhabitants adioyning, could not ſtay them but they paſt it: and carried an army beyond the pillers of Hercules, and paſſed the tops of the Pyrenæan mountaines, which reach vn-D to the cloudes, and ſo made all thoſe people ſubiect vnto them: and for all that they were ſo warlike a nation, and ſo farre from Rome, they left only one legion for Garriſon. Which of you haue not heard of the multitude of the Germanes? whoſe vertue and mighty bodies I thinke you haue often ſeene. For in euery countrey the Romanes haue them for captiues: yet they whoſe countrey is ſo large, hauing hearts farre bigger then their bodies, and ſoules that contemne death, who are more cruell then brute beaſts; yet are they now limited by the riuer Rhene, and kept in ſubiection by eight legions of Romanes: and thoſe that were taken were made ſlaues, and the reſt choſe rather to ſaue themſelues by flight then fight. And you who haue ſuch confidence in the walles of Ieruſalem, conſider the walles of Brytaine; whoſe countrey though compaſſed with the Ocean, and almoſt as great as our whole world, the Romanes ſayling into it, haue conquered, E and foure legions keepe that Iland ſo populous. What ſhould I ſay more, when the Parthians, a moſt warlike people, who lately raigned ouer ſo many nations, and abound in ſo much wealth, are now compelled to ſend pledges to Rome? Nay, you may ſee all the Nobility of the Eaſt, at Rome, who with peace ſhadow their captiuity; and almoſt all the nations vnder the Sunne trembling and dreading the Romane puiſſance: and will you onely warre againſt them? Doe you not conſider what befell the Carthaginians, who boaſting themſelues of that great Hannibal, ſprung from the noble race of the Phœnicians, at laſt were deſtroyed by Scipio? Neither could the Cyrenæans, who tooke their beginning from the Lacedemonians, nor all the race of the Marmaridans, which extended as farre as the Deſarts (which are very ſcarce of waters) nor the Syrtes, nor the Naſamonians, nor the Moores, nor the innumerable multitude of the Numidi-F ans, haue beene able to reſiſt the power of the Romans; who by force of armes haue conquered the third part of the world, the nations whereof can hardly be numbred, which from the Sea Atlantick and Hercules pillers vnto the red Sea, containeth an infinite company of Æthiopians, and innumerable habitations of them: who beſides that they pay ſo much fruits and Corne vnto the Romans, as for eight moneths in euery yeer will keep and ſuſtain all the people of Rome, doe alſo pay tribute; and moreouer aſſiſt them any way they can, and neuer murmure at it, as you doe; and there is onely one legion left to keepe them in obedience. But what ſhould I need to tell you of forraine examples, to ſignifie vnto you the power of the Romans, ſeeing you may well

To this, Agrippa anſwered, But your deeds ſhew that you fight againſt the Romanes: for you haue not paid your tribute to Cæſar, and you haue burned the porches belonging vnto Antonia; now if you would hide your rebellion, repaire with ſpeed the porches, and pay your tribute: for this fort belongeth not to Florus, nor the money. Herewith the people were content: and aſcending into the Temple with Agrippa and Berenice, they began to reedifie the porches, and the Nobility and Captains gathered the tribute in euery village, and quickly brought forty talents (for ſo much money was behinde.) And thus Agrippa appeaſed the beginning of theſe wars. After this, he began to perſwade the people to obey Florus, till ſuch time as another were ſent to ſupply his place.

B Herewith the multitude was ſo mooued, that they contumeliouſly reuiled the King, and threw ſtones at him, and draue him out of the citie. The King ſeeing that their ſedition would not bee quieted, complaining of the iniury done vnto him, ſent the Nobilitie and all the Potentates to Florus, who was at Cæſarea, that hee might chuſe whom he would amongſt them to gather the tribute thorow the whole countrie. Of the rebellion of the Iewes begun againſt the Romanes.

C AT this time, ſome of the chiefeſt rebels, aſſembled together, ſuddenly aſſault a Caſtle called Maſſada, which at vnawares they tooke, and killed all the Romanes, and in their places put a guard of their owne company. In the Temple alſo, Eleazar, ſonne of the high Prieſt Ananias, a bold and deſperate young man, Captaine of the ſouldiers, perſwaded them who offered ſacrifices, not to offer any, but thoſe that were giuen by the Iewes. And this was the ground and cauſe of the warres that enſued. For they reiected Cæſars ſacrifices, that were wont to bee offered for the good of the Romanes. And although the high Prieſts and people of account requeſted them not to omit that cuſtome of ſacrificing for their Kings and Gouernours, yet they refuſed ſo to doe, truſting greatly to their faction: all the ſtrength of the Citie that deſired alteration, were of their minds, and eſpecially Eleazar, who at that time was

D Generall, as is before ſaid. Wherefore all the Potentates, high Prieſts, and chiefeſt of the Phariſes aſſembled themſelues; and perceiuing into how great dangers thoſe rebels brought the Citie, they determined to make triall of the courage of the ſeditious people: wherefore they aſſembled them together before the brazen gate, which was in the inner part of the Temple toward the East. And firſt of all, they greatly complained of their raſh and vnaduiſed rebellion, and that they ſought to ſtirre vp ſo great warres againſt their countrey, inueighing againſt the cauſe that moued them thereto, as being without reaſon: telling them that their anceſtors for the moſt part, adorned the Temple with the gifts of Gentiles; neuer refuſing the offrings of ſtrangers; and not onely not to haue refuſed their offrings (for that were an impious fact) but alſo placed in the Temple the gifts that they ſent, which were yet to be ſeene. And that now onely to prouoke the Romans

E to warre, and denounce it againſt them, they began to alter Religion: and beſide other dangers alſo, to make the Citie ſeeme guiltie of impietie; as though it were ſuch a one, wherein none might offer ſacrifice but Iewes, nor any but they adore God. If wee ſhould make ſuch a law againſt any priuate perſon, he had iuſt cauſe to accuſe vs of inhumanitie. But now the Romanes were deſpiſed, and Cæſar himſelfe accounted prophane: and it was to be feared, that if the Iewes diſdained to accept of Cæſars offrings, Cæſar would hinder them from offering any: And that the Citie of Ieruſalem would preſently bee accounted as an enemie to the Empire, vnleſſe they preſently accepted Cæſars ſacrifice; and before ſuch time as they heard theſe newes againſt whom this outrage was attempted. And hauing thus ſpoken, they brought forth the moſt learned amongſt the Prieſts, to recount from time to time how their anceſtors had alwaies accepted of the ſacrifices

But none of the rebels gaue eare vnto any thing that was ſaid, and the Leuites came not to ſerue at the Altar; as now preparing for war. When the Nobility ſaw that they could not appeaſe this ſedition, and that they themſelues ſhould firſt feele the Romanes power, they deuiſed all meanes to pacifie the tumult, and ſent ſome as Embaſſadors vnto Florus: the chiefe whereof was Simon, the ſonne of Ananias: other ſome were ſent to Agrippa, of which the nobleſt was Saulus, Antipas and Coſtobarus, who were alſo akinne vnto the King, requeſting them both to come with an army into the citie, and ſuppreſſe the ſedition which was raiſed, before it went further. Florus was glad glad of these tidings, and desiring nothing more then warre, gaue no answer to the Embassadors. But Agrippa willing to spare both parts, as well the good as the rebels, and to preserue the Iewes for the Romans, and the Temple for the Iewes, considering it not meet for him to busie himselfe in such affaires, sent 3000. horsemen to aid the people against the rebels. Which horsemen were of Auranitis, Batanæa and Trachon, and made Darius their captaine, and Philip, son of Ioachim, Generall of all the army. These comming into the city, the Nobility, with the high Priests and the rest of the people that desired peace, receiued this succour in good part; and occupied the higher part of the city; for the rebels kept the lower part, and the Temple: so that they instantly fought with darts and slings, and shooting of arrowes; and sometime one rushing vpon another, suddenly they skirmished together. The seditious were more valiant, but the kings souldiers were more skilfull in wars; who chiefly endeauoured to get the Temple, and expell out of it those who prophaned it. And the rebels with Eleazar endeuoured, beside that which they had already, to get also into their hands the higher part of the city. Wherefore, during the space of 7. dayes, there continued a great conflict betwixt them, and either part kept that they had. When the celebration of the feast came, cal'd Xylophoria, wherein euery one carrieth wood to the Temple, to keep a fire cõtinually vpon the altar; the rebels would not suffer their enemies to do their deuotion.

War in Ierusalem betwixt the seditious and those that fauoured peace.

Now many of the theeues, who carried poyniards vnder their coats, went amongst the weaker multitude, and boldly followed their old practice. The Kings souldiers were ouercome, and forced to leaue the higher part of the City: and the rebels presently comming in, set the Palaces of Ananias, Agrippa, and Berenice on fire, and forthwith went to the place where all charters were kept, purposing there to burne all bonds and obligations of debters; thereby to defraud the creditors, and so to ioyne all the debters with their faction, and stir vp all the poore people against the rich. But the keepers of these publike writings fleeing, the seditious persons set all on fire: and so hauing destroyed as it were the strength of the city, they addrest themselues against such as resisted their proceedings. Some of the high Priests and nobles hid themselues in vaults; others fleeing with the Kings souldiers into the higher Palace of the King, soone lockt vp the doores after them; amongst whom was Ananias the high Priest, and Ezechias his brother, and they who (as is before spoken) were sent Embassadors to Agrippa: and so the seditious were satisfied that day with the victory, and firing of the houses aforesaid.

The next day, which was the fifteenth of August, they assaulted the Castle Antonia: and besieging it two dayes, they tooke all that guarded it and killed them; and placed in it a Garrison of their owne company. This done, they went vnto the Kings Palace, whither Agrippas souldiers were fled: and diuiding their company into foure parts, they began to cast downe the wals: none of them that were within durst come out for feare of the multitude, but went vp to the turrets of the Palace, and killed all those that offred to come vp, and many of the theeues vnder the walles, with things that they cast downe. This conflict continued day and night; for the rebels thought that those which were within could not hold out for want of victuals: and they within thought that the seditious being wearied would soone giue ouer. In the meane season, one Manahemus, the sonne of Iudas of Galilæa (that most crafty subtile sophister, who reuiled the Iewes in Cyrenius time for paying tribute, and would be subiect to any but to God) taking with him certaine Nobles, went vnto Massada, where King Herods armory was, and breaking into it, he armed the common people and other theeues; and hauing them for his guard, he returned againe to Ierusalem as King: and when he was made Prince of that sedition, he disposed of the battery of the fortresses. But they wanted engines, neither could they openly vndermyne the wals of the aduersaries, who continually cast downe darts: wherefore, they began a myne a great way off, till it came vnder one of the towers which was supported by posts of wood, and they set fire on the wood supporting it, and went their way: so the supporters being consumed with fire, the tower presently fell downe, and there appeared a very high wall within. For those within, perceiuing their aduersaries intent, perhaps by the shaking of that tower, presently builded this wall to keep out the rebels betweene them and it. The seditious, verily thinking that with the fall of the tower they should be victors, when they saw another wall, were amazed. And the Kings souldiers were sent vnto Manahemus, and others that were chiefe of the rebels, requesting them to haue licence to depart. Which Manahemus granted onely to the Kings souldiers, and those of his owne countrey, who presently accepting thereof, departed, and so left the Romanes in great feare. For they were not able to resist so great a multitude, and they thought it a shame to intreat that they might depart, thinking that it were dangerous for them, although it were granted. Wherefore leauing the lower place which was cald Stratopedon, because it might easily be taken, they fled into the Kings

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the death of ANANIAS the High Prieſt, MANAHEMVS and the Roman ſouldiers.

B THe next day following, Ananias the high Prieſt was taken in one of the water Conduits of the Kings Palace, where he hid himſelfe, and was there kild with his brother Ezechias by theſe theeues: and the Rebels beſieged all the towers round about, and kept diligent watch, leſt any of the Romans ſhould eſcape. But Manahemus, both for his good ſucceſſe in deſtroying the ſtrong holds, as alſo with the death of Ananias the high Prieſt, became proud and cruell: and thinking none ſo wiſe as himſelfe, in thoſe affaires, became an intolerable tyrant. Now two of Eleazars companions roſe vp and communed together, that it did not become them that rebelled againſt the Romans (onely to recouer their liberty) that they ſhould be traitors thereof to their owne companions, who were of the ſame condition, and that they ſhould indure C a King or Lord ouer them, who although he be no ſeuere man, yet he was of more abiect & baſe condition then they. If it were ſo, that it were expedient to haue one Ruler ouer all the reſt; they had rather haue any one then Manahemus: and being thus agreed, they ſet vpon him in the Temple, where he was praying with great pompe, apparelled like a King, and hauing about him a guard of his friends in armour. Now when Eleazar his followers ſet vpon Manahemus, the people did alſo throw ſtones at him, and ſo ſtoned him, hoping that by his death the ſedition would be extinguiſhed. The guard of Manahemus at firſt made ſome reſiſtance; but when they perceiued the whole multitude againſt them, euery one ſhifted for himſelfe as he could, and thoſe that were taken were put to death, and they that eſcaped were afterward ſought for: only a few of them fled to Maſſada, amongſt whom was Eleazar, the ſon of Iairus, the ſon of Manahemus kinſD man, and afterward in Maſſada became a tyrant. But Manahemus fled into a place called Ophias, where he baſely hid himſelfe: and being taken, he was drawne out from thence, and after many torments put to death, and with him, all the Nobility that had aſſiſted him, as alſo Abſalomon, who was his onely helper. And in this matter (as I haue ſaid) the people greatly helped, hoping hereby to haue ſome end of that ſedition. But the Rebels did not kill Manahemus, to the end to extinguiſh ſedition, but to the intent to rob and ſpoile more freely.

The people with many intreaties beſought them to let the Romans alone, whom they did beſiege, but they were ſo much the more earneſt againſt them: till they being no longer able to make reſiſtance, with the conſent of Metilius their Captaine, and ſome other of more authority, ſent vnto Eleazar, requeſting him to giue them licence to depart with their liues, and leaue their E munition to the Iewes. Who accepting their petition, ſent vnto them Gorion, the ſon of Nichodemus, and Ananias the Saducee, and Iudas the ſonne of Ionathas, to confirme the promiſe of their liues. Which done, Metilius led away the ſouldiers: and whil'ſt the Romans had their weapons, none of the Rebels durſt attempt any of their treachery againſt them: but ſo ſoone as euery one according to couenant laid down their ſhields and ſwords, and ſo departed miſtruſting nothing, Eleazars guard ſet vpon them, and kild them, who neither made reſiſtance, nor any intreatie for their liues, onely putting them in mind of their promiſe and oath. So they were all ſlaine ſaue onely Metilius, who greatly intreated for his life; and promiſing that he would become a Iew in religion, and be circumciſed, they ſpared him. Yet was this a ſmall loſſe to the Romans, who onely had then but a very few ſlaine of their great and almoſt infinite armie: and this ſeemed the F very beginning of the Iewes captiuitie.

Chap. XIX.

Of the great massacre of the Iewes at Cæsarea, and in all Syria.

AT the same houre on the selfe-same day, it hapned, as it were by Gods prouidence, that the inhabitants of Cæsarea did massacre the Iewes that dwelt among them; so that at one time aboue 20000. were slaine, and not one Iew left aliue in all Cæsarea. For those that escaped, Florus tooke, and brought them forth bound vnto the people. After this massacte done at Cæsarea, the whole nation of the Iewes waxed mad: and diuiding themselues into companies, they wasted and destroyed in short time all the borders of Syria, and the cities therabout, to wit, Philadelphia and Gebonitis, Gerasa, Pella and Scythopolis, and then they made incursion into Gadara, Hippon and Gaulanitis, pulling down some places, and firing other some. And from thence they marched towards Cedasa, a city of the Tyrians, and Ptolemais, Gaba and Cæsarea: and neither Sebaste, neither Ascalon could resist them, but they also were consumed with fire. Likewise they destroyed Anthedon, with Gaza, and most places adioyning to these Cities were sacked, to wit, the fields and villages, and a mighty slaughter was made of them that were taken in these places. The Syrians made as great a massacre of the Iewes as this among them: for all the Iewes inhabiting among them were murdred, not only for an old grudge, but also for the auoiding of imminent danger. And all Syria was troubled in most grieuous maner, and euery city was diuided into two parts, and either parts safety consisted in this, to preuent the other in murdering them first: the daies were spent in bloodshed, and the nights in feare, worse then death it selfe. For though they onely pretended to destroy the Iewes, yet were they drawne to suspect other nations, that followed the Iewes religion; and becaus they were as it were neuters, the Syrians thought it not good to destroy them: and againe, for their agreeing in religion with the Iewes, they were constrained to hold them as enemies. Many of the contrary part, who before seemed modest, were now through auarice incited to meddle in this murder, for euery one tooke the goods of them that were slaine, and carried them to other places as conquerors. And he was most renowned that had stolen most, as hauing also kild most. There might you see in euery part of the city the dead bodies of all ages vnburied, old men and children, and women lying in most shamefull manner, their secret parts being vncouered. Briefely, all the country was filled with exceeding great calamity, and the feare of misery to come was vnspeakeable.

The Iewes spoile the villages & burne the Cities of Syria.

All Syria full of miserable calamities.

And these were the conflicts betweene the Iewes and strangers. But afterward making incursion vpon the borders of Scythopolis, the Iewes there dwelling were their enemies. For they conspiring with the citizens of Scythopolis, and preferring their owne commodity and security before their kinred and consanguinity, ioyned with the Gentiles against the Iewes, who for all that, were suspected for their forwardnes. Finally, the Scythopolites fearing that they would assault the city by night, and excuse their reuolting by their great misery, they commanded all the Iewes, that if they would shew themselues trusty vnto the Gentiles, they with all their children should goe into a wood hard by: who forthwith did as they were wild, suspecting nothing, and the Scythopolites were quiet for two daies after, and did nothing: But the third night they sent forth scouts to see what they were doing: who finding some of them asleepe, and others not resisting, they surprized them in a moment, and kild them all, who were in number thirteene thousand, and afterward took their goods. I thinke it not amisse to speake of the death of Simon, who was the sonne of Saul, a man of regard: he was a man of great courage, and strength of bodie, both which he vsed to the great hurt of his owne nation: for he daily killed many Iewes, who dwelt neere vnto Scythopolis, and he alone often scattred diuers companies, and put whole armies to flight; who had an end worthie of his deeds, and murdering of his countreymen. For when the Scythopolites had compassed the wood about, so that none could escape their hands, they killed the Iewes in euery part thereof. Simon, drawing his sword, made no resistance to any of his enemies: for he saw that it was bootlesse to striue against such a multitude. Then pittifully crying out, I receiue, O Scythopolits, a worthy reward for that which I haue done, who to shew my fidelity towards you, haue kild so many of mine own countrimen: and it is a iust plague that a strange nation should be false to vs, who impiously forsook our own brethren. I will do therfore as a profane person, killing my self with my own hands, and this death will be a sufficient punishment for my offences, and a full argument of my magnanimitie, that none of my enemies may boast of my death, nor insult ouer me. When he had thus said, he beheld all his family with compassion

A passion & rage mixt together: he had a wife and children, & aged parents. And first taking his father by the haire of the head, stood vpon him, and thrust him thorow; after him he kild his mother, who was willing to die; after them his wife & children, euery one of them as it were offring their bodies to the sword, desirous to preuent the enemies. When he had slain all his kinred, himselfe remaining aliue, he stretcht forth his arme that they might see what he would do, & thrust his sword into his own body vp to the hilts. A yong man, who for his magnanimity & strength of bodie was worthie to be pitied, had yet a iust and deserued end for trusting forraine nations.

After this so great a massacre of the Iewes in Scythopolis, other cities also did rise against them where they inhabited, and 2000. and 500. were slaine at Ascalon, and 2000. at Ptolemais, and the Tyrians kild diuers, and kept many in prison: Likewise, they of Gadara and Hippon slew the most valiant, and those of least courage they cast into prison. Also all other cities, who either feared or hated the Iewes, rose vp against them. Onely they of Antiochia, Sidonia and Apamia, spared them that dwelt with them, and neither kild nor imprisoned any of them: perhaps they stood in no feare of them if they should haue risen, because their city was so populous: yet I thinke they spared them only for pitie sake, because they saw they were quiet, and C not seditious. The inhabitants also of Gerasa did no harme to the Iewes amongst them: but when they desired to depart, they conducted them safely to the end of their borders. In the Kingdome also of Agrippa much crueltie was shewed against the Iewes: for he being gone to Cestius Gallus at Antiochia, left the rule of his country to one of his friends named Varus, kinsman to King Sohemus; and there came vnto him 70. of the chiefe Nobilitie of the countrey Batanæa, requesting a garrison to represse those that should attempt rebellion amongst them. Varus sent certaine of the Kings souldiers armed, and kild them all as they were comming to him. But he did this impietie without Agrippa his consent, onely for auarice: and as it were emboldned by this fact, he ruinated the whole Realme, still continuing such crueltie and impietie against his nation, till such time as Agrippa vnderstood thereof, who, for Sohemus sake, durst not put him D to death, but dispossessed him of his place. In the meane while the Rebels tooke the fort called Cyprus, which is situate aboue Iericho, and after they had kild the garrison, they destroied the fortresse. At the same time a multitude of Iewes laid siege before the Castle of Macheron, and perswaded the souldiers left in garrison, to yeeld the Castle: who, fearing that if they denied they should be compelled thereto, deliuered it vnto them; vpon condition, that they might quietly depart: and they of Macherunt placed a strong guard within it.

Chap. XXI.

How the Iewes were slaine at Alexandria.

E The Citizens of Alexandria had alwaies a quarrel against the Iewes that liued with them, since the time that that famous Alexander vsed their helpe against the Ægyptians, and therefore permitted them to inhabit in Alexandria, and to haue the same priuiledges that the rest of the Citizens had. And this honour was also continued with them vnto the time of the successors and heires of Alexander: who also gaue them a certaine place in the city to dwel in, that there they might liue more commodiously. The Gentiles hauing nothing to doe among them, permitted them also to call themselues Macedonians. And afterward, when Egypt was brought vnder the rule of the Romans, neither Cæsar, nor any one else, did diminish the Iewes dignitie in that place which Alexander had giuẽ them. So that now there were daily conflicts between them and the Greeks: and although the Iudges on both parts still punisht them that were F in fault, yet the sedition more and more encreased; and when all cities else were filled with troubles, there the tumult was more vehement. For when the Alexandrians had called together the people to determine of an Embassage to Nero, certaine Iewes mingled themselues amongst the Greeks, and so went into the Amphitheater: who being espy'd by their aduersaries, the Greeks cried out, that the Iewes were enemies, and came as spies, and so laid violent hands vpon them. Some of them fled, onely three of them were taken by the Greekes, whom they drew to a place to burne them aliue. All the Iewes of the citie came to succour them, and first they threw stones at them, and then taking fire-brands, they ranne in a rage into the Amphitheater, and threatned to burne all the people there assembled: which they had done, if Tiberius Alexander Gouernour of the City had not appeased their fury; who did not at the first vse force of armes against them, but sent their nobility to perswade them to cease, and not incite the Roman army against them. But the seditious Iewes refused his admonition, and mocked Tiberius: who seeing that they would not otherwise be appeased, sent two legions of armed Romans against them which were in the City, and with them 5000. other souldiers, who by chance came out of Lybia to this massacre of the Iewes: and Tiberius gaue them charge not onely to kill them, but also to fire their houses, and take their goods. The souldiers presently went into the place called Delta (for there the Iewes were gathered together) and did as they were commanded, and not without bloody victory. For the Iewes, gathering themselues together, put those amongst them that were best armed in the forefront, who held out for a long time; but when they began to flee, they were massacred like beasts, and some of them were killed in the field, some were burned in their houses, the Romanes first taking what they found, neither sparing infants nor old men, but killing all ages. So that all that place flowed with blood, for there were slaine 50000. Iewes: and all the rest had bin extinguished, had not Alexander (moued to compassion by their intreaties) commanded the souldiers to leaue off; who being obedient vnto him, presently departed: but the people of Alexandria were hardly withdrawne from that massacre, because of the hatred which they had conceiued against the Iewes: and with much adoe were withheld from tyrannizing ouer the dead bodies. And this befell the Iewes of Alexandria.

A cruell victory, wherein 50000. Iewes are slaine.

Of the massacre of the Iewes by CESTIVS GALLVS.

Huge companies of the Romanes.

Cestius Gallus now thought it time to bestirre himselfe, forasmuch as the Iewes were now hated euery were: and taking with him the twelue whole legions out of Antiochia, two thousand chosen footmen, and foure companies of horsemen out of euery one of the other legions; and with them the Kings forces that came to help him, to wit, two thousand horsemen of Antiochia, three thousand foot all bowmen, and three thousand footmen sent by Agrippa, a thousand horse, and foure thousand which Sohemus brought, whereof the third part were horse, the rest foot, and for the most part bowmen; he went towards Ptolemais: and many ioyned themselues to them out of euery City, who, though they were not so skilfull in war as the Romans, yet their hatred was more then theirs. Agrippa himselfe was there with Cestius, being ruler of those he brought. There Cestius taking a part of the army, went to Zabulon (which is the strongest city of Galilæa, cald also Andron, and parts the borders of the Iewes from Ptolemais) and when he found it desolate (for the inhabitants thereof fled into the mountaines) who left it full of all riches; giuing licence to the souldiers to sacke it, he afterwards set it on fire, although he admired the beauty therof (for it was built like Tyre and Sidon, and Berytum) and after spoiled all the territories about it. Likewise, when he had burnt all the villages thereabout, he returned to Ptolemais. The Syrians, and especially those of Beryth, staid still behind to get booties: which when the Iewes vnderstood, and that Cestius was departed, they tooke courage, and came and set vpon them, and kild of them 2000. In the meane while Cestius departed from Ptolemais, and went to Cæsarea, and sent part of his army to Ioppe, commanding them to keep the towne if they could get it: and if the townsmen made any resistance, that then they should stay till he came with the rest of the army. Some of them went by sea, some by land, by which means they did easily take Ioppe: so that the people thereof had neither time to flee, nor to prepare themselues to fight; and setting on them, they killed all men with their families: and thus sacking the towne, they set it on fire, and there were slaine 8000. and 400. In like manner he sent part of his horsemen to Narbatena in the Toparchy neere Samaria, who spoiled the countrey, kild a great number of inhabitants, robd and burnt the villages, and carried away a great booty with them.

Of CESTIVS his battell against Ierusalem.

Sephoris and other cities of Galilee doe friendly entertaine the Romanes.

HE sent also Cæsennius Gallus, Generall of the twelfth legion, into Galilee, and gaue him as great an army as he thought sufficient to conquer that nation, whom the strongest city of Galilee called Sephoris courteously entertained, and other cities followed their example.

A example. They that were ſeditious and gaue themſelues to robbing, fled into the mountain which is ſituate in the midſt of Galilee againſt Sephoris, called Aſamon: theſe Gallus incountred with his army; who, ſo long as they kept the higher part of the mountaine, eaſily reſiſted the Romans, and killed aboue 200. of them: but when they ſaw the Romans had occupied a higher place then that wherein they kept, they eaſily were ouercome: for not being armed, they could not ſtand out, and if they ſhould haue fled, they could not haue eſcaped the horſemen, ſo that onely a few hid themſelues in difficult places, and aboue 2000. of them were ſlaine. Gallus perceiuing all Galilee in peace, and not minded to reuolt, returned with his cõpanies vnto Cæſarea, and Ceſtius with his whole army went to Antipatris: where vnderſtanding that a great cõpany of Iewes were gathered
B together in the tower called Aphecy, he ſent ſome before to skirmiſh with them: but the Iewes would not abide battell, and the ſouldiers burned their tents, and the villages adioyning. Ceſtius went from thence to Lydda, and found the city deſolate, for all the people were gone vnto Ieruſalem, becauſe of the feaſt of Tabernacles: and when he had killed fifty perſons whom he found there, he fired the towne, and went no further: and going by Bethoron, he pitched his Tent in Gabaus, which is fifty furlongs diſtant from Ieruſalem. When the Iewes ſaw themſelues in danger, they left the ſolemnity, and prepared themſelues for warre: and hauing a great multitude, they went to fight, obſeruing no order, altogether with indiſcreet cries, not regarding the Sabbath, which they hold in great eſtimation: and the ſame fury, that made them leaue their deuotion, made them alſo victorious in that battell; for they aſſaulted the Romans with ſuch a courage, that
C they brake their battell aray: and killing all that reſiſted, they preſſed into the midſt thereof: and if a freſh ſupply both of horſe and foot had not come in time, all Ceſtius army had beene in great danger. So there were ſlaine fiue hundred and fifty Roman ſouldiers, and foure hundreth of them were foote, and the reſt were horſemen, but of the Iewes but two and twenty. The moſt valiant in this combate were, Monobazus and Cenedæus, kinſmen to King Monobazus of Adiabena, and next to them Paraides Niger, and Silas a Babylonian, who fled vnto the Iewes from King Agrippa, whom he had lately ſerued: and ſo the Iewes being repulſed, returned into Ieruſalem; and Simon the ſonne of Giora inuaded the Romanes, as they were returning towards Bethoron, and ſlew many of the rereward, and tooke many carts, and much baggage withall, which he brought into the citie. Ceſtius ſtaied three daies in the field, and the Iewes kept the high places, eſpying which D way he went, purpoſing not to be quiet if the Romanes departed.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of the ſiege of Ieruſalem by CESTIVS, and of the maſſacre.

A*Grippa* perceiuing the Romanes to be in great danger, for that all the mountaines were couered with infinite numbers of the Iewes, hee purpoſed to trie, if through few words hee could perſwade them to deſiſt from warre; or if any refuſed, to receiue thoſe that were willing. Wherefore hee ſent vnto them Borcæus and Phœbus, whom they well knew, aſſuring and promiſing them pardon from Ceſtius, and from the Romanes, of all that they had al-
E ready done, if they would now lay downe their armes, and ioyne with them. But the rebels fearing that all the multitude, in hope of ſafety, would ioyne with Agrippa, determined to kill the Legats, and ſlew Phœbus before he ſpake any word, and Borcæus being wounded, eſcaped. But the people were angry hereat, and with ſtones and clubs draue them into the towne that were the authors of this fact. Ceſtius perceiuing them at ods amongſt themſelues, thought that he had now a fit opportunity to aſſault them, and ſo came vpon them with his whole army: and putting them to flight he purſued them vnto Ieruſalem. And when he had pitched his Tents in the place called Scopus, he departed ſeuen furlongs from the city, and did nothing againſt the city for three daies ſpace; perhaps hoping that they within would relent: and then ſending a great many ſouldiers into the villages adioyning to fetch corne, the fourth day, which was the thirtieth of October, F he came againſt the city with his army in battell aray. The people of the Iewes were kept in awe by the rebels, who terrified by the Romane diſcipline, forſooke the outmoſt parts of the city, and fled into the innermoſt part of the Temple. Ceſtius paſſing Betheza, burned Cænopolis and the new market place, and comming vnto the higher part of the city, he pitched his tent nere the Kings Palace: and if at that time he had violently iſſued in at the wals, he had taken the city and ended the wars. But Tyrannus Priſcus Generall of the footmen, and many other rulers & captains of the horſemen, being hired with money by Florus, hindred that his purpoſe, whereby the wars were ſo prolonged, and a thouſand calamities befell the Iewes. In the meane time many of the chiefeſt among the Iewes, and Ananus the ſonne of Ionathas, called Ceſtius, as though they would haue opened him the gates: but he was angry and ſcarce truſted them, till at laſt they delaied the time ſo long, that the rebels perceiued this treaſon, and caſt Ananus down the wall, and with ſtones draue his complices into their houſes. Which done, they retired themſelues into the towers, from whence they beat back thoſe that ſcaled the wals. The Romans for fiue daies ſpace aſſaulted the walles on euery ſide, but all in vaine; and the ſixt day, Ceſtius with many choſen ſouldiers and Bowmen aſſaulted the Temple on the North ſide. The Iewes valiantly made reſiſtance out of the porches, and often repulſed the Romans approching the wals: yet at laſt they, with the multitude of their aduerſaries darts, were forced to giue back. Then the Romans that went before, hauing their ſhields vpon their heads, leaned againſt the wal, & they in the ſecond place held their ſhields againſt theirs in the firſt, and ſo in order vntill the laſt, therby making as it were a couering as the Romans call it, or defence, that all their ſhot and darts could doe them no harme; ſo that the ſouldiers did ſafely vndermyne the wals, and attempted to fire the gates of the Temple.

Diuers Iewes cal for Ceſtius as if they intended to open their gates vnto him.

The Romans couer themſelues with their ſhields, & vndermyne the wals and burne the Temple gates.

Now the ſeditious people were hereat greatly amazed, and many fled out of the City, as though it would preſently be taken. And the good were hereby encouraged, as much as the rebels were diſmaied, and came vnto the gates to open vnto Ceſtius, who had well deſerued at their hands. And truely if he had but a little longer continued his ſiege, he had taken the Citie. But I think that God being angry with the wicked, would not ſuffer the warres to be ended at that time: for Ceſtius neither regarding the good-will of the people, nor the deſperation of the rebels, remoued his army from thence; and hauing receiued no loſſe, very vnaduiſedly departed from the Citie: at whoſe vnlooked for flight, the rebels tooke heart; and making after him, they killed the horſemen and footmen that came laſt. And then Ceſtius went to the Tents which he had fortified in Scopion. The next day he went further into the countrey; whereby hee more encouraged the rebels, who following him, killed many of his rereward. Afterward, either end of the army being well ſtrengthned, the Iewes aſſaulted them that were behinde, and the laſt durſt not caſt any darts againſt them, who wounded them on their backes, thinking that an infinite multitude had followed them; and they were not able to reſiſt them that aſſaulted them on each ſide, being as it were heauy, and not daring to breake their order; on the contrary, ſeeing the Iewes ſo actiue and apt to skip to and fro: ſo that the Romanes endured much harme at the hands of their enemies, and did them none; and thus were they beaten all the way along, and many of them killed, amongſt whom was Priſcus Captaine of the ſixt legion, and Longinus the tribune, and Aemilius Iucundus Captaine of a troupe of horſemen. And ſo with much adoe, they came vnto Gabio; where they firſt pitcht their Tents, caſting away much of their baggage, which might any way hinder them. Ceſtius ſtaied there two dayes, doubtfull what to doe: the third day he perceiued his enemies to be increaſed, and all places about to be filled with Iewes: whereby he ſaw that his ſlow haſte was to his diſaduantage, and the number of his enemies would ſtill increaſe, if he made any longer abode there. Wherefore that he might flye ſpeedily, he cauſed the ſouldiers to caſt away all thoſe things that might any way be a hindrance vnto them, and killed their Mules and Aſſes, and cattell, ſauing onely thoſe that bare munition; fearing that if he ſhould not deſtroy them, the Iewes might make vſe of them againſt him, and ſo hee led the army toward Bethoron. The Iewes in large paſſages little moleſted his army: but when they were to paſſe a ſtreight, then they killed them of the rereward, and thruſt other ſome downe into the valley, and all the army of the Iewes were ſpred vpon the eminent places, whereby the army was to paſſe, expecting to welcome them with arrowes. Where the footemen amazed, and bethinking how to helpe themſelues, the horſemen were brought into great danger: for they could not keepe their rankes for darts and arrowes, neither could they go to hurt their enemies, the aſcent vnto the toppe of the mountaines was ſo ſteep: and they were compaſſed on each ſide with rockes and deep valleies, ſo that if any went out of the way, he fell down & was killed, in ſo much as there was no way to flye nor to reſiſt. Now not knowing what to doe, they began to weep, and crie out as men in deſperation: and the Iewes anſwered them with an encouraging one another to play the men; being glad of their enemies aduerſitie, and cruelly bent againſt them: and all the army of Ceſtius had there periſhed, had not the night come on and helped them, which by her darkneſſe gaue leaſure to the Romanes to flye into Bethoron. In the meane while, the Iewes kept all the places thereabouts beſieged, and guarded the paſſages. Ceſtius ſeeing it not poſſible to march openly, thought it beſt to flye, and choſe almoſt foure hundred of his ſtrongeſt ſouldiers, and ſet them in very eminent places, commanding them that when they were aloft, they ſhould crie as they did before, that the Iewes might thinke that the whole army was there, and ſo he with the reſt of his army marched

And thus they followed the Romans vnto Antipatris: and seeing they could not ouertake them, they returned, bringing with them the warlike instruments, and rifling those that were slaine, and taking whatsoeuer the Romans had left behind; and so singing songs of victory, they returned vnto Ierusalem, hauing lost very few of their companie, and slaine fiue thousand, and three hundreth and eightie of the foot-

CHAP. XXV.

Of the cruelty of those of Damascus against the Iewes, and of IOSEPHS affaires in Galilee.

INcontinently after Cestius aduerse fortune, many of the chiefest amongst the Iewes daily fled and forsooke the Citie, as a ship presently ready to sinke. Costobarus and Saul two bre-
C thren, and Philip the sonne of Ioachim Generall of Agrippas army, fled out of the Citie and yeelded themselues vnto Cestius. As for Antipas, who was also besieged with them in the Kings Palace, he would not flye with the rest, and so was killed by the Rebels. But Cestius sent Saul and the rest of his company into Achaia vnto Nero, to let him vnderstand the cause of their flight, and to shew how Florus had caused all these wars: for so he hoped that Nero would bend his wrath against Florus, and quit him from danger. Then the people of Damascus vnderstanding the death of the Romans, deuised how to destroy the Iewes which inhabited amongst them: and they thought it was easie to be accomplished, for that the Iewes were already assembled in the common baths, for feare of some such matter: yet they mistrusted their women, who all, except a few, were Iewes in religion. Wherefore they tooke great heed to conceale their intent
D from them: and so assaulting the Iewes altogether in a narrow place, and hauing nothing to defend them, they put them all to the sword, who were in number ten thousand. The Rebels that so pursued Cestius, returned into Ierusalem, and ceased not to ioyne all vnto them that fauoured the Romans, either by force or by flattery: and assembling themselues in the Temple, they determined to choose a greater number of Captaines. Wherefore Ioseph the son of Gorion, and Ananus the high Priest were appointed rulers of the City, and especially to see the wals therof repaired. Eleazar the sonne of Simon was put in no authoritie, notwithstanding that he had in his custodie all preies and spoiles taken from the Romans, and Cestius his money, and a great part of the publike treasure, because they perceiued him through authority to waxe proud, and his attendants become stately. Yet in time Eleazar by money and craft, perswaded the people to obey him in E all things. And they requested other Captaines to be sent into Idumæa, who were Iesus the son of Sapphas, and Eleazar the sonne of the new high Priest: and they commanded Niger who was borne beyond Iordan, to obey these Captaines, who was therefore called Peraides, and was then Gouernour of Idumæa. And they neglected not to doe the like by other regions: for Ioseph the sonne of Simon was sent to Iericho and Manasses beyond the riuer, and Iohn the Essean to Tamna, euery one to rule the gouernment of his country as a Toparchy. Lydda, Ioppe, and Ammaus, were annexed to Iohn the Essean, and Iohn the sonne of Ananias was appointed Gouernour of Gophnitis and Acrabatena. And Ioseph the son of Matthias was made Ruler ouer both Galilees, vnto which was ioyned Gamala the strongest Citie in that coast.

As for other Gouernors, euery one discharged his place according to his wisedome and dexte-
F rity. When Ioseph came to Galilee, which was committed to his protection, his first care was to get the good will of the inhabitants, knowing that it might much profit him, although in other matters he had offended. Then considering that he should haue most mighty and assured friends, if he made them partakers of his authority; and likewise get the loue of the common people, if he did esteeme of those things which they should thinke well of; He chose seuentie of the most ancientest wise men amongst them, and made them rulers ouer all Galilee, and elected seuen Iudges ouer the lesser townes to iudge inferiour matters: for he reserued all great affaires and criminall causes to his owne hearing. Moreouer, hauing ordained a forme of iustice that those seuentie uentie ſhould follow, he tooke counſell how to worke their outward ſecurity: And being aſſured that the Romans would come into Galilee, he compaſſed thoſe places with ſtrong wals that were fit for his purpoſe, to wit, Iotapata, Berſabea, Selamis, Pereccho, Iapha, and Sigoph, with the mountaine Itaburium, Tarichea, and Tiberias. Moreouer, hee fortified the caues neere the lake Geneſar, which is in lower Galilee, and in high Galilee Petra, which is alſo called Achaberon and Seph, Iamnith, and Mero; in Gaulanitis alſo Seleucia, and Soganes, and Gamala: he only permitted them of Sephoris to build their owne wals, becauſe he perceiued them to be rich and prone to warre of themſelues. Likewiſe Iohn the ſon of Leuias, at Ioſephs command, built the wall of Giſcala himſelfe alone: but in all other places that were fortified, Ioſeph put to his helping hand, and told how they ſhould be done. He leuied alſo an army of an hundred thouſand, who were all young men, whom he armed with old armour, which he gathered from all parts of the country: and conſidering that the Roman army was inuincible, for that they were all obedient vnto their rulers, and expert in warre, he could not inſtruct them in martiall diſcipline, other occaſions forcing him to the contrary: but calling to minde that the multitude of rulers made obedience, he ordained many captaines, and conſtituted diuers ſorts of ſouldiers, as the Romans vſed to doe; making ſome gouernors often, otherſome ouer a hundred, and others ouer a thouſand; and appointed likewiſe rulers ouer them. He taught them alſo how to giue the ſigne of warre, and how to ſound the trumpet both to call them to combate, and to retire: how to march in length, and caſt in a ring, and alwaies to ſuccour them that were moſt in danger: and to be ſhort, he taught them whatſoeuer might either incourage them, or make them actiue: but eſpecially he exerciſed them in feates of armes, imitating in particular the order of the Romans, often telling them that they were to fight with men, who for ſtrength of body and courage paſſed all nations of the world. Alſo he told them that hereby he ſhould perceiue whether they would be obedient in warre, if now they abſtained from ſuch things as were vſuall to ſouldiers, to wit, robbing and ſpoiling their countrimen, and crafty and deceitfull dealing; nor thinke the ſpoile of thoſe with whom they conuerſed, to be their owne gaine: for thoſe wars had alwaies beſt ſucceſſe, where the ſouldiers carried good conſciences; and they that were bad, ſhould not onely haue men, but God alſo for their enemy. And after this manner he daily exhorted them, and now he had appointed how many were to fight. For 60000. footmen, and 200. and 50. horſemen, and beſide theſe 4000. and 500. whom he hired, were alwaies in readineſſe, and 600. choſen men to guard his owne perſon. And the hirelings onely excepted, the reſt of the ſouldiers were prouided for by the cities: for euery city before mentioned, ſent one halfe of their men for ſouldiers; and the other halfe they kept to prouide victuals for them, that one part being employed in warre, the other might doe ſuch buſineſſe as the city required.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of IOSEPHS danger and eſcape, and of the malice of IOHN of Giſcala.

WHileſt Ioſeph thus ordered the eſtate of Galilee, there aroſe a traitor borne in Giſcala, the ſon of Leuias, whoſe name was Iohn, a moſt ſubtill and deceitfull treacher, who by vile meanes was now become the richeſt man in that countrey, being before very poore; whereby for a while he was hindred from putting his villanies in practice: who could lie at his pleaſure and eaſily giue credit vnto lies, who thought deceit to be a vertue, which he vſed euen toward his deareſt friends: and a great counterfeiter of humanity: yet for the hope of gaine became a cruell murtherer. He alwaies aimed at high matters, with an aſpiring mind, and at firſt nouriſhed his hope with ſmall villanies. For firſt he was a thiefe after his owne maner, and liued in woods and ſolitarie places; at laſt he got him a company of audacious people like to himſelfe, at firſt ſmall, but afterward he greatly increaſed it. He alſo had a great care to chooſe no idle perſons, but ſuch as were ſtrong of body, valiant of mind, and skilfull in martiall affaires: of theſe he gathered foure hundreth, the moſt of them out of Tyre, and the villages thereabout: and with them he waſted all Galilee, and put many in mind of the miſerable wars to come. This man a long time before deſired to be Gouernor of the army: and aſpired to greater matters, only the want of money hindred him: and perceiuing that Ioſeph tooke delight in his induſtrie, he perſwaded him to ſuffer him to build the wals of that place where he was born, which was now deſolate; and to accompliſh this, he gathered great ſummes of money of the richer ſort. Then he deuiſed another ſhift: for hauing perſwaded the Iewes that were diſperſed ouer all Syria, that they Iohn a notable diſſẽbler, and a thirſtie murtherer vnder hope of gaine.

A they ſhould vſe no oile, ſaue onely that which was made by their owne nation, he cauſed diuers veſſels of oile to be brought vnto the confines of Galilee, and buying foure barrels for a piece of Tyrian money (which amounted vnto foure Antique groates) he ſold them againe vnto the Syrian Iewes, the halfe of one barrell for as much as all foure coſt him. And for that Galilee abounded with oiles, and eſpecially at that time, he conueied it to ſuch places where there was great want, and none was brought but by himſelfe. By this meanes he gathered an infinite maſſe of money, which preſently he turned to his preiudice who had giuen him licence ſo to get it. And thinking that if he could depoſe Ioſeph, that then he might come to be ruler ouer Galilee, he commanded his followers to robbe and ſpoile more then they did before, and ſo to trouble the

B countrey, that he might either kill the Gouernour, if he ſought to redreſſe it, at vnawares; or if he let all alone, to accuſe him of cowardice to the people for ſo doing. Moreouer, he had already giuen out ſpeeches, that Ioſeph went about to betray Galilee to the Romans, and deuiſed many things to this effect to worke Ioſephs ouerthrow. It hapned that at that time, ſome of the village of Dabarita, who watched in the field, ſet vpon Ptolomæus, who was factor for Agrippa, and his ſiſter Berenice, and ſpoiled them of all carriage, wherein was much coſtly apparell, and many ſiluer cups, and ſixe hundreth pieces of gold. And for that they could not doe this ſecretly, they brought all the whole bootie to Ioſeph at Tarichea: who reprouing them for offering violence vnto the Kings ſeruants, commanded the things to be kept at the houſe of Aeneas, who was one of the richeſt men in the towne, who ſhould reſtore them to the owner when time ſerued: wherein

C thinking to doe himſelfe great good, he wrought himſelfe much danger. For the theeues being offended that they receiued no part thereof, and ſeeing that Ioſeph would reſtore to Agrippa and his ſiſter Berenice that which they had laboured to get, they went round about the villages in the night, and ſpred this falſe report in euery place, that Ioſeph was a traitour to his countrey, and with the ſame rumour filled the cities thereabout. So that early in the next morning, 100000. armed men came againſt Ioſeph. Finally, the multitude aſſembling themſelues together in the Theater at Tarichea, the greateſt part cried out in their choler and fury, that the traitor might be depoſed, or herſome that he might be burned, and Iohn himſelfe incited many, and with him one Ieſus the ſonne of Sapphas, who at that time was Gouernor of Tiberias. All the friends of Ioſeph and his guard being terrified with ſuch a multitude, fled, foure onely excepted. But Ioſeph in the

D meane while was aſleepe: and had he ſlept a little longer, they had ſet his houſe on fire. Whereupon he aroſe, and the foure that remained with him, counſelled him to flye: but he not diſmaid in that he was left alone, nor for that ſo great a multitude came againſt him, went boldly towards them with his garment all torne and aſhes vpon his head, holding his hands behind him, and his ſword vpon his necke. Whereat they that bare him good will, eſpecially the people of Tarichea, were moued to compaſſion: but the country people and they whom he ouerlaid with taxes and tributes, curſed him, and bad him bring forth the publike treaſure, and confeſſe his treaſon: for becauſe of the attire and habit he came in; they thought he would not haue denied any thing whereof he was accuſed, and that he came ſo to mooue them to compaſſion, and ſo to obtaine pardon for his offence. This his humility ſtood him in good ſtead, for hereby thoſe that

E before were inraged againſt him, now began one to fall out with another in his behalfe, when he promiſed to confeſſe the whole matter: and then obtaining licence to ſpeake, he ſaid: I was neuer minded to ſend backe that money to Agrippa, nor to keepe it vnto my priuate vſe. For (God forbid) that I ſhould euer hold him for my friend, who is your open enemy, or that I ſhould ſo ſeeke mine owne profit, that I ſhould thereby damnifie you all. But (O ye men of Tarichea) foraſmuch as I perceiued that your city eſpecially had greateſt need to be fortified, and that you were not able to build the walles, and for that I feared the people of Tiberias, and others adioyning, who ſtill gaped after this prey and wealth that was taken from Agrippa; I determined to get thoſe ſpoiles for you to reedifie your walles. If ye miſlike this, I will bring out the treaſure, and giue it to be diuided amongſt you: but if you like thereof, then it appeareth

F how you moleſt him who is your benefactor.

This ſpeech of his well pleaſed the people of Tarichea, and diſpleaſed them of Tiberias; ſo that they breathed out threatnings againſt him. Thus they both left Ioſeph, and fought one againſt another. He now hauing many partakers (for the people of Tarichea were almoſt forty thouſand) ſpake more boldly vnto the multitude, and rebuked their temerity; affirming that it was neceſſary to ſtrengthen Tarichea with that preſent money, and that he would alſo prouide to ſtrengthen other cities, and that they ſhould not want money, if they would agree and conſpire together againſt them, from whom they ſhould take it; and not to offer violence vnto him who would endeuour to get it. So the reſt of the multitude being deceiued, though they were angry, yet departed; and two thouſand armed men offered to ſet vpon him: but he being already retired into his houſe, they ſtood without, threatning him. Wherefore Ioſeph vſed another deuice likewiſe to repreſſe theſe: and getting vp into the top of the houſe, he beckned vnto them with his hand to keepe ſilence; and then ſaid, that he was ignorant what they requeſted at his hands: for he could not heare one for another, becauſe their voyces were confounded through the multitude; but if they would ſend ſome into the houſe to talk friendly with him, he would do whatſoeuer they requeſted. The nobles and magiſtrates hearing this, preſently went into the houſe: whom, when he had led into the innermoſt part of the houſe, hauing ſhut the doores, he cauſed to be beaten, ſo long till that all their bowels appeared: the doores in the meane time being made faſt, the people ſtaied before the houſe, thinking that the cauſe of their long tarrying was, to alledge reaſons to and fro; and preſently Ioſeph opening the doores, put them forth amongſt the people all bloody as they were: wherat they were ſo terrified, that leauing their weapons behind them they ran away. Hereat Iohn tooke occaſion to encreaſe his enuie; and hauing ill ſucceſſe in this policy, he ſtill attempted other plots to bring Ioſeph in danger: and counterfeiting himſelfe ſicke, he requeſted Ioſeph to permit him to goe to Tiberias, and vſe the hot baths for to recouer his health. But Ioſeph not hauing yet perceiued his treaſon, wrote letters in his behalfe to the gouernour of the towne, willing him to be Iohns oaſt, and to let him want nothing that he needed: which he had in good ſort. And two daies after his arriuall there, he went about the buſineſſe, which he came to effect, and entiſed ſome with money, others with flatteries, to reuolt from Ioſeph. Silas whom Ioſeph had made Gouernor of the City vnderſtanding this, he preſently by letters gaue notice thereof to Ioſeph: who receiuing them in the night, went to Tiberias, and was there early in the morning, and the reſt of the multitude came out to meete him: but Iohn notwithſtanding he iudged that he came againſt him, yet ſtill he counterfaited himſelfe ſick in bed, and ſent a man of his acquaintance to excuſe his abſence for not comming to meete Ioſeph. Then Ioſeph aſſembled the Tiberians together in a place to ſpeake vnto them, concerning that which was written vnto him: and Iohn ſent armed men thither with commandement to kill Ioſeph. The people perceiuing them to draw their ſwords, cried out: and Ioſeph at their cry looking about him, and perceiuing their ſwords euen almoſt at his throat, he leapt downe a little hill vpon the ſhore, which was ſix cubits high, vpon which he ſtood to ſpeake vnto the people: and going into a boat with two of his guard which he found there, he went into the midſt of the lake, and preſently his guard taking their weapons aſſaulted the traitors. Ioſeph fearing that a great conflict would enſue, and ſo the whole city for a few mens fault be deſtroied, ſent to his ſouldiers, charging them onely to worke their owne ſafety and no more, and to kill none, nor reproue any for that wicked fact: who forthwith obeying his command, ceaſed from fight.

But they that inhabited about the citie, and heard of the treaſon, and by whom it was attempted, armed themſelues and came againſt Iohn: but he before they came, fled into Giſcala, where he was borne. In the meane while, all Galilee came and ioyned with Ioſeph, and there were many thouſands of armed men gathered together, affirming that they came againſt Iohn, and to fire that citie which had receiued him. Ioſeph thanked them for their good will, ſaying that he had rather conquer his enemies by policy, then by fire or ſword; and therefore requeſted them to be content. He alſo publiſhed an edict, wherein he declared that all thoſe that had rebelled with Iohn, and did not forſake him within fiue daies next following, ſhould loſe all their liuings, and their manſions ſhould be ſacked, and their houſes & family ſet on fire. Hereupon three thouſand preſently forſooke Iohn, and came and caſt downe their weapons before Ioſephs feete, proſtrating themſelues before him: ſo that there onely remained with Iohn but one thouſand of fugitiue Syrians. By whom Iohn being aſſiſted, again went ſecretly to work, hauing ſo ill ſucceſſe by plain dealing: and ſo priuily ſent meſſengers to Ieruſalem, who told that Ioſeph had gathered a great armie, and that except he were quickly preuented, he would come and vſurpe the dominion ouer that mother citie. But the people vnderſtanding before of Iohns hatred, did not regard it: yet diuers rich men and magiſtrates who enuied Ioſeph, ſecretly ſent money vnto Iohn, to hire ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, that he might warre againſt Ioſeph; and determined amongſt them to diſplace him: and thinking that their decree was not ſufficient to effect it, they ſent moreouer fiue hundreth and foure thouſand armed men, and foure of their principall nobility amongſt them, to wit, Ioazar the Lawyer, and Ananias the Sadducee, and Simon and Iudas the ſonnes of Ionathas, all very eloquent and learned men, to withdraw the peoples minds from Ioſeph; giuing them charge, that if he of his owne accord came vnto them, that then they ſhould permit him to

And hereupon before he could preuent it, foure Cities did reuolt from him, to wit, Sepphoris, Gamala, Giscala and Tiberias, the which he soone after easily recouered, without any force of armes: and hauing taken the foure captaines and counsellors of his enemies, hee sent them vnto Ierusalem: against whom the people being incensed, would haue killed them, and those that brought them, had they not fled betime.

B Tiberias and Sepphoris were recouered by IOSEPH.

NOvv Iohn, for feare of Ioseph, kept himselfe within the walles of Giscala: and a few dayes after Tiberias reuolted againe, the inhabitants calling in Agrippa, who came not at the day appointed, and yet a few Romane souldiers shewing themselues, they reuolted from Ioseph. Ioseph vnderstanding this at Tarichea, hauing sent his souldiers to fetch corne, thought it not good to goe alone against the Rebels, neither did he thinke it best to delay the time any longer, fearing that whilest he delayed, King Agrippa would come and possesse the towne: for the next day, becausse it was the Sabbath, he could doe nothing. Wherefore he thought to ouercome the Rebels by policie, and so he commanded the gates of Tarichea to be kept shut, that his C intent might not be reuealed vnto them of Tiberias. Then taking all the boates that were in the lake, in number two hundreth and thirtie, and in euery one of them foure saylers, he hastily sayled to Tiberias: and when hee came neere the city, yet so farre off that the inhabitants thereof could not easily descry him, he left all the boates vpon the water emptie, & taking onely seuen of his guard with him, vnarmed, he went neere vnto the city, that they might see him. When the rebels perceiued him, and thought that the boates had beene full of armed men, they cast downe their weapons, and held vp their hands to him, beseeching him to spare the city. Ioseph, after many threatning and bitter speeches, first, for that hauing vndertaken warres against the Romanes, they with ciuill wars consumed their owne forces: secondly, for that they had sought his life, who had wrought their safety, and that they were not ashamed to shut the gates against him, who D had builded the city wals: yet (said he) if any would come and talke with him, and confirme a league of their fidelity vnto him, he would not refuse them. So ten of the chiefest among them came vnto him, whom hee carried away in a fisher-boat farre from the citie, and sent for fiftie Senators, as though he requested their promise also. And deuising new causes, he still vnder pretence of agreement sent first for one, and then for another, as he thought good, till he had loaded all the boats: which done, hee commanded all the boatmen with all speed possible to goe to Tarichea, and put them in prison, so that he carried away all the councell, which were in number sixe hundreth and two thousand people, all whom he brought to Tarichea in boates. But they which remained in the Citie, cryed with one voyce, that one Clitus was cause of that reuolt, and therefore besought Ioseph to punish him for all. Ioseph told them that he would put E none of them to death, but commanded one of his guard called Leuia, to come and cut off Clitus his hands: but he fearing to trust himselfe amongst all his enemies, refused to doe execution. Clitus perceiuing that Ioseph was angry, and ready to come out of his owne boat to doe it himselfe, besought him to grant him one of his hands: which Ioseph did, vpon condition, that hee should cut off the other himselfe. So Clitus drawing out his sword with his right hand, cut off his left, being afraid of Ioseph; and after this, he returned to Tiberias to bring it againe vnder his subiection: and within a few daies after, he tooke Giscala and Sepphoris, which were reuolted, hauing giuen the spoyles thereof to his souldiers, but yet afterward he restored all that was taken away, vnto the people, and so he did to the inhabitants of Tiberias and Sepphoris: and by this meanes got the good will of them all.

VNtill this time, there were broyles in Galilee: and now ceasing from ciuil dissension, they prepared themselues against the Romans. And the Potentates of Ierusalem, and Ananus the high Priest, with all speed renued and repaired the wals, and made all sorts of instruments

ments for warre, arrowes and other weapons; ſo that all the Citie was buſied heerein, and trayned their men in warlike diſcipline. All places were filled with tumults; but the grauer ſort were very penſiue, and many as it were foreſeeing the calamitie that after enſued, burſt out into teares: they that deſired peace, receiued no comfort in any thing: all things were done at their beck, who were cauſe of all this warre. And the eſtate of the Citie euen then before the Romans came, was like a Citie to be deſtroyed. Now Ananus omitted that which was neceſſary for war, and laboured to reconcile the ſeditious faction of them that were called Zelous: but how he was ouercome and what his end was, we will declare heereafter. Now one Simon the ſonne of Giora in the Toparchie of Acrabatena, hauing gathered together a multitude of ſeditious people, robbed and ſpoyled al; and not only brake into rich mens houſes, but alſo did beate them grieuouſly, openly exerciſing his tyranny. But when Ananus and the reſt ſent an army againſt him, hee fled vnto his fellow theeues of Maſſada, and there he ſtayed till Ananus and the reſt of his enemies were ſlaine: and then he waſted Idumæa with the reſt, ſo that the gouernours of that place were faine to put a garriſon in euery village: ſo great was the number of them that were ſlaine by theſe theeues. And thus ſtood the affaires of the Iewes.

AFter that Nero vnderstood of his euill successe against the Iewes, he was seized with feare and astonishment; yet he dissembled it as much as necessity would permit him. In the meane-while he set a good face on the matter, and made as though hee were of more courage, saying, that that which happened, was rather by the fault of his Generall, then by the valor of their aduersaries: thinking that it behooued him, who was Emperour, not to shew himselfe mooued with a little bad newes; and the greatnesse of his Empire shewed he had a minde which yeelded to no misfortune. Yet it appeared by the vexation of his spirit that he was much mooued, and in great care vnto whom he should commit the charge of the East, which rebelled; who both would conquer the Iewes, and chastise the inhabitants about them, that bare the same minde as they did. At last, he found Vespasian, whom he thought onely meet for that purpose; a man who from his infancy had beene trained vp in warres, euen vntill he was gray-headed, who had appeased the people of the West, and helped them being troubled by the Germanes, and recouered it for the Romanes: as also he did Britanny, which was vnknowne before; and for that cause made his father Claudius triumph without taking any paines for it. Nero considered all these, and his prudence grounded in old age with his experience, who also had sonnes in the flower of their age to be pledges for his fidelitie, and that represented their fathers wisedome. God, as it should seeme, euen then disposing something of the whole Common-wealth, Nero sent him to gouerne the armies in Syria, greatly encouraging him with faire speeches and promises, as at that time need required.

Nero is amazed and afraid at the valiant acts of the Iewes.

Nero sendeth Vespasian to gouern in Syria and direct his warres.

Thus he departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero: and he commanded Titus his sonne to leade the fifth & tenth legions from Alexandria, and he himselfe crossing ouer to Hellespont, went after by land into Syria, where he assembled all the Romane forces, and all the helpe of the Kings adioyning that were confederates. But the Iewes after Cestius vnfortunate successe became proud of their victory, and could not containe themselues; but like men tossed at Fortunes pleasure, they still gaue more occasion of warre: and gathering all their warlike forces together, they went to Ascalon, which is an old Citie seuen hundreth and twenty furlongs distant from Ierusalem, which the Iewes alwaies hated, for which cause also they first assaulted it. The Gouernours in this expedition, were three men excellent aboue the rest for strength and wisedome, to wit, Niger of Peræa, Silas the Babylonian, and Iohn the Essean. Now the citie of Ascalon had very strong walls, but few men to defend it; for it had onely one company of footmen, and one band of horsmen, whom Antonius gouerned. The Iewes made such haste, as though they had dwelt hard by. Antonius perswading himselfe that they would assault him, caused his horsemen to issue forth of the citie: and neither fearing the multitude nor the malice of his aduersaries, he valiantly aboad the first assault of the enemies, and beat them backe that attempted to assault the wall. So the Iewes who were vnskilfull, hauing to doe with them that were expert; and they being on foot fighting against horsemen, without order, against those that were in good order, being lightly armed, against their aduersaries who were well prouided, were easily repulsed.

Vespasian and Titus gather great forces against the Iewes.

The Iewes besiege Ascalon.

Antonie fighteth with the Iewes.

Finally, they were more led by rage and wrath, then by good counsell; and they against whom they fought were obedient, and would doe nothing without the commandement of their Leader. For their first rankes being broken, they were forced by the horsemen to turne their backs; and turning themselues to their owne company, who turned toward the wall, became as it were enemies to themselues. So that euery one seeking to auoid the horsemen, they were all dispersed about the field, which was in euery place for the aduantage of the horsemen. This greatly helped the Romanes to kill so many Iewes: for they that fled were easily ouertaken by the Romanes, and killed; and others compassing diuers of the Iewes about, slew them with darts: so that the Iewes were in as great desperation for all their huge multitude, as if they had bin alone. The Iewes indeuouring to ouercome their misfortunes, were ashamed to flie, and so fled not hastily, hoping that fortune would change. But the Romans not wearied in that which they did with great dexterity, continued the fight the most part of the day: so that there were slaine of the Iewes ten thousand, and two of their Leaders, Iohn and Silas. The rest, many being wounded, followed their Generall Niger, who fled into a little towne of Idumæa, named Salis: many of the the Romans also were wounded in that fight. But the Iewes were not daunted with this misfortune, but the griefe thereof much increased their courage: neither were they dismayed with the former losse of so many men within so short time; but rather calling to minde their great victory they had before, were drawne to vndergoe yet another mishap. Shortly after, before the mens wounds were healed, they gathered together all their forces, and went againe to Ascalon in greater number and fury, but with the same successe and skill in warlike affaires which they had before. For Antonius hauing warning which way they meant to come, placed an ambush in the way, and the horsemen setting vpon them at vnawares, they killed aboue eight thousand of them, before they could prepare themselues to fight: and all the rest fled, and Niger with them, shewing as he fled many arguments of a valiant minde: and for that the enemies pursued them, they fled into the safest tower of a towne called Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vaine to stay about the tower that was inuincible, yet loth to let the Generall of their aduersaries to escape, set fire on the walles; and so departing, triumphed, thinking that Niger had beene burned. But he leapt into a deepe vault in the Castle, and so escaped, and three daies after he shewed himselfe vnto his souldiers, who sought for him weeping, that they might haue his body, for they thought him dead: whom against all expectation seeing aliue, they were very glad, as though by Gods prouidence he escaped to be still their Leader.

Eight thousand Iewes slaine at Ascalon.

Vespasian with his whole armie commeth to Ptolemais.

Vespasian came to Antiochia, which is the mother citie of Syria, and brought his armie with him, which for greatnesse and happy successe, doubtlesse was the third in the whole world, and finding that King Agrippa did expect his comming, he hasted with all his forces from thence to Ptolemais. At this place there came vnto him the Citizens of Sephoris a Citie of Galilee, who had no thought at all of rebellion: these both prouident for their owne safetie, and well knowing the forces of the Romanes, before Vespasian came, submitted themselues vnto Cestius Gallus, and receiued from him a garrison of souldiers; and now also courteously entertaining Vespasian, offered their helpe against their countrymen. To whom Vespasian at their request gaue a guard of horse and foot, so great as he thought was able to resist the force of their enemies, if the Iewes should attempt any thing against them. For hee thought it would be a great helpe vnto him in his warre to come, to haue Sephoris the greatest Citie of Galilee situate in a strong place on his side, which otherwise might be a safeguard to the whole nation.

The Sephorites doe courteously entertaine the Romans.

CHAP. II.

The description of Galilæa, Samaria, and Iudæa.

The description and situation of the higher Galilee.

THERE are two places named Galilæa, the one is called high Galilæa, and the other low Galilee: and they are both compassed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the West Ptolemais with the limits of his territorie doth part their borders, and the mount Carmell, which in time past belonged vnto Galilee, but now vnto the Tyrians. Vnto which adioyneth Gabaa, which signifieth the horsemens Citie: so called for because King Herods horsemen were sent thither to inhabit. On the South part it ioyneth to the Samaritanes and Scythopolitanes vnto Iordan. On the East part it bordereth vpon Hippene, and Gadaris, and Gaulanitis, which are the borders of King Agrippa his country. On the North it bordereth vpon Tyria. The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias vnto Zabulon; neere which is Ptolemais by the Sea coast. In breadth it reacheth from the village Xaloth, situate in a great field, vnto Bersabe, where also begins the bredth of high Galilee, and reacheth vnto the village called Baca, bordering vpon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a village neere Iordan named Thella, vnto Meroth. And being of such bignesse, and enuironed with so many nations, yet did they alwaies resist forraine forces. For the Galileans are from their childhood warlike, and neuer are daunted by feare or penurie: for their countrey is most fruitfull, set with all manner of trees, and very fertile, notwithstanding the inhabitants take small paines in tilling the ground. All parts thereof are tilled by the inhabitants, and there is no waste part.

The length and breadth of the lower Galilee.

The fertilitie of Galilee.

There are many Cities, and in euery place there are villages populous and rich: so that the least village there, hath in it aboue fifteeene thousand inhabitants. And although Galilee bee lesse in compasse then the region beyond the riuer, yet it is more populous, fertiler and richer then the same: for it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it be bigger, yet it is not all inhabited, for there are many desarts and barren places, and one beareth wild fruits. Peræa hath a good soile & large field, beset with diuers trees, especially oliues, vines, and palme trees: and it is abundantly watred with brookes running from the mountaines, and springs that continually come downe, when in the Dog daies they are almoſt drie. The length of this place is from Macherunt to Pella: the breadth from Philadelphia to Iordan. This towne Pella before mentioned, lieth on the North part, and Iórdan on the Weſt, and the countrey of the Moabites bordereth on the South, and on the Eaſt Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelphia and Geraſis. Samaria is ſeated between Iudæa and Galilee, beginning at a towne ſituate in a place called Ginæa, and endeth in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, nothing differing in nature from Iudæa. For both of them are full of mountaines and fields, and good for tillage; full of trees abounding both with wilde apples and others: for they are of their nature dry, but haue raine enough, and haue paſſing ſweet waters, and aboundance of good graſſe, and great ſtore of milch beaſts, and which is a great argument of wealth, both places are very populous. The confines of theſe countries is Anauth, a village otherwiſe called Borceos, which lieth on the North part of Iudæa. The South part of Iudæa, if you meaſure the length, is extended vnto the village of the Arabians, called Iardan: the breadth reacheth from Iordan vnto Ioppe: in the midſt thereof is ſituate Ieruſalem; ſo that ſome call that City the nauell of the countrey. Iudæa alſo bordereth on the ſea-coaſt, euen vnto Ptolemais. It is diuided into eleuen portions: the firſt is Ieruſalem, head and chiefe of all, being aboue all the reſt, as the head is aboue the body: and the reſt are Toparchies. Gophua is the ſecond, after that Acrabatena, then Thamna, afterward Lydda, alſo Ammaus, and Pella, and Idumæa, and Engadda, and Herodium, and Iericho: beſides theſe Iamnia and Ioppe command the places adioyning. Moreouer, there is Gamala and Gaulanitis, and Batanea and Trachonitis, which are portions belonging to King Agrippa his Kingdome. This countrey beginneth at mount Libanus, and the fountaines of Iordan, and reacheth in breadth vnto the lake neere Tiberias. And in length it reacheth from Iulias to Arphas, and the inhabitants are partly Iewes, and partly Syrians.

CHAP. III.

How aid was ſent vnto the people of Sephoris: and of the military diſcipline of the Romanes.

IHaue already ſpoken of Iudæa as briefely as might bee, and with what countries it is enuironed. Now Veſpaſian ſent helpe vnto the inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thouſand horſmen, and ſixe thouſand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their Gouernour: the horſemen diuided themſelues into two companies, lodged in a great Plaine, and the foot-men were in garriſon in the citie for to defend it, but the horſe-men ſtaied without. Theſe horſe-men made excurſions on euery ſide, and greatly moleſted Ioſeph, who was quietly bent, and alſo ſpoiled all that was without the cities, and alwaies repulſed the inhabitants, if at any time they tooke courage to reuenge themſelues. Notwithſtanding, Ioſeph aſſaulted the city Sephoris, hoping to take it: which he before ſuch time as it reuolted vnto the Romanes, had compaſſed with ſo ſtrong wals, that the Romans themſelues could not haue taken it, ſo his hope was fruſtrate: for neither by force nor faire meanes would the Sephorites yeeld vnto him. Hereat the Romanes being angry, troubled the countrey more then before; who now neither night nor day ceaſed from deſtroying it, but robbed and ſpoiled all they found, and all men able to beare armes they ſlue, and made the reſt their ſlaues: Thus all Galilee was filled with fire and ſword, and no man eſcaped that calamitie; onely they ſaued themſelues, that fled into the cities that Ioſeph had walled.

Veſpaſian ſendeth helpe to the Sephorits, but filleth Galilee with ſword and fire.

Titus came to Alexandria being winter, ſooner then he was expected: and ſo receiued there the ſouldiers that he was ſent for: and hauing a proſperous iourney, he quickly came to Ptolemais; and finding his father there with two of the chiefeſt legions, to wit, the fift and tenth, he alſo adioyned that fifteenth legion that he brought with him. And there followed them eighteen companies, fiue out of Cæſarea, one troupe of horſemen, and fiue companies of horſemen out of Syria: ten of theſe companies of foote had in euery one of them a thouſand men, the reſt only ſixe hundreth and thirteen, and in euery troupe of horſemen were a hundreth and twenty. The Kings alſo brought great aide: for Antiochus, Agrippa and Sohemus, brought each of them 2000. Bowmen, and a thouſand horſemen: and Malchus King of Arabia, brought 5000. foot, & 1000. horſe, and the moſt of his footmen were Archers; ſo that the whole army together with the Kings aid, amounted vnto the number of threeſcore thouſand horſe and foote together; beſides them that followed the campe, who were a great multitude, and not inferiour vnto the ſouldiers in warlike diſcipline: ſo that one may admire the Romanes, who ſo traine vp their ſeruants in time of peace, that they are very fit for warres. So that whoſoeuer well beholdeth their military diſcipline, discipline, he shall perceiue that they gained not this their goodly Empire by chance and fortune, but by vertue: for they do not only then begin to vse weapons when they come to fight, but they practise military discipline before they need: and they are not idle in time of peace, but alwayes practise themselues therein without ceasing. Their exercises are like warre it selfe, and euery souldier is euery day exercised in euery sort of weapons, euen as though they were fighting against the enemy; so that hereby they easily indure the burthen and trauell of wars. For their disorder doth not make them forget what to do, neither doth feare dismay them, nor continuance of fight and war weary and tire them. So that whosoeuer they fight against, who are not so well prouided in these affaires, as they are, they alwayes ouercome them: and one may well call their practices amongst themselues, conflicts without blood-shed; and their wars indeed, conflicts with blood-shed. They are not easily ouercome at vnawares: for in what enemy-countrey soeuer they come, they fight not before they haue fortified their camp about, which they do not rashly, neither do they pitch their tents in marish or high places, after a disordered manner, for if the place be vnequall, they make it plaine. And they proportion their campe foure-square: for they haue many Smiths, and all kind of workemen needfull, which doe still follow the army, to accomplish such businesse. And in the innermost part of the campe they make Tabernacles, whose outside resembleth a wall, with towers equally distant one from another, and between them engines of warre to cast stones, and such like, that all kind of shot may be in readinesse. They also build foure gates large and wide, both for their cattell easily to come in at, and also for themselues if need require, to enter in or issue out speedily.

The diligence and labour of the Romanes in prouiding things necessary for the warres.

The industry of the Romanes.

The order of the Romanes in their camp.

Within the campe, there are streets diuided into certaine spaces: in the midst their rulers, and amongst them all, the Generals tent like a Temple, so that it seemeth a citie, and a market full of shops made in an instant. There are also seats builded for the Gouernours to iudge of controuersies, if any arise betweene the souldiers and others. All this place and all things belonging thereto are made in an instant, partly by reason of the multitude, partly by the industry of such as worke: and if need require, they compasse it with a trench foure cubits deepe, and as many broad. Thus the souldiers enclozed with armes, doe liue quietly in their tents, without disorder, and all things are done with good aduice and order, whether they need water, or corne, or wood: for they must all go to dinner at the time appointed, and all sleep at once, and a trumpet giueth notice when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not commanded.

The reuerēce & obedience of the Roman souldiers to their captains

In the morning, all the souldiers come vnto their captaines to salute them, the captaines to the tribunes, and they all to the Generall, and he giueth them a watch-word, and telleth them what he thinketh good, & how they shall behaue themselues towards those that are vnder them, whereby in fight they may demean themselues, & well know when to assault, and when to retire. When they go forth of the camp, a trumpet soundeth, and no man is idle, but at the first beck taketh away his tabernacle, and makes all ready for their departure. Then the trumpet soundeth againe, warning them to be ready: & hauing loden their beasts with their baggage, they expect the sound again, as though they were to run a race, and at their departure they burne their camp, because it is easie to build the like again, and also lest afterwards it may aduantage their enemies. When the trumpet hath sounded the third time, which is a signe to set forward, then they hasten those that are slow, lest they forsake their order. And a crier standeth on the right hand of their Generall, asking thrice if they be prepared to fight, and they as often answer that they are, holding vp their right hands with lofty courage: and so they march on easily, euery man keeping his rank, as though they were ready to giue battell. The footmen haue a head-piece, a brest-plate, and a sword on the left side, and on the right side a dagger. The footmen guarding the Generall, haue a Iauelin and a shield: the rest, armed euery one with bucklers and pikes. Moreouer they carry a saw, a basket, a fardle, a hatchet, also a cord, a sythe, a chaine, and victuals for 3. daies, so that the footmen are as much loden as their cattel. The horsmen carry at their right side a long sword, in the left hand a dart, and a long shield hanging against the horse side, and a quiuer with 3. darts with broad edges, wch are as big as a speare: they haue also helmets and brest-plates like the footmen. And the Generals horsemen that guard his body, do nothing differ from the rest. That company alwaies leadeth, that the lot falleth vnto. And these are the fashions of the Romans concerning their warlike discipline. They neuer doe any thing vnaduisedly in battell, but manage all things according to counsell; so that they either do not erre, or if they do, their fault is easily amended. For they think that bad successe after deliberation, is better then good fortune without it; and they thinke that therin fortune did but flatter them, to worke them some great despight, by reason they haue not deliberated: but that which is premeditated, although it haue euill successe, yet it maketh thē wary against

A gainſt another time. And none of them accounts that good ſucceſſe, which commeth by chance, and yet euery one is comforted in their misfortune, for that they take good aduice. By the military exerciſes they doe not only make the bodies of their ſouldiers ſtrong, but their minds alſo more hardy: and their diligence is the greater by their feare. For their lawes are capitall, not only for them that forſake their order, but alſo for them that cõmit the leaſt enormity or negligence; and their Generals are more ſeuere then their lawes: who only by rewarding the good, purchaſe fauour, leſt they ſeeme cruell in puniſhing the wicked. Moreouer, they are ſo obedient to their Rulers, that in peace they honour them, and in warre the whole army ſeemeth one body vnited together: they ſo keepe order, & are ſo ready to turne here or there, and ſo attentiue to any com-
B mand, and alſo diligent to note ſignes made vnto them, and ſo quicke to labour with their hands, that they are alwaies apt to do any thing, but ſlow to endure. Inſomuch that they know no place, where they haue beene ouercome, either by number, or courage, or counſell, or by the difficulty of the place, nor by fortune it ſelfe: For they think victory more certaine then Fortune. Therefore ſeeing that their deeds are ruled by aduice and counſell, and their commandements ſo well fulfilled by the armie, what maruell is it if their Empire in the Eaſt reach vnto Euphrates, in the Weſt vnto the Ocean, in the South vnto Affrick, in the North vnto Rhene and Danubius? ſeeing that one may iuſtly affirme the poſſeſſion leſſe then the poſſeſſors. This I haue ſpoken, not to praiſe the Romanes, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrifie thoſe that deſire alteration: and perhaps it may teach them who want good diſcipline, and are ignorant of the manners and C cuſtomes of the Romanes in their militarie affaires. But I returne to my purpoſe.

How PLACIDVS aſſaulted IOTAPATA.

IN the meane time Veſpaſian liuing at Ptolemais with his ſon Titus, prepared his armie. But Placidus was already entred into Galilee and runne thorow it, where hee ſlew almoſt all hee found who were of the weaker ſort of people and cowards: And ſeeing that thoſe of courage alwaies fled into the Cities that Ioſeph had fortified, hee turned his forces againſt Iotapata, which was the ſtrongeſt of them, thinking it might eaſily be taken by a ſudden aſſault, and that
D he thereby ſhould get great glory, and that by taking it great profits might enſue, in that the people ſeeing the ſtrongeſt Citie ſurprized, they would not flie to any againe. But it fell not out as he expected; for the people of Iotapata vnderſtanding of his comming, met him neere the towne, and ſuddenly encountring the Romanes, being a great multitude and well diſpoſed to fight, as thoſe that bare armes for the generall ſafetie of the countrey, and the liues of their wiues and children, they put the Romanes to flight, wounding many, only ſeuen being ſlaine: for the Romanes in flying kept their rankes: and being armed round about, they were not dangerouſly wounded; but the Iewes being vnarmed, rather truſted to their darts and arrowes then to handy blowes. There were three Iewes ſlaine, and a few wounded: and ſo Placidus when he ſaw himſelfe repulſed from the towne, he fled.

How VESPASIAN inuaded Galilee, and how at the very ſight of him the ſeditious fled.

VESPASIAN deſirous to take Galilee himſelfe, departed from Ptolemais, making ſuch iournyes as ſouldiers ought to keepe, which the Romans are wont to follow. And he commanded thoſe that came to helpe him, and the bowmen becauſe they were lighter armed, to goe before and repreſſe the enemies incurſions, and ſearch the wood and forreſt fit for ambuſhes, whereby they were to paſſe: after them followed part of the Romane footmen and horſemen: and after them there marched ten by ten out of euery hundreth; bearing with them
F their armour, and the meaſures of their campe. After them followed men, whoſe office it was to mend the waies, where they were bad, and cut down the woods that were in the way, leſt with bad way the army were tyred. After them he ſent his baggage and the baggage of the Rulers vnder him, and withall horſmen to guard it. And after them he himſelfe followed, leading an army of choſen footmen and horſemen, accompanied with his owne guard of horſemen, and he had out of euery legion ſixſcore men for his own guard. After followed they that carried the engins to batter the wals of the cities, and other inſtruments, and with them the Prefects and Tribunes, guarded with their choſen ſouldiers. After them other Enſignes, and the Eagle, the which the Romanes hold for chiefe of all, becauſe it is the King of all birds, and is moſt valiant and ſtrong, wherefore they think it a ſigne of dominion and victory, ouer all them againſt whom they beare it. After theſe ſacred Enſignes followed the Trumpets ſounding in warlike manner; and after them the Army marching ſixe in a rank; & as the cuſtome is, a Centurion went by them to keepe order: the ſeruants were all with the footmen and baggage. After the laſt company who were hyred, followed armed footmen and horſemen in great number. And thus Veſpaſian with his whole army came vnto the borders of Galilee: and there pitching his Tents, he ſtayed the ſouldiers who were very eager to fight; as it were boaſting and ſhewing his army to terrifie his aduerſaries, and giuing them time to repent, if any one would alter his minde before the warre began, yet did he prepare to beſiege the walles and fortreſſes. The only ſight of him made many rebels flie, and danted the moſt of them. For Ioſephs ſouldiers who had pitched his Tents a little from Sephoris, when they knew that warre grew on, and that they were preſently to fight with the Romans, they did not onely flie before they fought: but alſo before they ſaw their enemies. Ioſeph being left with a very few, knowing hee was not able to abide the enemies; and that the Iewes were diſcomfited, and that if he put any truſt in them, they would for the moſt part reuolt vnto the enemies; for that time abſtained from all warre, and thought to get himſelfe out of danger: and ſo accompanied with them that remained with him, he went to Tiberias.

CHAP. VI.

How Gadara was beſieged and taken.

VESPASIAN went vnto Gadara, and tooke it at the firſt aſſault: for all able men fit for warre were fled out of the Citie: and entring the Citie, he put all to death. For the Romans had no mercy, partly for the hatred they conceiued againſt the Iewes, and partly in reuenge of that which had befalne Ceſtius. And they burned the citie and all townes and villages adioyning: ſome of them being already deſolate, and the inhabitants of the reſt were made ſlaues. Ioſeph fled into the citie which he made choice of for his ſafegard, and filled it with feare. For the people of Tiberias thought he would neuer haue fled, if there had beene any hope of withſtanding the Romanes: wherein they iudged not amiſſe, for he did foreſee what euent thoſe warres would haue, and that their only ſafety conſiſted in changing their rebellious minds. He himſelfe, though he hoped to obtaine pardon of the Romans, yet had he far more rather haue dyed, then to haue liued pleaſantly with them againſt whom he was ſent, and ſo become a traitor vnto his countrey committed to his charge. Wherefore he determined faithfully to write all his eſtate, and the eſtate of the country vnto the nobilitie at Ieruſalem, and not to extoll the enemies forces too much, leſt they ſhould ſay he was a coward; nor yet putting them in any comfort, leſt perhaps they now penitent for that they had done, againe by his letters ſhould be incited to goe forward in their rebellious courſe: willing them preſently to write an anſwer, whether they thought it good to enter the league with the Romanes; or if they would make warre, then they ſhould ſend a ſufficient army againſt the Romans: and hauing written to this effect, he preſently ſent men away to Ieruſalem to beare theſe letters.

Ioſeph is afraid of the Romanes and writeth to Ieruſalem.

CHAP. VII.

Of the ſiege of Iotapata.

VESPASIAN was very deſirous to take Iotapata, for that hee knew many of his enemies were fled thither, and for that this was the ſtrongeſt refuge they had. So he ſent before footmen and horſemen, to plaine the waies which were full of ragged ſtones, ſo that it was hard for footmen to paſſe, and altogether vnpoſſible for horſemen: who within foure daies effected that which they were commanded, and made a large way for the army to paſſe: And the fift day which was the one and twentith of March, Ioſeph before they came entred into the citie, comming thither from Tiberias to encourage the Iewes who were diſmayed. A certaine run-away told Veſpaſian that Ioſeph was come thither, willing him to haſten thither, for if hee could take Ioſeph, he might eaſily take all Iudæa. Hereat Veſpaſian was very glad, & took it as good fortune, that the moſt prudent and potent of his enemies, ſhould (God at that time ſo working) put himſelfe as it were in hold; and ſo preſently hee ſent Placidus before with a thouſand horſemen, and with him Captaine Ebutius, a man both ſtrong, valiant and prudent, and commanded them to compaſſe the Citie with a ſiege, leſt Ioſeph ſhould priuily eſcape from thence. The day

Ioſeph comes to Iotapata from Tiberias.

Iotapata beſieged.

A day after he himselfe followed with the whole army, and about noone came to Iotapata, and leading his army vnto the North side of the towne, he pitched his tents vpon a hill seuen stounds distant from the city. Vpon purpose placing himselfe within the view of his enemies, that the very sight of his army might terrifie them: which he also did; for presently euery one was in such a feare, that none durst goe out of the citie. The Romans being wearied all that day, would not assault the city: wherefore they inuironed the towne with two squadrons, and the third that consisted in horsemen, was placed without to intercept all passage, that none of the Iewes could passe any whither. Heereby the Iewes now in desperation tooke heart; for in warre nothing is more forcible then necessitie. The next day began the battery, and euery Iew kept his quarter, and
B kept themselues in order, and resisted the Romans before their wals. But when Vespasian sent all the bowmen, and those who cast darts and other things to beat them off from the walles, and he himselfe with footmen assaulted the walles in another place where they might easily be entred: then Ioseph fearing the citie, accompanied with all the people issued out of the towne, and assaulted the Romanes fiercely, and did driue them from the walles, shewing courage and strength: and they themselues suffred as much harme as they did vnto their enemies. For as they were encouraged with desperation, so were the Romans with shame, who were armed with military knowledge and strength, and the Iewes only with anger. And the fight continued all day euen vntill night; wherein many Romans were wounded, and only thirteene slaine: and of the Iewes there were sixe hundreth wounded, and seuenteene slaine. The next day also they met the Romans, and
C resisted them more stoutly then before, taking courage for that they the day before had resisted them, contrary to their expectation: and all the Romanes fought more valiantly, ashamed as it were of themselues, in suffering the Iewes to resist them; thinking withall that they themselues were ouercome, if they did not quickly suppresse their enemies. Wherefore the Romans for fiue dayes together ceased not to assault the towne, and the Iewes strongly rebatted them: and now neither the Iewes feared their enemies, nor the Romans were dismayed with the difficulty of taking the towne. Iotapata is almost all situate vpon a rocke, and compassed about with deepe vallies, which descend straight downe like a wall: so that one can scarcely see the bottome. There is only accesse vnto it on the North part, where it is seated vpon a mountaine going ouerthwart; which Ioseph inclozed with a wall, to the end it might be no passage for the enemies: all the rest
D of the citie is inuironed with high mountaines, so that it cannot be discerned by any before they be hard at it. And Iotapata was thus strengthned.

Vespasian determined both to striue against the nature of the place, and hardinesse of the Iewes; and therefore called all his Captaines together, and consulted with them to begin a hot siege: at last they resolued to reare a mount in that place where the citie was easiest to be entred. He sent his whole army to prouide wood to do it, who cut downe the mountaines neere vnto the towne: and great store of wood and stone being brought, setting hurdles before them to beare off the darts and arrowes, hee began to raise a mount; so that they receiued little or no harme by darts cast from off the wals: others brought earth from places thereabout, and no man was idle. The Iewes cast continually great stones and all kinde of darts vpon that which defended them; which E though they pierced not thorow, yet they made a great noyse and terrified the workemen. Which Vespasian seeing, caused all engines that did cast stones and darts, which were in number a hundreth and threescore, to be placed against the wals, to beat the Iewes from thence. And so they cast stones, and darts, and fire, and arrowes in great abundance: so that they did not onely beat the Iewes from off the walles, but also out of the reach of their shot; for both the Arabian archers & those that vsed slings and darts, and all the engines continually played vpon them. For all this the Iewes rested not, but running out in companies as theeues, they took away that which defended the workmen, and then assaulted them hauing no defence: and when they had beaten them away, destroyed and fired all that the Romanes had wrought for their owne defence and F safegard. At last Vespasian perceiued that these domages hapned for that there was space left betweene all these workes, whereby the enemies had accesse to doe them such harmes: wherefore he vnited them together, and so hindred the priuy excursions of the Iewes. When the mount was almost made and the towers vpon it finished, Ioseph afraid to doe nothing for the safegard of the towne, called all workemen necessary together, and commanded them to make the wall there higher; but they said it was vnpossible for them to worke, for the number of shot in that place. Then Ioseph made this deuice to defend them: he fixed stakes in the ground, and fastned vnto them hides of Kine and Oxen new slaine, by which they were defended from shot, and fire; so that they labouring night and day raised the wall twentie cubits high, erecting also vpon it many towers: and by this meanes made it a strong defence. Whereat the Romans, who before thought themselues sure of the towne, were now greatly dismaid both by this deuice of Iosephs, and also by the hardinesse of the Iewes.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the siege of Iotapata by VESPASIAN, and the diligence that IOSEPH vsed, and how the Iewes made excursions against the Romanes.

THIS stratagem & the carriage of the Iewes greatly moued Vespasian: for now they receiuing courage in that defence, made assaults vpon the Romans of their owne accord, and euery day skirmished, running out in companies, and like theeues, taking away whatsoeuer they lighted vpon; and what they could not carry away, they set on fire. At last Vespasian would not permit his souldiers to fight any longer: but determined now to besiege it and take it by want of victuals, purposing either to make them come & yeeld themselues for lacke of food, or if they held out, to famish them: and that it would be more easie to take it by force, if ceasing a-while from assaulting it, he afterward set vpon it, they being in anguish for the danger they were in. Wherfore he commanded all passages to be kept, that none could go out of the city. But they had great store of corne, and of all other things else, except salt and water, whereof they stood in great want: for there is neuer a fountain in the city, and they haue little raine in Summer-time, so that the inhabitants were in great distresse; for now there was hardly any water left in the citie. Ioseph perceiuing there was abundance of all things else, and that the citizens were valiant, as also the siege like to continue long, he gaue to euery one water in measure: with which they were not contented, thinking it as good to want altogether, as to haue it in that manner; and now they began to faint, as though they had suffred extreme drought. The Romans perceiuing this, being vpon a high hill, ouer against the place whither all the Iewes came together to receiue water, they with their shot killed many that came thither, insomuch that Vespasian hoped that within short time their water would be spent, and they constrained to yeeld. But Ioseph to frustrate this hope, commanded a great many garments to be laid in water and hanged vpon the walls, so that the water might run downe on euery side. When the Romans saw this, they were much grieued and afraid, for that they wasted so much water in mockery, and before had thought that they had wanted water to drink. And now Vespasian scorning to win the citie by siege, purposed to assault it againe by force. The Iewes were very glad of this: and the citie being in danger, rather wished to be slaine then perish through hunger or thirst. Ioseph deuised also another way to get such necessaries as he wanted, out of the countrey: for there was a valley out of the way, and therefore not regarded by the Romanes: wherefore Ioseph sent men into the countrey to his friends for such things as the city wanted, by this way, commanding them when they came neere the watchmen, to hide and couer themselues with hairy skins, that the watchmen might thinke them to be dogs: and this he vsed a good space, till at last the watchmen perceiued it, and so set a guard there to stop the passage. When Ioseph perceiued the Citie could not hold out long, and fearing his owne life, if still hee continued there, hee treated with the chiefe of the citie that hee might flie. But the people perceiuing his intent, flocked about him, and besought him to take pitie vpon them, and not forsake them, who had no hope but in him, affirming that for his sake they were all couragious and bold to fight; and if they were taken, yet he would be a comfort vnto them, telling him that it did not become him to flye from his enemies, nor to forsake his friends, neither as it were to leape out of a ship shaken with a tempest, into the which he came when the Seas were calme, for so by this meanes he would soone ouerthrow the citie; and once gone, no man afterward could or durst resist their enemies; for in him was all their hope.

Ioseph kept it to himselfe that his purpose was to worke his owne safety: for he told them the thing which he intended was for their good, affirming that though he stayed still in the citie, yet he could do them little good: and if the citie should chance to be taken, then he and they were like to perish; but if he were abroad and not besieged, he could doe them great good: for hee would presently assemble all the people of Galilee, and come against the Romanes, and so raise their siege; whereas now in staying with them, he saw not wherein he did them any good, but rather incited the Romanes against them, making them more earnest to take the towne then they would be, onely because he was there, that they might take him; but if they knew once that hee were fled, they would not then be so earnest in the siege. Ioseph herewith could not perswade the people, people, but they flocked faſter about him, and both young and old of all ſorts came and proſtrated themſelues at his feet, weeping, and beſeeching him to take ſuch hap as ſhould befall them, whether it were good or bad; not for that they enuyed his eſcape, but for that they hoped they ſhould receiue no harme if he remained with them. The yeere of the world, 4031. after Chriſts birth, 69.

He then bethought himſelfe that if he ſtayed with them, he fulfilled their requeſt; and if he denyed, he feared they would force him. Wherefore being partly mooued by compaſſion, hee determined to ſtay; and being now, as all the citie was, deſperate, he told them that now it was time to fight, ſeeing there was no hope of ſafety: and that it was a goodly matter to ſpend their liues renowmedly, and doe ſome noble act to leaue a remembrance vnto their poſteritie of their valour: and ſo went about it. And iſſuing out of the citie with the moſt valiant among them, when hee had killed the watchmen, at the firſt encounter hee came euen vnto the Romans tents, and tore the skins that their tents were made of, and fired others, and their engines: and ſo hee did the ſecond and third day, and for certaine daies and nights afterward neuer ceaſed. When Veſpaſian perceiued the Romans greatly endomaged by ſuch incurſions, and very loth to flye for ſhame, and not able to follow them being ſo loaden with their armour, and that the Iewes alwaies did ſome exploit before they retyred themſelues into the citie; hee gaue commandement vnto his ſouldiers to leaue their aſſault, and not to fight againſt men who deſired to die, affirming that no men were ſtronger then thoſe in deſperation, and that if they found none to aſſaile, their courage would ſoone by alaid; like vnto a flame of fire, when the matter that nouriſheth it, is conſumed. Moreouer, the Romans muſt ſeeke victory more warily, for that they fought not for neceſſitie, but onely to increaſe their dominions: and after that, oftentimes they beat the Iewes by the Arabian archers, and with ſlings and darts, and other ſhot which neuer ceaſed, and ſo the Iewes by this meanes were repreſſed. But ſo ſoone as they were without the danger of the ſhot, they more furiouſly aſſailed the Romanes, ſparing neither body nor minde, but continually fought by turnes, and euery one of the citie aſſiſted them that ſo laboured.

How Veſpaſian did beat the walls of Iotapata with a Ramme, and other warlike Engines.

VESPASIAN thinking himſelfe as it were beſieged, both for the long time which he had continued the ſiege, and alſo for the diuers aſſaults and priuy excurſions of the Iewes; hauing now almoſt raiſed the Rampiers as high as the walles of the Citie, determined to batter them with a Ramme. A Ramme is a huge beame like the maſt of a ſhip, whoſe end is armed with a ſtrong maſſiue iron, made in the forme of a Rammes head: whereupon it takes his name, becauſe he butteth with his head. It hangeth on another beame with ropes, like the beame of a paire of ballances: the beame it hangeth on lying acroſſe, is held vp with two props, which being drawne backe by force of many men, and then ioyntly with all their forces ſhooued forward, it ſtriketh the wall with the head of iron: And there is no wall nor tower ſo ſtrong, but though it abide the firſt ſtroke of the Engine, yet can it not hold out long. The Generall of the Romans thought good to vſe this meanes to take the city by force, for that the ſiege was dangerous, by reaſon that the Iewes neuer reſted; ſo the Romans with all kind of ſhot endeuoured to beat the Iewes from off the walles that made any reſiſtance: and the archers and they who vſed ſlings, were hard by: and when they ſaw that none of the Iewes durſt come vpon the walles, they applyed the Ramme vnto them; and couered it aloft with hurdles and skins, both for to defend themſelues and the engine, and at the firſt aſſault the walls were ſhaken, ſo that the citizens cried, as though the towne had bin already taken. Ioſeph ſeeing them ſtill beat one place, and that preſently the wall would fall, deuiſed a way to reſiſt the force of the Ramme, and ſo he filled ſacks with chaffe, and let them down off the wall iuſt againſt that place, where the Ram ſtrook ordinarily, and ſo brake the force of the blowes, the looſeneſſe of the chaffe making no reſiſtance; and ſo drowning or abating the violence of the ſtroke. By this meanes the Romanes were hindered: for whitherſoeuer they brought the Ramme, thither did they vpon the walls alſo remooue the ſacks of chaffe, and brake the force thereof: till at laſt the Romans alſo deuiſed a way to cut theſe ſacks, taking long poles & binding Siethes vnto the end of them, and ſo cut theſe ſacks of chaffe. And the Ram ſhooke the wall, and the wall newly built was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt. Then Ioſeph and his ſouldiers ſought to helpe themſelues by fire-workes, and ſo they fired all that was made of dry wood in three ſeuerall places, and withall the engines, and forts, and mounts of the Romans, who now had much adoe to defend themselues: first, becauſe that they were terrified with the valour of the Iewes: and ſecondly, becauſe euery one had worke enough to defend himſelfe againſt the fire, which ſeizing vpon dry matter with Brimſtone and Pitch wonderfully increaſed; ſo that in one houres ſpace it conſumed all the works that the Romans had made with ſo great labour. There was a Iew the ſon of Samæus called Eleazar, who deſerued eternall memory: this man was borne at Saab in Galilee. This Eleazar tooke vp a great ſtone, and caſt it downe with ſuch force vpon the Ramme, that he brake off the head thereof; and nothing fearing leapt downe amongſt the midſt of his enemies, and brought it away into the Citie: at the laſt being vnarmed, and as it were a marke for his enemies to ſhoot at, hee receiued in his body fiue arrowes; and as though he had not felt them, ſo ſoone as he had gotten vp the wall where all might ſee him, he boldly ſtood ſtill, and ſo through griefe of his wounds hauing the head of the Ramme in his armes fell downe. Next vnto him two brethren of Ramath in Galilee ſhewed themſelues valiant, named Netiras and Philip, who aſſaulted the tenth legion of the Romans with ſuch violence, that they brake their ranks, and put all to flight that ſought to withſtand them: which Ioſeph and thoſe that were with him perceiuing, tooke fire and burnt the engines, workes, and defences of the fift and tenth legions that were fled, and thoſe that followed deſtroyed all engines, and other matter that was left. In the euening the Romanes erected the Ram againſt that part of the Citie which before they had beaten, and ſo began afreſh to ſhake the wall in the ſame place that before they had battered: and one of the Iewes ſhot an arrow from the wall, and wounded Veſpaſian in the ſoale of the foot, yet the wound was not great, for that the force of the arrow was ſpent before it came to him, hauing come a great way off.

This fact greatly troubled the Romanes, who ſeeing Veſpaſian bleed, preſently ſpred theſe newes through the whole army, and almoſt all of them came running to ſee their Generall, and eſpecially Titus who feared his fathers death: ſo that the whole army partly for the loue of their Generall, and partly for the feare of Titus his ſon, were greatly troubled: but Veſpaſian preſently freed the army from all perturbation; and his ſonne Titus from feare. For the griefe of the wound being paſt, he ſhewed himſelfe to all that were ſorrowfull for him, and incited them to fight againſt the Iewes more earneſtly then before; and now euery one as it were to reuenge their Generall, deſpiſed all danger, and aſſaulted the wals, one exhorting another. Ioſeph and his aſſociates, notwithſtanding, that many of them were killed with ſhot, darts and arrowes; yet they forſooke not the walles, but with fire and ſword, and ſtones fiercely aſſaulted them, that being defended with hurdles, battered the walles with the Ram, but to little purpoſe: for they were continually killed, being in ſight of their enemies, and for that they could not ſee them, preſently were ſtriken downe, for their fire did make ſuch a light as though it had beene day, ſo that the Romans eaſily perceiued whither to direct their ſhot: and for that their engines were not perceiued afarre off, the Iewes could not defend themſelues from the arrowes and ſtones that were ſhot againſt them, by which meanes many of them were ſlaine, and the tops and corners of the towers beaten downe. And there was no man ſo well guarded, but he was ſlaine by force of thoſe ſtones; ſo that any man may know of what force that engin is, by that which hapned that night. For one that ſtood neere Ioſeph vpon the wall was ſtriken with a ſtone, and his head carried from his body by violence of that blow three furlongs, as though it had beene caſt out of a ſling: and the next day a woman great with childe was ſtriken on the belly with one of thoſe ſtones, and the childe carryed forth of her from the place where ſhe was ſtriken three furlongs; ſo great was the force of this engine: Therefore the violence of the engines was more terrible, and likewiſe the noiſe of darts, arrowes and other ſhot. And many were ſlaine on euery ſide, and the bodies of thoſe that were killed, ſtriken againſt the wall made a noiſe: and within the Citie was heard a pitifull lamentation, and weeping among the women; and without, a heauy mourning and cry of them, that were wounded to death; and all that part of the wall where the fight was, flowed with blood: ſo that now the multitude of dead bodies had ſo filled the ditch before the wall, that the Romanes might eaſily paſſe ouer them into the Citie, and the mountaines about did eccho with the cryes of the Citizens: and all that night long nothing wanted, that either might by the eye or eare mooue terrour. And many ſtoutly fighting for Iotapata dyed moſt valiantly, many alſo were ſore wounded: and notwithſtanding the wall was continually battered, yet it was almoſt morning before it fell, being all night long beaten with the Ramme. And then they of Iotapata repaired the breach with their bodies and armour, before the Romanes could ſet bridges to enter it.

How Iotapata was againe aſſaulted.

The yeere of the world, 4031. after Chriſts birth, 69.

IN the morning Veſpaſian brought his army to enter the breach, hauing giuen them but little reſt after their whole nights labour: and deſirous to make the Iewes that defended the breach, to forſake their place, before ſuch time as he entred, he tooke the moſt valiant of his horſemen, and vnhorſed them, being armed from the head to the foot, and placed them in three ranks; that they, being ſo armed, might beſiege round that part of the wall that was battered, and ſo take long pikes in their hands, ſo that as ſoone as the bridges were ſet, they ſhould firſt enter the breach. After them he placed the ſtrongeſt of his footmen: the reſt of his hoſemen he ſet round about the city vpon the mountaine, to the end that none might eſcape thereabout: after the footmen he commanded archers to follow with their arrows ready in their hands, and them that vſed ſlings alſo, and other engins for ſhot. And he cauſed other to ſcale the wals, where they were not battered, to the intent that the towneſmen, buſied in reſiſting them, might leaue the breach vnmanned; and the reſt being wearied and oppreſt with the thicknes of the ſhot, ſhould of force forſake their ſtanding. But Ioſeph, perceiuing his intent, placed old men and children, and thoſe that were already wearied, vpon thoſe parts of the wals that were not battered: & himſelf with the ſtouteſt of the city went to defend the breach, and placed ſix men before them, whom he choſe out, himſelfe being one of them, to ſuſtaine the firſt brunt of their enemies aſſault: commanding them likewiſe to ſtop their eares, to the end that they might not be terrified with the cries of the army. He willed them alſo to defend themſelues with ſhields againſt the darts & arrowes, and giue back a little, till ſuch time as the archers quiuers were emptied: and if ſo be that the Romans ſhould offer to make bridges, that then they with their inſtruments ſhould reſiſt; and that euery one ſhould now fight, not to defend his country, but as it were to recouer it being in a maner already loſt; and imagine, that they now did ſee their aged men ſlain with their children, and their wiues almoſt taken by their enemies, and now to reuenge themſelues vpon thoſe that hereafter would maſſacre their whole city: and thus he appointed men in both places. The weaker multitude, women and children, ſeeing the city compaſſed about with three ranks of horſemen, & that the Romans with their ſwords drawn preaſed againſt the breach, that all the mountaines about did ſhine and glitter with their weapons that were placed there, and certain Arabians to ſerue the archers with arrowes: they cried out as though the city were now taken, ſo that a man would haue iudged them already amidſt their enemies ſwords, and not onely in danger to fall into their hands. Wherefore Ioſeph commanded the women to their houſes, leſt their cries ſhould effeminate his ſouldiers minds; willing them likewiſe to keep ſilence, and threatned them if they did not: and ſo he marched to the breach, which place fell to his lot, and gaue no heed to them that ſought to ſcale the wals, but onely beheld a far off the force of the arrowes.

When all the trumpets began to ſound, and the aire to be obſcured with the multitude of arrowes; Ioſephs companions, remembring the charge giuen them, ſtopped their eares, and armed their bodies againſt the ſhot of arrowes: And ſo ſoon as the bridges were ſet againſt the wal, preſently they ran; and before the Romans could enter vpon them, they got them into their hands, and reſiſted them that ſought to come vpon them, ſhewing great proweſſe & ſtrength, and themſelues no way inferiour vnto the Romans, though they were in extreme danger, and the Romans in none: and did not giue one foote backe, till either they did kill or were killed. But the Iewes had not any freſh men to ſecond them that were tired; & the Romans, ſtill as they were wearied, ſent freſh ſupply, and ioyning together their long ſhields, exhorting one another, they became as it were a wall or defence inuincible; and the whole army like one body did beate backe the Iewes, and ſo ſet foote on the wals. Then Ioſeph, in this deſperate caſe, deuiſed ſome way to repell this preſent calamity: wherfore he commanded the Iewes to fetch ſcalding oyle, which they had ready, and powre it vpon the Romans yet ſeething, who alſo caſt the pans vpon them. This deuice brake the ranks of the Romans, ſo that with great paine and griefe they fell from the wal, and tumbled downe: for the ſcalding oyle eaſily got betweene their fleſh and armour, and ſcorched them like fire being eaſily heated, and long continuing hot by reaſon of the fatneſſe; and the Romans, being loaden with helmets and breſt-plates, could not flee; ſo that ſome leapt down off the bridge, and others for griefe died; others would faine haue retired themſelues, but could not, becauſe their enemies followed them ſo hard. But neither the Romans wanted vertue and valour in aduerſe fortune, nor the Iewes prudence and good aduice. For the Romans, notwithſtanding they were in intolerable paine, being ſcalded with hote oyle, yet did they freſhly aſſault them that hurt them, and euery one did thruſt him forward that was before him, as it were deſirous to ſhew their courage. Then the Iewes vſed another deuice to make them retire: for they powred fenugreek boyled vpon the bridge, ſo that they ſlid downe: and neither they that would haue fled, nor they who did ſtriue to aſſault the Iewes, could ſtand vpon their feet, it was ſo ſlippery; and many falling downe vpon the bridge, were by their owne company trodden to death; others did ſlide downe vpon the Rampier; and alwaies as they fell, the Iewes ſtrooke them: and ſeeing that the Romans were retired from the place, ſo that now they were not forced to handy blowes, they had leiſure to ſhoot arrowes and darts againſt them. When Veſpaſian ſaw that his men in that fight endured much miſery, towards euening he cauſed them to retire, many being ſlaine, and more wounded, and 6. men of Iotapata were ſlaine, and aboue 300. wounded: this fight was vpon the 20. day of Iune. But after that Veſpaſian had comforted his ſouldiers for that which had hapned, and perceiuing that they were angry, and deſired to fight to reuenge themſelues, ſo that they needed no exhortation; he raiſed the Rampier higher, and erected 3. towers 50. foot high, couering them aloft with iron, that ſo by reaſon of their waight they might ſtand ſtedfaſt, and not be conſumed by fire: and theſe he placed vpon the Rampiers, and in them Archers, and men that caſt darts and ſuch like: who not being perceiued of them that were vpon the wall, by reaſon of the highneſſe of the towers, and the couering thereof, eaſily wounded them who were placed thereon. So the Iewes, when they could not auoid the arrowes, nor be reuenged vpon them whom they could not ſee, nor yet fire the towers being couered with plates of iron, forſooke the wals; yet alwaies encountred with them who ſought to enter. And the people of Iotapata thus reſiſted, notwithſtanding that many euery day were ſlaine, and that they did their enemies no harme without great danger to themſelues.

How Iapha was taken by TRAIANVS and TITVS.

The taking in of Iapha by Traiane.

AT this time Veſpaſian vnderſtood that Iapha, a Citie neere Iotapata, minded to rebell, encouraged ſo to doe, for that they vnderſtood how they of Iotapata had held out contrary to all expectation: wherefore he ſent thither Traianus, Gouernour of the tenth legion, and with him 2000. footmen, and a thouſand horſe: who perceiuing the towne able to reſiſt, and the inhabitants prepared for to fight, and come out to meet him (for the towne being for the ſituation ſtrong enough, it was alſo compaſſed with a double wall) ſeeing this, he fought with them, and after a while put them to flight, and the Romans following them, brake in with them at the firſt gate: which the Citizens perceiuing, ſhut the ſecond gate, not ſuffering their own Citizens to enter in, for feare that the enemies alſo ſhould ruſh in with them, as they had done into the firſt gate. Truely, God gaue that victory vnto the Romans, whoſe will it was that all the warlike men of the Citie ſhould haue their owne gates ſhut vpon them, and ſo fall into their enemies hands, who were moſt greedy to deſtroy them. For many came to the gates, and called thoſe that kept them by their names, pitifully intreating that they might come in: which whileſt they did, they were butchered like ſheepe, being enclozed betweene two wals: their owne Citizens hauing ſhut one gate vpon them, and the Romans the other: and many thus enclozed periſhed with their fellowes ſwords, and an infinite number by the rage of the Romans, hauing no courage to reſiſt and reuenge themſelues. For the treaſon of their owne Citizens, and the terror of their enemies together, vtterly diſcouraged them, and ſo they died all in number 12. thouſand, not curſing the Romans, but the Iewes their owne countrimen. Traiane, thinking that the City was now deſtitute of fighting men, or if any were within, that they durſt not reſiſt being thus terrified, reſerued the taking of the Citie for the Generall, and ſent meſſengers vnto him, requeſting him to ſend his ſon Titus to make an end of the victory. Veſpaſian, fearing that yet there would be ſome reſiſtance, ſent Titus with 500. horſmen, and 1000. foot: who haſtning thither, placed Traianus on the left ſide of the towne, and himſelfe on the right: ſo the Romans on euery ſide ſcaled the wals, & the Galileans hauing a while reſiſted, preſently left them. Then Titus and his followers leaping down, preſently got into the city, & began a vehement fight with them that were aſſembled therin, ſome valiantly iſſuing out of the narrow ſtreets, and aſſaulting them, and the women caſting ſuch things as they could get, vpon the Romans from the tops of their houſes, and thus they held battell ſixe houres. How CÆREALIS conquered the Samaritanes.

B THE Samaritanes alſo were partakers of this calamity, who aſſembled themſelues together in mount Garizin, which they account a ſacred place. But both their aſſembly and their courage did portend their warres: and not warned by their neighbours harmes, nor with any aduice or iudgement conſidering their owne infirmity, and the Romans power, began to be tumultuous. Veſpaſian forſeeing this, thought it good to preuent them: and although all the region of Samaria had garriſons in it, yet for all the great multitude aſſembled, it was thought that the garriſons were able to keepe them vnder. Wherefore he ſent thither Cærealis, the Tribune of the fift legion, with 600. horſmen, and 3000. footmen. Cærealis thought it not the beſt way to goe vnto the mountaine, and fight with the whole multitude, becauſe a great many C of their enemies were vpon it: wherefore he commanded his ſouldiers to beleaguer the mountaine about, at the foot thereof, and to keepe them there all the whole day. There hapned at that time a vehement heat, and the Samaritans wanted water: for it was then Summer, and the people had not prouided themſelues of victuals, ſo that many in one day only for want of drinke died of thirſt, the reſt preferred death before the miſery they indured, and ſo fled to the Romans: of whom Cærealis learned that thoſe that yet remained on the mount, were euen diſmaid by the miſery they endured. Wherefore he aſcended the mountaine, and compaſſing about the enemies with his army, he firſt exhorted them to yeeld, willing them to ſaue themſelues, promiſing them all their liues, if they would caſt downe their weapons: but nothing preuailing with them, he ſet vpon them, and kild them all, in number 11000. and 600. and this was done the 27. day of D Iune. How Iotapata was taken.

THe Citizens of Iotapata indured this hard ſiege contrary to all expectation, and in the ſeuen and fortieth day, the Romans mounts were raiſed higher then their wals: on the ſame day one of the Citie fled vnto Veſpaſian, and told him in what caſe the City ſtood, and how few Citizens were left, and that with daily watchings and fighting they were far ſpent, E whereby they were not able to reſiſt any more, and that they might be taken by policy if they were followed: for in the laſt part of the night, being wearie, they ceaſed from their labour, and ſlept vntill the morning: wherefore he perſwaded Veſpaſian to aſſault them at that time. But Veſpaſian knowing how faithfull the Iewes were one vnto another, and how they contemned all puniſhment, gaue little credit to this run-away: for a little before, one of Iotapata being taken, could not by any torments be compelled to confeſſe, or diſcloſe the eſtate of the city, whom the fire nothing moued, and ſo at laſt he was crucified, laughing and ſcorning death: yet a probable coniecture which he had, perſwaded him to giue credit ſomewhat to this traitors words: and for that he knew no great harme could befall him, if he ſo aſſaulted the city as the traitor willed, he commanded the man to be kept, and made all his army in readines to aſſault the town. F So at the houre appointed, he made towards the wals with ſilence; Titus being the firſt, accompanied with one Domitius Sabinus a tribune, & a few of the 15. legion: who killing the watchmen, entred into the city, and after them Sextus Cærealis and Placidus, with their companies; ſo the Caſtle was taken, and the enemies were in the midſt of the towne, and it was faire day light, and yet the townſmen knew nothing, being now faſt aſleepe after their great labours and watchings: and they that did watch could ſee nothing, there was ſo thicke a miſt by chance that morning, & the reſt neuer wakened till death was at their doore; and that they perceiued their calamity and deſtruction. The Romans, mindfull of all that had befallen them in the time of the ſiege, did neither ther ſpare nor pity any one: but driuing the people out of the higher part of the city into the lo- G neſſe of the place: ſo being cumbred for want of roome, and ſliding downe the banks for haſte, their enemies ſtill purſuing them, they were eaſily ſlaine. Many of Ioſephs guard ſeeing this that they could not fight, gathered themſelues together in a corner of the city, and ſlew themſelues, that the Romans might not kill them. But ſome of the watchmen, who firſt perceiued the city to bee taken, fled into a tower, and reſiſted a while (this tower was ſituate on the North ſide of the City) and at laſt being enuironed with their enemies, towards euening yeelded, and offered themſelues to be ſlain. And the Romans might haue boaſted that that victory had bin without blood-

1000. and 200. captiues: and the number of them who were ſlaine during the ſiege, and at ſuch time as the city was taken, amounted to 40000. And Veſpaſian commanded the city to be de-

CHAP. XIIII. I

How IOSEPH was taken, and how he redeemed his life with deeds and words.

BVT eſpecially aboue all others, the Romans made diligent ſearch for Ioſeph, both for the hatred they bare him, and alſo becauſe Veſpaſian greatly deſired to get him, for that hee being taken, the greateſt part of the warres were then ended; ſo they ſought him among the dead, and amongſt thoſe that were hid: but he (fortune fauouring him) when the city was taken, eſcaped from the midſt of his enemies, and leapt into a deep Well, which had a large caue on the one ſide, the which they aboue could not perceiue; where he found forty principall men K who had prouiſion for many daies. The enemies being in euery place, he in the day time lay hid, and in the night he went forth to ſee if he could eſcape: and perceiuing that all places about were diligently watcht for to take him, he returned againe into the caue, and lay there two daies: the third day a certain woman that had bin with them in the caue was taken, and ſo he was deſcri'd. Then Veſpaſian ſent two Tribunes to him to promiſe him ſafetie, and bring him before him; the Tribunes names were Paulinus and Gallicanus: But Ioſeph would not accept their offer, fearing that becauſe he had bin the author of all the euils that the Romans had indured, that therefore they ſought him out to puniſh him: till Veſpaſian ſent vnto Ioſeph, Nicanor, the third Tribune, one of Ioſephs acquaintance. Nicanor recounted vnto him how mild the Romans were towards them whom they had conquered, and that the Roman Captains rather admired him for his ver- L tue, then hated him. Moreouer, that his Generall intended not to puniſh him (which if he pleaſed, he might do whether he yeelded himſelfe or no) but to ſaue him, who was ſo valiant a man:
adding alſo, that if Veſpaſian meant ill, he would neuer haue imployed his friend in ſuch a meſſage, to vſe friendſhip (ſo noble a vertue) to ſo euill a purpoſe as to worke treaſon: and that hee, though Veſpaſian had beene ſo minded, would neuer haue conſented to haue betrayed his friend.
Ioſeph, after Nicanors words, began to ſtudie, as doubtfull what beſt to doe. Whereat the ſouldiers being angry, began to caſt fire into the caue: but Veſpaſian hindered them, being deſirous to take Ioſeph aliue. Nicanor ceaſed not to intreat him: and he perceiuing how his enemies began to waxe angry, and calling to mind the dreames he had in the night, wherein God foretold him of all the Iewes calamities, & what ſhould betide the Roman Princes (for he could M interpret dreames, and whatſoeuer God obſcurely ſhewed, being inſtructed in the holy bookes of the Prophets, and himſelfe a Prieſt as his parents were.) So at that time being as it were filled with the Spirit of God, and recording the dreames and horrible viſions which he ſaw in his ſleepe, hee prayed ſecretly to God after this manner; O Creator (quoth hee) ſeeing that it pleaſeth thee to ruinate the nation of the Iewes, and that all good fortune is gone vnto the Romans, and that thou haſt choſen my ſoule to foretell future euents, I yeeld vnto the Romanes to ſaue my life, proteſting that I meane not to goe to them to play the traytor vnto my countrey,
but

A but as thy miniſter;and hauing thus ſpoken,he yeelded himſelfe vnto Nicanor.But they,who fled into the caue where Ioſeph was,perceiuing that Ioſeph yeelded vnto the Romans,flocked al about him,and cryed out, How are our country lawes violated? Where are thoſe promiſes of God made to the Iewes? where are thoſe gallant minds that contemne and deſpiſe death? Art thou O Ioſeph deſirous to liue,and ſee thy ſelfe to become a vile bondſlaue? How ſoon haſt thou forgotten thy ſelf? How many haſt thou perſwaded to embrace death for their liberty ſake? Truly thou haſt but a ſhadow of valour and prudence in thee, if thou doſt hope that they will ſaue thy life againſt whom thou haſt ſo behaued thy ſelfe:or if they would ſaue thee, to deſire life at their hands. But ſeeing the Romans offer hath made thee forget thy ſelfe; yet we,to preſerue the ho-
B nour and credit of our country,will lend thee our armes and ſwords,and ſo if thou be willing to die,die like the Generall of the Iewes: which if thou refuſe to do; thou ſhalt whether thou wilt or no die like a traitour to thy countrey. When they had thus ſaid,they all threatned to kill him with their ſwords, if he did yeeld to the Romans. Ioſeph feared their violence, and perſwaded himſelfe, if he died before he had put them in minde of Gods Commandements, that then he ſhould die a traitour to God: wherefore he began to make a Philoſophicall diſcourſe vnto them concerning this preſent eſtate, what was to be done.

The yeer of the world, 4031. after Chriſts birth, 69.

The Iewes violence & expoſtulation againſt Ioſeph.

Wherefore (O my friends, quoth he) are we become murtherers of our ſelues? Wherefore do we make war betweene things ſo vnited,as are the ſoule and the body? Will any man ſay that my mind is changed? Why, the Romans know that it is a thing moſt honourable to die in wars,
C not any way,but according to the law of armes, to wit, by the conquerers hand. If I intreat the Romans to ſpare my life,then am I worthy to periſh with mine own ſword and hand:but if they think good to ſpare their enemies,ſhould not we think it good likewiſe to ſpare our own ſelues? Truly it is meer folly to do that to our own ſelues,for the which we fight againſt them. I cõfeſſe it is a commendable thing to die for ones liberty; but yet to die in fight, & by their hands who took away that libertie:but now neither do they war againſt vs,nor kill vs. He is not onely to be iudged a coward, who refuſeth to die when need requireth,but alſo he who wil die whẽ no need vrgeth. Moreouer, what with-holdeth vs from offring our ſelues to the Romans? Truly, feare of death. Shall we therefore make that certain our ſelues,which we feare at the Romans hands? But ſome will ſay, How if not? then we are made captiues: conſider what libertie we now haue.
D You will ſay it is the part of him that is valiant to kill himſelfe:nay truly,it is the part of a verie coward. For I think him to be a timorous ſeaman, who perceiuing a tempeſt comming; before it fall,ſinketh the ſhip wherin he is. Moreouer,it is againſt the law of nature, and the nature of all creatures to kill themſelues,and thereby we ſhould commit a hainous crime againſt God. There is no liuing creature that of his owne ſeeking would willingly die: for euery one feeleth in himſelfe the ſtrong & forcible law of Nature,wherby they deſire to liue:and for this cauſe we iudge them for our enemies,that ſeeke to take it from vs; and puniſh them that do take it indeed. And doe you thinke it is not a greater contempt of God for a man to deſpiſe his gift? For we of him receiued our firſt being,and from him let vs expect our ending. The body is mortall,framed of corruptible matter; but our ſoules are immortall, and there is a little part of God, placed in our E bodies. If any one abuſe that which another man putteth him in truſt with, preſently we thinke him a perfidious and wicked man:and ſhall we think that if we caſt away out of our bodies that which God hath put vs in truſt withal,and placed in the ſame,that he ſhal not know of it,whom we haue ſo abuſed? We hold thoſe ſlaues worthie to be puniſhed that run away from bad maſters: and ſhall not we then be held for impious,who flee from ſo good a maſter as God is? Doe ye not know that they,who according to the law of nature depart out of this life,and render that to God which they receiued of him,when he who gaue it requires it, ſhall leaue behind them a perpetuall name to their poſteritie and family? And that vnto thoſe ſoules who are obedient to their Creator when he cals them, he giues a holy and ſacred manſion in heauen, and from thence after a reuolution of the heauens, departing, are againe commanded to dwell in chaſte bodies?
F And that they who haue wrought their owne death, go vnto dark hell? and that God puniſheth this their offence vpon all their poſterity? Hence it is that God is diſpleaſed therewith, and it is forbidden by our moſt wiſe Lawmaker. For if any amongſt vs kill themſelues,it is decreed that till the ſun goe downe they ſhall be vnburied,yet we hold it lawfull to bury our enemies. Other nations cauſe their right hands to be cut off,who haue kild themſelues; iudging that as the ſoule thereby was made a ſtranger to the bodie, euen ſo by that fact was the hand made a ſtranger vnto it. Wherefore, O companions, thinke on that which is decent, and not to adde to our humane miſerie impietie againſt God who created vs. If we deſire to be ſaued, let vs ſaue our ſelues:

ſelues: for it is no diſgrace to receiue our liues at their hands who are witneſſes of ſo many valiant deeds of ours. If we deſire to die, let vs die by their hands who haue ouercome vs. I will not goe into my enemies campe to be a traitor againſt my ſelfe. For I beare not their minde who forſake their owne company to flee to their enemies: for they flee vnto them to ſaue their liues, but I go vnto them to worke mine owne death, euen the death of my ſelfe. And I would to God that the Romans would breake promiſe with me; for if they kill me after they haue promiſed to ſaue my life, I ſhall willingly die, and with great courage, hauing their breach of promiſe and periurie for a comfort of the laſt victorie.

Ioſeph is in great danger to bee ſlaine.

Ioſeph ſpake much to this effect, to diſſwade his companions from killing themſelues. But they ſtopping their eares with deſperation, wherewith they had armed themſelues to die, came furiouſly towards him with their ſwords drawne, vpbraiding him that he was a coward, and euery one was ready to ſtrike him. Then Ioſeph calling one by his name, and looking vpon another with a countenance like a Gouernour, holding anothers hand, and intreating the reſt (diſtracted in ſuch danger) at laſt eſcaped from being killed at that inſtant: for ſtill as one came neere him to ſtrike him, he turned his face vpon him like ſome cruell beaſt; and ſome of them who remembred how he had bin their Captaine in their extremitie, with reuerence of his perſonage trembled, ſo that their ſwords fell out of their hands: and many lifting vp their armes to ſtrike him, of their owne accord let their weapons fall. Ioſeph, notwithſtanding his deſperate eſtate, yet was he not void of counſell, but aſſiſted by Gods prouidence, he hazzarded his life, and ſpake vnto them as followeth: Seeing (quoth he) that yee are all determined to die, let vs caſt lots who ſhall kill one another; and he, to whom the lot falleth, ſhall be kild by him who next enſueth, and ſo the lot ſhall be caſt vpon euery one of vs, ſo that none of vs ſhall be forced to kill our ſelues. For it were iniuſtice, that when ſome of vs be ſlaine, the reſt ſhould repent themſelues, and ſo eſcape. They all liked well of this, and alwaies he vpon whom the lot fel, was ſlain by him that followed, as though they were now to die with their Captain: for death was more acceptable, becauſe they thought Ioſeph ſhould die with them. Now it hapned by the prouidence of God, that Ioſeph remained aliue only with one other, and then perſwaded him who was left aliue, to liue and not ſeek death, for feare the lot ſhould fall vpon himſelfe: and for that if he ſuruiued, he ſhould be polluted with the murther and ſlaughter of his owne nation. Thus Ioſeph, deliuered both from the wars of the Romans, and alſo of his owne nation, went with Nicanor vnto Veſpaſian.

Another policy of Ioſeph.

Ioſephs fellowes dye by lots, & Ioſeph and another are reſerued.

Ioſeph reſorteth to Veſpaſian with Nicanor.

All the Romans came about him to ſee him: and preſſing about their Generall, they made a great noiſe, ſome reioycing that he was taken, others crying out to puniſh him, others ſtriuing to come neere to behold him better: and they who were a far off, cryed out to kill their enemy: but thoſe who were neer him and beheld him, remembring his proweſſe, were aſtoniſhed to ſee that change. And there was no Captaine nor Ruler, but although before they were all moued againſt him, yet now beholding him, they all began to pitie him: and eſpecially Titus, who being of a gentle diſpoſition, admired Ioſephs valour, his conſtancie in aduerſitie, and his age, and thereby was moued to take compaſſion vpon him, remembring what a manner of man he had beene during the wars, and what he now was being fallen into his enemies hands: calling alſo to mind the force and power of fortune, and how ſmall a ſtay the chance of warres had, and that no humane affaires had any ſtay or hold in them; wherefore he drew many mens minds to pitie him, ſo that Titus was the chiefe author of Ioſephs life: yet Veſpaſian cauſed him to be carefully kept, as though he meant to ſend him to Cæſar. Which Ioſeph hearing, requeſted that he might ſpeake a word or two with him alone. Then all but his ſon Titus departing and two of his friends, Thou O Veſpaſian (quoth he) thinkeſt onely that thou haſt Ioſeph for thy captiue, but I am a meſſenger vnto thee of great matters from God, otherwiſe I knew my country lawes, and how it behoued the Generals of our nation to die, and not to be taken aliue by their enemies. Wilt thou ſend me to Nero? Wherefore? As though Nero ſhould liue ſtill, and thou not ſucceed him? Thou, O Veſpaſian art Cæſar, and the Emperour of Rome, and Titus alſo thy ſonne; and keepe me in bonds with thee, for thou art not onely my Lord, but Lord of all the world, and ſea, and land, and all mankind. And if I now faine theſe things in this ſtate that I am, of mine own mind againſt God, let me be reſerued vnto a greater puniſhment. After he had thus ſpoken, Veſpaſian gaue ſmall credit to his words, and onely thought that Ioſeph fained theſe things of himſelfe to ſaue his life: yet by little and little he began to giue credit vnto him, becauſe God put it in his mind to hope for the Empire: and foretelling his raigne by many ſignes and tokens, he alſo found Ioſeph to tell the truth in other matters. For one of Veſpaſians friends anſwered, that it was maruaile that he knowing that, could not prophecie the euent of the warres againſt Iotapata, and what was like to

So he commanded Ioſeph to be kept priſoner, yet did he giue him aparrell and diuers other things in moſt kinde manner: and Titus did greatly honour him. The fourth day of Iuly Veſpaſian returned vnto Ptolomais, and from thence he came into the ſea-coaſt vnto Cæſarea, which is the greateſt Citie of Iudæa, whoſe inhabitants are for the moſt part Greeks: ſo the inhabitants receiued the army and the Generall with all friendſhip poſſible, both
B for that they loued the Romans, as eſpecially alſo for that they hated them who were deſtroyed; ſo that many intreated Veſpaſian to put Ioſeph to death. But Veſpaſian, iudging this a raſh petition, would make no anſwer vnto it: and he left two legions to winter at Cæſarea; becauſe he ſaw it was a fit place, and ſent the tenth and fift vnto Scythopolis, becauſe hee would not ouer-charge Cæſarea with the whole army. This place is warme in winter, and exceeding hot in ſummer, by reaſon it is ſituate on a Plaine by the ſea-coaſt.

C IN the meane time, a great multitude being gathered together, who either were ſeditious perſons, or theeues, or ſuch as had eſcaped out of the ruinated cities, began to reedifie Ioppe for their refuge, which Ceſtius beforetime had deſtroyed: and ſeeing that they could not rob nor ſpoile the countrey which was already waſted, and left deſolate by warres, they purpoſed to become Pyrates: and ſo building ſhips for that purpoſe, they robbed the Phœnicians, Syrians and Egyptians, not ſuffering any to paſſe thoſe ſeas without danger. Veſpaſian vnderſtanding their intent, ſent horſemen and footmen thither: who finding the citie not guarded, got into it in the night time: which the inhabitants perceiuing were ſo affraid, that they durſt not make any reſiſtance to expell the Romanes, but they all retired themſelues vnto their ſhips, and there ſtaied all night, a flight-ſhot from the ſhoare. Ioppe is naturally no road for ſhips (for it is D ſituated vpon a turbulent ſhoare) and on euery ſide hath very high and eminent rockes, which trouble the ſeas, and make huge waues: in this place (if wee may beleeue the fable) one may ſee the ſignes of Andromedaes chaines. When the North winde blowes, it ſtriketh the waues againſt the rockes, and ſo cauſeth a dangerous ſea, that it were farre more ſafe to be in the midſt of the ſeas, then at that ſhoare when the ſame winde bloweth. The inhabitants of Ioppe rode there all night, and by breake of day the North winde began to blow fiercely, and draue ſome of the ſhips one againſt another, and others againſt the rockes: and many ſtriuing againſt winde and weather, and ſeeking to get into the midſt of the ſea for feare of the rocky ſhoare, and their enemies there, were drowned; and they that eſcaped, neither had any place of refuge, nor hope of ſafety; for the tempeſt did driue them from the Sea, and the Romanes from the Citie, ſo that E the ayre was filled with cries of the people expecting to be drowned, and with the noyſe and ſound of the ſhips beating one againſt another. So ſome of the inhabitants of Ioppe were ſwallowed by the waues, others ſuffered ſhipwracke, ſome killed themſelues rather then to be drowned: many with the waues were ſtricken againſt the rockes, ſo that the ſea was bloody, and all the ſhore was couered with dead bodies: and whoſoeuer eſcaped the ſea and got to ſhoare, the Roman ſouldiers there ready ſtanding, killed them. There were foure thouſand and two hundreth dead bodies caſt vpon the ſhoare. So the Romans hauing without any fight taken the City, they deſtroyed it: and thus was Ioppe taken, and twice deſtroyed by the Romans in a ſhort time. Veſpaſian builded there a Caſtle, and placed in it ſome few horſemen and footemen, to the end that F none of the Iewes ſhould come thither againe to play the Pyrats, and that the footemen might keep the Caſtle, and in the meane time the horſmen might go forth, and ſpoile all the towns and villages, and territories belonging to Ioppe: which alſo they did. When the newes of the deſtruction of Iotapata was brought vnto Ieruſalem, many gaue ſmall credit to it, partly for the greatneſſe of that calamitie, partly for that no one man could ſay, that hee had ſeene the deſtruction of the city: for none eſcaped that maſſacre to bring newes, but only report therof was ſpred abroad; but at the laſt it was verified to be true by thoſe that dwelt neere vnto that place, and then they beleeued it. Many things alſo which were falſe, were reported as true. It was likewiſe bruted, that Ioſeph was ſlaine in the deſtruction of the city, for whoſe death all Ieruſalem ſorrowed, and euery one mourned for their loſt kinred; all bewailed the ſuppoſed death of the Generall, and ſome of their ſonnes, others of their brethren and kinsfolke, and others of their acquaintance. They all mourned for Ioſeph thirty daies, and hired many muſicians to ſing funerall ſongs for him. At laſt, truth diſcouered it ſelfe, and the true newes of the deſtruction of Iotapata with the accidents there: alſo how Ioſeph was not ſlaine, but liued with the Romans, and that the Romans honoured him with more then a captiue could expect. Then the Iewes began as much to hate him now liuing, as before they mourned for him when they ſuppoſed him dead. And ſome ſaid he was a coward, others that he was a traitor vnto his countrey, and the whole citie breathed out reproachfull ſpeeches againſt him. Theſe heauie tydings encreaſed their rage, and this their aduerſitie (which vnto wiſe men had bin a warning to prouide leſt the like befell them) made them more outragious; ſo that alwaies the end of one miſchiefe was the beginning of another. To be ſhort, now they were more incenſed againſt the Romans then before, as it were that they might alſo be reuenged of Ioſeph. And this was the eſtate of the Citizens of Ieruſalem.

Veſpaſian commeth vnto Aprippas Kingdom and recreateth himſelf there, and feaſteth twenty dayes.

Veſpaſian was deſirous to ſee the Kingndome of Agrippa (for the King had intreated him to go thither, partly to feaſt him and his whole army, partly to repreſſe ſome troubles ariſing in his Kingdome, in the time of his abſence) and ſo departed from Cæſarea vpon the ſea-coaſt, and went vnto Cæſarea Philippi, where he ſtaied, and refreſhed his ſouldiers twentie daies; and himſelfe alſo feaſted, giuing God thankes for his proſperous ſucceſſe in the warres. This done, he had intelligence that Tiberias and Tarichea were reuolted (both which cities belonged vnto Agrippa his kingdom) and fully determining vtterly to deſtroy the Iewes which inhabited thereabouts, he thought it good to lead his army againſt theſe two places, eſpecially that hee might reward Agrippa for his good entertainement, by ſurrendring theſe cities vnto him. Wherefore hee ſent his ſonne Titus to Cæſarea to bring the ſouldiers there vnto Scythopolis, which was the greateſt of all the ten cities, which alſo is neere vnto Tiberias; whither himſelfe being come, he expected his ſonnes comming: and departing from thence with three legions, he pitched his tent in a place called Enabris, where the ſeditious people of Tiberias might behold his army; this place was thirty furlongs from Tiberias: from thence he ſent Valerianus the Decadarch to entreat a peace with them, and ſent fifty horſemen to accompany him: for he vnderſtood that the people deſired peace, and againſt their will were forced to warre, by ſome of the ſeditious amongſt them. Valerianus comming neere the citie wals, lighted from his horſe; commanding all his company to doe the like, that they of Tiberias might not thinke that they came to fight, but in peaceable manner: but before he ſpake any one word, the boldeſt and ſtrongeſt of the ſeditious perſons came out armed againſt him, hauing one Ieſus the ſonne of Tobias, who had beene a captaine of theeues, for their Gouernour and leader. Valerianus not preſuming to fight without authority from his Generall, although he had been certaine of the victory; againe conſidering that it was great danger for ſo few to fight againſt a whole multitude, and withall terrified with the boldnes of the Iewes, contrary to his expectarion; he fled on foot accompanied only with fiue other, leauing his horſe and the reſt behinde him, whom Ieſus and his followers took, and brought into the citie, reioucing as though they had taken them in fight, and not by treaſon. But the Senators and chiefe of the citie, fearing what might enſue of this fact, went vnto the Romans, and together with King Agrippa came vnto Veſpaſian, and proſtrated themſelues at his feet, beſeeching him not to deſpiſe them, and not to thinke that the whole city were partakers with thoſe few wicked perſons, that ſo had merited his diſpleaſure; requeſting him to ſpare the people who alwaies had honoured the Romans, but rather that he ſhould puniſh the authors of that reuolt and miſdemeanour: who alſo had withheld the whole Citie, euen vntill now, to yeeld it ſelfe vnto the Romans, Veſpaſian moued by their entreaties, pardoned the Citie, though he was incited againſt them all for taking of Valerianus his horſe; in that he perceiued Agrippa was ſorrowfull, fot feare that the City ſhould bee deſtroyed, and ſo by them Veſpaſian promiſed the towneſ-men pardon. Then Ieſus and his aſſociates thinking it not ſafe for them to abide there, fled vnto Tarichea. The next day, Veſpaſian ſent before him Traianus with certaine horſemen into the Caſtle, to ſee if all the multitude deſired peace: and finding the people to beare peaceable mindes, he with his whole army came vnto the Citie. And the inhabitants opening the gates of their

The citizens of Tiberias proſtrate themſelues before Veſpaſian and obtaine pardon.

A their citie, went to meet him with great ioy, all crying out that he was the author of their welfare and benefactor, and wishing him all prosperity and felicitie. The gates of the city were narrow, so that the army could not quickly enter in: wherefore Vespasian commanded a part of the wall on the south side to be pulled downe, and so entred in: yet did he not sacke the citie, nor ruine the wals, for Agrippaes sake, who promised that from thenceforth the citizens would bee quiet. And so he pacified the citie greatly troubled with sedition.

Chap. XVII.

How Tarichæa was besieged.

Vespasian departed from Tiberias, and pitched his tents betwixt it and Tarichea, and encamped himselfe; foreseeing that there he should haue some trouble and long abode: for all rebels that desired warre came thither, trusting both to the strength of the Citie, and the lake adioyning vnto it called Genesar. For this Citie was situate like Tiberias, vnder the mountaines: and Ioseph had enclozed it with a wall on euery side, where it was not compassed by the lake. But the wall though it were strong, yet was it not so strong as that of Tiberias: for Ioseph builded that in the beginning of the rebellion, hauing men and money at will; but that of Tarichea was built onely by the remainder of his liberality. The Taricheans had great store of ships in the lake adioyning, to the end that if they were ouercome by land, they might flie by C water: and therefore they had prepared their ships for battell by water if need should be. Whilest the Romans entrenched themselues, Iesus & his followers not dismaied either with the multitude or militarie discipline of his enemies, issued out of the citie, and slew the workemen, and destroied a part of the worke: and perceiuing the Romans armed and assembled together against him, he fled againe vnto his companie without any losse or harme receiued. But the Romans pursued them so fast, that they forced them to take their ships: & so being gone as far from the shore, as that yet they might easily reach them with the shot of an arrow, they cast anchor and disposed their ships in warlike maner, and fought against the Romans who were on shore. Vespasian vnderstood that a great multitude of them were gathered together in a place neer vnto the city: wherefore he sent his son Titus against them with 600. horsmen, who finding the number of his ene- D mies to be infinite, certified his father, that he needed more forces: and perceiuing many of those horsmen of good courage, before any more aide came, and yet that some of them were afraid of the Iewes; he stood in a high place where all might heare him, and said, O ye Romans, I will first put you in mind who you are and of what nation, that so you considering what your selues are, may also consider who they are with whom we are to fight; neuer yet was there any enemy in any part of the world that could escape our hands. The Iewes themselues though already ouercome, yet doe they endure and manfully beare out their misery: if therefore they constantly endure wars, and fight valiantly being in aduersity; what should we doe who are in prosperity? I reioyce to see you shew good countenance, yet I feare lest so huge a multitude of our enemies discourage some of you: let euery one therefore once againe consider, who himselfe is, and with E whom he is to fight: and that although the Iewes be bold and valiant enough, yet they obserue no warlike order, and are vnarmed, and so are more fitly tearmed a multitude then an army. I need not speake of your knowledge and skill in wars: nay for this only cause are we trained vp in warlike discipline in the time of peace, to the end that our number should answer to the number of our enemies when we are to ioyne battell: for what fruite shall we shew of this our perpetuall warlike order & discipline, if we dare only fight with a rude multitude that are no more in number then our selues? Thinke that you being armed are to fight with vnarmed, and being horsmen are to fight with footmen, and being guided by the aduice of a Captain, with them who haue no head nor ruler: and that these things considered, doe supply in vs the want of more men, and the contrary in our enemies doth as it were much diminish their number. Victorie doth not onely F consist in the multitude of men, be they neuer so warlike, but also in a few, if they be valiant: for as they are few, so are they easily guided, and may easily come to helpe one another, not being pestered; whereas huge multitudes doe more hinder one another then doe good, and doe themselues more harme then their enemies. So the Iewes are led with desperation, rage & fury, which indeed in prosperous successe are of some force, but in a desperate fortune they are quickely daunted: but we are led by vertue and obedience and fortitude, which both are of force in prosperitie, and also are good in aduersitie. Moreouer, we haue greater occasion to fight then the Iewes haue: for they fight only for their country and liberty, but we fight for renowne and Empire;

pire; that we haue already gained the Empire of the whole world, it might not be thought that our enemies the Iewes were aduerſaries able to match vs. Conſider moreouer, that ye need not feare any great danger, for we haue many to help vs; and that hard by: let vs therefore atchieue the victory before any more ſuccour come vnto vs; ſo ſhall our credit be greater, and our victory more famous. I verily thinke that now triall is made of me, my father, and you; to diſcerne if he be my father, I his ſon, and you my ſouldiers: for he is wont to be victorious, and ſhall I returne vnto him being conquered? and are you not aſhamed to be diſmaied, ſeeing that I your Captain will offer my ſelfe and vndergoe the greateſt perils? My ſelfe will beare the brunt of the enemies, and firſt encounter with them, and let none of you depart from me: perſwade your ſelues that God will aſſiſt my force, and boldly preſume that we can do much more being in the midſt of our enemies, then if we ſhould only fight without and not be amongſt them.

It becõmeth ſouldiers to obey their Captaine.

Titus hauing thus ſpoken, as it were by Gods prouidence, all his ſouldiers took heart and courage, ſo that now they were ſorry to ſee Traianus come with 400. horſmen more before the fight was begun, as though their victory ſhould be leſſe renowned, becauſe he came to helpe them. Veſpaſian alſo ſent Antonius and Silo with 2000. archers, to take the mountaine that was iuſt oppoſite vnto the towne, and to beate them that defended the City, off from the wals: and they did as they were commanded. Then Titus with all force poſſible, firſt ruſhed with his horſe vpon the enemies: and all followed him with a huge cry, ſcattering themſelues in ſuch order as they occupied as much ground as the Iewes, and ſo appeared more then they were. The Iewes though terrified by their diſcipline, yet they withſtood the firſt aſſault: but in the end diſmaied, and put out of order with their lances, and killed with the horſmen, euery one fled as faſt as he could into the Citie. And Titus killed ſome as they fled, others as he met them, and thoſe he ouertooke, and many one for haſte tumbling one vpon another; and he preuented all that fled vnto the wals, and draue them backe againe into the field, till at laſt the multitude preuailed, and ſo they got into the Citie. Now at their returne into the City, there befell a great diſſenſion: for the inhabitants conſidering their owne eſtate, and the euent of all former warres, and eſpecially of this laſt fight, miſliked of warre, and deſired peace: but the ſtrangers that had fled from other places thither, and were in great multitudes, would needs contend therein; and ſo one part began a mutinie againſt the other, as though they would preſently one haue taken armes againſt another. Titus being not farre from the wall, heard theſe tumults within the Citie, and cried out vnto the Romans; This is the houre (fellow ſouldiers) wherein God hath giuen the Iewes into our hands: why doe we deferre the time any longer? why doe we not take the victory offered? doe you not heare the cries within? they who eſcaped our hands, are at variance amongſt themſelues: the city is ours, if we make haſte; and making haſte, take courage: for nothing worth renowne can be atchieued without danger: and let vs not only preuent our enemies concord which neceſſity will ſoone effect, but alſo our owne forces before any freſh aide come vnto vs; that beſide the victory we haue, being ſo few ouer ſo huge a multitude, we may alſo diuide the ſpoile of the citie among vs. No ſooner had he thus ſpoken, but preſently he mounted vpon his horſe, and rode into the lake, and ſo paſſed into the Citie, and all the ſouldiers followed him. They that defended the wals, were amazed at his boldnes, ſo that none made reſiſtance againſt him as he came: but Ieſus with his followers leauing his quarter which was his to defend, fled into the fields, others flying towards the lake, fell into their enemies hands, who came that way againſt him, and ſo were maſſacred euen as they were getting into their ſhips: otherſome were ſlaine as they did ſwim to ouertake the ſhips that were new launcht from the ſhore: and there was a great ſlaughter of men all ouer the City. For the ſtrangers that fled not, made reſiſtance, and the towneſ-men did not offer to defend themſelues; for they abſtained from fight, hoping for pardon in that they were not againſt thoſe proceedings: till at laſt Titus hauing ſlaine the wicked, tooke compaſſion vpon the towneſ-men and ſaued their liues, and cauſed the ſlaughter to ceaſe. They who fled into the lake, ſeeing the city euen taken, ran away as farre as they could from their enemies. Titus ſent horſmen to let his father vnderſtand what he had done. Whereof he hauing intelligence, being very glad for his ſons valour and magnanimity, and for the atchieuing of ſuch a victory, wherby a great part of thoſe warres was ended, he commanded the City to be guarded preſently round about, to the intent that none might eſcape away aliue. And the next day he came downe vnto the lake, and commanded ſhips to be built to purſue thoſe that had eſcaped by it: and hauing many workemen and great ſtore of matter to build them withall, his command was preſently effected.

Of the lake of Genezar, and the fountaine of Iordan.

The yeere of the world, 4031. after Christs birth, 69.

THe lake of Genezar taketh his name from the countrey adioyning vnto it, the breadth thereof is forty furlongs, the length a hundreth. The water of this lake is ſweet and good to drinke, and is more ſubtill then ordinarily pure water of mariſh places are, and it is very cleere neere the ſhoare, and more temperate to drinke, then either that of the riuer or fountaine, but it is alwaies more cold then one would iudge ſuch a lake to be of that largenes: for the water being ſet in the ſunne, doth not loſe his coldnes: which the inhabitants haue vſed to doe in ſummer euenings to allay the naturall coldnes thereof. There are here many ſorts of fiſhes nothing like to fiſhes of other places, either in ſhape or taſte. The riuer Iordan paſſeth thorow the midſt of it. It is thought that Panium is the head and fountain of Iordan, but in truth it hath his original from Phiala, and from thence paſſeth vnder the ground: this place is a hundreth and thirty furlongs from Cæſarea, towards that way which leades vnto Trachon on the right hand. This water is called Phiala, by reaſon of his roundnes: for it is as round as a wheele, and the water ſtill keepeth within the brink of Phiala, neuer encreaſing or diminiſhing; and no man knew that this was the head of Iordan, til Philip the Tetrarch of Trachon found it to be ſo: for he caſting ſtraws into Phiala, found them afterward carried vnto Panium, which before that time was thought to be the fountaine of Iordan. Panium, though it be naturally beautified, yet by Agrippa his coſt and charges it was much more adorned. Iordan beginneth with a deep riuer out of this denne, and paſſeth along the mariſh places, and durty lake of Semechonitis, and from thence 120. furlongs vnto the city of Iulia, and in the way diuideth the lake Genezar, and paſſing a great way further into the wildernes, at laſt it endeth in the lake called Aſphaltites. Vpon the lake Genezar there bordereth a countrey of the ſame name, naturally beautifull and admirable: for there is no kind of plant which groweth not there, and the inhabitants haue repleniſhed it with plants and trees of all ſorts, and the temperature of the aire well agreeth with ſo diuers trees; for there are an infinite company of Nut-trees, which of all trees eſpecially require a cold ſoile: there are alſo abundance of Palmes, which deſire great heat: likewiſe great ſtore of figges and oliues, which require a temperate aire: ſo that one may iuſtly ſay, that through the bounty of nature, ſo different and oppoſite qualities are here in one vnited; and at one time, as it were, all difference of ſeaſons of the yeere conioyned for good purpoſe. And it doth not onely nouriſh theſe fruits, but alſo conſerueth them for ten whole moneths: there grow figs and grapes; which two one may well call the kings of fruits, all other fruits continue all the yeere long. For beſide the temperature of the aire, it is alſo wattered by a fertile fountaine called Capernaum: many thinke it to be an arme of Nilus, becauſe it hath fiſhes like a Corbe bred in a lake neere Alexandria. The length of this countrey along the lake bearing the ſame name, is thirty furlongs, and the breadth twenty. And this is the name of the lake Genezar, and the countrey about it.

How the Taricheans were deſtroyed.

VEſpaſian hauing finiſhed his ſhips, and furniſht them with as many men as he thought ſufficed againſt them whom he was to purſue, he embarked vpon the lake, and himſelfe alſo went againſt them. The Taricheans could not poſſibly make any eſcape by land, although they would, and were not able to fight hand to hand with the Romanes, for their ſmall pyrat boats were not able to withſtand their enemies great veſſels; and beſide that, they were not ſufficiently manned, ſo that they feared to encounter with the Romanes who preſſed all together vpon them: yet notwithſtanding ſomerime they came about the Roman ſhips, and caſt ſtones at the Romans afar off, and ſometime alſo came neere, and skirmiſhed with them: yet they themſelues alwaies had more harme then the Romans; for their ſtones which they caſt did only rattle againſt the Romans armour, but hurt them not, and they were killed by the Romans arrowes: and if at any time they were ſo bold as to come neere the Romans, they were ſlain before that they could doe them any harme, or elſe drowned with their boats. And as many as attempted to wound the Romans, were ſlaine with Iauelins, and other with ſwords, the Romans leaping into their boats; and many were taken with their boats, the ſhips meeting one another. They that were in the water and did lift vp their heads to ſwim, were preuented with arrows, or ouertaken with Roman boats: and if in desperation they came swimming towards their enemies, their hands or heads were presently cut off. And thus some perished one way, some another, till at last they fled, and arriued vpon the shore, their ships being compassed round about. So the Romans kild many vpon the lake, and many vpon the land, and one might then haue seen all the lake stained with blood full of dead bodies, for not one escaped aliue. A few dayes after in that countrey there was a very odious stinch, and a horrible spectacle: for the shores were all full of boats that had suffered shipwracke, and dead bodies swollen in the water: and those dead bodies taking heat, did putrifie and so corrupt the aire all about, that not onely the whole countrey and inhabitants thought it a miserable affliction, but also the Romans who were the authors thereof. And this was the end of that warre by water. And the number of them that were slain here in the citie, was 6500. The fight being ended, Vespasian sate in a tribunall seate, and separated the strangers from the inhabitants, for that they seemed to be the authors of that warre: yet he deliberated with the Captaines and Gouernours, whether he should likewise pardon them: but they told him that their liues might endomage him; for said they, if thou send those men away and let them liue, they cannot liue peaceably, because they want abiding places; and are able to disturbe and disquiet those to whom they shall flie. Vespasian for this cause iudged them vnworthy to liue; assuredly knowing that if they were let go, they would fight against them who pardoned their liues, yet he deliberated what death to put them to. But he thought with himself the inhabitants would not patiently abide so many to be massacred, who had fled vnto them for succour: wherefore he sought to vse no violence vnto them, because he had promised them securitie. But at last he was ouercome by the perswasion of his friends, who told him that all things against the Iewes were lawfull, and that profit was to be preferred before honesty, seeing both could not be had: so licence being granted vnto them to depart, they suspecting nothing, were commanded to take onely that way that leadeth vnto Tiberias: and they fearing nothing, willingly obeyed that which was commanded them, not misdoubting the safety of their goods or money: but the Romans had placed themselues on euery side the way euen vnto Tiberias, to the intent that none might escape, and so shut them all in the city. Presently after came Vespasian and inclozed them all in an Amphitheater, and so killed 1200. of them, who were all old men or young, and vnable for seruice: of the rest that were all strong young men, he sent 6000. vnto Nero at Isthmos neere Corinth. The rest of the multitude he sold, in number 30400. beside others that he gaue vnto Agrippa: for he permitted him to doe what he would with those sort that were of his kingdome: But Agrippa sold also those that were giuen him. The rest of them were fugitiues and seditious persons of Trachon, Gaulanitis, and Hippenis, and many of Gadara, whose contempt of peace iustly procured these wars. They were taken the sixt of the Ides of September.

How Gamala was beſieged.

The yeere of the world, 4031. after Chriſts birth, 69.

AFter that Tarichea was conquered, all thoſe that from the time that Iotapata was ſurprized till this inſtant, had reuolted from the Romanes, did now againe vnite themſelues vnto them: ſo that the Romanes had now gotten into their hands all Caſtles and Townes, Giſcala onely excepted, and Itaburium, a mountaine ſo called. With theſe two rebelled Gamala, a towne ouer againſt Tarichea, and ſituate vpon the lake, belonging to the kingdom of Agrippa, and alſo Sogane and Seleucia: and theſe two laſt were both belonging to Gaulanitis, and Sogane appertained to the higher part called Gaulana, and Gamala vnto the lower, Seleucia vnto the lake Semechonitis, which is thirtie furlongs in breadth, and threeſcore large, whoſe mariſhes reach euen vnto Daphne, which countrey is very pleaſant of it ſelfe, and famous for that it entertaineth the ſtreame called little Iordan, and at the foot of the golden mountaine doth deriue it into the great Iordan. Agrippa, in the beginning of the rebellion, vnited Sogane and Seleucia vnto himſelfe: but Gamala, by reaſon of the ſituation apt to reſiſt, did not yeeld vnto him, for it is farre ſtronger then Iotapata. For, from an exceeding high mountaine, there deſcendeth a hill very difficult for any to paſſe, riſing high in the midſt, and then deſcendeth lower and lower both before and behinde, ſo that it repreſenteth the figure of a Camell, which the Hebrews call Gamal, & ſo thereof it tooke the name, though the inhabitants doe not keepe the exact ſignification. Before it, and on either ſide there are deepe vallies, into the which a man can hardly deſcend, onely it may be taken and aſſaulted on that ſide where it ioyneth vnto the mountaine, which alſo the inhabitants haue made inacceſſible, by cutting out there a deepe ditch. In that place the Citie was very well inhabited on the deſcent of the hill, and towards the South part it ſtood on ſo ſteepe a hill, that it ſeemed as if it would haue falne euery houre, and the South hill ſerued the inhabitants in ſtead of a Caſtle, being vnwald: for it was an exceeding high rocke, and reached downe euen to the bottome of the valley in the towne, and at the walles thereof there was a fountaine. Although this Citie were of his owne nature inuincible, yet Ioſeph compaſſing it with a wall, and with ditches and mines, made it ſtronger. Wherefore the inhabitants of this place put farre more confidence in their walles then they of Iotapata did; yet were they fewer in number, and not ſo warlike people as they; but for the ſituation of the Citie, they eſteeemed themſelues more then their enemies: for the City was full of men that fled thither by reaſon of the ſtrength of the place: ſo that for ſeuen moneths they reſiſted them that were ſent by Agrippa to beſiege them. Veſpaſian departed from Ammaus, and pitched his tents before Tiberias, and ſo went vnto Gamala, (Ammaus is interpreted hote waters, for there is a fountaine of hot water which cureth many diſeaſes) and the Citie was ſo ſituate, that hee could not beſiege it round about: wherefore he placed men to keepe watch in ſuch places as it was paſſable, and obtained the higheſt mountaine, where his ſouldiers pitching their tents, laſtly, entrenched themſelues. On the Eaſt-part of the citie in the moſt eminent place there was a caſtle, where the fifteenth and fift legions laboured againſt the towne, and the tenth legion filled vp the ditches and vallies. King Agrippa went vnto the walles, and ſpake vnto them that defended them, willing them to yeeld to the Romanes: but one of them with a ſling ſtrooke him on the right arme, and hurt him, and his familiar friends came about him to defend him. Then the Romanes, for anger that the King was hurt, and for feare of ſuch miſchances to themſelues, now became earneſt to aſſault the towne, perſwading themſelues that they would vſe ſtrangers and their enemies hardly, if it lay in their lot, ſeeing they had ſo euill entreated one of their owne nation, for perſwading them vnto what was profitable for them.

Hauing quickly intrenched themſelues by reaſon of the multitude that laboured in that buſineſſe, and by reaſon that they were accuſtomed to ſuch like worke, they began to place the engines againſt the towne wals. Chares and Ioſeph were two of the moſt potent men in the towne: they therefore animated and armed their Citizens, and brought them vnto the wals, who trembled for feare. And although they well perceiued that the citie could not long hold out, ſeeing they wanted water, and many other things neceſſary to withſtand a ſiege; yet notwithſtanding, they exhorted the townesmen to be valiant, and ſo brought them vnto the walles, and a while they reſiſted, notwithſtanding the ſhot: but at laſt, they were therewith ſo terrified, that leauing the wals, they fled into the city. Then the Romans did batter the wals with Rams in three ſeuerall rall places, and where the wall fell, there they issued in with trumpets and a great noise, and cries, and fought with the townsmen, who in the first conflict so valiantly resisted them, that they permitted them not to enter any further into the towne. At last being ouercome both in strength and number, they all fled into the highest part of the city, and from thence they turned againe vpon the Romans, who pursued them, and draue them downe into the vallies, and kild many, and diuers in that straight passage were troden to death by their fellowes. The Romanes, seeing that they neither could flee, nor resist their enemies aboue their heads, fled into their houses, which adioyned vnto the Plaine, and so filled them, that being ouercharged, they fell down, and lighted vpon other houses beneath them, which did beare them downe also, and they likewise others situated beneath them. Many of the Romanes this way perished; for being amazed, and not knowing what to doe, they fled into their houses, notwithstanding they did see them shake and totter: and many seeking to escape, were maymed by some part of the ruines that fell vpon their bodies, and many were choaked in the dust. The citizens of Gamala reioyced thereat, thinking that this ayde was sent from God: and not regarding their priuate commodities, they ceased not to compell the Romanes into their houses; and if any were in the narrow streets, them they slew with darts from aboue out of the high places. Thus the ruines afforded them stones enow, and their slaine enemies swords and armour, which they tooke from them, being now halfe dead, and vsed them against themselues: many dyed, who cast themselues headlong from off the houses being ready to fall, and those that sought to flee could not easily escape; for being ignorant of the wayes, and there being such a dust that one could not see another, one of them killed another: and so with much adoe finding passage, they went out of the citie.

The Romans fall down with the ruines of the Iewes houses.

Many Romanes slaine and spoyled.

Vespasians fortitude and warlike valour.

Vespasian, who was alwayes among the midst of these hurlyburlies, was greatly moued to see the buildings fall so vpon his souldiers: and forgetting his owne safetie, he secretly retired himselfe with onely a few into the higher part of the citie, where he was left in great danger, hauing very few about him (for Titus his son was not there, being before this time sent vnto Mutianus in Syria) and now he could not flee safely, nor yet had it bin for his honour, if he could. Wherefore remembring all that he had done euen from his child-hood, and his owne vertue, he encouraged his men, and with them ioyned armes, and couered themselues with their shields; and so as it were mooued with some diuine motion, defended themselues from all darts, arrowes and stones, which were cast from aloft vpon them, and so remained there, not terrified either by the number or might of his enemies, till at last, they wondring at his diuine vertue and courage, asswaged their fury. And now perceiuing his enemies to assault him but faintly, he retired backe, till at such time as he got without the citie walles.

Vespasians fight with the Iewes.

Many Romanes perished in that fight, and amongst the rest, Ebutius a Decadarch, who not onely in that fight shewed himselfe valiant, but also in many wars before, and had done the Iews much harme. Also in that fight a certaine Centurion, named Gallus, accompanied with ten souldiers, hid himselfe in a house, and at supper time he heard the people of that house talk, what the citizens of Gamala were purposed to do against the Romanes (this Gallus & they with him were Syrians) and in the night time he slew them all, and after escaped safe vnto the Romans. Vespasian perceiued all his army sorrowfull for that mischance, and so much the more, for that they neuer as yet had so bad a breakfast, and especially, for that they had forsaken their Generall, and left him in danger and distresse: wherefore he thought it good to comfort them, nothing speaking concerning himselfe, lest he should seeme to finde fault with some in the beginning of his speech. Wherefore he told them, that it behooued them patiently to abide that which was common to all men, affirming that there was no victory without bloodshed, and that fortune was mutable: and that he had already slain many thousand Iewes, and now had paid a small bribe for his happy successe vnto aduerse fortune. And that as it did not become any but vaine-glorious people to boast in their prosperitie, so it behooued none but cowards to feare and tremble in aduersitie: For, said he, fortune is very mutable both to the good and bad, and he is a valiant man that is not mooued by aduersitie: for he, hauing all his wits about him, can euen in the midst of his troubles see where any fault is, and amend it. Yet (quoth he) this hath not befalne vs through the weakenesse of our courage, or the valour and prowesse of the Iewes, but the difficultie of the place was the cause that they should ouercome vs, and we be ouercome. Wherefore one may well reprehend the too much rashnesse of your spirits: for when you saw your enemies flee into the higher places, you should then haue held your hands, and not to haue pursued them with so manifest danger to your selues, as euery one might foresee in this pursuit; so you hauing gained the lower part of the citie, you might in time haue drawne them to a sure and safe conflict: but but you, being eager of the victory, did not respect your own safety. It is not the manner of the Romans rashly and vnaduisedly to fight, who are wont to do all things orderly and aduisedly: for the other is fit for barbarous people, and as you see proper to the Iewes. Wherefore, let vs call our owne vertues to mind, and rather be angry for this that hath hapned (and so incite our selues to reuenge) then sorrowfull. And let euery valiant souldier with his owne hand comfort himselfe; so shall we both reuenge the death of our friends, and be reueng'd of them by whom they were slaine: and I my selfe (as also now I did) will expose my selfe to all dangers with you, and go first to fight, and come last from fight. With these and such like speeches he comforted his souldiers.

The Romane souldiers doe all things with discretion.

The people of Gamala were of great courage, and much emboldened with their prosperous successe, which notwithstanding did not happen through their valour: but presently perceiuing that now all hope of pardon was taken away, and that there was no way to escape, they were very sorrowfull, and their hearts relented (for now victuals failed them) yet they omitted not to prouide for their owne safety wherein they could; for the most valiant among them kept the breach, and the rest, other strong places about the walles which were yet vnbattered. The Romanes againe built mounts, and attempted to assault the Citie, and many of the Citizens fled by the vallies where no guard was, and by secret vaults vnderneath the ground; and they who for feare lest they should bee taken remained in the Citie, perished for hunger: for all the victuals were reserued for them that fought. And they still continued in this calamitie.

The Romanes once more attempt the assault of Gamala.

CHAP. II.

How PLACIDVS tooke the mountaine Itaburium.

DVring this siege, Vespasian made another expedition against them that kept the mountaine Itaburium, situate betweene the great field and Scythopolis, which is 30. furlongs high, and inaccessible on the north side. In the very top of this mountaine there is a Plaine 20. furlongs ouer, enclosed with a wall; all which wall being of so huge a compasse, Ioseph had built in 40. daies: they receiued all necessary prouision from beneath, for they had onely raine water. Vnto this place a huge multitude were gathered, and Vespasian sent Placidus against them with 600. horsemen, who could no waies get vpon the mountaine: wherefore he exhorted many of them to peace, putting them in hope of pardon: likewise many of the Iewes came downe vnto him, as it were to entrap him, and assault him at vnawares. Placidus for the nonce gaue them faire speeches, hoping to get them downe into the Plaine: so they, as though they would haue obeyed him, followed him thither, meaning when they came there, suddenly to assault him: yet Placidus his deuice tooke place. For when the Iewes assaulted him, he fained himselfe to flee, and the Iewes hauing pursued him a great way from the mountaine, hee turned againe vpon them, and wounded many on the backs as they fled, and killed some, and hindred the rest of the multitude from ascending the mountaine: so the rest left Itaburium, and fled vnto Ierusalem, and the inhabitants (now water failing them) yeelded to Placidus, and deliuered the mountaine vnto him.

How Gamala was destroyed.

NOvv the most presumptuous among the Gamalians fled and hid themselues, and the weaker sort did perish through famine: yet the most courageous that were left among them, defended the wall till the 27. day of October. Vpon which day, three souldiers of the fifteenth Legion, towards breake of the day, vndermined the highest tower in their quarter, and entred into it; those that kept it, neither perceiuing them when they came in, nor when they went out, (for it was in the night time.) These souldiers being wary lest any noise should be made, remooued fiue of the greatest stones, and presently leapt away, and incontinently the tower fell with a hideous noise, and with the fall kild those that kept it, and many that kept watch in those quarters fled, being sore afraid: and they who sought to escape the Romans, were killed, amongst whom one Ioseph was strooken with a dart from a part of the wall that was falne downe, and there dyed. They who were within the city were terrified with the noise hereof, and ranne vp and downe as though all the enemies were already entred into it. And Chares, Iosephs companion, being sicke, yeelded vp the ghost, feare encreasing his disease, and helping to shorten shorten his life. The Romanes, remembring the bad successe at the last assault, did not enter the Citie till the 23. day of the foresaid moneth.

Titus with a hundred horse besides chosen footmen, entreth Gamala

Then Titus, as it were vexed at the misfortune of the Romanes in his absence, accompanied with 200. horsemen, and certaine chosen footemen, entered the City, no man resisting him: and he being passed into the same, the watchmen then first perceiuing it, cried, To armes. Those within the Citie fearing that Titus was entred, some tooke their children, some their wiues, and fled into the Castle with pitifull cries and weeping: others met Titus, and were all put to the sword: and they that could not get into the Castle, not knowing what to doe, fell among the Romane watchmen: then the skies were fild with the cries of men dying, and the lower places of the city flowed with blood. Vespasian led his whole army against those that fled into the castle, which was of a huge height, and scarcely to bee come vnto, being all of stone, and full of ditches and deepe dens, and compassed with steepy rockes: so the Iewes did driue downe the Romanes that offered to come vp vnto them, partly with darts, partly with stones, which they rouled down vpon them; and they were so high, that the Romanes arrowes could not reach them. But at last, as it were by Gods prouidence, who would haue it, a whirlewinde arose, which carried the Romanes arrowes amongst them into the castle, and the Iewes arrowes from the Romans, and the wind was so violent, that it was not possible for them to stand vpon those high places; and so not being able to stand, nor to see those that came against them, the Romans ascended and took the castle; some resisting for their defence, others yeelding themselues. The Romanes now call'd to minde their fellowes that perished in the first assault, and so became more cruell. Many despairing of their liues, cast their wiues, their children, and themselues headlong downe those high places, into the deepe vallies vnderneath. So that the cruelty that the Romanes shewed against the people of Gamala, was not so great as that which they vsed against themselues: for there were onely 4000. that perisht by the Romans sword; and the number of them who so cast themselues downe, was found to be 5000. and not one escaped, but two women that were sisters, and daughters to Philip, who was son to Ioachimus, a worthy man, and Gouernor ouer all Agrippas army vnder him; and these two were saued onely, because at such time as the city was taken, they hid themselues; for they spared not infants, but many took them and cast them downe from the castle. And thus was Gamala destroyed the 23. day of October, which began to rebell the 21. day of September.

How TITVS tooke Giscala.

The yeere of the world, 4032. after Christs birth, 70.

NOw all the cities and strong places of Galilee were taken, Giscala onely excepted: the inhabitants whereof desired peace, for that they were husbandmen, and their riches consisted in the fruites of the earth; but there were many theeues in the city: to which vice also many of the Citizens were addicted. The people were incited to rebell by one Iohn, a witch; and a deceitfull person, sonne to one Leuias; who was of strange manners, and bold to presume any thing, and wonderfully atchieuing all he tooke in hand, and he was knowne to all men for one that desired warre to make himselfe mighty. This man was Ringleader of the seditious persons in Giscala: and for feare of them, the people, who perhaps otherwise would haue sent Legates to the Romanes to request peace, were hindred and forced to stay, till the Romanes came to warre against them. Against these people Vespasian sent Titus, and with him a thousand horsemen; and the tenth legion toward Scythopolis: and he with the rest went to Cæsarea, to refresh them after their great labour, at the charge of the townes adioyning; iudging it necessary to comfort their bodies, and encourage their mindes to sustaine manfully the wars that were to ensue: for he foresaw that he should haue much adoo to win Ierusalem, both for that it was wont to be the Kings seat, and also because it was the chiefe and head City of all the nation. And his care in this point was so much the more encreast, for that he perceiued many out of all parts fled thither; and that it was naturally strong, and also compassed with almost inuincible walles: and beside this, the boldnesse and desperate courage of the inhabitants, who although that they had no walles at all, yet had beene scarcely to be conquered: and therefore hee thought it necessary to comfort his souldiers before the fight, like champions who ought to enter the field and fight couragiously.

Iohn a poysoner and a deceitfull man, inforceth the Citizens of Giscala to rebell.

Vespasian foreseeth his no small trouble in the siege of Ierusalem.

Titus (comming on horseback vnto Giscala) perceiued that it might easily be taken: yet knowing that if it were taken by force, all the people should be destroyed by the Romans (and now he was weary of bloodshed) he cõpassionating the well disposed people, which were otherwise like

A to periſh together with the wicked, attempted to take it by condition. Wherefore the wals being full of people, amongſt whom were many of the ſeditious, he told them that he maruelled what help they had or expected, or by whoſe aduice, all other cities being now taken, they alone would abide the laſt brunt of the Roman forces, eſpecially when as they had already ſeen many towns, far ſtronger then theirs, ouerthrowne at the firſt aſſault: and contrariwiſe, thoſe who had yeelded themſelues to the Romans, liued in peace, and peaceably enioyed all that was theirs. Which offer (ſaid he) I now alſo make vnto you, and am not yet incenſed againſt you, becauſe that which you doe is for your liberty: but if (quoth he) you do ſtill perſeuere in this impoſſible courſe, my diſpleaſure ſhall be kindled againſt you. And if ſo be they refuſed this kind offer, they ſhould pre-
B ſently perceiue the Roman ſword to be ſharpened for their deſtruction, and incontinently ſhould find that their wals were but a mockery, and no waies able to reſiſt the Romane engines: where contrariwiſe, if they yeelded themſelues, and truſted to the fidelity of the Romans, they ſhould be the moſt happy people of all Galilee. None of the towneſ-men were admitted to make anſwer, nor to come vnto the wals: for the theeues were maſters of them; and a guard was placed at euery gate, leſt any one ſhould go forth to ſubmit themſelues, or any horſemen ſhould bee re-
C ceiued into the city. Then Iohn made anſwer, that he liked well of the conditions offered, and that he would either perſwade or compell the inhabitants to accept of them, yet hee requeſted, that that day might be granted vnto the Iewes: for it was the 7. day, wherein it was not lawfull for them to entreat of peace, nor make warre. For as the Romans knew, the Iewes euery ſeuenth day ceaſt from all work: and which if they profaned, they who cauſed it to be ſo abuſed, though it were Titus himſelfe, were as great offenders as they who were forced to it. Moreouer, ſo ſhort time could not preiudice the Romans, to wit, one nights ſpace: for nothing hee could effect in that time to endammage them, except only by fleeing out of the city (which Titus might preuent by placing a ſtrong guard & watch in euery place thereabout) and that he thought it a great priuiledge to be ſuffred to keepe the cuſtome of his countrey; and that it was his part, who offred peace & ſafety to them that expected it, and alſo to keep their laws whoſe ſafety he granted. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches Iohn ſought to delude Titus, being not ſo religious about the keeping of the Sabbath, as carefull for his own ſafety: for he feard that the city would preſently be taken,
D and he left alone, & ſo he determined in that night to flee, as the only way to ſaue his life. Truly God would haue it ſo, that Iohn ſhould then eſcape, to be the ouerthrowe of Ieruſalem, and that Titus ſhould not onely grant him the time he requeſted to deliberate, but alſo that night ſhould pitch his tents neere Cydæſſa, by the higher part of the towne, which is the ſtrongeſt village of all that are in the heart of the Tyrian ſoyle, which the Galileans alwaies hated. In the night time Iohn perceiuing no Romanes to keepe watch about the towne, hauing now opportunity, fled not onely with the armed men about him, but alſo with many of the chiefe of the Citie, and whole families, whom he promiſed to conduct vnto Ieruſalem. But Iohn fearing captiuitie, and carefull for his owne ſafetie, hauing carryed them twentie furlongs out of the Citie, forſooke them: who being ſo left deſolate, began grieuouſly to lament. For euery one thought himſelfe as neere his enemies, as he was farre from the Citie and his friends: and ſtill euery ſtep, they thought their E enemies at hand ready to take them, and euer they lookt backe, as though their enemies heard the noiſe they made as they went, and ſo came againſt them; inſomuch that many ruſhed forward on heapes, and many were killed in the way with the preaſe of them that followed; ſo that women and infants did periſh miſerably: or if they ſpake any thing, only it was entreating their parents or their kinsfolke to ſtay for them.

Iohns anſwer to Titus exhortation.

Iohn reſerued by Gods prouidence to be at the ſiege of Ieruſalem.

But Iohns exhortation tooke effect, wherein he cryed vnto them to ſaue themſelues, and haſten vnto ſuch a place, where they might be ſafe, and reuenge themſelues of the Romans, for the outrages which they that remain'd behind were like to indure: and ſo the multitude that fled, euery one as he was able diſperſed themſelues. Titus early in the morning came vnto the wals to know whether they accepted of his offer. Then the people ſet open the gates, and with their wiues and F children came to meet him, all crying that he was their ſafetie, and worker of their welfare, and that he had deliuered their City out of captiuity: alſo they certified him how Iohn was fled, and beſought him to pardon them, and execute iuſtice vpon thoſe malefactors that remained in the city. And at their requeſt, he ſent certaine horſemen to purſue Iohn, but they could not take him, for before they came, he had gotten into Ieruſalem: yet they ſlew almoſt two thouſand of them that fled with him, and brought backe againe three thouſand women and children. Titus was angry that he ſuffred Iohns deceit to eſcape vnpuniſhed: yet his anger was ſomething appeaſed, for that hee perceiued Iohns purpoſe preuented, in that ſo many of his company were ſlaine, and and ſo many brought backe their captiues. Thus hee peaceably entred the city, commanding the ſouldiers to break down a little piece of the wall, as it were to take poſſeſſion of it, and ſo puniſht the ſeditious rather with threats then torments. For hee thought that many were accuſed onely for priuate hatred, and ſo were in danger to ſuffer being innocent: and he thought it better to let the wicked liue in feare, then with them to deſtroy the guiltleſſe. Thinking moreouer, that hereafter they would be more quiet, either for feare of puniſhment, or for ſhame of their former offence, for which they were pardon'd: and that if any man ſuffered vnworthily, he could not afterward complaine. Then he placed there a garriſon, both to repreſs the ſeditious, & alſo to confirme them that deſired peace. And thus was Galilee conquered after it had much toyled the Romans.

CHAP. V.

Of the beginning of the deſtruction of Ieruſalem.

SO ſoone as Iohn was entred into Ieruſalem, all the people flocked about him and thoſe that came with him, enquiring what calamity had befalne them without the city. Some of them being yet out of breath, and not able to ſpeake, by ſignes diſcouered their neceſſity: yet amidſt theſe their miſeries, they boaſted that it was not the Roman power that forced them to flee, but that they of their own accord fled thither to war againſt the Romans in a ſafer place, then that from whence they fled, was; for none but vnaduiſed and raſh-headed men would fight for ſuch a citie as Giſcala and other places that were not able to reſiſt, ſeeing that it behoued them all to reſerue their vigour and ſtrength to defend their Metropolitane City. They alſo ſignified vnto them, how Giſcala was taken by the Romanes, and that they departed in good ſort away, though ſome reported that they fled. The people of Ieruſalem, hearing what theſe men reported, and how many were captiues vnto the Romans, they fell into a great feare, as though that which they told did portend their ruine. But Iohn, nothing aſhamed in that hee had ſo ſhamefully forſaken them of Giſcala who fled with him, went firſt to one, and then to another, inciting them all to warre vnder a vaine hope, alleadging the weaknes of the Romans, and extolling their owne puiſſance, deceiuing the ſimple people; and perſwading them, that though the Romans ſought to reuenge, yet could they neuer enter the wals of Ieruſalem, who had ſo much adoo, and endured ſuch affliction in entring the little burges & villages of Galilee, againſt whoſe wals they had broken all their engines. Theſe words of his, incited many young men to ſedition: but all the wiſer ſort foreſaw what was like to enſue, and euen now mourned their loſt city. And in this caſe were they of Ieruſalem: yet before this ſedition in the city, the countrey people began to be at diſcord among themſelues. For Titus departed from Giſcala vnto Cæſarea, & Veſpaſian went from Cæſarea to Iamnia & Azotus, and took them both: & leauing there garriſons, he returned to Cæſarea, bringing with him a huge company of them who had yeelded vnto him. All cities were at ciuill wars among themſelues; ſo that when the Romans did not war vpon them, one part of the Iewes in euery city fought againſt the other, and there was a great diſſention between thoſe that deſir'd peace, & the ſeditious people: and at firſt, this diſcord began only in priuate houſes; but in the end, euery one ioyning with them that were of their mind, they now began in companies to rebell openly. Thus euery place was troubled with ciuill diſcord: and euery where raſh young men, who deſired wars, preuailed againſt graue & wiſe old men, who foreſeeing the calamity like to enſue, deſired peace. At firſt, the inhabitants one by one rob'd and ſpoiled what they could; but at laſt, in whole troups they ioyned together, and robbed openly, & waſted all the countrey about: and they in their robberies ſhewed ſuch crueltie, that the harme and iniury they did vnto their owne countrimen, was altogether equall to the miſeries which befell them by meanes of the Romans; and they, who by theſe miſcreants were ſpoiled, wiſhed rather to haue falne into the Romans hands. But they who kept the citie, either becauſe they were loth to weary themſelues, or elſe for that they hated the citizens or people, did nothing or very little ſuccour them that fell into theſe theeues hands. At laſt the theeues aſſembled themſelues together from all places, and ioyning cõpanies, they brake into Ieruſalem. This citie had no gouernor, and according to the cuſtome of that countrie, receiued all that came thither that were their countrimen; and ſo much more willingly at that time, becauſe they thought that they that came thither, came of good will to help them: which only was afterward the cauſe that the city was deſtroid; ſetting aſide the ciuill diſſenſiõ. For a great multitude of people vnapt to fight being there, cõſum'd the victuals that would haue ſuffized for the fighting men: & beſide the wars, they brought vpon it famine & ciuill diſſẽſion. Then other theeues came out of the fields thereabout, and ioyning thẽſelues with thoſe that were within the city, omitted no kind of villany: for not cõtent to rob & ſpoile, they alſo attempted

A ted to commit murders, not onely priuily, or in the night vpon meane men; but euen in the day time they publikely set vpon the chiefest of the nobilitie. For first of all they tooke Antipas, who was borne of the blood royall, a man so eminent amongst them, that the publike treasure was committed to his charge and custody, and put him in prison: and after him they tooke Sepha a worthy man, and sonne to Raguel and Læuia, both of them of the Kings housholde, and after them all that seemed to beare any sway, or were in authority amongst the people. Great feare fell vpon the Inhabitants, and euery one prouided to saue himselfe, as though the citie were euen now surprized by the enemies. But these people were not content thus to haue imprisoned those potentates, neither did they thinke it safetie for themselues any longer to detaine such men aliue: B for many came dayly vnto them to visit them, and vnto their houses, who were able to reuenge their iniuries: and moreouer they feared that the peoole would make a head against them, being moued with their iniquitie. Wherefore they determined to kill them: and to effect their purpose, they sent one Iohn a cruell murderer, who was the son of Dorcas: he accompanied with ten more all hauing swords went vnto the prison, and slew as many as they found there. To excuse this cruell fact of theirs, they alledged this, to wit, that all they who were slaine in prison, had conference with the Romans concerning the betraying of the Citie into their hands, and that for this cause they had slaine them, being traytors to their Countrey: they also boasted that this fact of theirs had preserued the Citie, and that therefore they had well deserued of it. The people was brought vnto such slauery and terror, that the chusing of the high Priest was in their hands to C elect whom they pleased: so much was their insolence increased. Thus they not respecting the families, out of which it was onely lawfull to chuse the high Priest, they now elected strangers and base persons to that sacred dignitie, and such as would be partakers of their villanies and impieties: for they who not deseruing it, attained to such dignitie, were as it were bound vnto their will in all things, by whom they were so exalted. They also deuised many lies, to make those that were in authoritie one at variance with another, thereby as it were to hold them occupied, who were able to resist their enterprizes, till that being now satisfied with the blood of the Citizens, they began to commit impietie against God himselfe, and with prophane and vnpure feet to enter into the Sanctuary. Then the people was incited against them by Ananus his meanes, who was one of the Priests, and the most ancient and wisest of them all, who perhaps had saued D the Citie, had he escaped the hands of these miscreants. But they vsed the Temple as a Castle and defence for themselues against the people, and made the Sanctuary a place for them to exercise tyrannie in. And that which increased the sorrow of the Citizens, was, that amidst these calamities, their religion was also contumeliously abused: for these theeues, to try of what strength and courage the people were, and their owne forces, did elect by lot a high Priest contrary to their law: which as we haue already said, requireth that the high Priest shall be chosen by succession. This deed of theirs they coloured with an ancient custome, alledging that in time past the high Priest was chosen by lot. But indeed this their fact was an abrogation of the most firme custome that was amongst the people, and was onely a deuice to get all gouernment into their hands by establishing Magistrates at their pleasure.

E Then calling one of the holy tribes named Eniachin, they cast lots, and it so fell out that the lot fell vpon one, wherby their iniquity was discouered. This man whose lot it was to be high Priest was named Phanes, who was the sonne of Samuel, a man not onely vnworthy of that dignitie, but who had beene so rudely brought vp, that he neuer knew what the high Priest meant: this Phanes was borne in a village called Aphthasis. Him, against his will they fetcht out of the field, and as it had beene in a stage-play they graced him with another mans person, and presently gaue him instructions how he should behaue himselfe, putting vpon him the sacred attire of the high Priest, as though that so great impietie had beene but a sport. The rest of the Priests, beholding a far off the holy lawes to be scorned, scarcely contained themselues from teares, & euen groaned for sorrow, that their sacred dignities were so abused. The people could no longer endure this F their tyranny, but now euery one addrest himselfe to depose these tyrants. And those that were most earnest herein, were Gorion Iosephs sonne, and Simeon the sonne of Gamaliel, who went about the City to euery one in priuate, and then in a publike assembly exhorted the people to be reuenged vpon those tyrants, who tooke from them their libertie; and to addresse themselues to purge the holy Temple from such vile and vncleane persons. Likewise the best disposed amongst the Priests, to wit, Iesus the sonne of Gamala, and Ananus the sonne of Ananus, often in publike Sermons reprehended the people, and vpbrayded them with their slouth, in that they made no more haste to destroy those Zelous people (for so those wretches termed themselues, as though they had beene deuout followers of goodneſſe, and not impious malefactors. The people being all aſſembled together, euery man grieued to ſee the holy place ſo kept for a denne of theeues, and of their robberies and murders which they committed; yet did they not goe about to reuenge, thinking themſelues too weake to deale with theſe Zelous, as indeed they were. Then Ananus ſtood vp amongſt the middeſt of them: and hauing often turned his eyes to the Temple, and beholden it till the teares ran downe his cheekes, Oh ſaid he, how farre better were it for me to dye, then to liue, to ſee the Houſe of God thus filled with impietie, and the Sanctuary, wherein none ſhould come but the high Prieſt, prophaned with the wicked feet of impious perſons, being cloathed in Prieſts apparell, and beare the name of the moſt authoritie amongſt all names? and doe I yet liue, and doe I ſaue my ſelfe, and to bee gray-headed, abſtaine from dying a glorious death? Nay, rather I alone will goe againſt theſe murderers, and as though I were in a wilderneſſe where there were no man beſide my ſelfe, I alone will goe and offer my ſoule for Gods ſake. For what doth it auaile mee to liue amongſt a people, that hath no feeling of their owne calamitie, & which ſeeketh not to redreſſe their owne preſent miſeries? for you being robbed and ſpoyled beare all patiently, and being beaten you hold your peace, and there is none amongſt you that dare openly mourne for them that are moſt cruelly murdered. O tyrannous gouernment! But why ſhould I exclaime againſt the tyrants? Did not you your ſelues make them great, and nouriſh their power and authoritie by your patience? Did not you, by deſpiſing thoſe who before were in authoritie being but a few, make all theſe, who are many in number, tyrants ouer your ſelues? haue not you keeping your ſelues quiet, they being armed, turned their ſwords vpon your owne heads? and as then it behooued you to reſiſt their enterprizes, when firſt they iniured your kindred; you by ſuffering, haue made them theeues, becauſe at firſt you made no account, when they deſtroyed houſes and whole families. And this was the cauſe, that at laſt the rulers and potentates themſelues were ſet vpon, and none would ſuccour them when they were drawne thorow the middeſt of the Citie, and theſe murderers butchered them in priſon whom you thus betrayed. I will not recount what men they were, and of what birth: but I ſay they being neither accuſed nor condemned, hauing no man to heare them, they were moſt cruelly murdered, as we haue ſeene any: for they were before our faces led to bee ſlaine, as the fatteſt amongſt the whole herd of beaſts, all we beholding this: and yet no man opening his mouth nor lifting vp his hand. And will you alſo endure? will you ſuffer the holy Sanctuarie to be prophaned before your eyes? and will you, hauing ſo emboldened theſe miſcreants as ye ſee now, your ſelues ſtand in feare of them? aſſure your ſelues, they would, if they could deuiſe how, commit greater impietie then this is. They keepe againſt you the ſtrongeſt place in the whole Citie; called a Temple, but now indeed it is a fortreſſe or Caſtle of defence. What doe yee now thinke, ſuch a tyrannie being eſtabliſhed ouer you, and your enemies being euen vpon you; what do you deliberate to doe? Doe you expect the Romans to come and helpe you, to ſaue the Temple and ſacred myſteries? Our citie is now at that ſtay, and we haue ſo behaued our ſelues, that our verie enemies pitie vs. O yee wretches! will you not ariſe, and as the verie brute beaſts doe, will you not reuenge your ſelues vpon them that haue thus wounded you? Will not euerie one of you call to minde the maſſacre of his friends, and what calamitie he himſelfe hath ſuffered, and ſo encourage your ſelues to be reuenged? For ought I can ſee, you haue all loſt that ſacred and ſweet and naturall deſire of libertie, and now we imbrace bondage, as though we had learned to be bondmen euen from our anceſtors. But they endured many and hard warres to liue in libertie, and yeelded neither to the power of the Ægyptians, nor Medes, becauſe they would not bee at their command. What need is it to recount vnto you the warres of your predeceſſors? To what end doe we enterprize this war againſt the Romans (be it commodious for vs, or to our diſaduantage) if not to obtaine our libertie? And we, who cannot indure to be ſubiect vnto the Lords of the whole world, abide our owne nation to tyrannize ouer vs. Some may account it aduerſe fortune to be once ouercome by ſtrangers: but to be ſlaues vnto the baſeſt of our owne nation, it argueth that we haue no ſparke of generoſitie in vs, and that we beare baſe and ſeruile minds. And ſeeing I haue made mention of the Romanes, I will not ſticke to declare vnto you that which now commeth to my minde, to wit, that if we be taken by them (which God forbid) yet ſhall we ſuffer no greater miſerie at their hands, then now we doe vnder theſe baſe tyrants. And how can you abſtaine from teares, beholding this Temple, enriched by the gift of the Romanes, robbed and ſpoyled by them of our owne nation, this being our mother Citie? and to ſee thoſe men murdered, whom the Romanes (although they had conquered vs) would not haue touched? Who will now feare forraine warres, ſeeing theſe ciuill broyles are ſuch? Much better were it for vs to fall into our enemies hand: yea, if you will call euery thing by ſuch a name as it deſerueth, we ſhall finde that the Romanes haue not violated our lawes, but haue been the confirmers thereof; and they within our walles are our enemies. True it is, that thoſe that haue thus tyrannized ouer vs, deſerue death, and that no puniſhment can be deuiſed great enough for their offence: and all of you were ſo perſwaded before I ſpake of it, and you were incited a-B gainſt them by that which you haue endured at their hands: but yet you feare the multitude of them and their courage; and moreouer that they are in a higher place then you: yet as all this came by your negligence and ſuffering, ſo by your delaying they will grow ſtronger. For their number is dayly increaſed, and euery wicked perſon flyeth vnto his like; and they are ſo much the more emboldened, for that as yet no man did once offer to reſiſt their enterprizes: and bee ſure that if they haue time, they will make vſe of the higher place, and that to your domage. But (beleeue mee) if you would but once offer to goe againſt them, their very conſciences would abate their hautie minds, and the remembrance of their miſdeeds would put them ſo farre out of tune, that they will not make any benefit of the higher place. Perhaps God in his vengeance will turne their owne darts againſt them for their impietie, and conſume them there-

An anſwer to their contrary opinion, who obiect the number and boldneſſe of the enemy.

The Epilogue of Ananus Oration to the people.

Ananus thus exhorted the people againſt the Zelous, yet he knew well that it was great difficulty to ouercome them, being luſtie young men, many in number, of great courage, and the more deſperate for the remorſe of cõſcience of the horrible crimes, & execrable deeds which they had committed, for they deſpaird of all hope of pardon for their miſdeeds. Yet Ananus thought it altogether intolerable, that the commonwealth ſhould be ſo ouerruled. After this exhortation the people cryed out, that they were ready to goe againſt the theeues, and to doe as they were reque-
D ſted. Whileſt that Ananus ſelected out the moſt able men for warre, and ſet them in order, the Zelous came and iſſued out vpon him, and (hauing intelligence of all his intents and proceedings by certaine ſpies which they had appointed vpon purpoſe) being inraged ſalyed out, and in companies, ſometime all at once, other times in ambuſhes; ſparing none that they met with. Ananus quickly gathered together the people, who were more in number then the theeues: yet were they not ſo well armed as they; but what they wanted in armes, their courage did ſupply. For the Citizens were armed with fury, ſtronger then armour; & they which were gone out of the temple, with a more deſperate boldnes, then all the multitude how great ſo euer it was. For the Citizens thought it no abiding for them in the Citie, except they could driue away the Zelous: and the Zelous thought that they could not eſcape torments and death it ſelfe, except that they were vi-E ctors. So at laſt they ioyned battell, each vnder their Captaines and Leaders, and firſt of all both parties caſt ſtones one againſt another: and if any part fled, then the conquerors purſued them with drawne ſwords, and many were wounded and ſlaine on both parts. Thoſe townesmen that were wounded, were by their friends carried into their houſes; but the Zelous that were hurt, went into the Temple, and polluted the ſacred pauements with their blood: ſo that their religion was prophaned by their blood. Alwaies the theeues in making excurſions got the vpper hand. Hereat the Citizens being angry, ſeeing their number euery day increaſed, reproued the cowards: ſo that if any of their company offered to flye from the Zelous, they made him ſtand and reſiſt whether he would or no, not permitting him to paſſe away: And thus they bent all their forces againſt their enemies. At laſt, the theeues not able to make any longer reſiſtance, by little and F little retired themſelues into the Temple, and Ananus with his company entred the Temple by force with them, and brake the ranke of his enemies. Then they in the vtter Temple were in great feare and fled into the inner Temple; and ſhut the gates with all ſpeed. Ananus would not offer violence to the ſacred gates, & beſide that the enemies caſt darts from aloft: for he thought it a great offence againſt God, although he might haue got the victory, to introduce the people not being purified. Wherefore he elected ſixe thouſand of the chiefe of all his men well armed, and appointed them to keepe the porches, and others to ſucceed in their places while they tooke reſt. And many of the better ſort of the Citizens being by the chiefe of the Citie placed to keepe watch there, hired other poore folke to watch in their ſteads. But Iohn, who as before we haue told, fled from Giſcala, wrought the ruine of all theſe. This man being full of deceit, and aboue all meaſure deſirous of rule, long ago intended to ouerthrow the Cõmon-wealth. This man from that time counterfeited himſelfe to be againſt the theeues, and ſo day and night accompanied Ananus and the reſt, both in their conſultations, and when they went to viſit the watch; and hee diſcloſed all their ſecrets vnto the Zelous: and there was nothing decreed by the people, but he gaue the theeues intelligence thereof before it was put in practice; yet he ſeemed to be verie dutifull vnto Ananus, and the reſt of the nobilitie, hereby hoping to conceale his treacherie. But it fell out contrary to his expectation; for this his too much reuerence cauſed him to be ſuſpected, becauſe they noted him to play the paraſite: and for that vncalled he daily intruded himſelf into their conſultations, he was miſdoubted to bewray their ſecrets. For Ananus perceiued that the enemies knew all their ſecrets, and Iohns deeds did carrie ſuſpicion of treaſon, yet could they not eaſily remoue him, his craft was ſuch: beſides this, he was boulſtered out by many noble men who were emploid in theſe affaires. Wherefore they thought it good to requeſt of him an oath of friendſhip; which he denyed not, but added moreouer that he would be true vnto the people, and neither diſcloſe any deed or ſecret counſell of theirs vnto the enemies, and that he with heart and hand would truly endeuour to ſuppreſſe the Rebels. So Ananus did not more miſtruſt him, becauſe of his oath, and admitted him afterward to all their counſels, nothing ſuſpecting him. Nay, they now truſted him ſo far, that they ſent him for an Embaſſador vnto the Zelous, to perſwade them to peace: for they were verie carefull leſt the Temple through their deeds ſhould be defiled and prophaned, or that any of the Iewes ſhould there be ſlaine. But he, as though he had ſworne vnto the Zelous and not vnto the Citizens, entred boldly amongſt them: and ſtanding in the midſt of them, he recounted vnto them that he had often for their ſakes vndergone great danger, in ſuffering none of the townesmens ſecrets to be concealed from them, but declared vnto them all that euer Ananus and his confederates determined againſt them; and that euen now he was like together with them to fall into extreme danger, except it pleaſed God as it were miraculouſly to aſſiſt them. For, ſaid he, now Ananus without delay will ſend vnto Veſpaſian, and he will ſend his army in all haſte and take the Citie: and that he had appointed the next day following for purification to purifie the people, that ſo vnder pretence of pietie he might let them into the Citie, or elſe they might enter in by force: and that hee could not ſee how either they were able to endure a long ſiege, or to encounter with ſo huge an armie: adding moreouer, that it was Gods prouidence that he ſhould be ſent vnto them to make a peace, when Ananus purpoſed ſo ſoone as they were vnarmed to ſet vpon them. Wherefore if they had any care of themſelues, they ſhould either intreat the watchmen that beſieged them to be good vnto them, or elſe get ſome ſuccour from ſome place without the Temple. For (ſaid he) he that amongſt you hopeth for pardon if you be ouercome, doth not remember what hath paſt, and what he hath done; but let them perſwade themſelues, they that haue beene iniured, will not forget and forgiue ſo ſoone, as he that iniured them is ſorrie for his fact. Nay, many times the repentance of malefactors maketh them more hated then before, and the wrath of men that are iniured, is increaſed by authoritie, and licence to doe what they pleaſe. And they might bee ſure that the friends and kinsfolks of them that were ſlain, would alwaies lay waite to requite the iniuries; and that all the people were incenſed againſt them for breaking the lawes: ſo that although ſome few would take pitie vpon them, yet the greater companie being moſt in number would preuaile. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches Iohn terrified the Zelous, yet durſt he not openly tell them what he meant by forraine helpe, notwithſtanding he meant the Idumæans. And that he might more enflame the theeues, he went vnto the chiefeſt of them, and ſecretly told them that Ananus was cruelly bent againſt them, and breathed out many threatnings againſt them in particular.

CHAP. VI.

How the Idumæans came vnto Ieruſalem, and what they did there.

Eleazar one of the Zelous cauſeth the Idumæans to be ſent for.

AMongſt the Zelous there were two principall, Eleazar the ſonne of Simon, who aboue all the reſt was thought moſt fit to giue counſell, and to execute that which was conſulted vpon: and Zacharias the ſonne of Amphicalus, who both deſcended from the line of the Prieſts. Theſe two, vnderſtanding, that beſide the generall threatnings their deaths were eſpecially vowed, and that the faction of Ananus to get him into authoritie, had ſent to call the Romans (for this, Iohn had fained) deliberated with themſelues what to doe, hauing ſo ſhort time

A time to prouide. For they ſuppoſed that preſently the people would aſſault them, and they bethought themſelues that now it was too late to ſeek for forraine help: for they might endure all calamity, before they could giue notice hereof vnto any that would helpe them. Yet at laſt they determined to call the Idumæans to aide them, and ſo they wrote a briefe epiſtle vnto them, letting them vnderſtand how Ananus, hauing ſeduced the people, meant to betray the mother Citie of their nation vnto the Romans; and that they fighting for their liberty, were by him beſieged in the Temple: that the time wherein they expected ſafety was very ſhort: and that if they did not preſently ſend ſuccour, they were like to fall into Ananus and their enemies hands, and the Citie to bee brought in ſubiection vnder the Romans: and alſo committed many

B things to bee ſpoken by word of mouth vnto the Rulers of Idumæa. For which purpoſe were choſen two principall men eloquent and apt to perſwade; and that, which was in this caſe required, ſwift of foote: it was certaine that the Idumæans would preſently aide them, it being a clowniſh rude nation, and prone to ſedition and alteration, much reioycing therein; and by flatterie eaſily entreated to warres, making as much haſte to them, as if they went to ſome feſtiuall ſolemnitie: ſo that there onely was required two ſpeedie meſſengers. Which two were ready and quicke men for ſuch an exploite, and were both called by the name of Ananias. Theſe preſently came vnto the Gouernours of Idumæa: and they reading the Epiſtle, and hearing that which the meſſengers were to ſay vnto them, like mad men aſſembled all the people together in poſte haſte; and proclaimed warres; ſo the people in an inſtant gathered themſelues together,

C and were all armed to fight for the libertie of their mother City: and twenty thouſand being aſſembled together vnder the gouernment of foure captaines, came with all ſpeed to Ieruſalem: the names of them were theſe, Iohn and Iames, ſons of Soſa, and Simon the ſon of Cathla, and Phineas the ſon of Cloſoth. Ananus and his watchmen knew not of the going of thoſe two meſſengers, nor of the watches in the citie, but they vnderſtood of the Idumæans comming, and ſo ſhut the gates and placed watchmen vpon the wals: yet they thought it not good to go out and fight with them, but firſt with peaceable words to perſwade them to concord and peace. Wherefore Ieſus the eldeſt of the Prieſts next after Ananus, ſtood in a tower oppoſite againſt them, and ſpake in this manner:

Though many and diuers tumults and troubles haue moleſted this Citie, yet did I neuer ſo

D much admire any of them, as to come with ſuch fury and readines to help theſe wicked people, againſt all expectation: for (ſaid he) you are come againſt vs to help moſt vile perſons: and that ſo raſhly, as it behooued not you to haue done, if your Metropolitan City had requeſted your help againſt barbarous people. If I ſhould perceiue your maners like vnto theirs that haue requeſted your help, I would then think you had ſome reaſon to come, for nothing cauſeth firmer friendſhip then agreemẽt or ſympathy in maners. But they if they were narrowly ſought into, haue euery one deſerued a thouſand deaths. For they are the baſeſt and very outcaſt of all the countrie people; who hauing ſpent their patrimonies ryotouſly, and played the theeues in all places and cities about them, now at laſt haue got into this holy Citie, moſt religious of all cities, and haue profaned the holy place by their impietie: they tremble not to be drunke euen in the holy Temple,

E and there they conſume in banquetting the ſpoyles they haue gotten from them, whom they haue maſſacred. And you come to helpe theſe men with as great an army & prouiſion, as though that this your mother citie had by publike conſent requeſted your helpe againſt forraine enemies. Is not this the iniury of fortune, that your whole nation hath conſpired and bent all their forces againſt vs to help theſe miſcreants? Till now I knew not what moued you ſo quickly and ſo ſuddenly to arme your ſelues to aſſiſt theeues againſt your natiue countreymen. What? Haue you bin informed of the Romans comming, & of the betraying of the city? For euen now I heard ſome of you mutter, that you came to deliuer your mother citie. Is it not a wonder to ſee this deuice and inuention of theſe malefactors? But they could deuiſe no other way to incite other againſt vs (who euen naturally deſire liberty, & are ready for the ſame to ſpend our deareſt blood

F in conflict with the enemy) but to faine vs to be deſtroyers of libertie: But it behooueth you to conſider who are theſe calumniators, and againſt whom theſe calumniations are deuiſed; and then to gather the verity of the matter, not from forged tales, fained at mens pleaſures, but from the thing it ſelfe. What ſhould mooue vs now to yeeld vnto the Romanes, hauing indured as yet nothing to conſtraine vs thereunto? when if we had liked to liue vnder their obedience, neither needed we at firſt to haue rebelled; and beſide that, if wee had repented our ſelues, wee might haue againe ſubmitted our ſelues, and obtained their fauour before this time that all the country round about vs is deſtroyed. Nay, if now we would yeeld, it is not eaſie for vs: for the ſpoyle of Galilee, which they hauing already conquered, hath made them proud, and that we in humbling our selues vnto them, being neere vnto vs, should incur an infamy worse then death it selfe. True it is, I thinke peace better then wars; yet being once prouoked to wars, and the fight being begun, I had rather dye a glorious death then to liue in captiuity. Doe they enforme you that wee haue secretly sent the chiefe of our city to the Romans, or that by common consent of all the people we haue done it? If they say that we did it secretly; let them then tell what friends of ours were sent, or what seruants of ours were ministers to effect this treason. Did they take any messenger of ours, and finde letters about him? How can that be hid from all our citizens, with whom we doe euery houre conuerse? And is it possible that a few, shut vp in the Temple, who could not come out into the city, should know our secrets, all the whole city knowing nothing? or do they now first know it when they are like to be punished for their impiety? neuer suspecting any of vs to be traytors, so long as they were in no feare. If they say that it was done by common consent of all the people, why then all men were there when the speech was made vnto the people, to exhort them thereunto, and request their good wils, and so the newes thereof would quickly haue come vnto your eares: Or what need had we to send Embassadorus, if we had beene now already certaine to come to composition with the Romanes? Let them tell you who was appointed for that Embassage. These are but deuices and excuses of them, who feare to haue a death according to their deserts, and a shift to escape punishment.

Peace is better then wars.

Iesus exhorteth the Idumæans, that since they are come, they should oppose themselues against the Zealous.

If fate had so decreed that our city should be betrayed vnto the enemy, assure your selues that they, who doe thus accuse vs, would haue betrayed it themselues; who haue committed already all sort of impieties, treason only excepted. It is your part, seeing you are come hither in armes, first (as reason and iustice requireth) to assist your mother City against them who tyrannize ouer vs, and violate our lawes: who treading downe our lawes, make all that iustice, which they can effect with their sword. And first of all they tooke Noble men and cast them in prison, drawing them from amidst the publike assembly; and neuer being accused nor condemned, nothing respecting their entreaties, put them to death. If it please you to come in peaceable and not hostile manner into our city, your selues shall plainely behold euident tokens of this that I speake vnto you: to wit, houses ruinated and made desolate by their robberies, the wiues and families of them that are slaine, in mourning apparell, and howling and crying in euery part of the city: For there is no one amongst vs that hath not tasted the persecution of these wretched men, who are gone so far, that not content to make this city their refuge (which is the chiefe, and a spectacle to all others for sanctity) after they had robbed and spoiled all the countrey and villages, and cities hereabout, now lastly they haue made the sacred Temple a refuge and place to carry all their spoiles, which they haue impiously gotten in this city, vnto. This Temple they do make their bulwarke to issue out, and to retire vnto; and from thence they make incursions vpon the Citizens: and this is the place where they practise all their villanies against vs. And this sacred place, which all the world, euen the most barbarous and sauage people thereof doe reuerence, is now defiled by the horrible robberies which one borne amongst vs committed. And now being in desperation, they reioyce to see nation against nation, and city against city, and people, against people, and our owne countreymen to turne themselues against their owne bowels: when contrariwise, (as I haue already said) it had bin your parts and duties to ioyne with vs, and helpe vs to exterminate these malefactors; and be reuenged of them for this lie, in that they presumed to call you to help them, whom they had iust reason to feare as reuengers of their impieties: yet if you make account of these mens praiers, vouchsafe (laying your weapons aside) to come into our city like friends, and bee your selues Iudges betweene vs and them whom you came to helpe. And consider what fauour we shew them, who permit them to plead their owne causes before you, they being guilty of so hainous crimes, and hauing put to death persons of such account, neuer accused nor permitted to speake for themselues: yet this commoditie we will grant them for your sake. But if you continue in your anger against vs, and refuse this offer to bee our Iudges: then let vs entreat you that leauing both parts, you would neither imbrue your hands in our blood, nor lend your aide vnto these miscreants against your mother city. And if you suspect any of vs to be confederates with the Romans, you may keepe all passages; and then seeke to defend your Metropolis, when you haue proofe of any such matter as is alledged against vs; and punish the authors of that treason, when you haue conuicted them. The enemies cannot preuent you being already planted so neere the City. If you like of none of these, maruell not that wee shut our gates against you, cõming in armed and hostile maner. Iesus spake thus vnto them. But the Idumæans being angrie, were not moued hereby, and so much the more, for that entrance into the city was denied them,

CHAP. VII.

Of the maſſacre of the Iewes by the Idumæans.

ALL the whole multitude agreed with a loud crie vnto theſe ſpeeches of Simon. And Ieſus departed ſorrowfull, ſeeing that the Idumæans would agree to no reaſon, and that thereby their City ſhould ſuffer double warres. For the Idumæans wrath was not yet aſſwaged, who tooke the matter in great diſdaine that they were not permitted to enter into the City, and alſo for that they thought the Zelous very ſtrong, and they themſelues were aſhamed that they could not come to helpe them, ſo that many repented that they were come thither. Yet would they not for ſhame returne, nothing being done by them: and ſo raſhly placing their Ta-

E bernacles neere vnto the Citie walles, they determined to ſtay there. But that night there fell a moſt huge tempeſt: for there was a great ſtormy winde and an exceeding great raine mixt with fearfull thunder and horrible lightning, and the Earthquake with ſtrange noyſes: whereupon all men thought that this motion of the earth, did ſignifie the death of mankinde, and portend ſome great matter. The Idumæans and Towneſ-men were both of one minde: for they thought that God was angry with them for bearing armes againſt their Metropolis, and perſwaded themſelues that they could not eſcape death if they continued in their purpoſe. Ananus and his followers perſwaded themſelues that they had now ouercome them without warre, and that God had fought for them againſt the Idumæans. But they were falſe prophets, and what they iudged to befall their enemies, that fell vpon themſelues. In the meane while the Idumæans

F lay as cloſe together as they could, and couered their heads with their ſhields, ſo that by this meanes the rain did them not ſo much harme. The Zealous were penſiue for the Idumæans more than for themſelues, & deuiſed which way they might ſuccour them. Then the boldeſt amongſt them aduiſed the reſt, by force to oppreſſe the watchmen, and ſo to goe into the Citie, and open the gates to the Idumæans that came to helpe them, for it was eaſie to ſurprize the watchmen, by reaſon that many of them were vnarmed, and vnfit for warre, and the Citizens could not eaſily bee aſſembled together, for euery man becauſe of the tempeſt kept his houſe. And ſuppoſe that there were danger, yet were it better to endure all miſchiefes that might enſue, then to permit such an army shamefully to perish, who came at their request to helpe them. But the wiser sort disswaded the rest from this, seeing both a stronger watch placed to keep them in, and the City wals diligently guarded because of the Idumæans: and moreouer, perswading themselues that Ananus ceased not, but went vp and downe, first from one watch, and then to another; yet that night he did not so, not for slothfulnesse, but because that the destinies had so decreed that thereby both he and the Watch-men should perish. For about mid-night the storme increasing, the Watch-men fell into a sound sleepe. G

The watchmen are oppressed with sleepe.

Then the Zelous determined to file the barres and bolts of the gates in sunder; to effect this, they tooke the instruments which were consecrated to the Temple, and this attempt was much furthered by the huge wind and thunder, which made such a noise that they could not be heard: so issuing out of the Temple, they went priuily to the walles, and opened that gate neere vnto which the Idumæans lay; and suspecting that Ananus would make some resistance, they first of all drew their swords, and then together with the Idumæans came in: and if at that time they had assaulted the City, they had without any let or hinderance destroyed all the people therein: so great was their rage at that time. But first of all they hastned to assist their fellowes, whom they left besieged, and requested the Idumæans not to leaue them in danger, for whose succour they were come, nor permit them to incurre greater damage: for hauing first surprized the watchmen, it would be more easie for them to assault the City: which if they did not, but first set vpon the Citizens, they would presently assemble together, and oppose themselues against them, and not permit them to ascend vp into the Temple. The Idumæans consented vnto this, and so they passed thorow the City into the Temple. And the Zelous remaining in the Temple, carefully expected their comming; at whose arriuall they tooke courage, and ioyning with the Idumæans, came out of the inner Temple, and set vpon the watch: and some being slaine who were fast asleep, the rest were awaked by the cries of others, and so betook themselues to their armes, to defend themselues, being yet amazed. And at first, thinking that they were onely the Zelous that gaue the assault, hoped onely by their multitude to suppresse them; but seeing others without the Temple also assailing them, they perceiued the Idumæans were broken in: so the greater part of them being dismaid, laid downe their weapons and cried; and onely a few of them, young men well armed, and of good courage, encountred with the Idumæans, and for a good space defended their idle fellowes: others went and aduertized the Inhabitants what was done, yet none durst come to helpe them, because they now knew that the Idumæans were got in, but euery one lamented their hard fortune: and the women made great lamentation, when any of the watchmen fell into danger. The Zelous also answered their cries with the like, and then the tempest and thunder made all more dreadfull. The Idumæans spared none, because that they were naturally cruell and fierce to shead blood: and angrie that they were so beaten with the tempest, they vsed them most cruelly, by whose meanes they were shut out of the Citie, sparing neither those who requested fauour, nor them who made resistance, for they slew many euen as they were entreating them to remember that they were of their owne blood, and requesting them to spare them for reuerence of their Temple. There was no way to flye, nor any hope of escape: being driuen vp in a narrow roome, they hurt themselues more then the enemies did, by crowding and treading vpon one another, for there was no place to flye, nor their enemies ceased not to kill them. Being in this desperate estate; not knowing how to doe, they cast themselues headlong downe into the Citie, and so died a more miserable death (in my mind) then they that died by the enemies sword. The next day there was found slaine eight thousand and fiue hundreth, and al the vtter Temple flowed with blood. Yet this massacre sufficed not the Idumæans rage, but turning themselues against the City, they robbed and spoyled all houses, and killed all they met, making no account of the death of the rest of the multitude. They made diligent search for the Priests, and many laid violent hands vpon them, and killed them: and standing vpon their dead corpses, sometime they vpbraided Ananus with the peoples fauour towards him, sometime Iesus with the words he spake vpon the wall vnto them, and were so impious, as that they cast away their dead bodies vnburied, notwithstanding that the Iewes in this point are so religious, that after sunne-set they take downe the dead bodies of malefactors, who by sentence haue bin adiudged vnto the crosse, and burie them. I thinke I doe not greatly misse the marke, if I affirme Ananus his death to haue beene the destruction of the Citie, and from that time forth the walles of Ierusalem to haue beene ouerthrowne, and the Common-wealth of the Iewes to haue perished in that day when they beheld their Priest and Gouernour slaine, euen in the middest of the Citie. He was a man that led a laudable

A dable and moſt iuſt life: and being in great dignitie, honour, and reputation; yet would hee not exalt himſelfe aboue any one, were he neuer ſo baſe. He was a man who thirſted after liberty, and bare the rule and gouernment of the Common-wealth. He continually preferred the publike commodity before his owne priuate gaine, being alwaies deſirous of peace; for he foreſaw that the Romans could not be withſtood; and that, if the Iewes did not quickly accord with them, their ruine was at hand: briefly I ſay, that had Ananus liued, they had yeelded with him vnto the Romans. For he was an eloquent Orator and could perſwade admirably: whereby he had now gained vnto his ſide thoſe that hindred him, and cauſed the wars; whom if they had had for their Captaine againſt the Romanes, it had not beene ſo eaſie for the Romanes to haue conquered B them. With him was ioyned Ieſus inferiour to Ananus, yet excelling all the reſt. So that I thinke Almighty God hauing decreed the totall ruine of the City, being now violated and filled with iniquity, and meaning by fire as it were to purifie the holy Temple which was now defiled and prophaned, he firſt tooke away the defenders thereof, and thoſe that loued them moſt dearely. So they who a little before were clothed in ſacred apparell, and reuerenced of all thoſe that from the furtheſt parts of the world came to Ieruſalem, now lay murthered and naked in the open ſtreets, left as it were a prey to be torne in pieces with dogges or wilde beaſts, who earſt were the authors of piety and religion. I thinke that Vertue it ſelfe wept to ſee wickedneſſe ſo preuaile.

Chap. I.

Of another massacre, and of the returne of the Idumæans, and the cruelty of the Zelous.

The cruelty of the Idumæans & the Zelous.

SVch was the end of Ananus and Iesus. After whose death the Idumæans and the Zelous massacred the people, as though they had beene a flocke of pernicious beasts, and euery one was slaine whereſoeuer hee was found: and taking the nobilitie and younger sort of men, they kept them bound in prison, hoping that by deferring their deaths, some of them would become partakers with them. Yet none was thereby mooued, but euery one desired to dye, rather then impiously to conspire against their owne countrey: yet were they most cruelly whipped before they were put to death, their whole bodie being all as it were one sore place by whipping and stripes: and so when they could not indure these torments any longer, then were they killed. And whoso was taken on the day time, was in the night carried to prison, and those that died in prison and torments, they then cast their dead bodies out, that they might haue place to imprison others in their roome. And the people were so terrified, that none durst weepe openly for his friend, nor bury the dead body of his kinsman; yea those that were in prison durst not openly weepe, but secretly; looking about them, lest any of their enemies should espie them. For whosoeuer mourned for any that was afflicted, was presently himselfe vsed in the same maner as he had bin for whom he lamented; and sometime some in the night scraped vp a little earth with their hands, and therewithall couered the dead body of their friend; and some bolder then the rest, did the like in the day time. And in this generall slaughter were twelue thousand young noble men slaine by this meanes: and thus being hated for these massacres, they mocked and flouted the Magistrates, and made no account of their iudgements. So that when they determined to put one Zacharie the sonne of Baruch to death, a noble man and one of the chiefe of the city (for they perceiued that he was an enemie to their wickednesse, and loued the vertuous, and one that was rich, by whose death they hoped not onely to haue the spoile of his goods, but also to be rid of such a one who might be able to resist their bad purposes) they called seuentie of the best amongst the common people together as it were in iudgment, yet they hauing no authoritie; and before them they accused Zacharie that hee had betrayed the Common-wealth vnto the Romans, and that for that intent he had sent vnto Vespasian: but neither shewed any euidence nor proofe thereof, but onely they affirmed it to be so; and therefore would haue credit giuen vnto their words. When Zacharie perceiued that vnder pretence of being called vnto iudgement, he was deceitfully brought into prison; and hauing no hope of life, yet he spared not to speake liberally his minde: but began to scorne the rage and pretence of his enemies, and purged himselfe of the crimes whereof he was accused; and conuerting his speech against his accusers, he laid open all their iniquities, and much lamented the miseries and troubles of the Citie.

Zacharie condemned to death by the Zelous.

In the meane while the Zelous gnashed their teeth, and could scarcely containe themselues from drawing their swords, and were desirous that their pretended accusation and iudgement might be ended. He also requested them, who by these miscreants were appointed his Iudges, to remember iustice, notwithstanding those dangerous times. The seuentie Iudges all pronounced that he was to be absolued and freed as vnguiltie; and rather chose to die, then to cause his death who was innocent. This sentence being pronounced, the Zelous began to shoute and cry with a loud voice, and they all were angry at the Iudges, who did not vnderstand to what end that counterfeit authoritie was giuen them. Then two of the boldest amongst them set vpon Zacharie, and killed him in the midst of the Temple, and mocked him, saying; Thou hast now our sentence and absolution, farre more certaine then the other was, and presently they cast him downe from the Temple into the valley vnderneath: and then contumeliously with the hilts of their swords they did beate the Iudges out of the Temple; yet they did not kill them, to the end that being dispersed thorow the whole city, they might tell the people as messengers from them, of their miserable captiuitie. The Idumæans were now sorrowfull for their comming: for they misliked these proceedings: who being assembled together, one of the Zelous secretly told them all that their faction had done from their beginning; and that the Idumæans had taken armes, because they were enformed, how that the Metropolitan citie was by the Priests betraied vnto the Romans; but as they might perceiue, there was no proofe nor signe of any such matter: and that in Seuenty Iudges absolue and acquite Zacharie.

One of the Zelous discouereth their cruelty and barbarous dealing to the Idumæans.

A indeed the Zelous who pretended themſelues conſeruers of the citie, were meere enemies; and exerciſed tyranny ouer the citizens euen from their beginning. And though they had aſſociated themſelues with ſuch wicked perſons, and made themſelues partakers of ſuch and ſo many murthers, yet thought now to ceaſe from ſuch wickednes, & not aſſiſt men ſo impious to deſtroy their country lawes & religion. For although they took it in bad part that the city gates were ſhut vpon them; yet now they were ſufficiently reuenged of thoſe that were the cauſe thereof. Now was Ananus himſelf ſlain, and almoſt all the people in one night: wherof many of them ere long would repent, and that they might now themſelues perceiue the cruelty of them, who requeſted their aid, to be more then barbarous: ſo that they bluſht not to commit their villanies openly in B the ſight of them who had ſaued their liues; and their miſdemeanour and impiety would be imputed vnto the Idumæans, becauſe they neither hindered their miſchieuous practices, nor forſooke their ſociety. And that therfore it was their parts (ſeeing that it was now euident that the report of treaſon was only calumniation, and that no aſſault by the Romans was to be feared; likewiſe that an inuincible force was eſtabliſhed againſt the citie) for to depart home, and by forſaking the ſocietie of the impious acquite themſelues of their impietie, as being by them deceiued, and ſo againſt their wils made partakers therof. The Idumæans were hereby perſwaded, and firſt of all they looſed them that were in priſon, in number 2000. of the vulgar, and preſently leauing the citie, they went vnto Simon; of whom we will ſpeake hereafter, and ſo they departed home.

The yeere of the world, 4032. after Chriſts birth, 70.

The Idumæans depart out of Ieruſalem.

Their departure was againſt the expectation of both parts: for the people, not knowing that C the Idumæans were penitent for that they had done, reioyced as now deliuered from their enemies: and the Zelous grew more inſolent and proud, as though they neuer had needed helpe, but now were deliuered from them, in reuerence of whom they abſtained from villany. So now they vſed no delay to effect their impietie: for they ſpent not much time in taking aduice; but whatſoeuer ſeemed beſt vnto them, preſently without any delay they put it in practice. But chiefly they murthered thoſe men that were ſtrong and valiant: for they enuied the nobilitie for their vertue: And they thought it a principall point firſt to be effected, nor to leaue any one man of account aliue. Wherefore they ſlew amongſt the reſt Gorion a noble man of great birth and dignitie, one who loued the people, and was verie bountifull and a louer of libertie: ſo that there was none amongſt the Iewes like him, who for deſire of libertie and his other vertues was put to D death. But neither could Niger Peraita eſcape their hands, a man who in warres againſt the Romans had ſhewed himſelfe valiant: who althongh he often cried out and ſhewed the ſcars of his wounds receiued in defence of his countrey; yet they ceaſed not for all this moſt ſhamefully to dragge him thorow the Citie: and being led out of the Citie, deſpairing of life, he entreated that he might be buried. But the barbarous people denying his requeſt ſlew him. Who at his death beſought God that the Romans might come and reuenge it vpon them, and that plague and famine, and ciuill diſcord might light vpon their Citie. Whoſe praiers God heard, ſending all vpon them which he did iuſtly require, and firſt of all they were plagued with ciuill wars among themſelues. Niger being thus ſlaine, they were freed from the feare that they had of him, how that he would reſiſt their wickedneſſe. There was no part of the common people, who were not E by ſome forged tale or other put to death. For ſome were ſlaine, for that long ſince they had borne armes againſt their owne citizens; and they who were innocent in all points were put to death, for ſome occaſion deuiſed in the time of peace: and they who did not conuerſe with them were murthered, as ſuch that contemned them: and they that freely and friendly conuerſed with them were ſlaine, as men that ſought to betray them: and the greateſt offenders, and the leaſt offenders were all puniſhed alike, to wit, with death: for no man eſcaped, except he was either poor or of very baſe condition.

The ciuill diſcord amongſt the Iewes.

IN the meane while the Romanes addreſſed all their courage againſt the Citie of Ieruſalem; and ſeeing them at great variance among themſelues, thought this to bee for their great aduantage. Vpon this they incited Veſpaſian their Generall, affirming that it was Gods prouidence (who fought for them) that the Iewes ſhould be at ciuill wars among themſelues, and that therefore he ſhould not ouerſlip ſo good an opportunity: for the Iewes would quickly be friends again one with another, either by the wearines of ciuill war, or elſe repenting them-

themselues of that which they had done. To whom Vespasian answered, that they were ignorant what was to be done, being rather desirous as it were in a Theater to shew their forces & strength, then with him to consider what was profitable and expedient. For (said he) if we presently assault them, our comming will make concord amongst our enemies, and so we shall bring vpon our selues their forces yet firme and strong: but by expecting a little while, they should haue lesse adoo to conquer them, their chiefest forces being destroied by their own ciuill wars; And that God was more their friend then they were aware of, who without their labour and pain deliuered the Iewes into their hands, and will giue vs the victorie without endangering of our army: And that therefore it was rather their parts to bee as it were beholders of that tragedie, then to fight against men desirous of death, and troubled with the greatest euill that possible could be, to wit, domesticall sedition, and ciuill wars. And if any thinke that the victorie is not famous being gotten without fight, let him know and consider the vncertaine euents of wars: and that it is better, if it be possible, to get a victory without bloodshed, then therewith to hazzard the victorie. For they who by counsell and aduice doe any worthy act, deserue no lesse praise then they, who by force of armes atchiene a victory. Moreouer, in the meane time that the enemies one destroyed another, his souldiers might take rest, and so be stronger and better able to fight when need should require. Beside that, it seemed not that there was so much haste required to get the victory: for the Iewes neither prepared armes or engines of war, nor leuied any forces, nor sought for aide, and so by delay no domage could ensue: but that they would plague one another more by ciuill wars, then his army could by taking them and their citie. And therefore whether they considered it best to abstaine from assaulting them (who fought with one another) for security sake, or else for vaine glory, though the honour of the victory diminished thereby: yet he held it not meet to fight against them, who were at ciuill wars amongst themselues; for so it would be iustly said, the victory was not to be imputed to vs, but to their discord.

Many citizens to fly the Zealous, resorted to Vespasian.

The Captaines all consented, and thought this aduice of Vespasians best: And presently it appeared how profitable his counsell was. For euery day many fled vnto him to escape the hands of the Zealous: yet it was hard and dangerous to flye, because all the waies were guarded with watchmen. And if any man vpon any occasion whatsoeuer were taken vpon the way, he was presently killed, as one who intended to haue fled vnto the Romans: yet he that fee'd the watchmen with money, escaped away safely; and he that did not, was counted as a traitor: so that onely rich men could escape, and the poore were left to the slaughter. The multitude of dead bodies that lay on heapes together was innumerable, and many of them who had fled vnto the Romans, returned againe into the city, chusing rather to die there: for the hope they had to be buried in their natiue soile, made death there seeme more tolerable. But they became so cruell, that they neither permitted them who were slaine within, nor them without the city, to be buried. But like men that had now determined together, with their countrey lawes, to abolish the law of nature, yea and by their impietie to pollute the sacred diuinity with iniustice, let the dead bodies rot aboue the ground: and whosoeuer attempted to bury any one of them that were slaine, whether hee were friend or kinsman, were presently put to death, and left vnburied, as men forsaking their city, and flying to the enemie. To be breefe, nothing so much increased their calamitie as mercie: for the wicked people were herewith, as it were prouoked to wrath, whose displeasure and cruelty was extended from the liuing vnto the dead, and from the dead vnto the liuing. And such feare fell vpon the whole Citie, that those that were left aliue, deemed them happy, that being dead, were at rest, and free from those miseries: and they that were in prison, in respect of the torments they endured, thought themselues vnhappier then they who lay vnburied. All humane iustice was by them peruerted, and they scorned and mocked at all diuine and holy things, and proudly derided the oracles of the Prophets, esteeming them as fables and iests. But hauing now contemned all lawes established by their forefathers for the punishment of vice, and increasing of vertue, at last they found that true which by them was foretold, concerning the destruction of themselues and their countrey. For there was an old prophecy, that when sedition raigned amongst them, and their owne hands had first violated the Temple of God and holy things; that then their city should be destroyed by war, and their holy places should be burned with fire, according to the vse and custome of war. And the Zealous giuing credit vnto this prophecy, made themselues the ministers of this action.

The Zealous tyrãnize both ouer the liuing and the dead.

Chap. III.

How Gadara was yeelded: and of the maſſacre there.

The yeere of the world, 4032. after Chriſts birth, 70.

BVt Iohn, who long agoe deſired to bee in chiefe authority, as tyrant ouer all the reſt, thought it not ſufficient to be in as great reputation as his fellowes; wherefore by little and little ioyning vnto himſelfe the moſt impious of all the Zealous, he diuided himſelfe from their vnion and fellowſhip: So that now euery one perceiued (in that he alwaies neglected what others commanded, and imperiouſly commanded what himſelfe thought good) that he affected principality; and many ioyned to him for feare, ſome for fauour (for he had a ſmooth tongue, able to perſwade them vnto what he would) many alſo followed him; thinking it better that all the impiety before committed were laid to one mans charge in particular, then vnto all men in generall. Moreouer; being a valiant man of his hands, and one able to giue politike counſell, he wanted not followers, notwithſtanding that many of the contrary faction left him, enuying that he, who before was their equall, ſhould now be their Lord and commander. Feare alſo terrified them from liuing vnder the gouernment of one man; for they thought that if hee once preuailed, he could not eaſily be ouercome: and againe, if he were depoſed, that he would picke quarrels againſt them in the end, becauſe that they reſiſted him in the beginning. So euery man determined rather to ſuffer all miſery in war, then to ſubmit himſelfe, and periſh like a ſlaue. Thus the ſedition was diuided, and Iohn was chiefe of the faction againſt the Zealous: ſo betweene them they appointed garriſons in euery place; and if by chance they combated together, they did little or nothing hurt one another, but their chiefe contention was who ſhould beare moſt ſway amongſt the people: and they did ſtriue on both parts who ſhould haue the greateſt part of the ſpoile. Thus the City at one time was vexed with three intolerable miſchiefes and euils, to wit, warre, tyranny, and ſedition: and yet warre ſeemed a leſſe euill then the reſt vnto the communalty. In briefe; many leauing their natiue ſoile, fled vnto ſtrangers for ſuccour, and found among the Romans ſafety, who with their owne nation liued in continuall danger. There was alſo then begun the fourth euill, which wrought the ruine of the whole nation. Not farre from the City there was a Caſtle called Maſſada, builded by the ancient Kings of Ieruſalem, very ſtrong to lay their treaſure in, and their munition for warre, and to retire themſelues thereunto in time of need, for the ſafety of their perſons. This Caſtle was taken and kept by that ſort of theeues that were called Sicarij, who for feare durſt rob no more. Theſe theeues ſeeing the Roman army now idle, and the theeues in Ieruſalem at ciuill wars and ſedition among themſelues, they tooke courage, and againe fell to their villanies. And ſo on that day which is the feaſt of vnleauened bread (which the Iewes doe keepe holy, in memory of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian captiuity) deceiuing the watchmen, they ſeized vpon a Fort, called Engaddi: and before the townes-men could arme and vnite themſelues together, they were by theſe perſons driuen out of the town, who alſo killed them that could not flie, to wit, women and children, to the number of more then ſeuen hundreth; and ſo ſacking the houſes, and taking the fruits that were now ripe, they carried all vnto Maſſada: and ſo they waſted all the villages and whole countrey round about them, many wicked perſons daily flocking vnto them and ioyning with them: and by their example other theeues that a while had been quiet, now robbed againe, and ſpoyled in euery part of Iudæa. And as in a body, if the principall member thereof be ſicke, all other parts of it are afflicted: ſo Ieruſalem being filled with tumults and diſcord, thoſe that were without the city found licence to rob and ſpoile: and all they that had their towns deſtroied where they were wont to inhabite, went into the wilderneſſe. Then they aſſembling and vniting themſelues together, not ſo many as an army, yet more then a company of theeues, they brake into the townes and Temples; and as in war it commeth to paſſe, they purpoſed to aſſault them, by whom they had ſuffered ſuch iniury: but they were preuented; for the theeues vnderſtanding of their comming, fled with the ſpoile they had gotten. And there was no part of Iudæa that did not periſh together with Ieruſalem their mother city. Thoſe that fled vnto the Romans, certified Veſpaſian hereof: for although the ſeditious perſons did keep and obſerue all paſſages, and kill them that offered to flie, yet many ſecretly ſtole away from them, and beſought Veſpaſian both to helpe the oppreſſed city, and to take compaſſion vpon the reliques of their nation: affirming that many had been butchered for wiſhing well to the Romanes, and many being yet aliue, were yet in great danger. And Veſpaſian moued to compaſſionate their calamities, came with his army neerer Ieruſalem,as though he would haue beſieged it:but indeed his intent G was to deliuer it from the ſiege, hoping in the meane time to conquer that part of the countrey that was yet vntoucht, and ſo to leaue nothing to hinder him when he ſhould begin the ſiege.

Wherefore comming vnto Gadara, the ſtrongeſt place and mother City of all the countrey beyond the riuer, he entred into it the fourth day of March: for the chiefeſt of the city,vnknowne vnto the ſeditious people , had ſent Embaſſadors vnto him,partly deſiring peace,partly to ſaue their goods and liues,and promiſed him to yeeld the towne into his hands: for there were many rich men dwelling in Gadara:and their enemies knew not of their Embaſſage,till they ſaw Veſpa- ſian at the City gates.And ſo deſpairing that they were able to keep the City,by reaſon they had in the towne many enemies,more in number and ſtronger then themſelues;and moreouer,ſeeing H Veſpaſian euen now almoſt at the city: and thinking it a ſhame to flie and not be reuenged of their enemies; they tooke Doleſus (who was both a noble man and chiefe of the city,and alſo the author of that Embaſſage) and killed him, and for anger beating him after he was dead, they fled out of the city. Now the Romans army approaching neere vnto the city, the people of Gadara went forth and receiued Veſpaſian ioyfully,who alſo confirmed a league betwixt them and him, and left them a company of horſe and footmen to defend them againſt the incurſions of the fugitiues their enemies : for they themſelues before the Romans requeſted it, deſtroyed the citie wals, that ſo they might ſhew themſelues to deſire peace, in that deſtroying their wals , if after they deſired to rebell they could not.

The Gadarenſians entertain Veſpaſian with ioy and acclamations.

Veſpaſian then ſent Placidus with fiue hundreth horſmen, and three thouſand footmen to pur- I ſue thoſe, that were fled out of Gadara, and he with the reſt of his army returned to Cæſarea.
But the fugitiues perceiuing themſelues to be purſued by Placidus, before hee could ouertake them,got into a towne called Bethenabris : and finding there many young men, partly for that they were willing, partly by force they compelled them to arme themſelues, and ſo rathly they came againſt Placidus. Placidus and his army ſeemed a little to giue backe, to the intent to draw them further from the wall:and then hauing compaſſed them about in a fit place,they wounded them afarre off with darts and arrowes. Then the Iewes ſeeking to flie, were preuented by the horſemen: and they who offered to fight, were by the Roman footmen all put to the ſword, neuer ſhewing any ſigne of valour. For the Iewes aſſaulting the Romanes,being all inuironed and quite couered with their ſhields as with a wall,and not being able to break into their battell,they K were ſlain by the Romans darts:but their darts could do the Romans no harme,and ſo like fierce and ſauage beaſts they wilfully ran vpon their enemies ſwords,and ſo were ſlain,ſome hauing all their face cut with ſwords, ſome killed by the horſmen. For Placidus was carefull to intercept their paſſage vnto the towne,and to hinder their recourſe vnto it, and brought thoſe back againe that fled towards it,vſing his darts,and killing thoſe that were next him;and thoſe who fled afar off for feare,he cauſed to returne; till at laſt the ſtrongeſt amongſt them brake away, and got vnto the towne wals: And thoſe that were within the citie knew not what to doe, for they would not ſhut the fugitiues of Gadara out of the citie, becauſe they deſired to let their owne citizens in;and againe they perceiued that if they let them in, they thereby ſhould worke the ouerthrow of the citie,as it fell out indeed they did. For the gates being ſet open for them to come in, the L Roman horſemen almoſt brake into the towne with them, yet the gates were ſhut before they could get in. Then Placidus with all his ſouldiers aſſaulted the towne, and fighting a ſore fight which continued euen vntill the Euening,at laſt he got the wals,and the town,and ſlew the weaker ſort: for the ſtronger fled: ſo the ſouldiers ſacked the houſes, and then fired the towne. They who eſcaped thence,incited the whole country to fly with them, reporting their calamities with the moſt,and affirming that all the Roman army was at hand:and ſo they put all the inhabitants there in great feare; and hauing aſſembled a great multitude, they fled vnto Iericho, which place they put their confidence in,for that it was ſtrong and populous. Placidus hauing horſemen, and being incouraged with his former victorie, purſued them vnto Iordan , and whomſoeuer he o-uertooke he ſlew, and at the riuer he fought with all the multitude there gathered together; and M

Wherefore neceſſity forced them to fight,becauſe they could not flie: and placing themſelues ny for feare fell into the riuer; ſo the Romanes ſlew there thirteene thouſand, and the reſt not able to reſiſt, caſt themſelues into the riuer; which were an infinite number: alſo the Romanes tooke two thouſand and two hundreth men aliue, and a huge booty of Sheepe, Aſſes, Camels,

A and oxen. This maſſacre though it was no greater then the former, yet it ſeemed to the Iewes farre greater, becauſe that many all ouer the country flying were killed, and Iordan was ſo filled with dead carkeiſes, that none could paſſe ouer it: and alſo the lake Aſphaltites was full of dead bodies, brought thither out of diuers riuers. Placidus hauing ſo good ſucceſſe, went into the townes and villages adioyning, and tooke Abila, Iulias, Beſemoth, and all the townes euen vnto the lake Aſphaltites, and placed in them garriſons of them that fled vnto him: and afterward preparing ſhips and furniſhing them with ſouldiers, he purſued them that were fled by water, and ouercame them: and ſo all the countrey beyond Iordan yeelded vnto the Romans, and euen vnto Machæron all places were by them conquered.

CHAP. IIII.

How certaine townes were taken, and the deſcription of Iericho.

AT this time came newes of the troubles in Gallia, and how that Vindex together with the nobility of that countrey had reuolted from Nero, whereof we haue made mention in another place. This newes cauſed Veſpaſian to be more earneſt to end the warres of the Iewes: for euen then he foreſaw the ciuill wars that enſued, and the danger of the whole Empire: and he thought that if he could before the beginning of thoſe troubles end the wars in C the Eaſt part of the world, that then Italy was not in ſo much danger. But winter hindring him, he in the meane time placed garriſons in all townes and villages about the whole countrey, and placed Decurions in euery city, and repaired many places which he had before deſtroyed. And firſt of all he with his whole army that was at Cæſarea, went to Antipatris; and there hauing ſettled the eſtate of that city, after his abode there two dayes, the third day he departed, ſpoiling and burning all the country: as alſo all the countrey about Thamnia the Toparchy, and ſo went into Lydda and Iamnia. But ſeeing that thoſe two places ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, leauing there ſuch inhabitants as he thought good, he went thence vnto Ammaus, and placing himſelfe in the way to their Metropolitane City, he there entrenched his army, and then leauing the fift legion there, he with the reſt went into the Toparchy of Bethlepton, firing it and all pla- D ces thereabout; as alſo the borders of Idumæa: but he reſerued there certaine Caſtles in fit places, and fortified them. And hauing taken two townes in the midſt of Idumæa, to wit, Begabri and Caphartopha, he ſlew there aboue ten thouſand men, and tooke almoſt a thouſand, and driuing out the reſt of the inhabitants, he left a great part of his army there, who made incurſions and waſted all the high places thereabout: and he with the reſt returned to Iamnia; and from thence by Samaria and Neapolis, called by the inhabitants Mabortha, the ſecond day of Iune he came into Corea: and pitching his tents there, the next day he came to Iericho, where one of his Captaines named Traian, met him with the ſouldiers he brought from beyond Iordan, which place he had conquered. But the multitude, before the Romans came, fled from Iericho into the high countrey ouer againſt Ieruſalem, and many that ſtaied behind were there ſlain. So he found E the city deſolate, being ſituate in a Plaine vnder a great mountaine that is barren, which is of a huge length: for it reacheth on the Northſide vnto the borders of Scythopolis, and on the South vnto the borders of Sodom and the lake of Aſphaltites. It is all rockie and not inhabited, becauſe it beareth no fruit. Ouer againſt this neere Iordan is ſituate a huge mountaine, beginning on the North ſide at Iulias, and reaching vnto Bacra on the South, which is the limits of Petra a city of Arabia. In this place is that that is called the mountaine of Iron, reaching vnto the countrey of the Moabites.

Troubles in France.

Veſpaſian viſiteth all Iudæa

Veſpaſian commeth to Iericho.

The country betweene theſe two mountaines is called the great field, reaching from the village Gennabara vnto the lake Aſphaltites, being in length two hundreth and thirty furlongs, and in breadth a hundreth and twenty, and in the midſt it is diuided by the riuer Iordan. There are F alſo two lakes of contrary natures, Aſphaltites and Tiberias; for one of them is ſalt and barren, but that of Tiberias ſweet and fertill. This Plaine in ſummer time is burned with the heate of the ſun, and the aire is infected in all places therabouts, ſaue only about thoſe which adioyne to Iordan: and this is the cauſe that the Palme trees that grow about the riuer ſide do flouriſh moſt, and are more fertill then the reſt. Neere vnto Iericho there is a large great fountaine, which plentifully watereth the fields thereabout, and runneth with a great ſtream out of the ground neer vnto the old city: which Ioſue the ſonne of Nun Generall of the Hebrewes tooke by war, the firſt of all that he tooke in the land of Canaan. It is reported that in the beginning, the waters of this fountain did destroy all fruits of the earth,and also made women be deliuered before their time, G and to infect all places with diseases,and the plague; and afterward by Helizæus the successour of Helias was made sweet and fertill: Who,being once courteously entertained by the inhabitants of Iericho, did so reward them and all the countrey for that their kindnesse: and going vnto the fountaine he cast a pitcher full of salt into the water; and hard by lifting vp his hands to heauen, and tempering with the fountain water certain sweet waters, he prayed God to qualifie the rage thereof,to make it flow with more sweet streames: and besought God to giue a better aire vnto the fountain, which both might cause plenty of fruits, and also of children vnto the inhabitants: and that the water might haue the vertue to make women fertill, so long as they persist in piety.

A miracle wrought by Helizæus.

After these prayers, with his hands he altred the fountaine according to the knowledge he had: H and from that time,this fountaine which before was the cause of famine and sterility, was now the cause of plenty and fertility. And so it watereth the ground, that where a little of it commeth,it doth more good then all the other waters which lie long vpon it:and so they that water their grounds but a little with it, receiue much fruits; and they that water their grounds with it much, do not receiue them in that measure: yet it watereth a greater compasse of ground then other fountaines: and in length it runneth thorow a Plaine seuenty furlongs long, and twenty broad. There are most pleasant and goodly Orchards,and many sorts of Palme trees growing by brooks sides, which are diuers in the taste of their fruits; the fattest whereof being pressed, doe yeeld a iuyce like hony, nothing inferiour to other hony: yet there is great store of hony in that country,and the iuyce of balme,which is more precious then all fruits growing. There grow al- I so Cypres trees and Myrobalans: so that one may iustly call that part of the earth diuine, where what fruit soeuer is most deare and precious, is in most aboundance. Also in al other fruits it surpasseth all countries in the world: for it multiplieth and increaseth all things sooner there. The cause hereof I iudge to be the pleasant waters and warme nourishing aire, which as it were inuiteth all things to spring vp,and then encreaseth them:and the moisture causeth all things to take firme root; and also defendeth them from drought in summer time, when that country is vexed with such intolerable heats, that all things are as it were scorched, so that nothing then will grow;yet if they be watered with water drawne before Sun rise,by the blowing of a milde and temperate wind they are refreshed,and it receiues a contrary nature: in winter time it is as it were lukewarme and temperate to them that goe into it. The ayre of that place is so temperate,that K when it snoweth in other parts of Iudæa, and is extreme cold, the inhabitants in this place doe only weare a linnen garment. This countrey is distant from Ierusalem a hundreth and fifty furlongs,and threescore from Iordan, and all the ground betwixt it and Ierusalem is desart and stony,and so likewise betweene it and Iordan and Asphaltites, though it be lower ground then the other. Thus we haue sufficiently declared the fertility of Iericho.

Chap. V.

The description of the lake Asphaltites.

It is worth the labour to describe the lake Asphaltites, which is salt and sterile; yet whatsoeuer is cast into it how weighty soeuer it bee, it swimmeth aboue the water: so that one, though he would vpon purpose, cannot scarcely sinke vnto the bottome. Vespasian comming thither to see it, caused some to be taken who could not swimme, and their hands to bee bound behind them, and cast into the midst thereof, and all of them did swim aloft, being as it were borne vp by the power of some spirit. Moreouer it is admirable, how this lake thrice in euery day changeth colour, and shineth diuersly, according as the beames of the Sun do sundry waies fall vpon it. And in many places it casteth vp pieces of blacke bitumen, in greatnesse and shape lik a bull without a head,and these float aboue the water. They that get their liuing vpon this water, finding this bitumen that is thus gathered together, draw it to their boats, and it is M so tough and clammy, that hauing filled their boates herewith, it is not easie for them to get them away, but their boat is as it were fastned: so it hangeth vpon the rest of that masse of bituminous matter, till it be separated from it by the termes or vrine of a woman. This bituminous matter is good for to close the rifts of shippes,and also to cure many diseases. This lake is fiue hundreth and eighty furlongs long, being extended vnto Zoar which is in Arabia, and it is a hundreth and fifty furlongs broad. Neere vnto this lake is the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, sometime both fertill and rich: now all burnt,being(as it is reported) for the impietie of the inha-

To be short, one may here behold as it were the signe and reliques of that fire, that by Gods appointment destroyed the place: for one may yet see as it were the fashion and tokens of fiue cities, and trees and fruits springing vp in the ashes: which fruit to the eye seemeth like vnto other fruits; but if you handle them, they fall into ashes and smoake. And so the report of the land of Sodom is knowne to be true to them that behold it.

How Gerasa was destroyed: of NEROES death, and of GALBA and OTHO.

B VESPASIAN desirous to besiege Ierusalem on euery side, builded Castles at Iericho and Adida, and left there both the souldiers that came to assist him, and also Romans with them. And he sent L. Annius to Gerasa, giuing him many footmen, and part of his horsmen; who at the first assault tooke the City, and slew 1000. young men, who thought to haue fled, and led whole families captiue, giuing the souldiers the spoile of their goods: and so firing their houses, he went to other places adioyning. They who were able fled, and the weaker sort who could not flye were slaine; and whatsoeuer came in their way, they consumed it with fire. Thus all places both mountaines and plaines being wasted and oppressed with warres, the inhaC bitants liuing at Ierusalem had not whither to goe, when they desired to flie from the Zealous by whom they were kept in. And they who were against the Romanes, were kept in themselues, the City being on euery side inclozed and compassed with the army.

L. Annius taketh Gerasa.

After that Vespasian was returned vnto Cæsarea, and with all his army purposing to goe to Ierusalem, newes was brought him that Nero was slaine, hauing reigned thirteene yeers and eight daies. Touching whom I will not recount how he did dishonour the Empire, committing the whole sway of all the Common-wealth vnto two most wicked men, to wit, Nymphidius and Tigillinus, and of least worth amongst all the Libertines: and how he being taken by the treachery of these two men, was forsaken of all his Senators; and so fled only with foure trusty Libertines into the suburbs, and there killed himselfe: and how that long time after, they that deposed him D were punished for that offence: and how the wars ended in Gallia; and that Galba being created Emperour, returned to Rome out of Spaine: and how he was accused by the souldiers, and by them killed in the market place, as one of base condition: and how Otho was declared Emperor, and led his souldiers against Vitellius his army: also Vitellius his broyles and his fight before the Capitoll: and how Antonius Primus, and Mutianus slew Vitellius, and so appeased the Germane troupes and ciuill warres: Of all these I haue refused to speake, because I hope that both the Greeks and Romans haue written these things at large, yet I haue briefly recapitulated all to continue my History.

Vespasiã hath tidings of Neroes death.

Galba.

Otho. Vitellius.

After Vespasian heard these newes of Nero, he deferred the siege of Ierusalem, expecting who should be created Emperour after him. And when he was certified that Galba raigned, he deterE mined to doe nothing; but lye quiet till such time as he should write vnto him his minde, whether he would haue him proceed in those warres against the Iewes. And he sent vnto him his sonne Titus both to salute him, and also to know his pleasure concerning the Iewes. Likewise King Agrippa went with Titus for the same cause vnto Galba. But as they were passing by Achaia with long ships in winter time, as the custome is, newes was brought that Galba was slain, hauing raigned seuen moneths and seuen daies. After whom succeeded Otho, who gouerned the Empire three moneths. Agrippa not terrified with this alteration, still kept on his iourney to Rome. But Titus (as God would haue it) returned from Achaia vnto Syria, and so to Cæsarea vnto his father. They both were as it were in suspence what would ensue, and who should be Emperour, the Empire being so full of troubles: and so they neglected the wars against the Iewes, fearing their F owne countrey, and therefore thinking it an vnfit time to assault strangers.

Chap. VII.

Of Simon of Gerasa, author of a new conspiracie.

The yeere of the world, 4033. after Christs Natiuitie, 71.

For all this the war at Ierusalem was increased. For there was one Simon the son of Giora borne in Gerasa, young in yeeres, and inferiour to Iohn, who now already had gotten the dominion ouer the city; yet was he in strength and boldnesse more excellent then Iohn. This Simon being for this cause also driuen out of the country of Acrabatena, where he was Gouernor by the meanes of Ananus the High Priest, he came to the theeues that seized vpon Massada. This Simon, at his first comming, was so suspected by the theeues, that they onely permitted him and the women that came with him, to dwell in the lower part of the castle, and they themselues kept the higher part: yet afterwards his maners & behauiour were such, that they put confidence in him: for he was their Captaine alwaies when they went to spoile and rob any part of the country about Massada. So he feared not to perswade them to attempt greater matters: for being desirous of rule, after he heard that Ananus was dead, he departed into the high places of the countrey, and with the voice of a cryer promised and proclaimed, that all bondslaues that would follow him, should haue their liberty, and all other should be richly rewarded; and so he gathered together all the wicked and desperate people in the country. And hauing now a large army, he robbed and spoyled all the townes and villages thereabout; and his number daily encreasing, he also now presumed to come into the plaine countries: so that now cities stood in awe of him, and many Potentates now feared him for his strength and prosperous successe. And his army did not only consist in theeues and slaues, but now many people of the countrey came vnto him, reuerencing him as their Prince and King. So they made excursions into the Toparchie of Acrabatena, and into the greater Idumæa. For he had fortified a towne called Nain walled about, which he vsed for his defence like a Castle. And in the valley called Pharan he made many caues, and found many already made, and in these caues he kept his treasure, and the booties he got: also all fruits of the earth that he robbed and stole, there he laid vp in store; as also munition for diuers companies. And now no man doubted, but that being thus furnished with men and munition, he would go to Ierusalem. The Zelous fearing this, and desirous to preuent him whom they euery day did see encrease his number, and to grow more potent against them; they armed many of their company, and went out to meet him. Simon was not daunted at this, but boldly incountred them, and gaue them so sharp a battell, that he slew many of them in fight; and forced the rest to retire themselues into the towne: yet hauing men sufficient, he would not besiege the towne; but first of all he purposed to subdue Idumæa, and so accompanied with 20000. armed men, he hasted towards the borders thereof.

Simon of Gerasa resorteth to the theeues

The fight betweene Simon & the Zelous.

The Princes of Idumæa vnderstanding this, presently assembled fiue and twenty thousand armed men: and leauing at home sufficient garrisons to defend their country against the incursion of the Sicarij, which held the fortresse of Massada, they accõpanied with this train, went out and expected Simons comming into the borders of their country, where hauing met him they ioyned battell, and fought a whole day, yet neither party got the victory. Then Simon returned to Nain, and the Idumæans home. Not long after Simon with a greater army then before, assaulted the borders of their countrey, and pitching his tents in a village called Thecue, he sent one of his companions named Eleazar, to them that kept the Castle Herodium not far from that place, to sollicit them to yeeld it vnto him. The garrison there presently receiued him into the castle, not knowing the cause of his comming. But so soone as he began to perswade them to treason, they all pursued him with their drawn swords: and he not hauing any place to flie vnto, cast himselfe from off the castle wal into the valley vnderneath, and so presently he died. The Idumæans somthing fearing Simons forces, before they would offer him battell, thought it best to espy what number of men he had: to effect which businesse, one Iacob a ruler amongst them offred himselfe, meaning indeed to betray his country to Simon. So departing from Olurus where the Idumæans forces were assembled, he went vnto Simon, & first of al promised him to betray his country vnto him, receiuing of him an oath, that for reward of this deed he should alwaies be next in dignity vnto Simon himselfe, and so hee presently promised to helpe to subdue all Idumæa. For this cause he was welcome to Simon and feasted liberally, and had great promises if hee performed that which he offered: and then returned vnto the Idumæans; and fained that Simons army was farre greater then indeed it was. And so at last terrifying the Gouernors of his country, and the people, he by little and little perswaded them to receiue Simon, and without any more fight yeeld vnto

Eleazar Simons fellow, casteth himselfe headlong into the trench, and presently dieth.

A vnto him the whole ſoueraignty ouer them. Iacob, ſtudying to bring this his purpoſe to paſſe, priuily ſent meſſengers to Simon, willing him to come with his forces, and promiſing him to ſubdue the Idumæans for him, which alſo he did. For when Simons army drew neere, he firſt of all got vpon his horſe, and together with his aſſociates that were partakers of his treaſon, he fled to the enemy. Then feare fell on the Idumæans, and euery one without any more adoe departed home. Thus Simon againſt his owne expectation entred Idumæa without blood-ſhed: and firſt of all aſſaulting a little village called Chebron, vpon a ſudden he tooke it, and in it an exceeding great bootie, a great quantitie of corne, and many fruits, all which he carryed away. The inhabitants report, that this Chebron is not onely more ancient then all Cities of that Land, but alſo B then Memphis in Ægypt: for they affirme it to haue beene built 2000. and 300. yeeres ſince. They alſo ſay, that this was the place where Abraham the father of the Iewes dwelt, after hee forſooke Meſopotamia, and that his poſteritie departed from hence to Ægypt. And of this there are yet monuments in the Citie, richly wrought in fine Marble. Sixe furlongs from the towne there is an exceeding great Turpentine tree, which they affirme to haue endured euer ſince the creation of the world vntill this day.

Simon hauing obtained this place, from hence he inuaded all Idumæa, and not onely robbed and ſpoiled all townes and cities thereof, but alſo he waſted and deſtroyed many territories: for beſides his army, there followed him 40000; ſo that he could not find victuals ſufficient for ſuch a multitude. Moreouer, beſides this calamitie that he brought vpon Idumæa, he exerciſed great C cruelty and outrage vpon the countrey, and ſo cauſed a greater ſpoile therein. And like as after locuſts the trees and woods where they haue bin are left without leaues: ſo whereſoeuer Simon had bin, all the countrey from whence he came he left deſolate. And either by fire, or ouerthrowing it by ruinating places where he came, or elſe by treading vpon it with the feet of his armie, or by deuouring ſuch as they found, they left nothing ſtanding nor growing, either in field or towne: and onely by paſſing thorow fertile places, hee made the fields harder then barraine ground; and left no ſigne in places which he had deſtroyed, that euer they had beene tilled.

Simon ſpoyled all Idumæa.

Heereat the Zelous were againe mooued, yet durſt they not fight with him in open field: but placing ambuſhes in the way he was to paſſe, they tooke Simons wife, and many of her ſeruants, and ſo came againe into the Citie, reioycing as though they had taken Simon himſelfe. For they D perſwaded themſelues, that Simon would preſently, laying armes apart, come in humble wiſe and intreat them to reſtore vnto him his wife. But Simon was not mooued with compaſſion for the loſſe of his wife, but with fury: and comming to the walles of Ieruſalem, like a cruell beaſt that had beene wounded, and could not come to them that hurt him, he kild and ſlew all he met. And taking them that went out of the Citie to gather herbs and wood, he cauſed them to be whipped to death, whether they were young or old: and this crueltie ſeemed onely wanting in him, that he did not eate the fleſh of the dead bodies. Alſo he tooke many and cut off their hands, and ſo ſent them into the City, thereby to terrifie his enemies, and to recall the people from the Zelous: and bad them tell the Citizens, that except they preſently reſtored his wife vnto him, he ſwore by God who gouerned all, that he would breake downe their walles, and vſe all that he found in E the Citie after that faſhion, and that he would ſpare no age, nor reſpect the innocent more then the guilty. Theſe his threats did not onely terrifie the people, but alſo the Zelous, inſomuch that they ſent him his wife againe; and ſo his anger being ſomething aſſwaged, he ceaſed a while from daily ſlaughter.

CHAP. VIII.

of GALBA, OTHO, VITELLIVS and VESPASIAN.

F NOT onely in Iudæa, but alſo in Italy at this time were ciuill warres: for Galba was ſlaine in the midſt of the market, after whom Otho was created Emperour, and fought againſt Vitellius, who affected the Empire, whom the Germane legions had elected: So the battell being fought neere vnto Bebrias, a towne in Gallia Ciſalpina, the firſt day Otho got the victory againſt Valens and Cæcinna, the Generals of Vitellius his army. But the day following they ouercame Otho: and ſo many being ſlaine on both parts, and newes being brought that Vitellius his army had gotten the victory, Otho being at Brixels ſlew himſelfe, when he had ruled the Empire three moneths & two daies. Then Othoes ſouldiers came vnto Vitellius his Captaines, and ioyned with them, and ſo Vitellius came to Rome with his army. In the meane time Veſpaſian the fift day of Iune departed from Cæſarea, and went vnto thoſe parts of Iudæa which were yet vnconquered:

conquered: and first of all he went into the high countries, and subdued the two Toparchies of Acrabatena and Gophnitis, and after them two townes called Bethel and Ephrem, and placed garrisons in them, and so went to Ierusalem, killing many that he found in the way, and he tooke many captiues. And one of his Captaines called Cerealis, with a part of horse and footmen, wasted all the higher Idumæa, and in the way as he went, he tooke Caphetra a Castle, and burnt it, and besieged another called Capharis, enclozed with a strong wall: for the which cause he deemed that he should haue made long abode there: but contrary to his expectation, the inhabitants opened the gates vnto him, and came and yeelded themselues, beseeching him to bee good vnto them. When he had ouercome them, Cerealis went vnto Hebron an ancient City, and set it on fire: this Hebron as I haue already said, was situated vpon the mountaines, so farre from Ierusalem: and breaking into it by force, he slew all them that he found there, and fired the Citie. And hauing subdued all places, saue onely three Castles, to wit, Herodium, Massada, and Macheron, which were kept by the theeues, now onely Ierusalem remained to be conquered.

CHAP. IX.

Of SIMONS acts against the Zelous.

WHen Simon had receiued againe his wife from the Zelous, he went into Idumæa, to rob and spoile that which he had left: and chasing the inhabitants vp and down, at last he forced them to flie vnto Ierusalem, & he himself followed them thither; and besieging the wals, he killed all the workmen he took, that returned out of the fields from their labor. Thus Simon without the city, was more terrible to the people then the Romans; & the Zelous within the city crueller then them both, being incouraged & incited thereto by the counsell of the Galileans. For they had put Iohn in authority: and Iohn in reward therof permitted all things to be done which they requested. There was no end of robbing & spoiling rich mens houses, and of slaughtring both of men and women; and now to iniure any person was a pastime. And hauing with blood-shed obtained their prey in security, & without all feare after they had gotten what they liked, they now began to lust after women: yea, they became themselues effeminate through luxuriousnesse, dressing their haire, and clothing themselues in womens apparell; and they anointed themselues with sweet oyntments, that their beautie might be pleasing, and alluring; their eyes wanton-like, they now did not onely imitate the attire of women, but also their impudency, and became so shameless, that they now thirsted after vnnaturall pleasures, as though they had kept a stewes, and so profaned the whole citie with their execrable impurities. Yet though they did effeminate their faces, their hands were prone to blood-shed; and although they liued in ignominious manner, as people giuen ouer to pleasure, yet could they quickly become warriers, and vnder the habits of women drawing their swords, they did kil whomsoeuer they met. Whosoeuer escaped Iohns hands, Simon crueller, murdered; and whosoeuer escaped the tyranny within the citie, was slaine by the tyrant without. So now there was no way to flye vnto the Romans. Furthermore, the army of Iohn began to be diuided, for all the Idumæans separated themselues from the other people, and there began a mutiny against the tyrant, partly enuying his puissance, partly hating his crueltie. And so assaulting him, they slew many of the Zelous, and compelled the rest to flie into the Kings house, builded by Grapta, father of Izata, King of Adiabena. The Idumæans also brake in thither with them, and draue them from thence into the Temple, and so seized vpon Iohns treasure: for Iohn liued in that palace, and thither carryed all his spoyles. Then those Zelous that were dispersed in the citie, came vnto them that were in the Temple, and Iohn purposed to send them against the townesmen, and the Idumæans. But they feared not so much their forces, although they knew them to be the better warriors, as they did feare that now being desperate, they would steale out of the Temple in the night, and so slay them, and fire the citie. Wherfore assembling themselues, they deliberated with the Priests how to auoid their assaults: but it pleased God to turn their own counsell to be their destruction, & that they should prouide a remedy of safety, far worse then death it selfe. For to depose Iohn, they deuised to introduce Simon, & as it were to intreat yet another to tyrannize ouer thē. So this counsell was thought best: and Matthias the Priest was sent vnto Simon (whom before they stood in great feare of) now to request him to come into the citie. With them also came such as had fled from Ierusalē, for feare of the Zelous, intreating him in like maner, because they desired to returne to their wiues and families. So he entred into the citie proudly, promising them to be their Lord, and all the people cryed with loud voyces as he came into the citie, that he was their preseruer, and giuer of life and

Being now within the Citie, presently he deliberated with them about him, to establish his dominion, thinking as well them that called him into the Citie, as those against whom he was called, his enemies. Then Iohn and the Zelous with him, finding no way to come out of the Temple, and hauing lost all that he had in the Citie (for Simon and his followers at his entrance tooke all that belonged vnto him) began now to despaire of his safetie. And Simon, being assisted by the Citizens, assaulted the Temple, and the Zelous placing themselues vpon the porches, and in towers of defence, made resistance, and hurt many of Simons followers. For the Zelous were vpon the higher ground on the right hand, and so had the vantage against Simon. And although by reason of the place wherein they were, they preuailed against Simon; yet they buil-

One of these towers they built vpon the East side of the Temple; another on the North; the third vpon a place opposite to the lower part of the towne; and the fourth tower they built vpon the top of the place called Pastophorium, where one of the Priests doe vse to stand before the Sunne set, and at breake of day, to signifie vnto the people with the sound of the trumpet the beginning of the Sabbath, declaring thereby vnto them, sometime holy-daies, and afterward that they might goe about their businesse. In these towers they placed all kinde of Engins to cast stones, and men with slings. Then Simon, perceiuing many of his souldiers languish, was more remisse in his businesse: yet when his number increased, he came neerer: for afarre off ma-

CHAP. X.

How VESPASIAN was elected Emperour.

AT this time the Romans were in great danger: for Vitellius was now arriued out of Germany with his army, bringing beside them an infinit multitude with him; so that his army was so great, that the place appointed for souldiers could not containe it: insomuch that his army occupied all the whole citie, and euery house was fild with armed men. And they beholding the Romans wealth greater then euer they saw any, and admiring their abundance of gold and siluer, not able to containe themselues, they began to robbe and kill whomsoeuer that

D fought to withstand them. And this was the estate of the affaires in Italy. Vespasian hauing wasted all about Ierusalem, returned vnto Cæsarea, and there he vnderstood of the troubles at Rome, and Vitellius was Emperour. Heereat, though he knew as well to obey as to be obeyed, yet was he mooued to indignation, and disdained to call him Lord, who had as it were inuaded and vsurped the Empire, being destitute of a Ruler. And much grieued hereat, he could not conceale his griefe, nor follow warres against strangers, his owne countrey being so endangered. But the distance betweene him and Rome did as much represse him, as anger incited him to seeke reuenge: for he considered that fortune might cause many alterations before he could get to Rome, especially it being winter: and so he sought to bridle his wrath which daily increased. But his Cap-

E taines with the souldiers did now openly consult of a change, and with indignation did exclaime against the souldiers at Rome, who liued in pleasure, and neuer heard so much as the report of warre; and that notwithstanding this, it was lawfull for them to create whom they pleased Emperour, and vnder hope of gaine, they disposed of the Common-wealth at their owne pleasure: where they on the contrary side, hauing ouerpast so many labours and dangers, still continuing in armes till now, waxed old and gray-headed, and did suffer authoritie due vnto themselues, to be executed by others; when notwithstanding they had amongst them one who deserued the Empire, more then any one; and what recompence could they euer after make him? or what occasion could they finde hereafter to shew themselues gratefull to him for the benefits by him receiued, if they did now omit this occasion?

Vitellius encamps his army in Rome.

Vespasian knew both how to gouerne, and how to obey.

The Captaines consult with the souldiers openly of a change.

And they thought that Vespasian was so much more worthy of the Empire then Vitellius, by how much they, who created Vitellius Emperor, were in very many respects much inferiour vn-

F to them. For (said they) we haue endured no lesse toyle then those that came out of Germanie: neither are we lesse valiant then they, who bring a tyrant with them out of Germany. And that no body would resist Vespasian: for the Senate and the people of Rome would not rather endure Vitellius his vnsatiable lust, then Vespasians chastitie and temperance; nor a cruell Tyrant, rather then a good and courteous Emperor; nor the son should by them be elected Emperor, before the father. For true valor in an Emperor is a great defence of peace. Therfore if the Empire were due to aged experience, they had Vespasian; if to valiant youth, they had amongst them Titus: and that they might reap cõmodity by both their ages: And that they would not only assist him with the forces forces of the Empire hauing there three legions, beſide the help of the kings; but alſo all the Eaſt part of Europe was out of Vitellius his danger. Moreouer, they had in Italy ſome that would aſſiſt Veſpaſian, to wit, his brother & his ſon, whereof the one (they hoped) would get many young men to follow him, and the other was now made Prefect of the City, which was no ſmall ſtep to attaine vnto the Empire. Laſtly, it might ſo fall out, that the Senate would declare him Emperor, whom now the ſouldiers, being as it were their conſeruer, had neglected.

The cauſes that mooued the people to elect Veſpaſian Emperour

This was firſt talked amongſt the companies of the ſouldiers: at laſt, exhorting one another thereto, they came & ſaluted Veſpaſian by the name of Emperor, and requeſting him now to preſerue the Empire, being in great danger to be loſt. Albeit Veſpaſian had alwaies been carefull for the good of the Common-wealth, yet he refuſed to be Emperour: deeming himſelfe indeed to haue deſerued it; yet he rather did chuſe to liue a priuate life, wherein was ſecurity, then in the height of fortune and honour with perpetuall danger. The captaines were more earneſt becauſe he refuſed it; and the ſouldiers flocked about him with drawne ſwords, threatning his death, except he would conſent to liue as he deſerued: yet long time ſtriuing to auert this their determination, being loth to be Emperour; at laſt, ſeeing he could not auoid it, he accepted their offer.

CHAP. XI.

The deſcription of Egypt.

MVtianus and the reſt of the Captaines that had incited him to the Empire, together with the whole army, cryed aloud, willing Veſpaſian to lead them againſt their common enemy. But Veſpaſian thought it beſt, firſt to ſettle the eſtate of Alexandria, knowing that Ægypt for the ſupply of corne was the greateſt and beſt part of the Empire: which if he once were ſure of, he hoped that although Vitellius were ſtronger then hee, yet hee could bring him vnder perforce, becauſe the people would not endure that for his ſake the Citie ſhould be famiſht: which would haue come to paſſe, except they had ſupply of corne out of Ægypt.

Moreouer, he deſired to ioyne to himſelfe thoſe two legions that were at Alexandria. He alſo thought that that countrey might be a defence and refuge for him, if any aduerſe fortune ſhould betide him: for the countrey is not eaſily to be entred by an army, and the Sea-coaſts haue no hauens nor harbours to receiue ſhips. On the Weſt it bordereth vpon the dry and barren part of Lybia; on the South, vpon the frontiers which ſeparate Syene from Æthiopia, and the ſtreames of Nilus not nauigable; on the Eaſt it bordereth vpon the red Sea, which extends it ſelfe euen vnto the Citie Copton; on the North it is defended with Syria, and the Ægyptian Sea, wherein there is no hauen. Thus Ægypt is ſtrong on euery ſide, and reacheth in length 2000. furlongs from Peluſium to Syene: and from Plinthine to Peluſium they ſayle 3000. and 600. furlongs. And Nilus is nauigable euen vnto the towne Elephantine.

The bounds of Ægypt.

The length and breadth of Ægypt.

Further, by reaſon of the downfals of Nilus, alſo the hauen at Alexandria is dangerous to come vnto in time of peace: for the entrance into it is very ſtraight; and beſide that, the way goes not directly on, but is made crooked by great ſtony rockes, and the left ſide is compaſſed artificially, but on the right ſide is the Ile Pharus, hauing a tower vpon it exceeding great: ſo that the light in it is ſeene of the Mariners 300. furlongs off, that long before they come neere it, they may prouide to bring their ſhips in with ſafetie.

A moſt high tower in the Iland Pharos, giuing light to thoſe that ſayle 300. ſtounds off.

This Ile is incloſed with moſt huge wals made by art; againſt which the Sea beating, and ſo returning backe againe, maketh the entrance into the hauen more dangerous. Yet this hauen within is very ſafe, and 30. furlongs long: ſo that whatſoeuer that countrey wants, it is brought them into that hauen, and whatſoeuer aboundeth amongſt them which other nations need, is carryed from thence all ouer the whole world. So that Veſpaſian did not vnaduiſedly ſeeke to eſtabliſh the eſtate of Alexandria, and diſpoſe thereof for his owne profit, being to begin his Empire. Wherefore preſently he ſent letters to Tiberius Alexander, who was Gouernour of Alexandria and Ægypt, and told him of the ſouldiers reſolution: and how that he, ſeeing he could not auoid it, but that he was forced to take vpon him the Empire, now requeſted him to helpe him in what he could. Alexander, receiuing Veſpaſians letters, agreed willingly thereto, and preſently cauſed his army and the people alſo to ſweare vnto Veſpaſian: which both of them did willingly, vnderſtanding Veſpaſians vertue by reaſon that he gouerned ſo neere them. And ſo he hauing now leaue, prepared all things to furniſh himſelfe like an Emperour, and to be receiued like a Prince.

CHAP. XII.

How VESPASIAN deliuered IOSEPH out of captiuitie.

The yeere of the world, 4033. after Christs birth, 71.

IT is incredible how quickly this newes was carried into all parts of the world, to wit, that Vespasian was declared Emperor in the East; and now all cities reioyced and made triumphs, and offered sacrifices for his fortunate successe. Moreouer, the legions in Mœsia and Panonia, who not long before were reuolted from Vitellius by reason of his crueltie, did now willingly sweare obedience to Vespasian. Vespasian returned by Berytum to Cæsarea: where many Embassadors came vnto him, bringing him Crownes, and applauding and reioycing at his good fortune, who came out of Syria, and all other places thereabout. There was also present Mutianus, gouernor of those parts, who brought tidings how ioyfully all the people receiued him for their Emperor, and how that they had all sworne obedience vnto him. So all things falling out prosperously on Vespasians side, and fortune for the most part inclining as hee desired, hee began to think with himselfe that it was Gods prouidence that he was made Emperor, and that a iust destiny had brought him to that estate. And so he cald to minde all tokens and signes (as there had hapned many, which did foretell that he should be Emperor) and among the rest, he remembred that which Ioseph had told him; who, Nero being yet aliue, presumed to call him Emperor, and so he admired the man whom as yet he kept in hold. And calling Mutianus and the rest of his friends together, first of all he told them how valiant Ioseph had bin, and what ado he had to win Iotapata, onely because of him; and then his prophecies, which at that time hee esteemed onely fables, fained vpon feare; yet now time and euent had proued them true. Affirming it an vndecent thing, that he, who had bin the foreteller of his exaltation, and had bin a messenger to him from God, should still continue in bonds like a captiue, and he left in aduersitie. So calling for Ioseph, he commanded him to be let loose. This fact of his made the Captaines vnder him, hope for great reward at his hands, seeing he had bin so kinde to a stranger. Titus being there present, said; It is meet, O father, that as you acquit Ioseph from captiuitie, so you also take away the shame of that which he hath already endured. For if we doe not onely vntie his chaines, but also breake them in sunder, he shall be as though he had neuer beene in bondage: for this is the manner vsed for redresse, when any one being guiltlesse is committed to bonds. Vespasian hereto agreed: and so one came with an axe, and hewed his chaines in pieces. Thus was Ioseph rewarded for his prophecy, and so hereafter he was esteemed worthy to be beleeued.

of VITELLIVS his death and manners.

WHEN Vespasian had answered the Embassadors, & iustly disposed of all the Rulers of his army according to euery ones merit, he now came to Antiochia, and there did deliberate whither to go first, and it seemed best to him to go to Rome, rather then to Alexandria: for he knew that Alexandria was quiet and firme, but Rome was troubled by Vitellius. Wherfore he sent Mutianus into Italy, with many footmen and horsemen: who fearing to goe by Sea, went thorow Cappadocia and Phrygia, for it was winter time. Now Antonius Primus, who was Gouernor of Mœsia, brought from thence the third legion remaining there, and came to war against Vitellius. Vitellius sent Cæcinna to meet him with a great army: who departing from Rome, presently met with Antonius at Cremona, a towne of Gallia, situate vpon the confines of Italy; and there beholding the discipline and multitude of the enemies, durst not fight with them: and thinking it very dangerous to flee, he plotted treason, and so calling vnto him the Centurions and Tribunes vnder his gouernment, he perswaded them to goe and ioyne with Antonius, debasing Vitellius his power, and extolling Vespasians: affirming the first to haue onely the bare name of the Emperor; and the last to haue also all vertues meet for an Emperor. Moreouer, that so it would be better for them to doe that of their owne accord, which otherwise they should be compelled to; and seeing themselues already ouercome in number, so also now willingly preuent all danger. For Vespasian was able without their assistance to subdue all the rest: but Vitellius was not able with their helpe to keepe that he had: speaking much to this effect, he perswaded them to all that which he would haue done. And so with his whole army ioyned with Antonius.

Vespasian bethinks himself to returne to Rome.

Cæcinna perswades the souldiers to forsake Vitellius, & honour Vespasian.

that Vitellius ſhould get the vpper hand who ſent them againſt Antonius, drew their ſwords, and would haue ſlaine Cæcinna; And had done it, had not the Tribunes come and entreated them to the contrary: wherefore they did not kill him, but kept him bound, meaning to ſend him to Vitelliss as a traitor. Primus Antonius hearing this, came with his army and aſſaulted them who were reuolted from him, and they a while reſiſted; yet at laſt, forced to retire, they fled to Cremona. And Primus, accompanied with horſemen, preuented their courſes, and ſo ſlew moſt of them before the city; and afterward ſetting vpon the reſt, gaue his ſouldiers the ſpoile of it, wherein many Merchants of other conntries, and many townſ-men were ſlain, and all Vitellius army, 30000. and 200. men: and Antonius loſt in that battell 4000. and 500. of thoſe whom he brought with him out of Mœſia. And deliuering Cæcinna from priſon, hee ſent him to beare newes hereof to Veſpaſian: who comming vnto him, was praiſed for his fact, and greatly honoured aboue his expectation, in reward of his Treaſon.

Cæcinna is apprehended for Treaſon.

Veſpaſian honors Cæcinna with vnexpected honours, and is acquited of Treaſon.

Sabinus, who was at Rome, hearing that Antonius was at hand, greatly reioyced, and tooke courage: and gathering together the companies of the watchmen in the night time, he tooke the Capitoll, and in the morning many of the nobles came and ioyned with him: and Domitianus his brothers ſonne, who was a great cauſe and helpe to obtaine the victory. Vitellius little eſteemed Primus; but he was angry againſt Sabinus and thoſe that had reuolted with him: and as it were naturally thirſting after the blood of the nobilitie, hee ſet all the army he brought out of Germanie with him, to aſſault the Capitoll, where many valiant deeds were ſhewed on both parts: and at laſt, the Germanes, being moſt in number, got the Capitoll hill. And Domitian with many braue noble men, as it were by Gods prouidence, eſcaped ſafe, the reſt of the multitude were there ſlaine. And Sabinus was carryed to Vitellius, and there by his commandement put to death: the ſouldiers, taking away all the gifts and treaſure in the Temple, ſet it on fire. The day after came Antonius, and Vitellius his ſouldiers met him: and fighting in three ſeuerall places of the Citie, they were all ſlaine. Then Vitellius came drunke out of his palace, and being full gorged with delicate meat, he was drawne thorow the midſt of the people, and after many contumelies ſlaine, hauing raigned eight moneths, and fiue daies: who if hee had liued longer, I thinke verily the Empire had not beene ſufficient to haue maintained his gluttony. There were ſlaine aboue 50000. of other people. And this was done the third day of October. The day after, Mutianus with his army came and entred Rome, and repreſſed the ſouldiers of Antonius, who ſtill ſought about in euery place for Vitellius ſouldiers & many other of his fauorites, & ſlew whom they thought good, not examining any matter by reaſon of their fury: and bringing out Domitian, he declared to the people that he was to gouerne the Citie till his father came. The people being deliuered from feare, proclaimed Veſpaſian Emperor, and made feaſts and triumphs both vnder one, for his eſtabliſhing in the Empire, and for ioy that Vitellius was depoſed.

CHAP. XIIII.

How TITVS was ſent by his father againſt the Iewes.

WHen Veſpaſian came vnto Alexandria, newes were brought vnto him what was done at Rome. And Embaſſadors came vnto him from all parts of the world to congratulate him. And although next after Rome this citie was the greateſt in the world, yet was it ſcarcely able to receiue the people that came thither vnto him. Veſpaſian now being eſtabliſhed Emperor of all the world, and the Common-wealth of the Romans being contrary to his expectation freed from troubles, he now began to think vpon the reliques of Iudæa. And ſo he himſelfe, winter being ended, prepared to goe to Rome, and in the meane time he haſted to diſpoſe of all things at Alexandria. Moreouer, he ſent his ſon Titus with certaine choſen men to deſtroy Ieruſalem. Who departed from Alexandria to Nicopolis by land, which is diſtant from it 20. furlongs, and there he did ſhip his men, and ſo ſayld along the riuer Nilus by Medenſia to Thumin, and there landing his men, he came to the city cald Tanis. And the ſecond place he reſted in was the city Heraclea, & the third Peluſium: and there reſting, and refreſhing his ſouldiers two dayes ſpace, the third day he paſt the borders of Peluſium, and hauing gone one daies iourney thorow the wilderneſſe, he pitcht his tents at the Temple of Iupiter Caſſian, and the next day at Oſtracine, where there is no water, but all that the inhabitants doe vſe, they bring from other places. After that, he reſted at Rhinocolura, and from thence in 4. daies he came to Raphia, where begin the borders of Syria, and the fift day he lodged at Gaza, and from thence to Aſcalon, & ſo to Iamnia and Ioppe, from whence he went to Cæſarea, purpoſing to gather the reſt of the ſouldiers there.

CHAP. I.

Of the three sorts of sedition in Ierusalem.

TITVS being thus come out of Ægypt by the desart into Syria, he departed from thence vnto Cæsarea: for there he purposed to set his army in order. And whilest yet he was with his father Vespasian at Alexandria, disposing of the Empire that God had giuen him, it happened that the sedition at Ierusalem was diuided into three parts, whereof one fought against another: and one may say, it was a good turne that they were so equally diuided. Wee haue already sufficiently declared who were the Authors and beginners of the faction of the Zelous, whose tyranny ouer the Citie was the ruine thereof: and one may well call this a sedition raised out of a sedition; which, like a cruell and sauage beast in penury and want of others, turned his crueltie against his owne bowels. So Eleazar the sonne of Simon, who was the first that in the Temple diuided the Zelous from the people, faining himselfe to be displeased with that which Iohn euery day did; yet in truth, for that he enuyed that a more tyrant of later time then himselfe should be his ruler, desirous to obtaine the principalitie, and make himselfe mightie, he reuolted from the rest: and with him Iudas the sonne of Chelcias, and Simon the sonne of Ezron, two of the most potent amongst them. Besides them, was also Ezechias the sonne of Chobarus a Nobleman, and all these had many of the Zelous following them:

them: and getting in possession the inner part of the Temple, they set a guard in the entrance and in the sacred gates, trusting in their abundance of all necessaries: for there was great store of sacred prouision, and they thought it no impietie to vse it; yet fearing their small number, they permitted many of the company that were killed, to remaine in the places where they were slaine. Iohn was superiour in multitude and number, but inferiour by the inequalitie of the place: and hauing his enemies aboue his head, he could not without danger make incursions; and yet for anger he would not cease to persecute his enemy: notwithstanding that thereby his part had more harme then those of Eleazars side, yet he still assaulted them though to his owne cost: thus many assaults were continually made, and many darts cast, and all the Temple was profaned with murders. And Simon the sonne of Giora (whom the people being in despaire, incited to be their Leader, in hope that he would haue assisted them, hauing in his hands both the higher part of the Citie, and the greater part of the lower) did now more boldly then before assault Iohn and his followers, because they were assailed by those aboue them: yet he being as it were beneath Iohn and his adhærents, he sustained as much losse at their hands, as Iohn himselfe did at theirs aboue him. So Iohn had double warres: and Eleazar harmed him because of the higher place wherein he was, so likewise did he domage Simon for the like cause; and easily without any labour repulsed all his assaults, which he made being on the lower ground, and terrified by Engines those that cast darts at him from the top of the Temple: for he vsed all Engines to cast darts and stones, and killed many not only of his enemies, but also of them that were offering sacrifices. For although that they were carryed headlong vnto all vice, yet they permitted those that would, to offer sacrifice, watching and diligently guarding them of their nation. For the strangers that came thither for deuotion, were not mistrusted: yet afterward that they had entreated these wicked people to permit them to sacrifice, they when they had done were a prey for them, and consumed by this sedition. For darts and other shot with force of the Engines came into the Temple and Altar, and slew the Priest at the Altar. And many who came from the vttermost parts of the world vnto that holy place, were slaine euen as they offered sacrifice, and so imbrued the Altar with their blood, which all the Greekes and barbarous people did reuerence: and strangers and the Priests being now profaned, were forced to be amongst the dead bodies, and the place about the Altar stood full of blood of men that were slaine. O miserable Citie! What didst thou suffer at the Romanes hands, to be compared vnto this, although they entred with fire to purge thee from iniquitie? For now thou wast no longer the House of God, neither couldest thou endure being made a Sepulchre of thine inhabitants, and hauing by thy ciuill warres made the holy Temple a graue of dead bodies. Yet mayest thou once againe come into better estate, if first thou appease Gods wrath that hath made thee desolate. But I must not giue place vnto sorrow, and write a lamentation of my miserable countrey, seeing I haue vndertaken to write a History of all things that past there. Wherefore I will recount the residue of the impietie of these seditious.

The fight betweene Iohn and Eleazar.

Simon and Iohn skirmish in the Temple.

Great slaughter in the Temple.

The seditious people beeing diuided into three companies; Eleazar and his followers, who had the keeping of the holy first fruits, and all the sacred oblations, came against Iohn, when they were drunke. And they who followed Iohn spoyling the people, assaulted Simon, and the Citie did succour Simon. Wherefore when Iohn was assaulted on both sides, hee turned some of his souldiers against Simon, and the rest against Eleazar: and against Simon hee vsed darts cast from the porches of the Temple: and against Eleazar hee vsed Engines for shot. And alwayes so often as they aboue his head ceased (as they often did beeing either weary or drunken) hee freely assaulted Simon and his men. Also as farre as hee draue them into the Citie, so farre did hee fire all, and burne houses full of corne and other necessaries: and that which hee left vnburned, Simon at his returne (when Iohn was gone into the Temple) set on fire: as if vpon purpose, to the great aduantage of the Romane, they had consumed all that was prouided against the siege; so did they destroy their owne forces and strength. To be short, all was consumed with fire about the Temple, and the Citie was made a plaine ground to fight in, and all the corne was burnt that might haue sufficed the Citie many yeeres; and so they were taken by famine, which they could not haue felt, had they themselues not caused it. The Citizens were in euery place a prey vnto those that were seditious on one side, and to them that besieged the Citie on the other side, and like a great body torne in pieces betweene these two. The old men and women astonished with these calamities, prayed for the good successe of the Romanes, and desired some forraine warre to deliuer them from their ciuill disagreement.

Iohn assaulted on both sides.

They of Ierusalem had wilfully burnt all their corne.

A wretched calamitie in Ierusalem.

And

A And forthwith great feare and terror fell vpon them all: beſides, it was no time as now to take counſell to change their minds, nor hope of agreement or of flight to them that deſired it. For all places were kept, and the rebels within, whomſoeuer they perceiued to wiſh peaceably to the Romans, or offer to flie vnto them, they preſently killed them as their common enemies. And all theſe wicked perſons agreed in this, to wit, to put the iuſt men to death, who beſt deſerued to liue. Day and night nothing could be heard ſaue onely the noiſe of them that fought one againſt another; yet the lamentable cries of them that liued in perpetuall feare was far more miſerable, who euery day had new cauſes and occaſions of ſorrow giuen them; yet durſt they not publikely lament, for feare; and ſo not daring to ſhew their griefe, they ſecretly ſorrowed, and now no man B obſerued any reuerence to them that were aliue amongſt them, nor tooke any care to bury the dead. The cauſe of both which was, that euery man deſpaired of himſelfe. For whoſoeuer were not ioyned with the ſeditious, grew to be careleſſe of all things, as making account preſently to dye a thouſand deaths. But the ſeditious gathering the dead bodies vpon heapes, continued their fighting, and troad vpon them; and as it were encouraging themſelues by the dead vnder their feet, they became more cruell, ſtill deuiſing one pernicious practice or other, and preſently executing whatſoeuer they deuiſed without any commiſeration, omitting no way to murther, and leauing no tyranny vnattempted: ſo that Iohn abuſed the holy things of the Temple to make Engines of warre. For before-time when the Prieſts and people had determined to vnderprop the Temple and build it twentie cubites higher, King Agrippa with great coſt and charges C brought them very goodly timber ſufficient for their purpoſe from mount Libanus. And this worke being preuented by warres, Iohn tooke them, and ſeeing them fit for his purpoſe, he erected a tower to fight againſt thoſe that aſſaulted him from off the Temple; which he built along the wall ouer againſt the Chapter houſe, that ſtandeth on the Weſt ſide of the Temple: for he could build it in no other place, by reaſon that all other places were filled with ſtaires. And hauing thus impiouſly prouided Engines, he hoped hereby to deſtroy his enemies. But God ſhewed his labour to be in vaine, and before he could preuaile againſt them, he brought the Romanes againſt the Citie.

Lamentation & mourning in Ieruſalem.

The crueltie of the ſeditious in Ieruſalem.

Iohn made vſe of the wood that was kept for holy vſes to make engines of.

For after that Titus had now gathered together part of his army, and by writing appointed the reſt to meet him at Ieruſalem, he departed from Cæſarea, hauing three legions that lately D vnder the conduct of his father Veſpaſian had waſted all Iudæa, and the twelfth legion that ſometime vnder Ceſtius were ouercome, and put to flight by the Iewes: who though they were otherwiſe valiant enough; yet they deſired to fight againſt the Iewes to reuenge themſelues for that diſgrace. Titus commanded the fift legion to meet him at Ieruſalem, and goe by Emmaus, and that the tenth legion ſhould march by Iericho: the reſt hee tooke with himſelfe accompanied with the Kings forces that came to helpe him, hauing now more helpe then before, and many alſo out of Syria. Titus alſo brought men with him to ſupply the number that was wanting, being ſent by Veſpaſian with Mutianus into Italy: for he brought 2000. choſen men from the legions at Alexandria, and 3000. followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his chiefeſt friend, and one next him in moſt authoritie, who before was Gouernour of Ægypt, E and as then thought a fit man worthy to be Gouernour of the army; for that hee was the firſt that did entertaine the Emperour beeing new elected, who faithfully ioyned with Veſpaſian, though yet he knew not what ſucceſſe he ſhould haue: and he was preſent with him in all his affaires as his chiefeſt Counſeller, renowmed both for his wiſedome and experience.

CHAP. II.

How TITVS went to Ieruſalem to ſee their ſtrength, and how he was in great danger.

F TITVS being now to go into the country of the enemy, cauſed all thoſe that came to helpe him, to march in the foremoſt place: after whom followed they that were to mend the wayes, and to pitch the tents: and after them they which carried the baggage of the Rulers and Gouernors of his army, and with them, the armed ſouldiers. Next after theſe came Titus himſelfe accompanied with choſen men, and with him many that bare his colours: next, the horſemen going immediately before the Engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certaine choſen men, and their companies followed. After them the Eagle with many other Enſignes: and the trumpets went before them. And after them followed the army marching ſixe in a rank: then the multitude of ſeruants that followed euery legion did driue their baggage before them: laſtly, came the hirelings and those that were appointed to guard them. Marching in such comely and warlike manner, as the Romans are wont, he came by Samaria into Gophna, which place was already conquered by his father, and then also was vnder the custody of the Romane garrisons. And staying there one night, he departed from thence the next day: and after a dayes iourney he pitched his tents in a place, which in the Iewes language is called Acanthonaulona, that is, the valley of thornes, neere vnto a village named Gabath Saul, which signifieth the valley of Saul, which is almost 30. furlongs from Ierusalem. From thence accompanied with 600. chosen horsemen, he went to Ierusalem, to view how strong it was, and of what courage the Iewes were, to see if peraduenture at sight of him they would yeeld without any further warre, for feare. For Titus vnderstood (and it was true) that the people desired peace, but they were oppressed by the seditious, and so durst not attempt any thing, being not able to encounter or resist the Rebels. Titus riding along the high way that went straight to the walles, saw no man all the way: but turning aside towards the tower Psephinos with his horsemen, an infinite number presently issued out by the towers of women, at a gate opposite to Helens tombe; and brake his ranke of horsemen into two parts, and opposed themselues, hindring those horsemen that were yet in the high way, to come and ioyne with the rest that had crost the way, and so did single out Titus accompanied only with a few men. So he could goe no further for the ditch of the towne wall on one side, and for the garden pales on the other side: and there was no hope for him to returne vnto his souldiers, the enemies being betweene him and home. And many of his souldiers not knowing their Generall to be in any danger, but supposing him to haue beene amongst them still, fled away. Titus seeing that hee had onely his owne valour to trust vnto, turned his horse against his enemies, and with a loud voyce exhorted his followers to doe the like, and so hee brake violently into the midst of them, hasting to get vnto his company. It was euident at that time that God giueth the victory, and hath a particular care of Kings & Princes and Emperors. For notwithstanding that an infinite number of darts and arrowes were shot at Titus, and he had no armour at all (for as we haue already said, he came to espy, and not to fight) yet had hee not one wound but all past him; as though purposely euery one had striuen to haue mist him. But Titus with his sword made way, and cut many vpon the face that opposed themselues against him, and so they falling downe, he with his horse past ouer them. The Iewes seeing Titus his valour, cried and exhorted one another to set vpon him; but whithersoeuer he turned, the Iewes fled, and would not abide by it: likewise those souldiers that were in the like danger with him, came of either side him and behinde him. For no man had any hope to saue his life, but onely by making themselues way with Titus, before they were so enclozed & oppressed. So, of two of the most valiant amongst them one was slain, & his horse likewise: the other was slaine, and his horse taken by the Iewes. And Titus with the rest of his followers came safe into the campe. And the Iewes getting the first victory, rashly tooke courage, and that encouragement being of moment, made them very confident a long time after.

CHAP. III.

How the Iewes did issue out vpon the Romanes pitching their tents.

SO soone as the legion that was to passe by Ammaus, was ioyned to the rest of the armie that night, Cæsar presently the next morning remooued, and came to Scopos, where hee might perfectly view the Citie and the Temple on the North part, where the ground adioyning vnto the Citie is very low, and is properly called Scopos, being distant seuen furlongs from the Citie: and there Titus commanded two legions to encampe themselues, and the fift legion to retire three furlongs off, to the intent that the souldiers who were wearyed with trauelling all night, might entrench themselues without feare or danger. No sooner had they begun their worke, but presently the tenth legion came, who were to passe by Iericho, which Vespasian had already subdued, and had placed there a garrison. This legion was commanded to encamp sixe furlongs from Ierusalem, neere mount Oliuet, which is opposite to the East part of the Citie, and is enclozed with a deepe valley called Cedron. This great and huge army so suddenly arriuing, presently stayed the warres within the Citie: and these three sects of seditious people beholding with admiration the Romans campe, became friends, and made agreement amongst themselues. They began also to question one with another, what fury caused them to suffer themselues to be enclozed with three wals, to their preiudice and losse of their liues: and seeing such preparation of wars towards, that they should be as it were beholders of that which was done

Thus they being aſſembled together, exhorted one another: and preſently arming themſelues, they iſſued out of the Citie, and aſſaulted the tenth legion, and with a huge cry ſet vpon the Romans that were entrenching themſelues in the valley. The Romans being euery one appointed to do ſome buſineſſe for the furtherance of that worke, & for that cauſe the moſt of them hauing laid down their weapons (for they thought the Iewes durſt not haue made any excurſions, & although they would, that yet they were hindred being at variance among themſelues) they were B troubled aboue meaſure, and preſently leauing the worke, ſome fled; many arming themſelues to fight, were ſlain before they were prepared to reſiſt. The multitude of the Iews was daily increaſed, becauſe that at the firſt they got the vpper hand, & notwithſtanding their number was ſmall, yet did they thinke themſelues many: and ſo did the Romans thinke them to be, becauſe of their good fortune. The Romans who were alwaies wont to obſerue military diſcipline and order, at that time by their ſudden aſſaulting, were ſo troubled, that they obſerued no order, and ſo fled: yet whenſoeuer they turned againe vpon them that followed them, they eaſily wounded the Iewes, partly, becauſe that they were ſo earneſt, that they did not greatly ſeeke to defend themſelues, and alſo they did eaſily ſtay the Iewes from purſuing them. Yet the number of them that purſued them ſtill increaſing, they were alſo more troubled, and ſo at laſt forced to forſake the C field, and leaue their tents: and the whole legion had bin in greater danger, had not Titus hauing preſent newes hereof ſpeedily came and ſuccoured them, and vpbraiding their cowardlineſſe recalled them from flight; who with them, and the choſen men he brought, encountring the Iewes on one ſide, he ſlew many of them, and wounded diuers, and put the reſt to flight, and forced them into the valley. The Iewes being now in the lower ground, and hauing endured much at the Romans hands, ſince fortune frowned vpon them, turned againe, and hauing the valley betweene them, they fought with the Romans. And thus the fight continued till the midſt of the day.

The Citizens aſſaile the Romanes.

The Iewes driue the Romanes from their campe.

A little after midday Titus guarding the reſt with thoſe that he brought to ſuccour them, and placing others, to preuent the excurſions of the Iewes, hee commanded the reſt to entrench themſelues in the top of the mountaine. The Iewes thought the Romanes had fled, and their D ſentinell vpon their wals, making a ſigne vnto them by ſhaking his garment vp and down, a great multitude of them ran ſo violently vpon the Romans, as though they had beene ſauage beaſts, ſo that none of their enemies were able to withſtand them; but as though they had beene ſtricken with ſome Engine, ſo all of them were diuerſly ſcattered and forced to flye into the mountaine. But Titus in the midſt of the ſide of the mountaine remained alone, hauing but a few with him; notwithſtanding his friends, who for the loue they bare to their Emperour, ſtayed with him, and abode the danger, did earneſtly perſwade him to flye from the Iewes, who deſperately ranne vpon their owne deaths, and not to endanger himſelfe for them, who ought rather to abide it then he: And that he ſhould think vpon his own eſtate, who was not a ſouldier, but General of thē all, and Lord of the whole world, and that he ſhould not abide when all others fled ſo faſt, & in E ſuch danger. But he made as though he heard them not, and oppoſed himſelfe againſt them that offered to aſſault him, ſtriking them vpon the faces, and killing them that made reſiſtance, and he purſued them downe the hill, and ſo forced them to retire. The Iewes amazed at his valour, did not yet flye into the Citie, but auoyded him on both ſides, and fled into the valley: then againe purſuing them that fled from them; yet Titus croſſing them as they went, hindered their purſuit. In the meane time thoſe that were encamping themſelues aboue, ſeeing them beneath put to flight, were diſcomfited, and all fled, thinking that they were not able to reſiſt the Iewes, and imagining that Titus was likewiſe fled: for had they thought that he had ſtaied by it, they neuer would haue forſaken their quarters; yet being now terrified they knew not wherefore, ſome fled one way, and ſome another without any order, till ſome ſeeing the Emperor in the midſt of F the battell, and fearing the miſchance that might betide him, they with loud cries ſignified it vnto the whole legion. Then the Romans turning againe for ſhame, and accuſing themſelues guilty of a great offence in forſaking their Emperour amidſt ſuch danger, came with all the violence they could vſe againſt the Iewes, and driuing them down the mountaine, forced them to retire; yet the Iewes fought flying, and ſeeing the Romans to haue the vpper hand of them, becauſe they were vpon the higher ground, they departed into the valley. Titus aſſaulted them that were oppoſite againſt him, and ſo commanded the reſt to go and finiſh their trenches. And hee with thoſe that before were with him to defend the workmen, did now alſo keep the Iewes from moleſting

CHAP. IIII.

Of the fight within the Citie vpon the feast of vnleauened bread.

John entreth and seizeth the inward Temple and all the furniture thereof, putteth the Zelous to flight, and raiseth a mighty sedition.

DVring the intermission of the forraine warres, they fell to their former sedition againe, which caused ciuill warres among them. And against the feast of vnleauened bread, which is the 14. day of Aprill (for vpon this day the Iewes say that they were deliuered out of the bondage of Ægypt) Eleazar and his companions opened the gates, to the intent that all that would, might come in to adore and doe their deuotion. But Iohn vsed this festiuall day as a meanes to effect his deceit; and caused many of his company that were vnknowne, to enter in among the people with weapons vnder their garments, giuing them charge when they were within, to get possession of the Temple: and so soone as they were within, they cast off their garments, and shewed themselues to bee in armour. Presently a great tumult arose within the Temple: for all the people that were not of the sedition, thought themselues betrayed: and the Zelous thought this treason only practised to preiudice them: and so leauing the gate which before they kept, and leaping downe from the towers, they neuer offering to fight, fled into the vaults about the Temple. And the people flocking about the Altar, and others who were driuen into the Temple, were killed with clubs and swords, and so troden vpon. And many were slaine vpon priuate hatred, vnder pretence to be partakers with the enemies. And whosoeuer beforetime had offended any of those Traitors, hee was put to death, as though he had beene one of the Zelous. But they who had cruelly raged against the innocent, let the wicked haue leisure to escape out of those caues, whereby they had no harme: and hauing gotten the inner part of the Temple, and all belonging thereunto, they did now more confidently then before fight against Simon: and thus the sedition that was before diuided into three parts, was now brought only into two. Titus being desirous to bring his army neerer the Citie, sent a certaine number of horsemen and foot, which he thought sufficient to hinder all excursions of the Iewes from Scopos, and another company he sent to plaine all the grounds betwixt him and Ierusalem: who cutting downe all hedges and pales, and fences, and wood (though they were fruit trees) filled the vallies and made it all plaine ground: and hewing downe all stones that standing vp made the ground vnequall, they plained all that ground from Scopos euen vnto Herods monument, which adioyned to the lake of Serpents called sometime Bethora. CHAP. V.

Of the deceit the Iewes vsed against the Romane souldiers.

ABout this time the Iewes deuised this stratagem against the Romans. The most courageous among the seditious people went out vnto the places called the womens towers, and counterfeited themselues to be driuen thither by them within the citie that desired peace; and for that they feared the Romans, they were come thither to hide themselues one behind another: others standing on the wals, and counterfeiting themselues to be the Citizens, with loud cryes desired peace, and a league of friendship; promising to set the citie gates open, and inuiting the Romans to enter: and crying thus, they also cast stones against their countrymen before spoken of, as though they did driue them from the gates; and they made as though they would by force breake thorow the people, and come to the gates, partly by force, partly by entreating the people to permit them. And making many offers to go vnto the Romans, they turned againe like men troubled in minde, and studying what to doe. The Romane souldiers did not perceiue their subtill meaning; who seeing the seditious ready to fall into their hands, that so they might punish them, and seeing the people (as they thought) ready to open the gates vnto them, would in poste haste haue gone vnto the citie. But Titus suspected some deceit coloured with this kind inuiting him to enter, because he did not see any reason for it. For the day before, hauing by Ioseph offered them peace, hee vnderstood that their mindes were farre from any peaceable cogitations: wherefore now he commanded the souldiers to keepe their quarters and not to remoue; yet some of them, appointed to worke in the trenches, taking their weapons, ran vnto the gates, and the Iewes who seemed to be driuen out of the citie at first fled; at last when they came vnto the gates L M gates of the towers, they inclozed the Romanes round about, and aſſaulted them vpon their backs: and they that were vpon the wals did caſt all kinde of darts and ſtones vpon them: ſo that they ſlew many, and wounded very many; for it was not eaſie to eſcape from the wals, others being behind them, and offring them violence. Moreouer, they were aſhamed that their Captaines had ſo offended, and in feare for their offence committed, both which cauſed them ſtill to perſeuere in it. And after a long conflict receiuing many wounds, and giuing as many, at laſt they put them to flight that enclozed them, and ſo the Iewes departed, and followed them to Herods monument, purſuing them with darts. And then the Iewes returned reioycing in their good fortune; and deriding the Romans for being ſo deceiued, lifting vp their ſhields and bucklers, ſhouting and reioycing.

The victory of the Iewes.

The Roman ſouldiers were receiued of their Captaines with threatnings, and of Cæſar with this ſpeech: The Iewes led only with deſperation, do all things with aduice and counſell, deuiſing deceits; and fortune fauoureth their practices becauſe they are ordered, and truſty to one another. And now the Romans, whom for their obedience and diſcipline fortune was wont to fauour, doe contrariwiſe offend herein, and for their raſh and vnaduiſed fighting are ouercome: and which is worſt of all, in Cæſars preſence offring to fight without their Captaines. Truly the military law and diſcipline will be grieued hereat, and my father very ſorrowfull to heare of this. For he who from his infancy vnto old age, hath been trained vp in armes, yet did he neuer offend in this ſort; and what ſhall we ſay to our law that puniſheth the leaſt offences againſt them committed with death, when our whole army doth diſobey their Emperours command? But (quoth hee) they who ſo arrogantly haue diſobeied our command, ſhall preſently vnderſtand, that among the Romans, victory againſt the Generals command is an infamy. Titus, hauing thus ſpoken in anger to the Captaines, euidently declared to them what and how he purpoſed to puniſh them. And they preſently deſpaired, as though by and by they were iuſtly condemned to die. But all the other legions flocking about Titus, beſought him to pardon their fellow ſouldiers, and to remit the offence of the raſhneſſe of ſome few, for the obedience ſake of the reſt: affirming that their future valour ſhould be a ſufficient recompence for this their offence. Cæſar was now pacified, partly thinking what was moſt profitable, partly for the intreaty of the reſt: for he purpoſed to puniſh one man only, and to rebuke the reſt, and ſignifie to them his diſpleaſure, and ſo he was reconciled to his ſouldiers, ſtraightly charging them to be wiſer hereafter: and after, he deuiſed now to be reuenged on the Iewes for this deceit. When all the ground betweene the wals of Ieruſalem and his army was in 4. daies made plaine, Titus being deſirous ſafely to conduct the baggage and the reſt of the multitude in ſafety, he placed the ſtrongeſt of all his ſouldiers euery one in his ranke ſeuen by ſeuen, and cauſed them to march from the North part of the City vnto the Weſt, all along without the City wals, placing the footmen in the forefront, and in the laſt place the horſemen three in a ranke, and betweene them both the Archers. So the Iewes not able now to make any excurſions, Titus ſouldiers being thus diſpoſed of, the baggage of the three legions and the multitude paſſed along without any danger. And Titus himſelfe being now within two furlongs of the City wals, pitched his tent againſt that corner of the wall that is called Pſephinos, where the compaſſe of the wall from the North bends into the Weſt: the other part of the army entrenched themſelues againſt that part of the wall that is called Hippicos, diſtant in like manner two furlongs from the City. But the tenth legion remained ſtill in mount Oliuet where it was before.

CHAP. VII.

The deſcription of Ieruſalem.

THe Citie was compaſſed with a threefold wall on euery ſide, ſaue onely on that part where it was inclozed with vallies inacceſſible: for on that ſide it had onely one wall. It was built vpon two little hils, one of them being oppoſite vnto another, and ſeparated one from another with a vally, which was wonderfully repleniſhed with houſes. One of theſe hils whereon ſtandeth the vpper part of the City, is far higher and ſteeper then the other, inſomuch that becauſe of the ſtrength of it, King Dauid in times paſt called it a Caſtle. (This Dauid was the father of King Salomon, who firſt builded the Temple in that place) but wee at this day call it the high market place. The other hill cald Acra, is the place where the lower part of the City ſtands. Oppoſite againſt this hill, there was alſo another lower then this Acra was, which was firſt diuided from it with a large vally, but afterward at ſuch time as the Aſmoneans raigned, raigned, they did fill vp this vally, to the intent they might ioyne the city vnto the Temple, and cut downe the top of Acra, and ſo made it lower, that it might not hide the Temple. The vally, by which we haue ſaid the two higher hils are ſeparated one from another, is called Tyropœon, and reacheth vnto Siloa (which is a fountaine abounding with ſweet water.) Without the city were two hils compaſſed with deepe vallies: and being enclozed with high rocks, they were on euery ſide inacceſſible. The moſt ancient of the three wals, by reaſon of the vallie about it, and the hill whereupon it ſtood, could not eaſily be taken: and beſide the opportunity of the place, it was very ſtrongly built, at the coſt and charges of Dauid, Salomon, and other Kings. This wall, beginning at the tower called Hippicos, reacheth to that called Xyſtus, and afterward being ioyned vnto the Palace, it endeth in the Weſt porch of the Temple: on the other ſide towards the Weſt it begins at the ſame tower; and paſſing by the place that is called Betiſo, it deſcends vnto the gate of the Eſſeans, and ſo into the South, and from thence againe it bendeth into the Eaſt, where alſo is Salomons pond, and reacheth vnto the place called Ophlan, where it is ioyned vnto the Eaſt porch of the Temple. The ſecond wal beginneth at the gate that is called Genath, which is a gate of the former wall, and it onely compaſſeth the North part of the city, and reacheth to Antonia, a Caſtle ſo called. The third wall beginneth at the tower Hippicos, from whence it goeth into the North part, and from thence it commeth vnto the tower Pſephina, ouer againſt the Sepulchre of Helena that was Queene of Adiabena, and mother of King Izates: and paſſing along by the Kings caues, it turneth towards the tower neere the monument of Fullo, and in the vallie called Cedron it ioyneth with the old wall. Agrippa compaſſed that part of the City that he built, with this wall, it being before all open without defence. For the city grew ſo populous, that by little and little they were forced to inhabit ſome part without the wals: and this wall reacheth a great way, being ioyned vnto the hill next the city on the North ſide of the Temple. There was alſo a fourth hill inhabited, named Bezetha, ſituate againſt Antonia, but ſeparated from it with very deep ditches, which were made of purpoſe, leſt that the foundation of Antonia being ioyned vnto it, it might be eaſier to come vnto, and ſeeme lower: for the deepeneſſe of the ditch maketh the tower ſeeme much higher then otherwiſe it would. This place being added vnto the City, is called in that countrey language Bezetha, which ſignifieth the new City. And the inhabitants deſiring that part to be fortified, Agrippa, father to this Agrippa that finiſht the wall, did begin that wall aforementioned: and fearing leſt Claudius Cæſar, hearing how ſumptuous a wall he built, ſhould miſtruſt that he purpoſed to reuolt, he onely laid the foundation of it, and ſo left it vnfiniſhed.

For the city could neuer haue been taken by force, if he had finiſht that wall as he began it, it being built with ſtones 20. cubits long, and 10. cubits broad, which could neither eaſily bee vndermined, nor battered with engines: and this wall was built ten cubits high, and no doubt had been raiſed higher, had not his liberality who began this building been hindered. Yet againe by the Iewes induſtry the ſame wall was raiſed 20. cubits high, the battlements hereof were two cubits high, and the tower 3. cubits, and in all it was 24. cubits high, as before. Vpon the wall were three towers 20. cubits broad, and 20. cubits high, built foure-ſquare very ſtrongly, and was builded of as firme a foundation as the wall it ſelfe, which for the building and faire ſtone was not inferiour to the Temple aboue. Within this ſtrong tower, which reached twenty cubits high, were roomes for men to dwell in, and ciſternes to receiue raine-water, and large turning ſtaires to goe into euery place there: and this third wall had fourſcore and ten of theſe towers, and betweene euery tower were two hundred cubites ſpace. The middle wall had fourteene towers, and the old wall had threeſcore, and the compaſſe of the whole city was three and thirty furlongs. And although the third wall was admirable, yet the tower of Pſephina, which was built vpon a corner of the wall, betweene the North and the Weſt part of the city, had a certaine excellency of more wonder, againſt which part Titus had encamped himſelfe: for it was ſeuenty cubits high, ſo that from thence vpon a cleere Sun-ſhine day, one might diſcouer Arabia, and ſee the vttermoſt parts of all the dominions of the Hebrewes vnto the ſea, and it had eight corners. Iuſt oppoſite to this was the tower Hippicos, and neere vnto it were other two, that King Herod builded vpon the old wall, which in bigneſſe, beauty and ſtrength, did ſurpaſſe all others in the whole world.

The third wal had 90. towers

Pſephina was 70. cubites high.

For King Herod, beſides his naturall liberality and deſire to adorne this City, did alſo for his owne pleaſure ſo beautifie this building, that it might excell all other, and dedicated them to three moſt renowned perſonages, whoſe names they alſo did bear, to wit, to his brother, his friend and to his wife, ſhe being (as is aforeſaid) put to death for iealouſie; the other two being ſlaine in warres

Herod called three towers by the names of three his moſt deareſt friends.

A warres, after they had fought valiantly. The tower Hippicos cald by the name of his friend, had foure corners, and euery one of them were fiue and and twenty cubits broad, and as many in length, and thirty cubits in height, being in no place hollow: and aboue the high places and ſtone-worke, there was a well to receiue raine-water, twenty cubits deepe: and aloft of it were houſes with double roofes twenty fiue cubits high, and diuided into many roomes: and aboue them were battlements two cubits high, and turrets three cubits high: ſo that the whole height was accounted to be fourſcore and fiue cubits. The ſecond tower that by his brothers name he called Phaſaelus, was in breadth and length forty cubits, and ſo many cubits high, in figure of a ſquare pillar, all which height was ſolid, and not hollow within: and aboue this a porch tenne B cubits high, decked with turrets and pinnacles. Ouer the midſt of this porch he built another tower diſtinguiſhed into goodly roomes and ſumptuous baths, that it ſhould not want any thing neceſſary for a Prince: on the top it was beautified with turrets and pinnacles, ſo that all his height was almoſt fourſcore and ten cubits: And it reſembled the tower Pharus at Alexandria, wherein continuall light is kept to guide the ſeamen that ſaile thither, ſauing that it had a greater compaſſe then it. And in this houſe now at this time did Simon lodge, who tyrannized ouer the people. The third tower was, according to the Queenes name, called Mariamme, the wife of Herod, twenty cubits high, all ſolid, and other twenty cubits broad, hauing more magnificent and beautifull houſes and lodgings then the reſt. For the King ſo thought it meet, that the tower called by his wiues name, ſhould be more beautifull then they who onely bare the names of o- C ther men, like as they were ſtronger then this that bare the name of a woman. This tower was in all 55. cubits high.

The yeere of the world, 4034. after Chriſts birth, 72.

Hippicos 85. cubits high.

Phaſaelus 90. cubits high.

Mariamme a goodly tower 55. cubits high

Notwithſtanding theſe three towers were of ſuch height, yet by reaſon of their ſituation they ſeemed far higher: for the old wall whereupon they were built was placed vpon high ground, and the top of the hill whereupon they ſtood was aboue thirty cubits high, whereby their height was much increaſed. The greatneſſe alſo was admirable; for it was not ordinary ſtone which men might beare, but all white marble, whereof euery ſtone was twenty cubits long, and ten cubits broad, and fiue cubits thicke: and they were ſo coupled one to another, that euery ſtone by it ſelfe ſeemed a tower; and ſo cunningly conioyned by workemens hands, that euery tower ſeemed one ſtone. And theſe were placed on the North ſide of the City; and adioyning D to them within the City, was ſituate the Kings Palace, ſurpaſſing all that can be ſpoken of it: which for greatneſſe and excellent worke may be compared to all that were in the world. It was compaſſed about with a wall thirty cubits high, and adorned with goodly towers round about, euery one of like diſtance from other, beautified with dwelling houſes and lodgings for a hundreth of the Nobility. The variety of the marble it was built withall, was admirable, all ſorts being there vſed that were neuer ſo rare to be found: and the tops of theſe houſes for the length of the beames and the beauty thereof paſſed all credit; and the multitude of roomes and diuerſity of buildings, all filled and adorned with houſhold ſtuffe and furniture. And in euery roome there were many veſſels of gold and ſiluer, and many porches round about, one anſwerable vnto another, and pillars in euery one. And there were many pleaſant walkes repleniſhed with diuers E trees, and many walking places or allies, all beſet with conduits that ſpouted vp water on high, and ciſternes full of brazen images, from which ran out water: and about the water many doue-houſes full of tame pigeons. But it is impoſſible ſufficiently to declare the riches and beauty of the Kings Palace; and a griefe to thinke what goodly things, and how rich the theeues did there ſet on fire: for theſe things were not burnt by the Romans, but by the ſeditious theeues (as is before ſaid) at the beginning of this rebellion, who conſumed all with fire, euen from the Caſtle Antonia from whence the fire came, and deſtroied the Kings Palace, and the couers and tops of the three towers. The Temple was, as is before ſaid, built vpon a hard mountaine, and at the firſt, the Plaine vpon the top thereof was ſcarcely big enough to containe it and the Temple yard, the hill being very ſteep. But when King Salomon, who alſo built the Temple, had compaſſed F the Eaſt part thereof with a wall, he alſo placed a porch vpon the rampire, and ſo for many ages after, it lay vnfenſt on other parts: wherefore the people euery day bringing earth thither, at laſt made it plaine and large enough: and breaking down the North wall, they tooke in all that ſpace which the Temple had continually occupied euen vntill now: and the hill being now enclozed with a threefold wall, it was a worke paſſing all expectation in building. To the effecting wherof many ages were ſpent, and all the holy treaſure offred to God, euen from all parts of the world, was employed therein, as well in the buildings of the higher as of the lower part of the Temple; the foundations whereof were laid three hundreth cubits deepe, and in many places more: yet could could not all the height of the foundations be ſeene, being now buried in vallies that were filled vp to make them equall with the ſtraight ſtreets of the city. The ſtones of this building were of forty cubits: for the abundance of treaſure and liberality of the people did effect that which was ſcarcely poſſible: and that which all men thought could neuer haue come to paſſe, in time and by induſtry came to perfection. G

The porches were built of white marble ſtone ſuſtaind by pillars.

The building was anſwerable vnto theſe foundations. For all the porches were double, and euery one was ſupported by pillars, each of them being fiue and twenty cubits high, and all of one piece and of white marble: the top whereof was all of Cedar, whoſe naturall beauty for the good conioyning of this wood and poliſhing therof, did aſtoniſh all that beheld it, being adorned neither with painting nor carued works. Theſe porches were thirty cubites broad: and the compaſſe of them altogether, with the fort of Antonia, was 6. furlongs. All the ground whereon ſtood no building, was curiouſly wrought and paued with all ſorts of ſtones. The way to the 2. Temple was all enclozed with ſtones of lattice work, which were 3. cubits high, and moſt beautifully wrought along: in which place alſo were placed certaine pillars equally diſtant one from another, to ſhew the law of purification; ſome being written vpon in Latine letters, other ſome in Greek, forbidding all ſtrangers to enter into the holy place: for the ſecond Temple is called the holy place. To goe vnto the ſecond from the firſt, one muſt paſſe vp fourteene ſtaires, and it was fourſquare aloft, and enclozed with a wal by it ſelfe; whoſe outſide being forty cubits high, was all couered with ſtaires to aſcend vp vnto it; and within, it was fiue and twenty cubits high: for all the part of the inner ſide was vnſeen, becauſe it was built on the deſcent of a hil. After the fourteene ſtaires there was a Plaine made leuell with the wall of three hundreth cubites: from thence paſſed on fiue other ſtaires which lead vnto the gates, whereof on the Northſide and the South there were eight, foure on each ſide, and two on the Eaſt. For it was neceſſary that there ſhould be a peculiar place for women to exerciſe their deuotion in, which alſo was inclozed with a wall. And ſo it was neceſſary there ſhould be two doors: and againſt the firſt gate there was oppoſite vnto it one gate on the North ſide, and another on the South, both ſeparated from the reſt, whereby one entred the place allotted for women; for it was not lawfull for any to paſſe by any other gate vnto the women, neither could they go beyond their own doore, becauſe of the wall: for that place was common both to the women of that nation, and alſo to all ſtrange women that came for religion ſake. There was no gate on the Weſt part, but a wall that reacheth all along in that place. Between the gates were porches oppoſite one againſt another, reaching from the wall vnto the treaſure houſe, ſupported with great and goodly pillars, being as plain and fully as bigge as they below. The gates were couered with gold and ſiluer, as alſo the poſts and foreparts thereof were, one onely excepted that was couered with Corinthian braſſe, far ſurpaſſing in beauty the other that were couered with ſiluer and gold. In euery gate there were two doores, each one thirty cubits high, and fifteene cubites broad: and after the entrance where they were made larger, euery one had on each ſide ſeats thirty cubites long, and large like a tower, and forty cubites high, each one ſupported with two pillars twelue cubites thicke. And all other gates were of like greatneſſe; but that which was couerd with Corinthian braſſe, which was the entrance into the place allotted for the women, and opened into the Eaſt gate of the Temple, doubtleſſe was bigger then the reſt: for it was 50. cubits high (the gates whereof were forty cubits) and was more richly adorned then the reſt: for the couer of gold and ſiluer was thicker then it was in the reſt, which Alexander Tiberius his father had melted, to couer all the nine gates. And there were fifteene ſtaires, that went from the wall that ſeparated the women, vnto the great gate of the Temple: for theſe ſtaires were ſhorter by fiue degrees, then thoſe that went to other gates. The Temple it ſelfe was ſituated in the midſt of all, to wit, the holy Sanctuary, and had twelue ſtaires to goe vnto it. The forepart whereof was in height and breadth a hundreth cubites: and behind, it was forty cubits outright: and before, it was as it were two ſhoulders on each ſide riſing vp in height twenty cubits. The firſt gate hereof was ſeuenty cubits high, and twenty fiue wide, and had no doore: for it ſignified that heauen was ſpred all ouer, and might be ſeene in euery place: and all the foreparts were gilded with gold, and all the firſt building did appeare and might be ſeene without, and all that was within and about the gate gliſtered with gold. The inner part thereof was diuided into two rooms, whereof onely the firſt roome might be ſeene, which was in height foureſcore and ten cubites, and in length forty, and in breadth twenty. The inner gate was (as is already ſaid) all gilded with gold, and all the wall about it, and aboue it: it had a golden vine, whereon were hanging cluſters of grapes all of gold, euery cluſter being as long as a man is high. And becauſe the height was ſeeled aboue, the inner

Temple

A Temple did ſeeme to be lower then it was without,and it had golden gates 55.cubites high,and 16. cubits broad.

The yeere of the world, 4034. after Chriſts birth, 72.

It had hangings alſo of the ſame length,which was a Babylonian vail,all wrought with violet and purple ſilke and ſcarlet, admirable to behold: the permixtion of which colours had a myſticall meaning,bearing as it were the ſignification of the whole world. For the ſcarlet doth ſeem to expreſſe the fire,the ſilke ſignifieth the earth, the violet ſheweth the aire,and the purple declares the ſea,partly in their colours reſembling them,partly alſo as hauing their beginning from them: for the purple is ingendred in the ſea,and the ſilk is produced by the earth. In this tapeſtry work was curiouſly wrought, and deciphered all the ſpeculations of the heauens, onely the Celeſtiall B ſignes excepted. Being entred within,you come into a lower place of the Temple,which was 60. cubits high, and as many in length, and twenty in breadth. Againe, this place was diuided into two, whereof the firſt part contained forty cubits, hauing in it three moſt admirable things, and famous thorow out the world,to wit,a candleſtick,a table,and the altar of incenſe: vpon the candleſticke ſeuen lampes were placed,which ſignifieth the ſeuen planets (for ſo many did there come all out of one ſtemme of the candleſticke) vpon the table were ſtanding twelue loaues of bread,ſignifying the twelue celeſtiall ſignes,and reuolution of the yeere. By the altar of incenſe, out of which proceedeth 13. odours, comming partly from the ſea which is vnhabitable, and partly from the earth which is inhabited,is ſignified that all things are in the hands of God,and ſubiect to yeeld him obedience. The inner part of the Temple contained 20. cubites,which alſo C was ſeparated from the other part by a vail,and nothing was within it:and this place was the holy of holies, and no man might enter, looke into it, nor violate the ſame. On each ſide of the lower Temple, there were many lodgings and doores to paſſe into, euery one of them hauing three roofes one aboue another: and there was a gate which led vnto both ſides of the Temple, and vnto theſe roomes:but the higher part of the Temple had not the like roomes on each ſide, and therefore it was made ſo much narrower then the other,yet was it higher then it by 40. cubits, neither was it ſo gorgeous as the lower. For the whole height was 100. cubites, and the ground thereof ſixty. The vttermoſt part was ſo curious and richly wrought,that it was vnpoſſible for any one to imagine any workmanſhip that it wanted: for it was all couered with a maſſiue plate of pure gold, which ſhined far brighter then the morning ſunne, ſo that it dazled the eyes D of the beholders,as doth the ſun when it is gazed vpon. And a far off it ſeemd vnto ſtrangers that came thither,like a white mountaine: for where the Temple was not gilded with gold,there was it milk white. The top hereof was all ſet full of rods of gold, very ſharpe at the vpper end like pikes, leſt the birds ſhould come and ſit thereon, and ſo defile it: many ſtones wherewithall it was built,were 45. cubits large, fiue cubits in length, and ſixe cubits broad. Before the Temple there ſtood an Altar fifteene cubits high, being forty cubits broad,and as many long, and foure ſquare,hauing corners made like hornes. The way to this Altar was on the South ſide, where it by little and little mounted from below euen vnto the Altar. This Altar was builded without yron,and neuer yron did touch it. The Temple and the Altar were enclozed with ſtone-worke, beautifull to behold, which was a cubit high, ſeparating the people from the Prieſts. Thoſe that E were troubled with a fluxe of their ſeed, and Lepers were expulſed out of the city; and women alſo hauing their monethly courſes,and thoſe that were not vncleane,might paſſe this foreſaid limit. Likewiſe men that were not purified,were not permitted to come within the inner Temple; and thoſe that were,might not come among the Prieſts: thoſe alſo that deſcended from the line of the Prieſts, and for blindneſſe did not adminiſter their function, were notwithſtanding admitted into the place appointed for the reſt of the Prieſts that were ſound, and had a ſhare as they had; yet did they goe attired as lay-men, for onely he that did ſacrifice, might weare Prieſtly attire.

The outward court of the Temple couered with many plates of gold.

The Prieſts that came vnto the Altar and Temple had no infirmity,and they were clothed in a fine linnen garment, and abſtained from wine, and liued in abſtinence for reuerence of religion, F leſt they ſhould ſinne whilſt they offred ſacrifices. The high Prieſt alſo aſcended with the Prieſts into the Temple; yet not alwaies, but euery Seuenth day, and in the Calends of euery moneth, or on a feſtiuall celebrated according to the cuſtome of their country, or wherein all the people were preſent. And then he ſacrificed being girded with a vaile, which couered his thighes euen vnto his priuities, vnder which hee wore a linnen garment hanging downe vnto his feet, and aboue it a round violet garment all fringed at the skirts, and hanged full of golden belles, and pomegranats of gold,firſt one and then another: the bels ſignified thunder, and the pomegranats lightning. Vpon his breſt he wore a veſture of fiue colours; to wit,gold,purple,ſcarlet,ſilke and violet, violet, which also (as we haue said) the vails of the Temple were wrought withall. He had like- G wise a rotchet of the same, wherin was more gold, & in shape it was like the garment he wore on his body down to the thighes: it was also buttoned with two golden buttons, made in the forme of Aspes, wherein was inclozed the greatest and most precious Sardonyx stones that could be found, bearing the names of the 12. tribes of Israel engrauen in them. On the other side did hang 12. precious stones, three and three in a rank, diuided into foure rowes. In the first was the Ruby, the Topaze and the Emeraud: in the second the Carbuncle, the Iasper and the Saphire: in the third the Agate, the Amethyst and the Diamond: in the last the Onyx, the Beryl and Chrysolite, in e-uery one of which one name of the twelue tribes was written. Vpon his head he wore a miter of silke, which was crowned with Hyacinth: and aloft of it was another Crowne of gold, where- H in was engrauen sacred letters, to wit, the 4. vowels. He did not alwaies vse this garment, but another most commonly not so gorgeous: this he vsed when he entred into the Sanctuary, which he did onely once euery yeere alone, none else going with him, vpon which day all the nation was wont to fast. But we will hereafter speake more at large of the City and Temple, the lawes and customes, the ordinances and obseruations; for these things cannot be briefly declared. The Castle Antonia was situate in a corner of the two porches of the first Temple, which looked vnto the West and the North: and it was built vpon a rocke of stone 50. cubits high, which on eue-ry side was inaccessible: this first was built by King Herod, to shew the greatnes and magnificence of his minde. For first of all the rocke at the foot thereof was all couered with thin and slender stones like slates, which did both adorne it, and would also easily slide downe if any one walked I vpon them. Before the battlements of the fort there was a wall 3. cubits high, within which the Castle Antonia was built 40. cubits high, being within all furnished and contriued like the Palace of a King, hauing all kind of houses of office, and other necessary rooms. For there were porches, baths, and large hals, to place tents in: so that for all conuenient rooms and places it seemd to be a city, and for the magnificence thereof a Kings Palace. In outward fashion it was built like a tower, and inuironed about with 4. other towers, at euery corner one, whereof they that were on the South and East side were 70. cubits high, the other two were onely 50. So out of these 2. highest, one might haue a perfect view of the whole Temple. Where it ioyned to the porches of the Temple, there was on either side of it a paire of staires for the fouldiers to come down out of it into the Temple. For alwaies the Roman souldiers lodged there, and guarded the Temple in K armour vpon festiuall daies, lest the people should attempt any rebellion or sedition. For the Temple was as a Castle to keepe the towne in awe, and the Castle Antonia to ouerthrow the Temple: there also were placed the soldiers: likewise in Herods Palace, which serued for a Castle ouer the higher part of the city. The hill Bezetha was diuided from the city, as is before mentioned: which being the highest of all, was ioyned to part of the new city, which did obscure the view of the Temple on the North side. And thus I haue here spoken sufficiently of the city and the wall in this place, because we meane hereafter to describe them more at large.

CHAP. VII. L

How the Iewes refused to yeeld, and how they assaulted the Romanes.

15000. follow Simon.

THE most warlike of all the people ioyned with Simon, being in number ten thousand, be side the Idumæans: and those ten thousand had 50. Captains of their owne fellowes, yet all subiect vnto Simon. The Idumæans that tooke his part were fiue thousand, and had ten Captaines, the chiefe of whom were Iacob, the son of Sosas, and Simon, the sonne of Cathla.
And Iohn, who kept the Temple, had sixe thousand armed men, ouer whom were twenty Captaines: and then there came vnto him two thousand of the Zelous, and foure hundreth, who before had followed Eleazar and Simon, the sonne of Iairus. So these warring one against another, the people was their booty, and the multitude that were not seditious as they were, was their prey. Simon kept the higher part of the City, and the greater wall euen vnto Cedron, M and all that part of the old wall which is betweene Siloa and the Palace of Monobazus, who was King of Adiabena, that lieth beyond the riuer Euphrates: hee also kept all the hill Acra (which is the lower part of the city) vnto Helenas Palace, who was Monobazus his mother.
But Iohn kept all the Temple and the space about it, Ophla, and the vally Cedron: and that which was between these two places which Simon and Iohn kept, was all consumed with fire, and made a place to fight in. For although the Romans tents were pitched neere vnto the wals of the city, yet did not this sedition cease; but hauing recouered some security a while at the Romans first comming,

Simons camp against Iohn.

A comming presently they returned vnto their former wont. And diuiding themselues againe, euery man fought for his owne part, doing all that the Romans could wish to be done. For the Romanes did them no more harme then they did themselues: for after them the City suffered no new calamity, but indured farre more miserie before it was taken and destroyed by the Romans, then it did at that time. For the Romans in destroying it, did rather end their misery then bring them into it. For the seditious did take the city, and the Romans did ouercome and take the seditious, which was farre stronger then the wals: so that one may ascribe all their miseries to their owne nation, and equity and iustice vnto the Romans, as euery one shall cleerely see by that which ensued.

The yeere of the world, 4034. after christs birth, 72.

The seditious tooke the city, and the Romans ouercame & tooke the seditious.

B The City being in the estate beforesaid, Titus with chosen horsmen went vp and downe without it, to espy where he might most easily assault the wals. And being in doubt a long time what to doe, for that where the vally was, footmen could not possibly get vp to it: and where it was walled, they seemed to be impossible to be battered downe with engines: At last he determined to assault it on that part, where was the monument of Iohn the high Priest: for only in this place the first wall was lower then in other places, and it was not compast here with the second wall, for this place was not fortified, because that those parts of the new City were not much inhabited. So that from this place the wall might easily be assaulted: wherby Titus was perswaded that the higher city, and the Temple, and Antonia, might easily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends called Nicanor, came vnto him: who was shot in the left shoulder with an

Titus circulting the wall, seeketh which way he should attempt his battery.

C arrow, because he desired to come neere Ioseph, who went thither of purpose to perswade the Iewes which were vpon the wall to yeeld: for Nicanor was very eloquent. Cæsar perceiuing their minds, and that they would not abstaine from him, who perswaded them to that which was most expedient for them, was now moued, and began earnestly to besiege them: and so he permitted his soldiers to waste all the suburbes, and to gather all the rubbish, stones, wood, & other matter together, and made therewith a mount. And diuiding his army into three parts, he disposed of euery one what he should doe, and in the midst of all vpon the mounts he placed archers, and before them engines for shot, wherewithall he hindered the incursions of his enemies, lest they should annoy the work, and also did beate those off from the wall, who made any resistance from thence. And presently all trees being cut downe, the suburbes appeared naked. Whilst the

D Romans, hauing gathered the wood together, were busied in their work, the Iewes were not idle: and then the people, who were troubled with murders and robberies, did hope to haue an end of their misery, the seditious people being busied against their enemies: and they now hoped that if the Romans did ouercome, they might be reuenged vpon them. Iohn still kept where he was, fearing Simon; yet were his followers very earnest to assault the Romans. But Simon being next vnto the siege, did not rest, but placed all along that part of the wall, men with darts, which before were taken from Sestius Gouernour of the Romans, and found in the Castle of Antonia. But the darts did the Iewes small pleasure, by reason that few of them knew how to vse them: onely some who were taught by certaine that fled from the Romanes, could vse them a little. Yet did they assault the Roman souldiers that were building the mounts, with arrowes and stones; and

The darts did the Iewes little good, because they were not expert in vsing them.

E also made incursions vpon them by companies, and fought with them. But the Roman workmen were defended by hurdles that were of purpose set before them: and euery legion had strange and admirable engines against the excursions of their enemies, and especially the engines that the tenth legion had to cast darts, and others that cast stones; which did not onely repulse them, by whom they were assaulted, but also those that stood vpon the wall: for euery stone was a talent weight, and were shot more then a furlong, and slew not only those that they did first strike, but also many that were striken with the rebound. But the Iews alwaies espied the stones before they came (for they were white) and so auoided them: and they were not only descried by the noyse they made in flying, but they might easily be perceiued: and by this meanes the watchmen in the towers gaue warning alwaies when these engines were shot off, and when the stones came,

F crying in their country language, The stone commeth: so the Iewes vpon the walles knowing what they meant, auoided the stones, and so receiued no harme. Then the Romanes deuised to blacke the stones with inke, and so they could not be seene as they flew, but at one stroke slew many. But the Iewes were not herewith so terrified, that they permitted the Romans peaceably to build the mount, but night and day they hindered them with stratagemes and valour. Now when the Romanes had finished their worke, the Carpenters measured the space betweene the mounts and the walles with a plummet fastned vnto a line, which they cast from one place vnto another: for they could not measure it otherwise, because of the darts cast from the walles; and finding that they had Rammes long enough, they ſet them vp, and Titus commanded the wall to be battered in three places, to the end that the batterie might not be hindered. The noiſe that theſe rams did make, was heard round about the city; and the citizens cried mainely out, and the ſeditious perſons were alſo ſore afraid. And ſeeing themſelues all in like danger, they now determined to ioyne all together in reſiſting the Romans: and the ſeditious cryed one vnto another, ſaying, that they rather aſſiſted the enemies, then reſiſted them: and therefore exhorted one another at leaſt for that time to become friends, if not for euer, only to reſiſt the Romans. And Simon ſent a cryer vnto the Temple, licenſing all ſuch as would, to come vnto the wals: which alſo Iohn did permit, notwithſtanding he miſtruſted Simon: ſo they forgetting their old quarrell, ioyned all together, and reſiſted the Romans, and guarding the wals round, they caſt much fire vpon the engines of the Romans, and againſt thoſe that did rule them; and threw darts againſt them without intermiſſion: and the boldeſt amongſt them in great companies leapt downe, and deſtroyed that wherewith the engines were couered, and aſſaulted thoſe that ſtood to defend them; and ſo did the Romans much harme, by reaſon of their deſperate boldneſſe, more then by their skill.

Titus commandeth the wall to bee battered in three places.

The ſeditious forgetting their hatred and diſcords ioyne in one.

Titus was ſtill at hand to ſuccour them that ſtood in need: and placing horſmen and Archers about the engines, he repulſed the Iewes who came to caſt fire, and repreſſed them that caſt darts, and ſhot arrowes from the towers, and ſo gaue the rams time and opportunity to beat the wals. Yet for all this the wal was not ſhaken with rams, ſaue only that the ram of the 5. legion did ſhake the corner of a tower; but yet the wall ſtood firme, and was not harmed by the ſhaking of the tower: for it was far higher then the wall, and ſo could not draw downe any part of the wall as it fell. So ſoone as they had a while ceaſed from excurſions, they perceiued that all the Romanes were buſied in one labour or other, and ſo diſperſed all ouer the camp, thinking that the Iews for feare durſt come no more. The Iews all ſecretly iſſued out of the gate by the tower Hippicos, and caſt fire vpon the works, and courageouſly made incurſion vpon the Romans euen vnto the rampire of their campe. The Romans ſeeing what danger might enſue, preſently aſſembled themſelues, both they that were neer, and thoſe that were far off. The diſcipline of the Romans ouercame the fury of the Iewes: and putting thoſe to flight that firſt met them, they aſſaulted thoſe that oppoſed themſelues againſt them afterward. So there began a grieuous battell about the engines; the Iewes ſtriuing to fire them, and the Romans fighting to hinder them: and a doubtfull cry was raiſed on both parts, and many in the forefront were ſlain on both ſides. But the Iews audacity got them the vpper hand; and their fire did ſomething touch the engines: and all had been conſumed quite with fire, had not the choſen ſoldiers that came from Alexandria hindred it, who for the opinion that they had of themſelues did fight ſtoutly: for they were accounted to haue been the moſt valiant of all in this battell; till ſuch time as the Emperour with certaine ſelected horſmen, came and ſet violently vpon the enemies: and he himſelfe ſlew twelue men that did reſiſt him, for whoſe deaths the reſt fearing fled, and were forced to retire themſelues into the City, and ſo ſaued the engines from being fired. It chanced that one of the Iewes was in this fight taken aliue, and Titus commanded that he ſhould be crucified before the wall, that perhaps the reſt being herewithall terrified might yeeld. After Cæſar was retired, Iohn the Captaine of the Idumæans talking vpon the wall with one of his friends, being ſtriken in the breſt with an arrow by an Arabian ſouldier, preſently died: which cauſed great lamentation among the Iewes, and ſorrow amongſt the ſeditious, for he was valiant of his hands, and very wiſe, and of good aduice.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the fall of the tower: and how the two walles were taken.

THE night following, there was a great tumult amongſt the Romanes. For Titus the Emperour had commanded to be builded three towers, fifty cubits high apiece, each one vpon a ſeuerall mount, that from thence hee might the more eaſily beate the enemies from off the walles: but one of theſe towers in the middeſt of the night fell downe without any aſſault. And making a great noiſe with the fall, feare fell vpon the whole army; who ſuſpecting that it came to paſſe by ſome ſtratagem wrought by the Iewes, euery one ranne and armed himſelfe, and ſo there was a great tumult in the army: and for that no man could tell what the matter was, a long time, they ſtood as it were all amazed, euery one asking his fellow what had hapned. And ſeeing no enemies come, they began to feare ſome treaſon amongſt themſelues; and ſo were in a great feare they knew not wherefore, til ſuch time as Titus vnderſtanding the

A the matter, cauſed the truth thereof to be preſently proclaimed thorowout the campe; and ſo the tumult (although with much adoe) was appeaſed. The yeere of the world, 4034. after Chriſts birth, 72.

The Iewes valiantly bearing and induring all other dangers, were ſore troubled by reaſon of theſe towers which Titus had erected; for they were ſlaine and wounded from thence with ſmall engine ſhot, darts and arrowes; neither could they build themſelues any ſo high, nor was there any hope to deſtroy them: for neither could they be throwne downe for their waight, nor fired, becauſe they were couered with yron: and ſo they flying out of the reach of the ſhot, did not ſeeke to hinder the ram from battering their wals; which neuer ceaſing, at laſt preuailed ſomewhat. So the great ram, which the Iewes called Nicon, becauſe it ouercame all, at laſt battered
B the wall; and the Iewes being weary with fighting, for that they had watched all the night before, for ſloth, or elſe becauſe they perſwaded themſelues that the wall was ſuperfluous, they hauing two more beſide it, they all forſooke their quarters, and retired themſelues vnto the ſecond wall; and the Romans entred the firſt, that the ram called Nicon had battered. Then the Romans that had paſſed and entred the firſt wall, went and opened the gates and let in the whole army. Hauing thus gotten the wall the ſeuenth day of May, they deſtroyed the greateſt part thereof; and alſo the North ſide of the city which before Ceſtius had waſted.

Nicon, that is to ſay Victor, the Romans great ramme.

The Romans get the firſt wall.

Titus remooued his campe from thence, and went vnto the place called the Aſſyrians campe, and ſeized vpon all betweene that and Cedron; and being without the ſhot of an arrow from the ſecond wall, he began againe to aſſault it. Then the Iewes diuiding the wall betwixt them to
C defend each others part, they reſiſted moſt valiantly. And Iohn and his partakers defended all Antonia, and the North part of the Temple from Alexanders tombe: and Simon defended all from Iohns tombe vnto the gate by the tower Hippicos. And many times iſſuing out at the gates they fought hand to hand with the enemy, being alwaies repulſed by the diſcipline of the Romans, only for want of knowledge in warlike affaires; and ſtill in all fights vpon the wall they got the beſt: for the Romans were aſſiſted by fortune and knowledge, and the Iewes with deſperate boldneſſe which came of feare; for they are of ſtout courage in aduerſity. Moreouer, the Iewes were mooued to fight, in hope that way to ſaue their owne liues: and the Romanes to get a ſpeedy conqueſt. Neither party was weary, neither did they euer ceaſe from aſſaulting one another: all the day long the Iewes in whole companies made excurſions againſt the Romanes,
D and they omitted no kind of fight, beginning at Sunne-riſe, and continuing all night long, farre more terrible to them both then in all the day before: the Iewes feared leſt that the Romanes ſhould get the wall; and the Romanes likewiſe miſdreaded that the Iewes ſhould inuade their campe. Thus ſtill all night long being armed, early in the morning they were prepared againe to fight. The Iewes did one ſtriue with another who ſhould vndergoe the moſt danger, and ſo deſerue his Captains fauour. Simons followers did greatly reuerence and feare him, inſomuch as if he ſhould haue commanded any of them to haue killed himſelfe, he would preſently haue done it. The Romans were encouraged to fight, by their wont and cuſtome in getting the victory, and that they were not wont to be ouercome: againe, their frequent and daily wars and continuall exerciſes, and large dominions gaue the like courage, and eſpecially Titus their Generall ſtill preſent
E in all their affaires greatly ſtirred them forward: for euery one thought it a hainous crime to be a coward in the preſence of ſuch a Captaine as Cæſar was. Cæſar himſelfe beholding and looking on, who alſo was a witneſſe of their deeds that behaued themſelues valiantly, would reward euery man for his valour: beſide that, it was aduantage to be eaſily knowne vnto the Prince for a valiant man: ſo that many of them ſhewed that their alacrity was farre greater then their ſtrength. At this time Longinus one of the horſmen comming out of the Roman army, preaſed into the midſt of the Iewes forces, and caſting them downe that ſtood in his way, by this violence he ſlew two of the ſtrongeſt of the enemies amongſt them, ſtriking one of them ouer the face, and ſlaying the other with his owne dart he took from him: who for this deed was greatly honoured, hauing broken thorow a ſtrong army of the Iewes, that were placed before the wals,
F and caſt darts at him on either ſide. Many of the Romans by this his example were enticed to doe the like. The Iewes now regarded not what they ſuffered, but onely deuiſed which way to harme their enemy; nothing eſteeming death, ſo that they might kill ſome one of the Romanes. But Titus had as much care to preſerue his ſouldiers, as he had to get the victory; affirming theſe raſh aſſaults to proceed of deſperation: and that only was to be accounted for vertue, when one did warily not indanger himſelfe to atchieue any worthy action, and willed them rather to ſhew themſelues men where there was no danger.

CHAP. IX.

How CASTOR the Iew derided the Romanes.

THEN Titus commanded the ramme to be set vp against the tower on the North part of the Citie, wherein a craftie and politike Iew accompanied with ten men had hid himselfe, all the rest being fled: this Iew was named Castor. These men hauing lien still a while there in their armour, at last being afraid, and the tower beginning to shake, they start vp: and Castor stretching forth his hand, did as it were humbly craue fauour at Cæsars hands, and with a lamentable voice besought him to spare him. Titus seeing the mans simplicity, as hee thought, and perswading himselfe that the Iewes did now repent them of their enterprize, he caused the ram to cease from battery, and the archers to hold their hands; and withall permitted Castor to speake his pleasure. Castor said, that he desired to come and make a league of peace. And Titus answered, that he would grant it, if so be al the rest would do so likewise; and that he would presently confirme a league of peace betweene him and the city. Five of Castors fellowes seemed to be willing, and to request the like; but the other five counterfaited to withstand them, crying out aloud, that they would neuer be slaues vnto the Romanes, seeing they might die in liberty. Whilest Castor and his fellowes were debating the matter, the battery ceased. In the meane time Castor priuily sent word vnto Simon, willing him whilest the batterie ceased, to deliberate what was expedient to be done in this necessity: for he a while would deceiue the Roman Emperour, and hold him in suspence. And in the meane time he seemed to exhort his companions that denied to embrace the kind offer of Titus: & they as it were angry hereat, drew their swords and strooke vpon their corslets; and they so striken seemed to fall downe, as though they had bin slain. Titus and his souldiers were amaz'd at this their obstinacy; for being on the lower ground, they could not well perceiue what was done: and so they wondred at their desperation, and also pitied their calamity. At this time one strook Castor in the buttock with a dart, and Castor pulling it out of his flesh, shewed it vnto the Emperor; and complained of it, as being iniured. Titus presently with sharp words corrected him that shot it, and forthwith would haue sent Ioseph to promise Castor pardon and peace. But Ioseph denied to goe, affirming that Castor only dissembled, and so hindred his friends that would haue gone. At last one Aeneas, who had fled vnto the Romans, offered himselfe to goe. Castor inuited him, as though he would giue him some thing in token of his true meaning. Then Aeneas opened the skirt of his garment, thinking Castor would haue cast him downe something of worth: and when he came vnderneath the tower, Castor tooke a great stone and threw it down vpon him; yet hurt him not, because he was aware of it, and auoided the stone; but it wounded another souldier standing by. Then Cæsar considering this deceit, began to thinke that piety and mercy in wars was hurtfull, and that cruelty was not so easily deceiued; and so being very angry at this deceit, hee caused the wall to be beaten with the ramme more then before. Castor and his fellowes perceiuing the tower to shake, they set it on fire, and so passed thorow the flame, and conueied themselues into a mine of the tower; so that againe the Romans admired their courage, thinking that they had burned themselues.

Titus assaulting the wall on this part, tooke it 5. daies after that he had taken the first; and causing the Iewes to fly from thence, he accompanied with 1000. chosen men about him, entred in where the woolmen, and copperssmiths, and marchant-tailors dwelt, which place was the new city, hauing only narrow and straight waies to goe vnto the wall. And had he presently beaten down a great part of the wall, or according to the lawes of armes destroied what he had gotten, he had obtained the victory without any losse on his side. Yet now hoping the Iewes would yeeld, seeing that if he pleased he might take them by force, he gaue the more ample and easie passage to retire: for he did not thinke that they whose good he sought, would haue bin traitors vnto him.

Titus taketh the second wall.

CHAP. X.

How the Romanes did twice take the second wall.

WHen Titus was entred the city, he suffred none of them that were taken, to be slaine, nor the houses to be burned, but permitted the seditious (if they were so minded) to fight, and that without the preiudice of the people: and also promised the people to restore vnto them all their goods. For many besought him to spare the city for them; & the Temple for the

A the citie. The people were glad hereof: and many of the warlike Iewes thought the humanity of Titus to proceed from cowardize; and iudged that Titus, for that he deſpaired to winne the reſt of the citie, did now coward-like propound theſe conditions. They likewiſe threatned all the people, that whoſoeuer ſhould ſpeake one word concerning peace and yeelding vnto the Romanes, ſhould preſently dye: and ſome of them did reſiſt the Romanes from out of their houſes, and others in the narrow wayes: and others going out at the higher gates, began a battell; wherewith the watchmen being ſore troubled, fled from the wall, and forſaking the towers, they retired themſelues into their campe. The Romane ſouldiers within the city cried out, becauſe they were enclozed with enemies, the gates being ſhut, and aſſaulted without, by thoſe who ap-
B prehended their companions to bee in great danger. The number of the Iewes encreaſing, and preuailing, for that they knew the waies and turnings of the ſtreets, many of the Romanes were ſlaine, and violently borne downe, when they offered to reſiſt in that neceſſity: for a multitude together could not flye, by reaſon of the narrowneſſe of the ſtreets, that went vnto the wall: and all that entred into the city had beene ſlaine, had not Titus ſuccoured them. For placing at the beginning of euery ſtreet archers, and himſelfe being where moſt need was, he ſo did driue away the Iewes with darts and arrowes: and with him Domitius Sabinus, who in that fight was proued a ſtout warriour; who ſo long continued beating the Iewes with arrowes, till all the ſouldiers were eſcaped away.

They interpret warlike Titus humanity for cowardize.

The Romans are driuen out by the Iewes.

Thus the Romans hauing got the ſecond wall, were beaten from it againe: And the citizens fit
C for war, were hereat encouraged, and were drunken with this good fortune, thinking that now the Romans durſt no more offer to come into the citie, and that they could not be ouercome, if they did arme themſelues to fight. For God, becauſe of their iniquitie had darkened their vnderſtanding, ſo that they neuer conſidered that the Romane forces were far greater then they that were ouercome, nor the famine that preſently enſued: for as yet they liued vpon the deſtruction of the people, and dranke the blood of the citie: but the good did euen now ſuffer famine, and many of them had already periſhed for want of foode: yet the ſeditious did reioyce at the death of the Citizens, as though thereby they were eaſed of a great burthen, onely deſiring their liues that bare rebellious minds, and would ioyne with them againſt the Romans, reioycing at the death of the reſt, as free from a heauy clogge: and this was the affection they bare vnto their Citizens. And D ſo they armed themſelues and reſiſted the Romans, who now againe did attempt to enter the breach: and they threw downe ſtones and part of the wall vpon them as they came vp, and ſo draue them backe againe, and valiantly reſiſted them for three dayes. But the fourth day they were not able to withſtand Titus his aſſault, but were forced to retire, as before: and hee hauing gotten the wall, deſtroyed all the North part thereof, and placed a Garriſon in the towers and fortreſſes of the South part.

CHAP. XI.

Of the mounts raiſed to batter the third wall: and a long Oration of IOSEPHVS to perſwade the people to yeeld: and of the famine in the Citie.

TITVS now determined to batter the third wall, and he thought to continue the ſiege but a ſhort time: and that it was conuenient to giue the ſeditious ſome time to bethink themſelues, to ſee if that either by the taking of the ſecond wall, or terrified with famine, they would repent. For now there were no mo preies for them left in the city, and he lay before the wals thereof, euen as he deſired. And the time being come, that euery ſouldier ſhould receiue victuals & prouiſion for himſelfe, Titus cauſed them to be led euery one in order into a place, where the Iewes in the city might preſently behold them, and cauſed his captaines to diſtribute money to euery one: and the ſouldiers (as their cuſtome is) all armed, and drawing their ſwords out of F their ſheathes, marched along, the horſemen leading their horſes gallantly adorned, and a great part of the ſuburbs gliſtered with gold and ſiluer. This ſpectacle was gratefull to their own ſouldiers, and terrible to the Iewes: for all the old walles, and the North part of the citie, and many houſes were filled with the multitude of them, who came to view this ſight: and there was no part of the citie that was not filled with people to ſee and behold it. And feare came vpon the very boldeſt amongſt all the Iewes, ſeeing both the Romans armour and their order: and perhaps that ſhew would haue cauſed the ſeditious people to haue relented, had they not deſpaired to haue found mercy and pardon at the Romans hands for their offences committed; and ſo they thought it better presently to be slaine in warres, then to be put to death shamefully, if they desisted from fight. Destinie also hindred this, whereby it was decreed that the innocent should perish with the wicked, and the citie with the seditious, and for foure dayes space they distributing necessaries vnto the souldiers; and on the fift day Titus perceiuing that for ought he could do, the Iewes were still obstinate, he diuided his army into two parts, and about Iohns tombe he began to raise mounts, and against Antonia, hoping that waies to take the higher part of the citie, and by Antonia to seize the Temple; which except hee could effect, hee could not safely take the Citie: and against either of these places hee raised two mounts, euery legion making one. The Iewes and Simons followers did hinder the worke that was begun before Iohns tombe, and Iohn likewise with a great number of the Zelous hindred them that made the mounts ouer against Antonia: who not onely did fight with the aduantage of the higher ground, but also had now learned the vse of engines: for continuall vse by little and little made them skilfull, and they had 300. engines called Balistaes: and 40. engines to cast stones, wherewith they greatly annoyed the Romanes, and hindred them from their worke.

Destinie had decreed that the innocent should perish with the nocent, and the citie with the seditious.

The Romans in their labour are hindred by the Iewes.

Titus, foreknowing that fortune would fauour him, and that the city was like to perish, hasted to take it, neuer ceasing to perswade the Iewes to yeeld: and with his deeds he ioyned counsell. For he knew that many times words preuaile more then violence of armes, and exhorted them to saue themselues, and yeeld the city vnto him: and told them of Ioseph, how that he should make a speech vnto them in their owne language, for he hoped that they would heare their own countriman. Then Ioseph, going about the city without the danger of shot, cried vnto them to spare themselues, the Citie, the Temple, the people, and not become more hard-hearted vnto them then strangers were. For the Romans did reuerence the holy places, notwithstanding they had no society or portion in them; and how euen till this day they had abstained from violating them: and they who were nourisht with them, and might onely saue them, did willfully cause their destruction: and bade them consider that their strongest wals were batterd downe; and onely now the weaker remaining vnbattered, he willed them to consider, how they were not able to withstand the Romans forces. And that it was no newes to the Iewes, nor strange, to be subiect vnto the Romans. For although it be a good and commendable thing, to fight for liberty, yet that was to be done in the beginning: for he that was once subiect, and would rebell, hauing a long time liued vnder the obedience of the Romans, seemd rather to be desirous of a shamefull death then a louer of liberty. Moreouer, that they should disdaine to be subiect vnto base people, and not vnto them whom the whole world obeyed. For (said he) what place haue not the Romans that may be inhabited? Nay themselues might perceiue how fortune did still fauour them: And that God who guided the Empire to be placed in all parts, was now in Italy. Also that euen by the law of nature, aswell by the example of beasts as men, wee are taught to giue place vnto them that are stronger then our selues, and be contented that they should get the victory that are valianteſt in armes. And this (quoth hee) was the cause that your ancestors, who were farre more strong and politike then you, and had better meanes to resist; yet did they submit themselues vnto the Romans: which if God had not beene pleased withall, he would neuer haue permitted them to haue done. And how could they hope to resist, seeing the city was as it were already taken? And that the citizens supposing their walles were whole, yet were they all destroyed. For the Romans well knew what famine was amongst them, and how it did euery day waste the people, and would also in short time destroy the warriours amongst them. For suppose that the Romanes would cease, and not besiege the citie, nor offer with drawne swords to assault it: yet is there a ciuill warre within the Citie, which the Iewes cannot ouercome or auert, it euery day increasing: except they would also fight against hunger, and they alone ouercome aduerse fortune. Further, he added, that it was best, before intolerable calamities befell them, to change their opinion, and whilest they haue time, to bee counselled by good aduice. And that the Romans would not punish them for that which was already past, except they persisted obstinate euen vnto the end. For they are (quoth he) kind, courteous, and gentle to their subiects, and doe prefer their commodity before reuenge. And they thought it aduantage to haue the citie, and the countrey inhabited; therefore the Emperors would make a league of peace with them: but if he took the citie by force, he would not spare one, especially seeing that they were willed by him to saue themselues, and yet in their greatest necessity refused to obey him. Likewise hee told them that the third wall would also be taken very shortly, as well they might perceiue by the two walles: and suppose that the citie was inexpugnable, yet the famine would cause it to be yeelded into the Romanes hands in despite of them.

Iosephs Oration to the Iewes.

Fortune and God for the Romans.

Famine in the Citie.

As

A As Ioseph did thus aduise them, many standing vpon the wals did raile against him, many vp- braided him, and others shot at him. Ioseph seeing he could not auert them from their imminent calamities, recounted vnto them all their owne Histories making for his purpose. O wretches (quoth he) and vngratefull to them that help you: you fight against the Romans, and beare armes against them, as though this way you had conquered some others that came, as they now do, a- gainst you. When doth God the maker of all things deny help vnto vs if we be oppressed? Will ye not remember your selues? For what cause did you enterprize these warres, and how great a friend and assister of yours do you daily offend? Do ye not remember the miraculous works of your ancestors, and this holy place, and how in times past it was by the enemies destroied? But I
B quake and tremble to recount the works of God to such vnworthy hearers: yet harken, that you may know that you do not onely resist the Romans, but also God himselfe. Nechias at that time King of Egypt, who also was called Pharao, came, and with an infinite army took away Queen Sa- ra, the mother of our nation. And what did our first father Abraham in this case? Did hee with » weapons and armes reuenge this iniury? hauing vnder his command three hundreth and 18. cap- » taines, and vnder them an infinite multitude? Or did he rather desist from warre, perceiuing God » not to accompany him? wherefore lifting vp pure and vndefiled hands towards this holy place, » which now you haue defiled and profaned, he chose God an inuincible helper to aide him. And » was not the Queene the second night after sent home againe vnto him vntouched? And the E- » gyptian adoring this holy place, which ye haue polluted with murders of your owne nation, and »
C trembling at the visions he saw in the night time, fled, rewarding the Hebrewes with gold and sil- » uer, whom he perceiued to be so beloued of God. Shall I recount vnto you the going of our an- » cestors into Egypt? who hauing for foure hundreth yeeres been slaues vnto the Egyptian tyrants and Kings, and able to haue reuenged themselues by force of armes, yet did they rather expect and stay Gods leisure. Who knoweth not, that then Egypt in reuenge of the Hebrewes, was filled with all kinds of serpents, and infected with all diseases, and the earth became so barren, that Ni- lus waxed dry, and the ten plagues followed one another without ceasing; whereby our ancestors » were safely deliuered without any bloodshed: for God conducted them, as willing to reserue them » for his Priests?

When the Assyrians had taken away from vs the holy Arke, did not Palestina and Dagon re-D pent that fact? did not all the nation of them that took it, weep and lament therefore? For their priuie parts being putrified, their bowels and the meat they did eate ran out there; and so with vncleane hands they were forced to bring it backe againe, with cymbals and trumpets: thereby to make satisfaction for their offence. It was God that did this for our ancestors, because that they laying their armes aside, wholly resigned themselues to his pleasure. Was Senacherib King of As- syria, comming with all his power out of Asia, and incamping himselfe before this citie, ouer- come by humane force? Did not our ancestors leauing armes, flie to prayers, and by an Angell » God in one night destroyed an infinite army? And the next day the Assyrian rising, found a hun- » dreth foure score and fiue thousand of his men dead, and so fled with the rest from the Hebrewes » being vnarmed, and not pursuing him? You know also, that in the captiuity of Babylon, where E the people liued the space of 70. yeers, they got not their liberty, till such time as God put in Cy- rus heart to suffer them to goe into their owne countrey. Who still assisting them, they againe as » the Priests in old time were wont, did serue and reuerence their helper. In briefe, our ancestors » did neuer atchieue any great matter by force of armes, neither did they leaue any thing vndone, » wherein they expected Gods helpe, but still remaining quiet at home, they ouercame their ene- » mies through his prouidence: and when they did fight after their own wils, they alwaies failed of » their expectation. For when Zedechias our King, contrary to the admonition of the Prophet Iere- my, did go forth, and fight with the King of Babylon then besieging the citie, both hee and all his were taken, and this city destroi'd. Yet consider how far your captains are inferior vnto that King, F and your selues vnto the people of those times. For Ieremy crying vp & downe the city, and say- ing that God was offended at their iniquity, and that except they did yeeld the same, it should be » taken by force; yet did not the King nor any of the people lay hands vpon him. And you (that I » may omit your iniquity done within the city, which though I would I could not sufficiently dis- » cipher) do attempt to kill me, & vsing railing speeches against me, who once gaue you wholsome » counsell for your good; only for that I put you in mind of your sins, you not enduring to heare » of that which you daily commit. This same betided also when Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes be- » sieged the city, God being highly displeased at our ancestors, who going out in armes against him were all slaine, the towne spoiled, and this holy place for three yeeres and sixe monetes made de- solate.

solate. What should I shew vnto you any more examples? Who first incited the Romans themselues against the Iewes? Was it not the impietie of our owne countrimen that did it? Whence began our bondage at that time? Did it not proceed from the sedition of our ancestors, when the furie of Aristobulus and Hircanus brought Pompey into our citie: and so God subdued them vnto the Romans, being now vnworthy of liberty? And at length for three moneths space hauing endured a siege, being not so great offenders as you are, and better able to abide the siege then you, yet did they yeeld themselues. Are we ignorant of the end of Antigonus, the sonne of Aristobulus, who inuading the Kingdome, brought our nation againe into subiection; God so laying this bondage vpon them, for that he was moued at the iniquitie of our nation? And Herod the sonne of Antipater, brought Sosius and the Roman army, and besieged the city round six moneths space: and at last, for the greatnesse of our iniquitie was taken and punished for their offences, and the citie sacked by the enemies. So you euidently see that our nation did neuer preuaile by force of armes. And assure your selues that the Citie will be taken by this siege. It is meet therefore that you who keep this holy place, wholly commit your selues to Gods will and pleasure, and then feare not the forces of the enemies, when by reason of your piety, you are assured of Gods helpe and succour. But what one parcell of Gods Law haue you obserued? Nay, what mischiefe haue you left vndone, that he detested not? How farre greater is your impiety then theirs, that did suddenly perish for their sinnes? For you making small account of secret sinnes, to wit, stealing, deceit, and adulteries, doe violently take away mens goods by open force, and murder whom yee please; and haue deuised new waies to sinne. Moreouer, you haue made the holy Temple a place of all these your impieties; and the seate that the Romans did adore, is by our owne nation polluted: much derogating from the honour of our religion by your impious facts. Last of all, you hope of his help whom you haue so hainously offended. Truly you are very iust people and obedient, and with pure hands you aske help of God. Did our King thus pray vnto God, when he obtained that in one night so many of the Assyrians should be destroyed? Or do the Romans commit such impietie as the Assyrians did, that you may hope of the like reuenge against them? for he hauing receiued a piece of money to saue the city, did, not regarding his oath, seeke to destroy the same. The Romans doe onely request the tribute that our ancestors were wont to pay vnto them: which if they haue, they will neuer destroy the citie, nor touch our holy things. They will also permit you to enioy freely your families and possessions, and suffer our lawes to remaine inuiolate. It is altogether madnesse for you to hope that God will so punish iust men, as he did sinners and impious persons, who knoweth to punish at his pleasure. To be short, he destroyed the Assyrians the first night, that they encamped before the citie. And if he purposed also to deliuer you, and punish the Romanes, hee would then haue done it, when Pompey and Sosius came against the citie, or when Vespasian wasted Galilee, or lastly now, when Titus came to assault it. But neither Pompey nor Sosius suffered any harme, yet both of them tooke the citie. Vespasian so gained by warring against vs, that he hath hereby got the whole Empire. And the fountaines which before gaue you no water, yeeld it to Titus in great aboundance. You know that before his comming, the fountaines without the citie and Siloa were so dried vp, that water was sold by measure: yet now they flow so plentifully, that they do not onely serue al their army, and their cattel also, but besides that, do water all the gardens about. What this wonder foretelleth, you haue already experience, when the King of Babylon came with his army and destroyed the city: who took it and fired it & the Temple, notwithstanding that (as I am perswaded) the Iewes of that time were nothing so wicked as you are. Wherefore I thinke that God hath forsaken this holy place, and is now gone to them that do besiege you. Will not a good man flie a wicked house, and hate the impious that dwel therin? And do you then think that God wil abide your impiety, who beholdeth all secrets, and knoweth all things that are hid? But what is secret amongst you? Or what do you seek to hide? Nay, what do you that your enemies do not know? All your iniquities are disclozed to all men: and you euery day striue one with another who shall be most impious. And you doe as greatly labour to shew your selues vicious, as others do to shew themselues vertuous. Yet for all this, there is time to amend, and Gods wrath will be appeased, if ye acknowledge your sins, & be penitent for your offences. Cease from armes, be ashamed of your countrie now ruined through your owne meanes. Turne your eyes and behold the beauty of the place, whose ruine you seeke. How braue a City, how gorgeous a Temple, how rich with the gifts of all nations? Who would fire these? Who would desire the ruine of these? Or what is there in the world that better deserueth to be preserued then these? O hard-hearted people, and more blockish then stones! If you doe not pitie these, yet let your families moue you; euery one of you look vpon your children, wiues, Ioſeph crying thus vnto them with teares trickling downe his cheekes, the ſeditious were nothing moued, but told him that it was not ſafety for them to yeeld. But the people were perſwaded to flye: and ſome ſelling their poſſeſſions & that they had for ſmall prices, they did ſwallow downe the gold, for feare the theeues ſhould take it from them. And ſo when they had eſcaped B vnto the Romans, they emptying their bellies found it againe, and ſo had mony to buy them neceſſaries. Titus alſo permitted many to go away whitherſoeuer they pleaſed: which thing cauſed diuers to flie, ſeeing that thereby they were deliuered out of their calamitie, which in the Citie they abode, and were not forced to ſerue the Romans. But Iohn & Simon were as diligent to ſtop the wayes, leſt the Citizens ſhould eſcape, as they did hinder the Romans from entring into the Citie: ſo that whoſoeuer did but giue any ſuſpicion of flight, he was preſently by them put to death. The richer ſort, whether they ſtayed or fled, were ſlaine for their wealth and poſſeſſions. The famine of the citie, and the deſperation of the theeues both increaſed alike, euery day more and more; ſo that now there was no more corne found. Wherfore the ſeditious perſons brake into the houſes, & ſearched euery corner for to finde corne; and if after their ſearch they found any, C then they did beat the owners for denying it at the firſt: and if they found none, they tortured the houſholders, as hauing more cunningly hidden it. And whoſoeuer was yet ſtrong of body, and well liking, him they preſently kild; for hereby they deemed him to haue ſtore of food, or elſe he ſhould not haue bin in ſo good plight of body as he was. And they that were pined with famine, were by theſe barbarous ſeditious people ſlaine, who eſteemed it no offence to kill them, who would ſhortly after die though they were left aliue. Many both rich and poore ſecretly exchanged all that they had for one buſhell of corne, and preſently ſhutting themſelues in the ſecret'ſt roome of their houſe, ſome of them did eate the corne as it was, vnground: others made bread thereof as neceſſitie and feare required. No man in the whole citie ſate downe to eate his meat on a table, but greedily taking it not boyled from the fire, they euen raw as it was did eate it.

Ioſephs loue and conſtancie towards his countrey.

The people flye with their money.

A wonderfull famine in the Citie.

The argument of ſtore of meat.

D Moſt miſerable was this manner of liuing, and a ſpectacle which none without teares was able to behold; for the ſtrongeſt ſtill got the moſt, and the weakeſt bewailed their miſery: for now famine was the greateſt calamitie they endured. And nothing doth arme-men more then ſhame: for during this famine, no reuerence was had towards any man: for wiues tooke the meat euen out of their husbands mouthes, and children from their parents, and mothers euen from their infants, which was the moſt lamentable thing of all. No body had now any compaſſion, neither did they ſpare their deareſt infants, but ſuffered them to periſh euen in their armes, taking from them the very drops of life. Yet could they not eat thus in ſuch ſecrecy, but preſently ſome came to take away from them that whereon they fed. For if in any place they ſaw any doore ſhut, preſently heereupon they coniectured that they in the houſe were eating meat, and forthwith brea- E king downe the doores, they came in; and taking them by the throat, they tooke the meat already chewed, and ready to be ſwallowed downe. The old men were driuen away, and not permitted to keepe and defend their food from being taken from them: the women were drawne vp and downe by the haire of the head, for that they hid betweene their hands ſome part of their meat, and would not forgoe it. No pitie was now remaining, neither to old age nor infancy, but they tooke young babes eating, their mouth full of meat, and not permitting it to be taken out of their mouthes, and threw them againſt the ground. Now if any one had preuented theſe theeues, and eaten their meat before they could come at them, then they were more cruell; and the other ſo much more tyrannouſly handled, as hauing committed ſome greater offence againſt them. They alſo deuiſed moſt barbarous and cruell torments to extort food from others: for they F thruſt ſticks or ſuch like into the cauitie of mens yards, and ſharpe thornie rods into their fundaments: and it is abominable to heare what the people endured to make them confeſſe one loafe of bread, or one handfull of corne which they had hidden.

A miſerable kind of liuing, and a ſpectacle of great compaſſion.

The ſouldiers enter the houſes, and take the meat vnchewed out of the Citizens mouthes.

Theſe miſcreants did not yet for all this feele either hunger or thirſt: for then theſe their impieties had bin more tolerable; but they did it onely to exerciſe their crueltie, preparing ſixe dayes food for themſelues aforehand. Wherfore meeting ſuch as had eſcaped the Roman watch in the night, and gone into the fields to gather weeds or herbs, when they againe came into the Citie, and thought they had now eſcaped the danger of their enemies; they there tooke from them the herbs herbs they had gotten with hazzard of their liues, denying to giue them any ſmall part of that for which they had vndergone ſuch danger: and they required them for Gods ſake to doe it; yea, they thought it a benefit, if being thus robbed and ſpoyled, they did not alſo periſh by the ſwords of theſe miſcreants. Theſe calamities the baſer ſort of people endured at the hands of the common ſouldiers: but the Nobles and chiefe men of the Citie were led vnto the tyrants, and accuſed before them of betraying the Citie vnto the Romans; and ſo by ſome forged treaſon or other put to death. And many times their ſuborned accuſers would teſtifie againſt them, that they purpoſed to flye vnto the Romanes. And thoſe that Simon robbed, he ſent vnto Iohn; and thoſe that Iohn ſpoyled, he ſent vnto Simon: and ſo they did as it were one drinke vnto another the blood of the people, and diuide their dead carcaſes betweene them; inſomuch that they diſagreed onely for their deſire of rule and domination: but both conſpired to doe miſchiefe and commit iniquitie. For he that did not giue to the other part of that which by cruelties he had extorted from the miſerable Citizens, was accounted impious: and he that receiued not part, did now grieue as ſuſtaining loſſe, in not hauing a ſhare in crueltie and impietie.

The honourable and rich are drawne before the tyrants.

The diſſenſion betweene Iohn and Simon was for rule, their concord was in wickednes.

I am not able to recount all their iniquities: but briefely, I thinke that neuer any Citie endured the like, nor neuer any people ſince the memory of men were ſo cruell and barbarous: and finally, to the intent that their impiety vnto ſtrangers might ſeeme the leſſe, they ſpake euill of the nation of the Hebrewes, and curſed them, and openly confeſſed themſelues to be ſlaues, people of diuers countries, vnited together in wickedneſſe, baſtards and abortiues of their nation. They ouerthrew the Citie, and forced the Romanes (though againſt their wils) to accept of this ſorrowfull and heauy victory, and almoſt drew the fire into the Temple, as though it ſtayed from it too long. Neither did they weepe or lament, when they ſaw the higher part of the Citie on fire; but many amongſt the Romanes did with ſorrow behold that ſight; which wee will ſpeake of heereafter, where we will deſcribe the euent of that buſineſſe.

Chap. XII.

Of the Iewes that were crucified, and the Rampiers burnt.

The mounts and rampiers that Titus built, did greatly aduantage him: and although his ſouldiers endured ſome loſſe by the Iewes who were vpon the wall, yet he ſent part of his horſemen, and commanded them to lay wait for the Iewes that came out of the Citie into the vallies to fetch food: and amongſt them were alſo ſome fighting men. For now that which they could rob and take from the Citizens, was not ſufficient for all of them: yet the greater part of them were poore people, who durſt not flie vnto the Romans, for feare that ſome harme ſhould thereupon betide their deareſt friends, not induring to leaue them behinde to be murthered by the theeues. Famine did now embolden them to goe forth of the citie; and now it onely remained for them to goe forth priuily, and be taken by the enemies. And being taken, neceſſitie forced them to fight for feare of torments; for they now thought it too late to requeſt mercy: after the fight, they were beaten and tortured all waies poſſible, and then crucified before the citie wals. Titus deemed this calamitie moſt miſerable: for euery day 500 Iews and ſometime more were taken; and yet did he not thinke it expedient to diſmiſſe ſo great a multitude, nor to keepe them who would be as a guard of guards. But the principall point for which he did not hinder this, was, that by this ſpectacle he might terrifie the Iewes, and make them feare to ſuffer the like, except they did quickly render themſelues and the Citie vnto him. Wherefore the ſouldiers for a hatred which they conceiued againſt our nation, crucified all they tooke, one after one faſhion, and another after another in deriſion. And the multitude of the captiues was now ſo great, that there remained no more ſpace to ſet croſſes in, nor any more croſſes to crucifie bodies vpon. But the ſeditious Iewes within the Citie were ſo farre from relenting by this maſſacre, that rather their hearts were heereby more hardned; ſo that heerewith they terrified the reſt of the multitude: for they carryed the kinred of them that had fled vnto the Romans to the wals, and bade them behold how thoſe were vſed that fled vnto the Romans: the ſame ſight they alſo ſhewed vnto them that deſired peace; affirming that they whom the Romanes had ſo vſed, were thoſe that fled vnto them for ſuccour, and not captiues by them taken. This terrified many who deſired to flie vnto the Romanes, from effecting their deſire; till ſuch time as the truth hereof was knowne. Yet ſome preſently went boldly vnto the Romanes, as it were intending to ſuffer death and torment at their hands, accounting that death comming vnto them by their enemies hands, was farre more tolerable then the famine they endured.

The poore peoples miſery.

Titus crucifieth many Iewes before the walles.

The Iewes carryed the kindred of thoſe that were fled out of the Citie to the Romanes, and ſhewed them the tortures they ſuffered.

Here-

A HEreupon Titus cut off many of the captiues hands, and ſo ſent them into the Citie vnto Simon and Iohn, that their calamitie might teſtifie them to bee captiues, and not ſuch as had fled and yeelded vnto the Romans, willing to admoniſh them at leaſt now to yeeld, and not compell him to deſtroy the Citie: telling that in ſo doing, euen now at the laſt they ſhould ſaue their owne liues, countrey, and Temple, which had not the like in all the world: and he continually went about the rampiers haſtening the workmen in their buſineſſe, as though he preſently meant to effect that in deeds, which in words hee had ſpoken. The Iewes that ſtood vpon the walles, curſed both him and his father, reuiling them, and affirming that they contemned death; and that they did chuſe rather to dye then to become bond-ſlaues: and that whileſt life laſted, they B would as much as lay in them harme the Romans, neither hauing care of themſelues nor of their countrey; which Cæſar ſent them word were both preſently to periſh. Moreouer, they ſaid, that the whole world was a Temple dedicated to God, farre more excellent then that of theirs, which notwithſtanding ſhould be conſerued by him that dwelt in it; whoſe helpe they alſo enioying, would deride all his threatnings, which could not come to paſſe, God being the end of all. And thus opprobriouſly they exclaimed againſt the Romanes.

The Iewes both curſe Cæſar and his father.

At this time arriued alſo Antiochus Epiphanes, and with him many armed men; and beſide them, guarded with a company called the Macedonians, who were of like age; and little older then young men, in their youth all trained vp in armes, and armed after the Macedonian manner, whereof alſo they tooke their name: yet for the moſt part not able to anſwer the expectati- C on that men had of the Macedonians. For the King of Comagene was the moſt fortunate & happy of all Kings that were ſubiect vnto the Romane Empire, till ſuch time as he felt the frown of Fortune: who in his aged yeeres ſhewed that none ought to be accounted happy afore his death: he yet flouriſhing, his ſonne (ſaid he) maruelled that the Romans did delay ſo long to aſſault the Citie, and enter the battered walles (for this young man was a fine warriour, and of exceeding ſtrength, to the which he truſted too much, ſo that he did many things raſhly. Titus heereat ſmiled, and anſwered, that that was a labour not onely for the Romans, but for all in common. After he had ſaid thus, preſently this young man Antiochus, as he was accompanied with his Macedo- The inſolence of Antiochus and the ſouldiers. nians, aſſaulted the wall, and himſelfe with his ſtrength and dexteritie auoyded the darts of the Iewes, and caſt his darts at them: but all his young men (onely a few excepted) were there ſlaine: D for aſhamed of their boaſting ſpeeches, they continued longer in fight then it was expedient for them: at laſt, many being wounded retired themſelues, now perceiuing that the Macedonians to winne a victory had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romanes the 12 day of May, began to build their rampiers: and laboring full ſeuenteene whole daies, with much ado they ended them The Romans in ſeuenteene dayes build foure huge bulwarks. the nine and twentith day of the ſaid moneth. For they builded foure moſt huge rampiers, one of them ouer againſt Antonia, which was builded by the fift legion oppoſite to the midſt of the Struthian waters: another was builded by the twelfth legion, 20 cubits diſtant from the other. But the tenth legion, which was of more account then the two former, erected a mount oppoſite to the pond called Amygdalon on the North ſide: and the fifteenth legion made the fourth, thirtie cubits diſtant from the other, ouer againſt the monument of the high Prieſt Iohn.

E The mounts being thus finiſhed, Iohn vndermined that which was ouer againſt Antonia, and vnderpropped it with poſts of wood, and filling the myne with wood, bitumen and pitch, he fired it: ſo the poſts that held it vp being burnt, the myne fell, and the mount alſo with a hideous noiſe fell into it: and firſt of all there aroſe a great ſmoake and duſt, for the mynes did couer the flame; at laſt the fire hauing conſumed the matter that couered it, the flame cleerely appeared. The Romans at this ſudden and vnexpected exploit were amazed, being grieued at it: ſo that thereby thoſe who before made account of the victory, as though it had bin theirs already, began to deſpaire. Two daies after, Simon and his aſſociates did ſet vpon the other rampiers: for thereon were planted rams, wherewith the Romans began to beat the wals. Amongſt the reſt, a certaine Three valiant Iewes. F man named Tephæus of Garſus a citie of Galilee, and Megaſſarus, one of Queene Mariammes ſeruants, and with them one of Adiabena the ſonne of Nabateus, who for his fortune was named Agiras, which ſignifieth lame: theſe three taking fire-brands, ran vnto the Engins, and there was none found in all the Roman army more valiant then theſe men, nor more terrible: for they ran amidſt the throng of their enemies ſo boldly, as though they had gone amongſt their friends, and neuer made any ſtay, but breaking thorow the midſt of their enemies, they fired their Engines: The Romans inuironed with fire, loſe the mounts they had bulk. and notwithſtanding that on euery ſide they were aſſaulted with darts and arrowes; yet did they not giue backe, nor ſeeke to auoide the danger, till ſuch time as the fire had taken hold of the Engines. The flame mounting on high, the Romanes now came running out of their campe to succour their fellowes: and the Iewes vpon the wall with darts and arrowes hindered them, G fighting with them that sought to quench the flame, nothing sparing their owne bodies. The Romanes began to draw away the Rammes, their shelters being fired. And the Iewes amidst the flames sought to keepe them there: yet for all this the Romans saued their Rammes. From thence the fire caught hold of the rampiers, and those that would haue preuented it were burned: and the fire so increased, that it could not be extinguished; so the Romanes now enuironed with a flame, and despairing to rescue their workes, retired themselues into their campe, and left them on fire. But the Iewes were so much the more earnest, their number still increasing by new supply comming out of the Citie: and so encouraged by this their victory, they rashly aduentured

vnto the Romanes campe, and assaulted the guard there. Which guard, was a company placed H round about before the campe in armour; and there was a law made, that whosoeuer of them forsooke his place, he should lose his life: so that they esteeming rather to dye a glorious death, then ignominiously to suffer a penall punishment, resisted very valiantly: so that many that had fled, retired themselues backe againe to fight, both for shame that they had forsaken their place, and for feare of punishment thereof: and placing Engines vpon the rampier of their campe, they hindred the Iewes from issuing out of the Citie any more: for they came out vnarmed, hauing nothing to defend their bodies withall. For the Iewes fought with whomsoeuer they met, and rashly running amongst their enemies pikes, they strooke them with their fists. For the Iewes preuailed more by their hardinesse, then by their deeds: and the Romanes fled more for the Iewes boldnesse, then for any harme they sustained by them.

Titus accuseth his souldiers of negligence.

I Then Titus came from Antonia, where he had beene to view a place to build another rampier, and he greatly blamed the souldiers, who hauing gotten their enemies walles, did now suffer themselues to be in danger in their owne walles; and now forced to abide that, which earst the Iewes did suffer, being now as it were broken out of prison: and so he with certaine chosen men assaulted the enemies on one side; and they, though striken vpon the faces, yet did they not giue backe, but stoutly resisted him: and so ioyning the battell, the dust was so thicke, that none could see one another, nor any heare what was said for the cryes and noyse, so that now no man could discerne his friends from his foes. The Iewes persisted still in the battell, not for that they trusted to their force, or thereby preuailed, but becausse they were desperate. The Romanes on the other part tooke courage, and fought stoutly for shame, and for that Cæsar himselfe was in danger a- K mongst them. So that I thinke, that had not the Iewes retired themselues into the Citie, the fury of the Romanes had then consumed the whole multitude. The Romanes were now sorrowfull for the losse of their rampiers, who in one houre had lost that, which with such labour and so long time they had beene making: and many of their Engines being now displaced, they despaired to take the Citie.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the wall which the Romane army built about Ierusalem in three daies space.

Titus consulteth with his Captaines.

TITVS now deliberated with his Captaines what was to be done; and they that were most forward amongst them, thought it best with all the whole army to assault the walles: for that as yet the Iewes had onely fought with one part of the army, but they were not able to withstand the force of the whole army, but would bee all consumed with darts and arrowes. The wiser sort againe perswaded Titus to build rampiers: but others counselled the contrary, to hold themselues quiet there, and onely to keepe all places about, that no food should be conueyed into the Citie, and so famish the Citie, and neuer fight with the enemy. For that the Iewes being now desperate, and desiring to be slaine, would not be ouercome by force; or if not, to slay others which was worst of all. But Titus thought it a shame to lie there idle with so huge an armie. and doe nothing; yet he deemed it superfluous to fight with them, who would willingly M fight to be slaine: and he could not make any mounts, becausse he wanted matter, and it was most difficult of all to guard euery place about the citie, that none could go forth, for that it could not be beleagerd round on euery side, by reason of the difficult places, & huge compasse thereof, fearing also the dangers that so might ensue, the Iewes issuing out of the citie. For the Iewes seeing their opē waies all garded by the Romans, they would deuise some secret waies, both vrged thereunto by necessity, & also becausse they knew all places thereabout very well. And if so be that the Iews should secretly effect any thing to preiudice them, that then their siege was like to continue so

A so much the longer: so that he feared that the continuance of time would diminish the glory of his victory. For though all these waies might be taken, yet he preferred haste before glory: and if so be he would vse celerity and safety, that then it was needfull for him to compasse the whole citie round about with a wall: for so all waies and passages might be hindred: and so the Iewes seeing now no hope of safety, should either be compelled to yeeld the citie, or else be consumed with famine, otherwise he could not be in safety and at quiet; and that so he might erect mounts, hauing that wall to defend them. And if any one thinke that work difficult, and not to be atchieued, let him consider that it did not become the Romans to make a base or slender piece of work: and that no man in the world could without labour effect any great matter, but God only. Hauing
B with these speeches encouraged his Captaines, he caused them to lead the souldiers, and dispose them all in these businesses. The souldiers had as it were some diuine force and courage falne vpon them: for the Captaines parting the circuit amongst them, not onely they, but the souldiers also did striue who should first effect their part. And euery souldier laboured to please his Decurio, the Decurio to content the Centurion, and the Centurion the Colonell, and the Colonell to please the Captaine, and the Captaine to please Cæsar, who euery day went round about and beheld the worke: and so beginning at the place called the Assyrians campe, where he was encamped, he drew a wall all about, euen vnto the new citie, and from thence by Cedron and mount Oliuet, and so turned toward the South, and inclozed the mountaine to the rocke called Peristereonos, and the hill next adioyning thereunto which hangeth ouer Siloa: and from thence bending his work into the West, he brought it down all along the vally of the fountaine: from thence C ascending to the monument of Ananus the high Priest where Pompey pitched his tents, and so brought it about by the North side of the citie: and comming along vnto the village called Erebinthonicus, he compassed the monument of Herod towards the East, and so ioyned the wall vnto his campe where he began. This wall was nine and thirty furlongs about. Without this wall he builded also thirteene forts, euery one ten furlongs in compasse. And all this whole worke was finished in three daies space, which desired moneths to haue beene builded in: so that the celerity in the building thereof doth make it scarcely credible. The citie being thus encompassed with a wall, and guards placed in euery fort, Titus himselfe did still goe round about the first watch, to see all things in good order: the second watch hee allotted vnto Alexander; and the third

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the famine in Ierusalem: and of the building of the second Rampire by the Romanes.

THE restraint of liberty to passe in and out of the Citie, tooke from the Iewes all hope of safety; and the famine now increasing, consumed whole housholds and families; and the houses were full of dead women and infants; and the streets filled with the dead
E bodies of old men: And the young men swollen like dead mens shadowes, walked in the market place, and fell downe dead where it happened. And now the multitude of dead bodies was so great, that they that were aliue could not bury them, nor cared they for burying them, being now vncertaine what should betide themselues. And many endeuouring to bury others, fell downe themselues dead vpon them as they were burying them. And many being yet aliue, went vnto their graues and there died. Yet for all this calamity, was there no weeping nor lamentation, for famine ouercame all affections. And they who were yet liuing, without teares beheld those, who being dead, were now at rest before them. There was no noyse heard within the citie, and the still night found all full of dead bodies: and which was most miserable of all; the theeues at night came and tooke away that which couered the dead bodies nakednesse, and went F laughing away, and in their bodies they proued their swords, and vpon pleasure only thrust many thorow yet breathing. Yet if any had desired them to kill him, or to lend him a sword to kill himselfe, that so he might escape the famine, they denied him. And euery one that died, as he was dying, fixed his eyes vpon the Temple, and beheld it now with griefe, leauing the seditious behind them. The seditious now not able to endure the stink of the dead bodies that lay corrupted aboue the ground, first commanded that all such should bee buried at the charges of the city: at last finding not place wherein to burie them all, they threw them ouer the walles into the ditch. When Titus, going about the walles, beheld all the ditch filled with dead mens bodies, he lamented; and lifting vp his hands to Heauen, he called God to witnes, that it was not his doing. Such was the estate of the citie. Now the Romans, when none of the seditious durst make any more excursions, passed their time in ioy and mirth: for they neither suffered famine nor sorrow, hauing abundance of corne, and all other necessaries out of Syria, and the Prouinces adioyning: and many standing before the wals, and shewing their abundance of victuals vnto the Iewes, did so much more encrease their famine. Yet were not the seditious people mooued at these calamities: wherefore Titus pitying the reliques of the nation, and minding at least to saue them that were left aliue, hasted to take the citie, and so he began anew to build mounts, though he scarcely found matter to doe it withall. For all the wood neere vnto the citie, was consumed in the first workes, so that now the souldiers were forced to fetch more wood 90. furlongs off; and only against Antonia, were erected in foure places foure mounts greater then the former. Cæsar went about and hastned the workmen, and now shewed the theeues that they were falne into his hands. Yet for all this, they would not repent: and now as it were depriued of their wits and bodies, they vsed both as though borrowed, and not their owne. For neither did any affection mooue their minds, nor any griefe their bodies: for they rent and tore the dead bodies like dogs, and filled the prisons with weake and languishing people.

CHAP. XV.

Of the massacre of the Iewes, both within and without the Citie.

AT last, Simon hauing tormented Matthias, put him to death, notwithstanding that by his meanes hee had obtained the citie. This Matthias was sonne vnto Boethus a Priest whom the people for his fidelity towards them greatly esteemed of: who seeing the outrage of the Zelous towards the people, Iohn being now ioyned with them, perswaded the people to call in Simon to helpe them, conditioning nothing with him before, for that they misdoubted no euill. And when he was come into the citie, he held him for his enemy as well as the rest: notwithstanding, that by his onely aduice hee was receiued into the citie, as though Matthias had onely done that of simplicitie. Wherefore calling him before the people, he accused him that he did fauour the Romans, and so condemned him to die, not suffering him to cleare himselfe; and put to death likewise his three sonnes with him, for the fourth was before this time fled vnto Titus. Matthias requested Simon that he might be put to death before his sonnes: but Simon, in regard that by his meanes hee had gotten the Citie, caused him to be executed last of all. And so he was killed vpon the murdered bodies of his sonnes, in a place where the Romans might behold him: for so Simon commanded Ananus his executioner who was the sonne of Bamadus. This man was the most cruell of all Simons followers: who euen when he was to kill Matthias, derided him, asking what they could now helpe him, to whom he sought to flye? and permitted not their bodies to be buried. After them Ananias a Priest the sonne of Masbalus a Noble man, and chiefe Secretary to the Councell, a valiant strong man and borne at Emaus, and with him fifteene of the chiefest men in the citie were put to death. They tooke also Iosephs father and kept him in prison, and with the publike voyce of a crier proclaimed, that no man should talke with him nor visit him, pretending feare of treason: and whosoeuer bewailed his estate, were put to death without any tryall. It hapned, a certaine man called Iudas the sonne of Iudas, who was one of Simons Captaines, seeing this (who also kept a tower that Simon committed vnto his charge, perhaps moued with compassion towards them that perished without desert, yet rather fearing his owne life) assembled together ten of his most trusty companions, and said;

cc How long shall we endure these calamities? Or what hope haue we of life, in being trusty to a cc most impious man? Behold how famine doth take our citie. The Romans are almost within our cc wals, and Simon is cruell and faithlesse, euen towards them that haue well deserued at his hands:
cc with him we are in feare of punishment; if we flie vnto the Romans, we shall assuredly be receiued cc into fauour. Wherfore let vs deliuer the wall vnto them, and saue our selues and our city. Neither cc can Simon hereby sustaine any great losse, in being punished a little sooner, then otherwise hee cc should be, being now desperate of his owne health and safety. The ten men to whom in this man-cc ner he brake his mind, agreed hereunto, and so he in the morning sent the rest of his souldiers vnder his rule into diuers places, that they might not perceiue his intent, and he at the third houre of the day standing vpon the tower, called the Romans. But some of the Romans proudly contemned their offer, and others scarcely beleeued them, & the rest made no speed to come. In the meane time

Iudas with his companions is slaine by Simon.

A time while Titus with certaine armed men came vnto the wall, Simon had notice of their intent; and ſo ſpeedily got the tower, and ſlew them that were within, in the ſight of the Romanes, and caſt downe their bodies ouer the wall. And Ioſeph going about the wall, and comming thither (for he neuer ceaſed from requeſting the Iewes to remember their eſtate) he was ſtrooke vpon the head with a ſtone, and ſo amazed with the blow, fell downe: who being falne downe, preſently the Iewes made excurſions out of the Citie, and had carryed him away into the Citie, had not Titus ſent men to defend him: and whileſt they fought, Ioſeph was carryed away, ſcarcely knowing what was done. The ſeditious with loud cryes reioyced, as hauing ſlaine him whoſe death they chiefly deſired; and ſo they reported within the Citie. Hereupon the people were B moſt ſorrowfull, verily beleeuing him to be ſlaine, by whom they had confidence to flye vnto the Romanes.

The yeere of the world, 4034. after Chriſts birth, 72.

Ioſeph wounded in the head with a ſtone, and the rumour is ſpred thorow the Citie.

When Ioſephs mother who was in priſon heard this, ſhe ſaid vnto thoſe of Iotapata that were her keepers, that ſhe verily beleeued it, for that he was neuer taken aliue by the Romanes: yet ſecretly vnto her maidens ſhe wept, and ſaid, that this benefit ſhe receiued by hauing borne a ſon, that ſhe could not bury him by whom ſhe hoped to haue beene buried her ſelfe. But this falſe report did not long grieue her, nor comfort the theeues: for Ioſeph was quickly healed of his wound, and recouered; and ſhewing himſelfe hee cryed vnto them, that ere long they ſhould finde that he would be reuenged on them for his wound; yet he ceaſed not to exhort the people to obey the Romanes, and yeeld: but the ſeditious ſeeing him aliue were aſtoniſhed, and the C people conceiued good hope. Many (preſent neceſſitie vrging them) leapt off the walles and fled vnto the Romanes; diuers, with ſtones going forth vnder pretence to fight with the Romanes, yeelded themſelues, who had harder fortune there then within the Citie; and were now more harmed by plentie of victuals which they found amongſt the Romanes, then with their famine they ſuffered in the Citie: for many became by famine all ſwollen, as though they had the dropſie, and preſently filling their emptie bodies they burſt; and ſo all dyed, ſaue only thoſe who being wary, did by little and little accuſtome their bodies to food, which they had long wanted. Yet they who thus eſcaped fell into another grieuous misfortune: for one of the Iewes that were fled vnto the Romans, was found amongſt the Syrians, gathering gold out of his owne dung which he had ſwallowed, as is before ſaid, for that the ſeditious did ſearch all, and take D that they could finde from them: and there was very great ſtore of gold in the Citie, and that now was ſold for twelue Atticks which before was worth twentie fiue. This deuice being diſcouered in one, preſently a report was ſpred all ouer the whole campe, that the Iewes that fled from the Citie, came full of gold. And now the Arabians and Syrians did rip the bellies of their poore ſuppliants, to ſee if they could finde any gold or ſiluer within them. And I am perſwaded that there was no greater calamitie befell the Iewes then this was: for in one night the bellies of 2000 Iewes were ript. Titus hearing of this crueltie, had cauſed the authors hereof to haue bin compaſſed round with horſemen, and ſlaine with darts; and had the multitude of offenders bin knowne, many more of them ſhould haue bin puniſhed, then of the Iewes that were ſo murthered. Wherefore he called together the Leaders of the ſouldiers that came to helpe him, and E the Romane Captaines (for ſome of the Romanes alſo did commit this fault) and ſaid vnto them in anger, that if any of his ſouldiers did commit any ſuch acts for vncertaine gaine, and were not aſhamed that their armour ſhould be made of gold and ſiluer: or if the Arabians in theſe warres againſt ſtrangers did what they pleaſed, and preſently cauſe the infamy of their vile facts to redound vnto the Romans; they committing ſuch murders, and exerciſing their hatred againſt the Iewes (for now euery one that bare armes vnder him, were defamed with this vile report) he declared vnto them, that ſuch being hereafter found in that fact, ſhould be put to death. Alſo hee commanded his owne legions to make enquiry, who were ſuſpected among them for this matter, and bring him word thereof. But auarice is not terrified by feare of puniſhment, and cruell people haue naturally a deſire of lucre and gaine, and no one calamitie may be compared to the F deſire of wealth; yet ſometime it is bridled and reſtrained for feare. But now God, who had giuen ouer the people to perdition, ſuffered all things to be turned to their deſtruction: for that which Cæſar did ſo ſtreightly forbid, was ſtill ſecretly committed againſt the poore Iewes that fled for mercy vnto the Romanes. So that now whoſoeuer fled out of the Citie, the ſouldiers firſt looking about them, leſt any of the Romanes ſhould ſee them, ript their bellies, and ſo got an vngodly and impious booty; yet in very few did they finde that they ſought for; and the moſt of them that were ſlaine, had no gold nor ſiluer found within them. And this miſchiefe cauſed many that fled vnto the Romanes to returne againe into the Citie.

Ioſeph recouereth vpon his wound.

Chap. XVI.

Of the sacriledge committed about the Temple, and the dead bodies cast out of the Citie: and of the famine.

John falleth to sacriledge, and taketh away many presents out of the Temple.

When Iohn could rob no more, nor get any spoyle from the Citizens, whom he had robbed of all they had, hee presently fell to sacriledge, and tooke many gifts that were bestowed vpon the Temple, and carryed away sacred vessels for Diuine Seruice, as cups, plates, tables, and the cruets of gold that Augustus and his wife sent. So that now a Iew robbed and spoyled the Temple of all gifts wherewith the Romane Emperours and other Nations had honoured it: affirming vnto his associates, that without feare they might vse the holy things of the Temple, seeing they fought for God and the Temple, and therefore it was lawfull for them to be fed by the riches of the Temple. Moreouer, that it was lawfull for them to spend the holy wine and oyle which the Priests reserued for Diuine Sacrifice: which he distributed in the Temple amongst the multitude, and they without feare were anointed therewith, and dranke thereof. I will not cease to speake that which griefe compelleth me. I verily thinke, that had the Romanes forborne to haue come against these seditious, that either the earth would haue swallowed the Citie vp, or some deluge haue drowned it, or else the thunder and lightning which consumed Sodom, would haue light vpon it: for the people of the Citie were far more impious then the Sodomites. In briefe, by their desperation and obstinacy the whole nation was extinguished. What need I recount euery particular misery? Mannæus the sonne of Lazarus, flying to Titus out of the gate that was committed vnto his custody, and yeelding himselfe vnto him, recounted vnto Titus, that from the time that the Romanes army was placed neere the Citie, from the foureteenth day of Aprill, vntill the first of Iuly, were carryed out of that gate he kept, a hundreth, fifteene thousand and foure score dead bodies; yet was he not the Keeper of the gate; but being appointed to pay for the burying of the dead at the charges of the City, was forced to number the dead bodies. For others were buryed by their parents, & this was their buriall, to cast them out of the Cirie, and there let them lye. And certaine Noblemen flying vnto Titus after him, reported that there were dead in the Citie 600000 poore folkes which were cast out of the gates, and the others that dyed were innumerable: and that when so many dyed that they were not able to bury them, that then they gathered their bodies together in the greatest houses adioyning, and there shut them vp. And that a bushell of corne was sold for a talent, which is sixe hundreth crownes: and that after the Citie was compassed with a wall, that now they could not goe out to gather any more hearbs, many were driuen to that necessitie, that they raked sinkes and priuies to finde old dung of Oxen to eate; and so the dung that was loathsome to behold, was their meat. The Romanes hearing this, were mooued to compassion; yet the seditious within the Citie, who beheld this miserable sight, were nothing mooued, nor repented not, but suffered them to be brought to that calamitie: for their hearts were so blinded by the prouidence of God, that they could not see what hanged ouer their heads, and ouer the Citie.

Sixe hundreth thousand dead carcases cast out of the Citie.

CHAP. I.

Of the breach made in the walles: and how the mounts were burned: and how SABINVS assaulted the wall.

The yeere of the world, 4034. after Christs birth, 72.

THE misery of Ierusalem euery day increased, the seditious being by reason of their misery more and more incited against the people: for now the famine was not only amongst the people, but amongst them also. And it was a miserable sight to see the multitude of dead bodies heaped together in the Citie, from which came a pestilent and infectious smell, so that it hindred the souldiers from making excursions. For they were forced to tread vpon dead bodies, as though they were to march along a field couered with dead carcasse. Hauing now embrued their hands in the blood of their countreymen, they prepared to resist and fight with their enemies, and (as it seemeth to mee) hereby vpbraiding ding God, in that hee so deferred to punish them. For the greatest part of them did now fight more earnestly then before, not for hope of safetie, but as despairing of all. The Romanes though much troubled to get wood to build withall; yet did they in one and twentie dayes finish their mounts, hauing cut downe all the woods neere the Citie by 90 furlongs. It was miserable to behold that countrey and place, before all beset with trees and fertill plants, now to lye plaine like a desart, all cut downe: neither was there any stranger that before-time had seene Iudæa, and the beautifull suburbs of Ierusalem, who now beholding it, could abstaine from teares, or not lament the woefull change so farre different from the former. For now this warre extinguished vtterly all signes of beautie: neither could one comming suddenly now know the place which he well knew before. G H

The Iewes vpbraided God, in that he so long delayed to punish them.

Iudæa desart and desolate.

The Iewes & Romanes are equally afraid.

When the mounts were ended, both the Romans and the Iewes greatly feared: the Iewes, for that except they were destroyed, their Citie would be presently taken: the Romanes, for that if these were ouerthrowne, they knew not how to erect more, wanting matter: and now their bodies were wearied with labour, and their minds with many griefes and molestations. But the Romans were more grieued at the calamity of the City, then the Citizens within: for the Iewes notwithstanding these miseries did neuertheless stoutly defend their wals: but the courages of the Romanes fayled, when they saw that the Iewes policy made their mounts vnprofitable, that the strength of the wals resisted their engines, that the Iewes boldnes ouercame their strength in fight; and especially, seeing that the Iewes hauing endured such calamity, famine, and misery, were still more couragious then before: so that they deemed their strength not to be ouercome; and that their minds were inuincible, who were hardned and encouraged by misery. For who were able to abide their forces in prosperity, who by aduersity were incited to vertue? Wherefore the Romans made a stronger watch about their mounts. But Iohns followers who were in the Castle Antonia, fearing what might ensue if the wall were batterd, preuented it in what they could, before the Rams were set vp: and taking firebrands in their hands, they assaulted the mount; but deceiued with a vaine hope, they retired themselues. For first of all they seemed to disagree among themselues; so that they came from their wals one after another, and some space betweene euery one; so that they came softly and fearefully; and briefly, not after the manner of the Iewes: for they wanted courage, rashnes, and flocking together at once, which is proper vnto all that nation, and so came more soberly, and with lesse courage then they were wont. They did also finde the Romanes more couragious then of late, who so defended their mounts with their bodies and weapons, that it was not possible to come and fire them; and euery one was fully determined not to shrinke out of his place till he was slaine. For besides that if so be that worke were destroyed, they had no hope left to build more, they all accounted it a shame that their vertue should be ouercome by subtiltie, or their weapons by rashnesse and temerity, or their skill by a multitude; or the Romanes by the Iewes. Also they had engines to cast darts at them as they came downe their walles. And when any one of the Iewes that was slaine fell downe, he hindred them that followed, and the danger of him that went before terrified them that came after. They also that rashly aduentured within the shot of a dart, either were terrified, with the discipline, and multitude of their enemies, or else wounded with their darts: and so they all retyred, one accusing another of cowardlinesse, and atchieued nothing. I K L

The Romans most of all feare the desperatenesse of the Iewes.

The Iews with firebrands set vpon the engines: but losing their hope, returne backe againe.

The valour and violence of the Iewes decreaseth.

The Iewes retire arguing one another of cowardize.

The first day of Iuly the citie was assaulted: and the Iewes being now retyred, the Romans set vp their Rammes, notwithstanding that they were assaulted from Antonia with stones, fire and sword, and whatsoeuer their enemies in that extremitie could finde. For though the Iewes had great confidence in their walles, as that they could not be battered, yet did they not permit the Romans to place their Rams against them. And the Romans being perswaded that the Iewes so laboured, because they knew their walles to be weake, and lest Antonia by the breach of the wall should be hurt, did striue to place them against the wals. But the wall would not yeeld vnto the Ram: yet did the Romans safely & without danger (notwithstanding that many darts were cast at them from off the wals) persist to beat the wall with their Rams: who being below and seeing the stones broken with the force of their engins, they shielded themselues with their bucklers: and so some with their hands pulled the stones out of the wall; some digged vnder the foundation therof: and when foure stones with much labour were broken and shaken, the night hindred both parties from doing any more at that time, and in it the wall now shaken with the Ramme (in the place which Iohn had vndermined to destroy the mounts, the myne settling) fell downe. So, that fell out otherwise then either part expected: For the Iewes, who indeed had cause to be sorrowfull for the myne of the wall, and for that they did not preuent that mischance, were ioyfull and coura- M

The Romans vndermine the wall.

The Iewes set vpon the Romans.

A courageous,as though Antonia did yet remain firme and ſtrong: And the Romans reioycing for this vnexpected fall, were againe diſmaied, ſeeing the other wall that Iohn had built within,yet they iudged it eaſier to be taken then the former;but no man durſt aſcend it,for that he who firſt aſſaulted it,was certaine to dy. Titus,thinking that by hope and perſwaſion his ſoldiers might be encouraged, and knowing,many times promiſes and exhortations make men forget danger, and ſometime to contemne death it ſelfe, he called together the moſt valiant of all his ſouldiers; and ſpake thus vnto them as followeth; Fellow ſouldiers,it is manifeſt cowardlineſſe to exhort men to enterprize a thing without danger,both in them that are exhorted, and in him that exhorts: for exhortations are onely to be vſed in doubtfull affaires, wherein it is praiſeworthy for euery B man to aduenture himſelfe.So that I confeſſe it is hard for you to aſcend the wall:yet will I ſhew you that it is a glorious death to dy in ſuch a fight, and eſpecially it becõmeth them that are deſirous to win honour; and that they that firſt aduenture valiantly to do it,ſhall not goe away vnrewarded. And firſt let this moue you which terrifieth others, to wit, the patient minde of the Iewes,and their conſtancy in aduerſity. For it is a ſhame for the Roman ſouldiers, who in time of peace practiſe themſelues in warlike feats, and are accuſtomed in war to get the victory, now to be ouercome by the Iewes;and that in the end of the victory, we hauing alſo God to help vs: for all our harmes proceed from the Iewes deſperation; and their deſtruction and calamity by Gods fauor and your valour is euery day increaſed. For what elſe is betokened by their ſedition amongſt themſelues,their famine, the fall of their wals without our engines to batter them, and C the ſiege it ſelfe, then the wrath of God towards them,and his fauor towards vs? Wherefore it is vnſeemly for you either to giue place to your inferiours, or to betray Gods fauor and furtherance. Is it not a ſhame that the Iewes, who, were they conquered, ſuſtained no great reproch, as being accuſtomed to ſerue and obey others, ſhould ſo valiantly contemne death, leſt they ſhould hereafter ſuffer or endure the like;and many times boldly to aduenture and make excurſions euen among the midſt of vs, not for hope they haue to ouercome vs, but onely to ſhew their valour:and we,who haue conquered almoſt the earth and ſea, to whom it is an infamy not to be victorious,to lie idle,neuer making valiant aſſault vpon our enemies,but being thus armed, to expect till fortune and famine deliuer them into our hands? Eſpecially ſeeing that by vndergoing a little danger,all will be ours.If we get into Antonia,we haue taken the city.For ſuppoſe D that we were then to fight againſt them that are within the city (which I do not thinke) we hauing gotten the higher part of the city,being aboue our enemies head, are then aſſured of a perfect victory ouer them. I omit now their commendations who haue beene ſlaine in warres, and their immortality whom Martiall fury hath depriued of this life: and thoſe that do not ſo think, I pray that they may die of ſome euill death in peace, whoſe ſoules are condemned to be entered with their bodies.For what valiant man knoweth not that the ſoule of him that dies in war,is preſently receiued into the moſt pure airy element, and from thence carried and placed among the ſtars of heauen,and the good and valiant ghoſts doe alwaies aſſiſt his poſterity? And that all that in peace do die of ſome diſeaſe and ſickneſſe, their ſoules are kept in the bowels of the earth in darkneſſe: notwithſtanding that they be moſt iuſt and pure, and preſently they are forgotten, E and their life and memory together with them extinguiſhed. Seeing therefore that we are all certaine to die, and that to die by the ſword is a more eaſie death,then to die by any diſeaſe,why ſhould we depriue our ſelues of this opportunity, ſeeing that at laſt we muſt neceſſarily forgoe our liues as due debt vnto the deſtinies? And this I haue ſpoken as though it were vnpoſſible to eſcape with life,you doing your endeuours; yet they that beare the mindes of men, can finde meanes to ſaue themſelues euen in the greateſt dangers. For firſt of all, that part of the wall that is falne may eaſily be entred, and the wall new built is not hard to be throwne downe: and many of you together enterprizing this worke, may one exhort and helpe another, and your audacity and courage will quickly daunt the enemies heart, and perhaps may get vs the victory if we get this one place without bloodſhed. For they will not reſiſt vs if wee offer to aſcend the wall: F and let vs but effect any one exploit either ſecretly or openly,and the Iewes will neuer more endure vs,though we be but few in number. And I would be aſhamed if I did not ſo reward him that doth firſt begin,as to make all that are in our army to enuy his happineſſe: and from henceforth I decree, that whoſoeuer eſcapeth,ſhall be Gouernour ouer them that are now his equals; and whoſo is ſlaine in this quarrell, I will doe him great honour.

Titus hauing thus ſpoken, the reſt of the multitude feared the greatneſſe of the danger: but one of them that warred in the companies, named Sabinus, a Syrian borne; a man of excellent ſtrength and courage; yet of ſo ſmall ſtature, that if one had ſeen him, they would haue deemed him him vnfit to haue been a ſoldier: for he was of very ſmall ſtature and of black colour, but he had a mind far bigger then his body, and ſtrength ſcarce able to be contained in ſo little room. This Sabinus riſing vp, ſaid; I offer my ſelfe vnto thee, O Cæſar, firſt of all to aſcend the wall, and that with a willing mind, requeſting that my fortune may aſſiſt my ſtrength and mind: yet if fortune ſhal hinder my enterprize, know that I dy not againſt my expectation, but that I will gladly giue my life for thee. When he had ſo ſaid, he took his ſhield in his left hand, and holding it aboue his head, with his drawne ſword in his right hand, about the ſixt houre of the day he went vnto the wall: and 11. men followed him, who only enuied his vertue. But Sabinus with a diuine feruour of ſpirit went before them all; notwithſtanding that on euery ſide the Iewes vpon the wall caſt an infinite number of darts at him, and rowled downe vpon him huge ſtones, which did ſtrike downe ſome of the 11. that followed him. But Sabinus, meeting the darts and peſtering arrowes, yet did not remit his force, till ſuch time as he had gotten to the top of the wall, and put the enemies to flight: who, terrified with his ſtrength and courage, and indeed thinking that more had come vp after him, fled. Wherein, who may not iuſtly blame Fortune, and accuſe her; as enuying at vertuous acts? For this man failed not of his purpoſe, yet was he ſtricken with a ſtone, and throwne downe flat vpon his face moſt violently with a great noiſe: ſo that now the Iewes ſeeing him alone, and lying on the ground, returned againe, and ſhot at him on euery ſide: and he kneeling vpon his knees, and couering himſelfe with his ſhield, did firſt of all reuenge himſelfe vpon his enemies, and wounded many that came neere him, till with wounding them he was ſo weary, that he could ſtrike no longer; and ſo at laſt was ſlain with arrows: a man who for his valour deſerued better fortune, and died as valiantly as his enterprize was courageous. Thoſe that were left of his company, hauing almoſt gotten to the top of the wall, were ſlaine with ſtones, and the reſt being wounded, were carried into the camp. How the Romanes aſſaulted Antonia, and how they were driuen backe from thence by the Iewes.

TWo daies after, twenty of the watchmen which guarded the mounts, two horſemen, and one trumpetter, gathered themſelues together: and about the night houre of the night, they came by the ruines into Antonia without any reſiſtance: and finding the firſt watchmen aſleepe, they ſlew them, and got the wall, and commanded the trumpetter to ſound; by which ſound the reſt of the watchmen were awaked, and fled for feare, before they ſaw what company of the Romans were gotten vpon the wall: and the ſound of the trumpet perſwaded them, that a great multitude of enemies were come vp the wall. Cæſar, hearing the ſound of the trumpet, preſently armed his ſouldiers; and accompanied with his chiefe Captaines, and a company of choſen men, he aſcended the wall. The Iewes fled into the inner Temple, and the Romans alſo brake in amongſt them by the myne that Iohn had made to deſtroy the mounts of the Romans. And the followers both of Iohn and Simon, did courageouſly driue them backe: for they thought it the vtter ruine of all, that the Romans were now gotten into the holy place, which indeed was the beginning of their victory. So they began a ſore fight, euen in the very entrance, the Romans ſtriuing to get the inner Temple, and the Iewes endeauouring to beate them backe towards Antonia. And now arrowes, darts, and ſpeares, nothing auailed either part, but they both fought it out at handy blowes with ſwords: and in that conflict no man could diſcerne on which ſide any one fought; for the ſouldiers on both parts were mingled together, and for the ſtraightneſſe of the place, could not keepe their roomes: for there was ſuch a noiſe that no man could heare one another, and many were ſlaine on both parts: and the dead bodies of thoſe that were ſlaine, and their weapons falling with them, did hurt many that trode vpon them; and whoſoeuer had the worſt, preſently cried out pittifully, and the victors ſhouted for ioy: neither was there any place to flie or follow; the fight was ſuch, that now one had the better, and now the other. Moreouer, they that ſtood in the forefront of the battell, were either of neceſſity to kill or be killed: for there was no void ſpace left betweene the two armies. At laſt the Iewes courage ouercame the Romans skill, and they were all beaten backe (hauing fought from the ninth houre of the night, vnto the ſeuenth houre of the day.) The Iewes were encouraged to fight for feare they ſhould be ouercome. And that parcell of the Roman army (for as yet the legions were not come) thought it ſufficient at that time to haue gotten the Caſtle of Antonia.

Of the exceeding valour of IVLIAN the Roman ſouldier.

The yeere of the world, 4034. after Chriſts birth, 72.

THERE was one Iulian, a Centurion, borne in Bithynia, of good parentage, who (as my ſelfe well knew) was moſt valiant of all, both in ſtrength of body and skill, and courageous mind. This Iulian, ſeeing now the Romans to haue the worſt (ſtanding by Titus in Antonia) he preſently leapt downe, and all alone purſued the Iewes who had the victory, into the inner Temple. And the whole multitude fled, deeming him by his force and courage, not to haue beene a man. But he amongſt the midſt of them, ſlew whomſoeuer he light on, one of them for haſte caſting downe another. So that this his deed ſeemd admirable to Cæſar, and terrible to his enemies. Yet did that deſtiny befall him which no man can eſcape; for hauing his ſhooes full of ſharpe nailes, as other ſouldiers haue, running vpon the pauement, he ſlipt and fell downe, his armor in the fall making a great noiſe: whereat his enemies, who before fled, now turned againe vpon him. Then the Romans in Antonia fearing his life, cryed out: but the Iewes many at once ſtrooke him with ſwords and ſpeares. And hee defended many blowes with his ſheld, and many times attempting to riſe, they ſtrooke him downe again: yet as he lay, he wounded many; neither was he quickly ſlaine, becauſe all parts of his body, which being wounded might cauſe preſent death, were armed, and ſhrunk in his necke a long time till the reſt of his body being cut off, and no man helping him, his ſtrength failed. Cæſar was very ſorrowfull to ſee a man of ſo great force and fortitude ſlaine in the ſight of ſuch a multitude: and that the place wherin he was, hindred him from helping Iulian: and others that might haue helped him, durſt not for feare. At laſt, when Iulian had a long time ſtriuen with death, and wounded many of them that ſlew him, he was with much ado killed, leauing behinde him a renowned memory, not onely amongſt the Romans and Cæſar, but alſo amongſt his enemies. Then the Iewes tooke his dead bodie, and beat backe the Romanes and ſhut them in Antonia. In this battell one Alexas and Gyphthæus, two of Iohns company, fought valiantly, and of Simons company Malachias and Iudas, the ſon of Merton, and Iames the ſon of Soſa, Captaine of the Idumæans; and two brethren of the Zelous, the ſons of Iairus, Simon and Iudas.

IOSEPHS ſpeech, perſwading the Iewes to yeeld their City: and how many of them fled vnto the Romanes.

AFter that Titus had commanded his ſouldiers to pull downe the foundations of Antonia, and make an eaſie entrance for the whole army: he called Ioſeph vnto him (for he vnderſtood, that day being the ſeuenteenth of Iuly, that the Iews were wont to celebrate a certaine feaſt to God, which they called Entelechiſmus, and that it was not ſolemnized for want of men; ſo that the people greatly mourned therefore) and againe commanded him to tell Iohn that whereof before he had ſent him word, to wit, that if he deſired to fight, he ſhould haue liberty to come, with what multitude he pleaſed; ſo that the City and the Temple might not both periſh with him, willing him now to deſiſt from prophaning the holy place, and from ſinning againſt God: ſending him alſo word, that if he ſo pleaſed, he would grant him leaue to celebrate the feſtiuity which had bin now long time omitted, and that by what company he pleaſed. Ioſeph, to the intent that not onely Iohn might heare this offer of Titus, but alſo the reſt of the people, he ſtood in an eminent place, from whence he might be heard, and in the Hebrew tongue he recounted vnto the Iewes Cæſars pleaſure, earneſtly requeſting them to ſpare their countrey, and forbid the fire now ready to take hold of their Temple, and to offer the accuſtomed ſacrifices vnto God. When he had thus ſaid, the people were very ſorrowfull, and euery one held his peace, not knowing what to ſay. But the tyrant Iohn hauing vſed many rayling ſpeeches againſt Ioſeph, at laſt he anſwered, that he need not feare the deſtruction of the Temple and City, ſeeing that it belonged to God.

Titus willeth Iohn to come out to fight, leſt with him the City and temple ſhould periſh alſo.

Iohn raileth againſt Ioſeph.

Then Ioſeph with a loud voice cried out, True it is, you haue kept it pure, and vnprophaned for God, and the holy things you haue kept inuiolate, neither haſt thou committed any iniquity againſt him, from whom thou expecteſt helpe, but haſt offred ſolemne ſacrifice vnto him. If any man ſhould take from thee thy daily food, no doubt thou wouldſt account him thy enemy: canſt thou then hope that God, whō thou haſt depriued of daily ſacrifice, will aſſiſt thee in theſe wars?

Doſt thou impute theſe offences to the Romans? why? they euen now do defend our religion, G and command ſacrifice to be offered, which thou haſt forbidden. Who doth not bewaile this vnexpected change, and lament our city? Strangers and enemies correct thy impiety, and thou a Iew borne, and brought vp in our law, art more cruell then they. But conſider, Iohn, it is no ſhame to repent thy wickednesſe in extremity: and at the laſt caſt, if thou be deſirous to ſaue thy countrey, thou haſt a good example of Iechonias, ſometime King of the Iewes; who, when the Babylonians warred againſt him, of his owne accord went out of the city before it was taken, and willingly endured captiuity with all his family and kinred onely, leſt he ſhould betray theſe holy places to his enemies, and behold the Temple fired. And for this act of his, he is of ſacred memory among the Iewes, and hath thereby gained immortall credit amongſt all his poſterity. This H

Ioſephs ſpeeches interrupted with ſighs.

Ioſeph thus crying with teares and lamentations, he could ſpeake no more for ſobbing: And the Romans, compaſſionating his ſorrow and affliction, were aſtoniſhed. But Iohn and his confederates were ſo much the more incited againſt the Romans, and ſought to take Ioſeph; yet his ſpeech did moue many of the nobles; and diuers, fearing the ſeditious watchmen, remained ſtill where they were, making full account both of their owne deſtruction, and the ſubuerſion of the city. Yet ſome there were, who finding opportunity, fled vnto the Romans: amongſt whom were two Prieſts, Ioſeph and Ieſus, and three ſons of Iſmael the Prieſt, who was beheaded at Cyren, and foure ſons of Matthias the Prieſt, and one of the other Matthias, who eſcaped vnto the Romans before his father was put to death by Simon Giora, with his three ſons, as is before ſaid: K and many other nobles reuolted with the Prieſts, whom the Emperor receiu'd very courteouſly, and ſent them into Gophna; knowing that it was a griefe for them to conuerſe amongſt people of diuers manners from them, and willed them to remaine there, and promiſed euery one of them great poſſeſſions after the warres were ended. So they ioyfully departed vnto the place appointed. But the ſeditious, for that they were not ſeene, reported vnto the people, that they who had fled vnto the Romans were ſlaine, meaning hereby to terrifie the reſt from fleeing to them: and thus their deuice a while preuailed, as their former did; and they that faine would, durſt not now flee for feare. But afterward when Titus recalled them from Gophna, and com-

all before the Romans, they beſought the ſeditious with teares, firſt to receiue the Romans into the Citie, and ſaue their countrey: or if it pleaſed them not, at leaſt to depart out of the Temple, and deliuer it vp vnto them. For the Romans durſt not, except neceſſity vrged them thereto, fire the holy Temple. But their malice againſt the Romans encreaſing, and rayling againſt them that had fled vnto them, they planted all their engines to caſt ſtones, darts and arrows vpon their holy porches. So that all the void ſpace about the Temple was filled with dead bodies like a ſepulchre, and the Temple it ſelfe reſembled a caſtle, & they now with their weapons hauing their

For there was not one amongſt the Roman ſouldiers, that did not with reuerence behold the Temple, and adore it, and that did not heartily wiſh that the theeues would repent themſelues before it was too late. Moreouer, Titus pitying the ſeditious, once again ſpake vnto Iohn and his adherents, ſaying: O ye impious people, haue you not inuironed the Temple about with a cloiſter? haue not Titus in deſpight of the Iewes, ſtriues to ſaue the Temple.

CHAP. V.

B How the battell was renewed, the Rampires being againe builded, and of the excurſions of the Iewes.

IOSEPH hauing deliuered theſe words of Titus to the Iewes, the ſeditious thinking that they proceeded not of good will, but of feare, began to be more proud hereat. Then Titus, ſeeing they neither pitied themſelues nor the Temple, determined againe to fight, though very loth ſo to doe; yet could he not bring all his army againſt them, the roome was ſo little. Wherefore out of euery hundred he made choice of thirty of the ſtrongeſt among them, and ouer euery thouſand he appointed a Colonell, and made Cerealis their Captaine or Generall, commanding him at the ninth houre of the night to aſſault the watchmen of the enemy. Alſo he himſelfe would C haue gone downe with them armed; but his friends, and the Captaines about him, foreſeeing the great danger he might fall into, would not permit him: affirming, that he might doe more good ſitting in Antonia, and encouraging the ſouldiers that fought, then if he ſhould goe and endanger himſelfe: for euery man being in the view of the Emperor, would fight more couragiouſly. Titus was herewith perſwaded, telling the ſouldiers that the onely cauſe he went not with them was this, that he ſtaied behind to view and iudge euery ones valour and vertue, and to the intent that none behauing himſelfe valiantly ſhould go away vnrewarded, nor any coward eſcape vnpuniſhed, but that he himſelfe would be a beholder of euery mans vertue, and a witneſſe thereof, who was their Lord either to reward or puniſh.

Titus choſe thirty out of euery hundreth, moſt ſtrong and able men, and bids them charge the beſieged.

Then he went vnto a watch-tower in Antonia, from whence he beheld what was done. But D they whom Titus ſent did not finde the watchmen aſleep, as they hoped, but with a crye, aſſaulted the Romans that came againſt them: and at this noyſe they awaked their fellowes, who came in whole companies to aſſiſt them, and made excurſions vpon their enemies. So the Romans ſuſtained the violence of their firſt companies: but the ſecond that came, fell vpon their owne fellowes, and vſed them like their enemies: for no man could know one anothers voice for the noiſe there, neither could one ſee another by reaſon it was night: and moreouer, ſome were blinded with fury, ſome with anger, ſome with feare: wherefore euery one ſtrooke him that met him, without any reſpect. And the Romans receiued ſmall damage thereby, becauſe that they were defended with their ſhields, and remembred one anothers watch-word. But the Iewes fell on euery ſide, ſhewing themſelues raſh as well in excurſions as in their retiring; ſo that many times one E of them tooke the other to be his enemy, euery one falling vpon him that retired, as though he had beene a Roman, aſſaulting them in the dark. Briefely, more were wounded by their fellowes then by their enemies, til day breaking that euery one knew his companion; and each one keeping his rank, did then betake themſelues to their darts and arrowes. Neither part gaue backe, nor was wearied with labor: but many Romans together and apart, did in the view of the Emperor ſhew their courage, euery man accounting that day the beginning of his preferment, if he behaued himſelfe valiantly. The Iewes fought ſtoutly, both for that they feared their owne imminent danger, if they were ouercome, and the deſtruction of the Temple: and Iohn ſtanding by, encouraged them to fight, ſome with blowes, other ſome with threatnings. They fought moſt commonly with handy blowes; yet fortune often changed: for neither part had either farre to flee, or any ſpace F to follow them that fled. The Romanes in Antonia cryed vnto their fellowes that fought the battell, Now for hope of victory: preſently encouraging them to ſtand to it, when they began to giue backe; ſo it was as it had beene a Theater of warre: for Titus, and they with him, beheld all that was done; ſo at laſt, in the fift houre of the day the fight ceaſed, hauing continued from the ninth houre of the night, neither party forſaking the place where firſt they began battell, neither any part hauing the victory. Many Romans there fought courageouſly, and amongſt the Iewes theſe that follow: Iudas, the ſonne of Merton; Simon, the ſonne of Ioſias; and Iacob, and Simon Idumæans; this, the ſonne of Cathla, but Iames was the ſonne of Soſa: and all theſe were of Simons company, and of Iohns followers Gyptheus and Alexas; and of the Zelous, Simon the son of Iairus. But the 7. day, the rest of the Romans pulling downe the foundations of Antonia, made a large entrance for the rest of the army. And the legions comming vnto the wall, presently began to raise mounts, one against the corner of the inner Temple, which was situate North and East: and another against the gallery on the North side betwixt the two porches: and the other two, one against the porch of the West side of the outward Temple; the other against the North porch. So with much toile and labour they finisht this worke, fetching wood to build it withall 100. furlongs off. And many times they were endamaged by trechery, not being wary by reason of their victory: and the Iewes despairing of themselues euery houre, more and more were encouraged. For many of the horsemen going either to get wood or hay, while they were about it, they took the bridles from off their horse, and permitted them to feed till they had ended their busines; and presently the Iewes issuing out in troups vpon them, tooke them away.

Foure mounts raised neere to the temple.

The Iewes surprize the Romans horses.

Titus seeing that this fell out, deemed (as indeed it was) that his mens horses were stolne rather by their negligence then their enemies valor: wherefore he thought by the seuere punishment of one, to make others looke better to their horses. And so he put to death one of the souldiers that had lost his horse: by whose punishment the rest of the souldiers being terrified, kept their horses better. For after that, when they went about any businesse, they neuer left their horses in the pastures, but kept alwaies with them. Thus the Romans assaulted the Temple, and builded there mounts. The day following, certaine of the seditious, who now could get no more booties in the city, and now also began to taste of hunger, assaulted the Romans that were placed towards mount Oliuet about the eleuenth houre of the day: for they hoped to take them vnawares, as being now at dinner. But the Romans perceiuing their intent, came out of their places, and resisted them who attempted violently to breake in vpon them ouer the wall: so that there was a hot fight, and many other deeds were done on either party, the Romans hauing both strength and knowledge in warlike affaires; the Iewes led with a desperate fury: and shame forced the Romans to fight, and need compelled the Iewes: for the Romans accounted it a shame not to ouercome the Iewes, who were as it were falne into their hands; and the Iewes thought it the onely way to saue their owne liues, to breake downe the wall by force. And one of the horsemen, called Pedanius, the Iewes being put to flight and driuen into the vally, pursued them with his horse as fast as he could gallop, and ouertook a young man, one of his enemies, being heauy of body, armed all ouer; and taking him about the ankle, he carried him violently away: thereby shewing the strength of his arme and of the rest of his body, and his skilfull chiualry, and so brought the captiue vnto Cæsar as a present. Titus admiring Pedanius his strength, and punishing the captiue for hauing attempted to assault the wall, he now hasted to assaile the Temple, and commanded the workmen quickly to dispatch the mounts. In the meane time the Iewes being ill handled in the former warres, and war still increasing to the ouerthrow of the Temple, they did, as the custome is in a putrefied body, preuent the plague from going any further, by cutting off the corrupted members. For that part of the porch that reached from the North vnto the East, ioyned vnto Antonia: which they firing, separated it twenty cubits from it, hauing now with their owne hands begun to cast fire into the holy place. Two daies after, which was the 24. day of the aforesaid moneth, the Romans set the porch on fire, and the fire hauing gone fourteene cubits, the Iewes pulled downe the top thereof, and not desisting from their accustomed workes, they pulled downe all adioyning vnto Antonia; when it was easie for them, and that they ought to haue hindered the fire. The porch being on fire, they permitted so much to bee burned, as they thought good for their purpose. The fight about the Temple neuer ceased, many excursions were made one against each other.

Ionathan prouokes the stoutest Roman to a single combate.

About this time, a certaine Iew of low stature, and to see to a contemptible person, euery way an abiect, both by reason of his base parentage and otherwise, named Ionathan, going to the monument of Iohn the Priest, dared the strongest amongst the Romanes to come and fight a single combate with him. The Romanes that beheld him, disdained him: yet some amongst them (as it is commonly seene) were afraid of him: others wisely deemed, that they ought not to fight with one that was desirous to die: for they that were desperate, neither fought aduisedly, nor had the feare of God before their eyes: and so that it was not a signe of valor, but of ouermuch hardinesse, to fight with such a one; who n though they ouercame, yet they could win no credit, but with infamy hazzard themselues to be vanquished. So a long time none of the Romans came against him, and he vpbraided them of cowardlinesse. At last, an arrogant and proud fellow, one of the Roman horsemen, named Pudens, disdaining his insolency, and perhaps also for

that

A that he was of little ſtature, came againſt him; and fighting with him, fortune frowned vpon him, ſo that he was laught to ſcorne by his fellow: for he falling downe, Ionathan ſlew him; and ſetting his foot vpon the dead body, with his left hand he flouriſhed his ſhield, and with his right his bloody ſword: and ſtriking his weapons one againſt another, he inſulted ouer the Roman army, and ouer the dead body, vpbraiding the Romans, ſo long till Priſcus a Centurion, as he was thus vaunting, ſhot him thorow with an arrow, and ſo he fell downe dead vpon the body of his enemy: at which deed, both the Romans and the Iewes raiſed a confuſed cry or noiſe. So Ionathan here ſhewed how quickly reuenge purſued the felicity of warlike victory, falling out contrary to all reaſon.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romanes through the deceit of the Iewes were conſumed with fire, and of one ARTORIVS.

THE ſeditious that kept the Temple, did now euery day openly in fight reſiſt the Romans that kept the mounts, and the 27. day they deuiſed this ſtratagem; They filled the void part of the Eaſt porch of the Temple with dry wood and brimſtone, and bitumen, and then fled out of it as not able longer to reſiſt. Wherefore many of the Romans raſhly purſued C the Iewes that fled, and with ladders got into the galleries. But the wiſer ſort conſidering that the Iewes had no iuſt occaſion to flie, kept their place. The porch being now full of Romanes that were got vp into it, the Iewes gaue fire to the wood and brimſtone, and vpon a ſudden all the porch was compaſſed with the flame: ſo that the Romanes who were out of danger were hereat amazed, and thoſe that were amidſt the flames became deſperate; and inuironed with the flames, ſome ſought to run backe into the towne, otherſome vnto the enemies; others kild themſelues, ſo preuenting the fury of the fire; and preſently the flame ouertooke thoſe that ſought to flie. Cæſar, though offended at the ſouldiers for hauing aſcended into the porch vnbidden, yet ſeeing them die ſo wofully in the flames, he compaſſionated them. And although that the fire could not be quenched, yet the poore ſouldiers dying amongſt the flames were hereat comfor- D ted, in that they perceiued him to be ſorrowfull for them, for whom they had loſt their liues. For they beheld him crying to their fellowes to helpe to extinguiſh the fire, and he himſelfe laboured what he could to do it; ſo that euery one eſteemed his ſorrow and lamentation for them as much as a ſumptuous funerall: but ſome eſcaped the fire and got into the largeſt part of the porch; yet inuironed round about with Iewes, hauing long reſiſted, though with many wounds; yet in the end they were all ſlaine.

The Iewes fill the void part of the Eaſt porch with dry wood, ſulphure and bitumen.

The Romanes calamity in the fire.

Cæſar hath compaſſion of the Romanes that were in the fire.

At laſt a young man named Longus, was an honor to all this miſery: and notwithſtanding that euery one that there periſhed deſerued particularly to be remembred, yet he ſhewed himſelfe the moſt valiant of them all. The Iewes were deſirous to kill this man for that he was ſtrong, and willed him to come down vnto them, ſwearing vnto him to ſpare him. But his brother Cornelius, E who ſtood on the other ſide, entreated him not to diſcredit his owne honour and the Romans; whom he obeyed: and he lifting vp his ſword on high, that either part might ſee, ſlew himſelfe. Yet one Artorius from amidſt the fire eſcaped by this deuice: he called vnto him one Lucius his fellow ſoldier and chamber fellow; I will (quoth he) make thee heire of all my inheritance, if thou wilt catch me in thy armes. Lucius willingly endeuouring to do it, Artorius caſt himſelfe downe vpon him, and ſo eſcaped with his life, but Lucius vpon whom he fell was bruiſed againſt the pauement, and ſo died. This calamity awhile did greatly grieue the Romans, yet it made them more wary afterward, and acquainted them with the Iewes ſubtilties, whereof before being ignorant, they ſuſtained great domage; ſo the porch was burnt vnto the tower which Iohn built, during his wars againſt Simon: and the Iewes, after the Romans that were aſcended into it were F conſumed, pulled downe the reſt. The next day the Romans fired the North porch, euen vnto the foreſaid Eaſt porch, which contained the corners of the wall builded ouer the vallie Cedron, ſo that it was terrible to behold the vally from thence, by reaſon of the depth.

Chap. VII.

Of the famine amongst the Iewes.

The intestine warres of the Iewes that were welnie famished with hunger.

SVch were the affaires about the Temple, but an infinite multitude perished within the City through famine, so that they could not be numbred: for in euery place where any shew or signe of food was, presently arose a battell, and the dearest friends of all now fought one with another, to take the food from other poore soules, neither did they beleeue them that were now a dying for famine, but the theeues searched them, whom they saw yeelding vp the Ghost, thinking that they dying for famine, had hid about them some food: but they were deceiued of their hope, being like mad dogs, greedy of meat, and fell against the doores like drunken men, searching the selfe-same houses twice or thrice together in desperation, and for very penury they ate whatsoeuer they light vpon, gathering such things to eate, as the most filthy liuing creatures in the world would haue loathed. In briefe, they did eat their girdles and shooes, and the skins that couered their shields, so that a little of old hay was sold for foure Attiques. But what need is it to shew the sharpnesse of this famine by things that want life? I will recount an act neuer heard of, neither among the Greeks, nor any other barbarous people, horrible to be rehearsed, and incredible: so that I would willingly omit this calamity, lest posterity should thinke I lie, had not I many witnesses hereof, and perhaps should incurre reprehension, not fully recounting all accidents of them that are dead.

The Iewes eat their own girdles, shooes, the leather of their Targets, and old hay.

Chap. VIII.

Of a woman that for famine killed her sonne, and dressed him for meate.

ACertaine woman named Mary, dwelling beyond Iordan, the daughter of Eleazar of the towne of Vitezokia, which signifieth the house of Hysope, descended of noble and rich parentage, flying with the rest vnto Ierusalem, was there with them besieged, her other goods the tyrants had taken from her, which she had brought from beyond the riuer into the city: and whatsoeuer being hid, escaped their hands, the theeues daily came into her house and tooke it away: wherat the woman greatly moued, cursed them, and with hard speeches animated them the more against her, yet no man either for anger, or compassion would kill her, but suffred her to liue to get them meat: but now could she get no more, and famine inuaded her, with rage and anger more then danger. Wherefore by rage and necessity she was compelled to doe that which nature abhorred, and taking her son vnto whom she then gaue sucke, O miserable childe (quoth she) in warre, famine, and sedition, for which of these shall I keep thee? If thou continue among the Romans, thou shalt be made a slaue, yet famine will preuent bondage, or else sedition worse then them both. Be therefore meat for me, a terrour vnto the seditious, a tragicall story to be spoken of by posterity, and that which is onely yet vnheard of among the calamities of the Iewes. Hauing thus spoken she slew her sonne, and did seethe the one halfe of him, and ate it, the rest she reserued couered. Presently came the seditious, smelling the sent of that execrable meat, threatning presently to kill her, except she forthwith brought some of that vnto them which she had prepared. Then she answered that she had reserued a good portion thereof for them, and presently vncouered that part of her son which she had left vneaten, at which sight they trembled, and a horror fell vpon them. But the woman said, This is truely my son, and my doing, eate you of it, for I my selfe haue eaten therof. Be not more effeminate then a woman, nor more mercifull then a mother. If religion make you refuse this my sacrifice, I haue already eaten of it, and will eate the rest. Then the seditious departed hereat, onely trembling; and scarcely permitting this meat to the mother. Presently the report of this hainous crime was bruted all about the city, and euery man hauing before his eyes this execrable fact, trembled as though himselfe had done it. And now all that were vexed with this famine, hastned their owne deaths, and he was accounted happy that died before he felt this famine. This vnnaturall fact was soone after recounted vnto the Romans, and some of them would not beleeue it, others pitied them within the City, and many hereat encreased their hatred towards that nation.

The mothers speech before she slew her sonne.

The seditious challenge the meat which the desolate mother had dressed.

The calamity recounted to the Romans.

Cæsar before Almighty God protested, that he was not the cause of this, hauing offered the Iewes peace, free pardon and forgiuenes for all their offences past, and that they did rather make choice

A choice of war then peace, of ſedition then quietneſſe, of famine rather then wealth and plenty, hauing with their owne hands begun to ſet on fire the Temple, which he had preſerued for them, and that therefore ſuch like meate was fit for them, and that he would bury this abominable crime of eating their owne children in the ruines of their countrey, and that he would not in any part of the world ſuffer the Sunne to ſhine vpon ſuch a City, wherein mothers did eate their owne children, and that ſuch food did more beſeeme fathers then mothets, who for all their miſeries would not yet ceaſe from armes. Hauing thus ſpoken, he conſidered the deſperation of the enemies, and that they would not recall themſelues, who had already endured all ſuch calamities, which might if it had beene poſſible haue altred their opinions, rather then haue endured them.

CHAP. IX.

How the wall was taken, and the Temple burnt.

THE eighth day of Auguſt, two of the Roman legions hauing finiſhed their mounts, they began to place their Rammes againſt the Eaſt galleries without the Temple, hauing ſixe daies together without intermiſſion, already beaten the wall with their ſtrongeſt Rams, C and nothing preuailed, the ſtones being ſo ſtrong, that the Rams could not mooue them: others of the Romans laboured to dig vp the foundations of the porch, that was on the North ſide; and after much toile, they only could pull away the outward ſtones, and the inner ſtones did ſtill ſupport the porch. At laſt the Romans ſeeing themſelues not preuaile by their iauelins and other inſtruments, they ſet ladders to aſcend into the galleries. The Iewes did not greatly labour to hinder them from getting vp: but when they were within the galleries, then they came and fought with them, and caſt ſome of them downe headlong, forcing them to retire; others they ſlew that ſtood in it; and others that were vpon the ladders going down, before they could defend themſelues with their ſhields, were with ſwords ſtricken down, and they alſo thruſt downe ſome ladders full of armed men. So that there was a great maſſacre of the Romanes, ſome fighting for D their enſignes, which the Iewes had taken from them, eſteeming the loſſe thereof a great ſhame vnto them. At laſt the Iewes got their ancients, and ſlew them that came vp to reſcue them; and the reſt terrified with their deaths that were ſlaine, went down againe, and no one of the Romans died, who before he was ſlain did not ſome valiant act; and thoſe ſeditious people that in the former battels did ſhew themſelues valiant, did now alſo fight valiantly, and beſide them Eleazar, ſon vnto the tyrant the brother of Simon. Then Titus perceiuing that he ſpared the Temple of the Iewes to his loſſe, and to the death of his ſouldiers, he commanded fire to be put to the Temple gates: preſently Ananus of Emmaus the moſt cruell of all Simons followers, and Archelaus the ſon of Magadatus, fled vnto Titus; who, for their cruelties committed, determined to put them to death: yet they hoped for pardon, for that they had now forſaken the Iewes when they had got-E ten the better hand. But Titus affirmed they came not of good will, but for neceſſity, and that they did not deſerue to liue forſaking their country now ſet on fire for their offences: yet his promiſe bridled his wrath, and he diſmiſſed them, but they were not ſo much eſteemed as the reſt. The Roman ſouldiers did now put fire vnto the Temple doores: and the ſiluer plate wherewith they were couered being molten, the flame quickly fired the wood, and encreaſing, tooke hold preſently on the next porch. The Iewes ſeeing themſelues inuironed with flames, were now altogether diſcouraged, and their ſtrength failed them, and being amazed no man ſought to extinguiſh the flame, and ſo they ſtood ſtill beholding the fire, yet not lamenting that which was ſet on fire, more then deſiring to ſaue the reſt: and ſo that day and all the next night the fire encreaſed, for the porches were burnt by little and little, and not all at one.

The Iewes ouercome the Romans, and ſeize their enſignes.

None of the Iewes goeth about to extinguiſh the fire.

F The next day Titus cauſed part of his army to quench the fire: and calling vnto him his Captaines, and ſixe that were the chiefeſt among them, to wit, Tiberius Alexander Generall of the whole army, Sextus Cerealis Commander of the fift legion, Largius Lepidus of the tenth, Titus Frigius of the fifteenth, with whom alſo was Aeternius Fronto Commander of the two legions that came from Alexandria, and Marcus Antonius Iulianus Gouernour of Iudæa, and with them the Colonels and Captains, he deliberated with them what was to be done concerning the Temple. Some counſelled to vſe the cuſtome of warres, for that the Iewes would neuer liue peaceably their Temple ſtanding; all their nation whereſoeuer liuing, aſſembling themſelues thither at certaine times. Others perſwaded Titus, that if ſo be the Iewes yeelded their Temple, and fought not for it, then to ſaue it: but if they fought for it, to burne it: for now it ſeemed a caſtle and not a Temple: and if any man were offended hereat, it ſhould not be imputed to the Romanes or to their Generall, but to the Iews who conſtrained them to do it; and he offended not, they forcing him to fire it. But Titus affirmed, that although the Iewes fought for their Temple being men without conſcience, yet it ſhould not be deſtroied: for he would not ſo be reuenged of their iniquities: neither would he euer fire ſo goodly a building; for ſo it would redound to the loſſe of the Romans; as alſo it would be a credit vnto them, if it were left remaining. And now Alexander, Fronto, and Cerealis, perceiuing Cæſars mind, were of his opinion, and ſo he diſmiſſed the conuocation, and commanded the ſouldiers and Captaines to reſt, that they might be more able to fight when need required: and preſently he appointed certaine choſen men to make the wayes euen, and eaſie for the army to paſſe by the ruines, commanding them to quench the fire; and that day the Iewes being fearefull and weary did make no reſiſtance. The day following taking heart and aſſembled together, they aſſaulted the watchmen that kept without the Temple, the ſecond houre of the day. The Romanes valiantly reſiſted their firſt aſſault, ſo defending themſelues with their ſhields as though they had a wall before them; yet ſure it was that they would not long abide, for that they were fewer in number then their enemies, and not ſo deſperate as they were. Then Cæſar before his men retired (beholding the fight from Antonia) with certaine choſen horſmen came to ſuccour them: whoſe force the Iewes not ſuſtaining, but the firſt of them being ſlaine, the reſt fled: and the Romans departing, they returned, and fought againſt them; and when the Romans returned againe, preſently they fled, till about the fift houre of the day, the Iewes were forced to betake themſelues into the Temple, and there they were ſhut vp. Then Titus returned into Antonia, purpoſing the next day to aſſault them with all his army, and win the Temple. But the ſentence of God had already determined, that it ſhould be conſumed with fire: and now the fatall day was come after many yeeres, which was the tench of Auguſt: vpon which day alſo, the King of Babylon did once before fire it, yet was it now firſt ſet a fire by our owne countrimen, who were indeed the cauſe thereof. For the ſeditious being quiet till Titus was departed, then againe they aſſaulted the Romans, and ſo fought with the guard that were without the Temple, labouring to extinguiſh the flame; who putting the Iewes to flight, came vnto the Temple.

CHAP. X.

How the Temple was burnt againſt the will of TITVS.

THen a certaine ſouldier, who expected no command, nor feared to do ſo execrable a fact, moued with ſome diuine fury, and lifted vp by his fellow, took in his hand a flaming firebrand, and caſt it into the golden gate which entred into the roomes on the North part of the Temple, and the flame preſently aroſe: which cauſed a great cry amongſt the Iewes, expreſſing their calamity, and euery one haſted to extinguiſh the fire; now neither accounting of their liues nor forces, hauing loſt that for which they ſo fought. Newes hereof was preſently brought vnto Titus, by one who came from the fight, who then was reſting in his tabernacle, and he preſently aroſe and ran vnto the Temple to hinder the fire, and all the Captaines after him; whereat the ſouldiers being terrified followed, and there aroſe a great cry and tumult in that army being vnordered. Cæſar both with voice and hand made a ſigne vnto the ſouldiers, that were fighting, to quench the fire. But they did not heare him, there was ſo great a noyſe, neither did they perceiue the ſigne he had made vnto them with his hand, becauſe that ſome were diſtracted with fight, others with anger: and the ſouldiers iſſued in, not reſtrained either by commands or threatnings, but euery one went whither fury carried him: and thronging together at the entrance, many preſſed one another to death; and many being amongſt the fiery ruines of the galleries, periſhed as miſerably as thoſe that were ouercome. When they came vnto the Temple, euery one counterfeited himſelfe not to heare Cæſars command, and ſo exhorted his fellowes that were before him to fire the Temple. The ſeditious now had no hope to withſtand them, but either fled or were ſlaine; and many vnarmed and vnable people, whereſoeuer they were found, were ſlaine: ſo that about the altar was an innumerable company of dead bodies heaped together, and their blood flowed down the Temple ſtaires; & their bodies that there were

The burning of the temple. Great ſlaughter in the temple.

A were ſlaine rouled downe, Cæſar ſeeing he could not reſtraine the fury of the mad-braine ſouldiers, and that the fire encreaſed, entred into the Temple with his Nobles, and beheld all the holy things there, and whatſoeuer elſe was there, farre ſurpaſſing all report which ſtrangers had giuen of it, and equall to the report which the Iewes made of it. And the flame not hauing yet pearced into the inner part of the Temple, nor yet conſumed the houſes and roomes about it, he deemed that as yet it might be preſerued: wherefore himſelfe came and entreated the ſouldiers to extinguiſh the fire: commanding Liberalis the Centurion of his guard to beate thoſe with a trunchion that would not be obedient, and driue them away. But their fury and the rage of warre, and the hatred they bare againſt the Iewes, ouercame in them all Cæſars commands, and feare of them
B that forbade them. Many were incited ſo to doe, hoping of ſome bootie, thinking that all the Temple within was full of money, becauſe they ſaw the gates of gold. Moreouer, a certaine ſouldier, when Cæſar ſought to quench the flame, fired the poſtes about the doores: and preſently the flame appearing within, Cæſar and the Captaines departed, and ſo euery one ſtood looking vpon it, and no man ſought to extinguiſh it. Thus the Temple was burnt againſt Titus his will. And although euery man will iudge it a lamentable caſe, in ſuch a building ſurpaſſing all that euer was ſeene or heard of, both in greatneſſe, workmanſhip, coſtlineſſe and plenty of all things; in this yet we may comfort our ſelues, in that the deſtinies had ſo determined. For neither liuing creatures, nor places, nor buildings can auoyd their deſtiny. One may alſo admire the exact and iuſt reuolution of time: for it was now deſtroyed in the ſame moneth, and on the ſame day that
C the Babylonians firſt deſtroyed it: and from that time that Salomon began the firſt Temple, vnto the deſtruction of the ſecond Temple, which hapned the ſecond yeere of Veſpaſians raigne, were a thouſand a hundreth and thirty yeeres, ſeuen moneths, and fifteene daies: and from the building of the latter Temple which Aggæus built in the ſecond yeere of the raigne of King Cyrus, vnto the deſtruction thereof now in Veſpaſians raigne, were ſixe hundreth thirty nine yeeres and fiue and forty dayes.

Of the Prieſts: the Treaſure-houſe: and the Porch.

D WHEN the Temple was thus conſumed with fire, whatſoeuer the ſouldiers found therein, they carried away, and put all to the ſword that were in it, which was an infinite number: neither did they ſhew any pity to old age, or infants: but old, young, Prieſts and common people, all were ſlaine without reſpect, and all ſorts of people taſted the calamitie of warre, whether they reſiſted, or intreated for mercy. And now the flame encreaſed, which grieued euen them that were yeelding vp the ghoſt: and by reaſon of the height of the hill, and the building together, one would haue thought the whole City had beene on fire. Then a moſt lamentable cry was raiſed betweene the Romane legions, and the ſeditious now inuironed with fire and ſword, and of the people that were taken in the higher part of the Citie,
E and had fled vnto the Romanes, lamenting their calamitie; and they of the Citie anſwered the teares and cries of them in the hill, and many whoſe eyes death by famine had already clozed, tooke ſtrength awhile to bewaile the Temple, which they now opening their eyes beheld on fire. The countrey beyond Iordan, and the mountaines about did eccho with their laments: and yet the calamitie ſurpaſſed that tumult. For one would haue iudged the hill whereon the Temple was ſituate, to haue beene burnt vp by the rootes, it was ſo full of fire: Yet multitude of blood there ſhed ſurpaſſed the fire. Many that were ſlaine were couered with them that ſlew them, and all the ground was ouerſpred with dead bodies, ſo that the ſouldiers ranne vpon the dead bodies to purſue them that fledde. At laſt the theeues hauing driuen the Romanes without the Temple, they ranne into the Citie; and the reſt of the people that were left, fled
F into the outward porch. And many of the Prieſts firſt vſed ſpits, and then their ſeates made of lead, in ſtead of darts againſt the Romanes; at laſt, nothing at all preuailing, and the fire falling vpon them, they went vnto a wall eight cubits broad, and there ſtayed. Yet two of the Nobles, when they might either haue fled vnto the Romans, and there haue beene ſaued, or elſe haue endured like fortune with the reſt, they notwithſtanding caſt themſelues into the fire, and ſo were burnt with the Temple: one of them was named Meierus the ſon of Belga, the other Ioſeph the ſonne of Dalæus.

The Romans thought it in vaine to ſpare the buildings about the Temple, ſeeing the Temple was already conſumed, and ſo ſet fire on them all, the porches, galleries and gates; two onely excepted, one on the Eaſt ſide, and the other on the South ſide, both which afterward they razed vnto the ground: they burnt alſo certaine cheſts called Gazophylacia, or money boxes, wherein was great ſtore of coine, and rich garments, and other precious things, and indeed all the Iewes treaſure, for the richeſt of the Citie had brought all their wealth thither. There came into the porch that was left ſtanding, many men, women, and children, to the number of ſixe thouſand. And before Cæſar and the Captaines did determine any thing what ſhould bee done with them, the furious ſouldiers fired the porch wherein they were, and ſo they all periſhed in the flames; ſaue a few, that leaping downe to auoide the fire, were ſlaine in the fall, ſo that no one eſcaped of all that multitude. A certaine falſe prophet was cauſe of all their deaths, who the ſame day preached in the Citie, and commanded them to goe into the Temple, and behold ſignes of their deliuerance: for many falſe prophets were then ſuborned by the tyrants, to perſwade them to expect Gods helpe, thereby to hinder them from flying to the Romans, and to cauſe the ſouldiers to fight more valiantly to defend their Citie. Men eaſily beleeue and are credulous in aduerſity, ſo that if any deceitfull perſon promiſe deliuerance out of Calamity, he that ſuffereth miſery, is full of hope thereof.

CHAP. XII.

Of the ſtrange ſignes and tokens that appeared before the deſtruction of Ieruſalem.

The blindnes of the people.

THeſe miſerable people were thus eaſily perſwaded by impoſtors who did belie God, yet would they not beleeue, nor giue any eare or regard vnto certaine tokens, and ſignes of the ruine of their city: but as it were blinded, neither hauing eyes nor ſoules, they counterfeited themſelues not to ſee what God foreſhewed them. One while there was a Comet in forme of a fiery ſword, which for a yeere together did hang ouer the city: another time before the firſt reuolt and warre, the people being gathered together to the feaſt of vnleauened bread (which was the eighth day of April) the ninth houre of the night, there was ſo much light about the Altar and Temple, as though it had bin bright day, which remained halfe an houre: this the ignorant people interpreted as a good ſigne; but they that were skilfull in holy Scripture, did preſently iudge, what would enſue before it came to paſſe. The ſame feſtiuity, a Cow led to be ſacrificed at the Altar, brought forth a lambe in the midſt of the Temple: and the Inner gate of the Temple on the Eaſt ſide being of maſſiue braſſe, which at night time had alwaies at leaſt 20. men to ſhut it, and was bound with locks of iron, and was barred with barres, the ends whereof went into morteis holes in the ſtones on either ſide the doore (the foreſaid ſtones being on each ſide, one whole ſtone) was ſeene at the firſt houre of the night to open of his owne accord: which being preſently related vnto the Magiſtrate by the keepers of the Temple, hee himſelfe came thither and could ſcarcely ſhut it, and this alſo to the ignorant ſeemed a good ſigne, affirming that God opened vnto them the gate of his bleſſings: but the wiſer ſort iudged that the defence of the Temple would decay of his owne accord, and that the opening of the gate foretold, that it ſhould be giuen to the enemies, affirming one vnto another that this ſigne ſignified deſolation. A little while after the feaſt daies, on the 21. day of May there was ſeene a viſion beyond all beliefe, and perhaps that which I am to recount might ſeeme a fable, if ſome were not now aliue that beheld it, and that calamity worthy to bee ſo foretold enſued: for before the ſunne ſet, were ſeene in the ayre iron Chariots all ouer the countrey, and an army in battell aray paſſing along in the clowds, and begirting the Citie. And vpon the feaſt day called Pentecoſt, at night the Prieſts going into the inner Temple to offer their wonted ſacrifice, at firſt felt the place to moue and tremble, and afterward they heard a voice which ſaid, Let vs depart hence. And that which was moſt wonderfull of all, one Ieſus the ſonne of Ananus a countrey man of the common people, foure yeeres before the warres began, when the Citie flouriſhed in peace and riches, comming to the celebration of the feaſt to Ieruſalem, which we call the feaſt of Tabernacles, ſuddenly began to cry out thus; A voyce from the Eaſt: A voyce from the Weſt: A voice from the foure winds: A voyce againſt Ieruſalem and the Temple: A voyce against men and women newly married: A voyce againſt all this people: and thus crying night and day, he went about all the ſtreets of the Citie.

A Some of the Nobility diſdaining misfortune, took him and ſcourged him with many ſtripes: but he, neither ſecretly ſpeaking for himſelfe, nor to thoſe that did beat him, perſeuered crying as before. The Magiſtrates then thinking (as indeed it was) that the man ſpake this through ſome diuine motion, led him vnto the Generall of the Romans, where being beaten till his bones appeared, he neuer intreated nor wept, but as well as he could, framing a weeping voice he cried, Wo, wo vnto Ieruſalem. Albinus (being then Iudge) asked him what he was, or of whence, or wherefore he ſaid ſo, but he made him no anſwer. Yet hee ceaſed not to bewaile the miſery of Ieruſalem, vntill Albinus, thinking him to be out of his wits, ſuffred him to depart. This man euen vntill the time of warre neuer went to any Citizen, nor was ſeene ſpeake to any one: but ſtill as it were B ſtudying of ſome ſpeech, he cryed, Wo, wo vnto Ieruſalem. Neither did he euer curſe any one, though euery day one or other did beate him; nor thanke any one that offred him meat. All that he ſpake vnto any man was this heauy prophecy. Hee went crying as is aforeſaid, chiefely vpon holy-dayes, ſo doing continually for the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres and fiue moneths, his voyce neuer waxed hoarſe nor weary, till in the time of the ſiege, beholding what hee foretold them, hee ceaſed, and then once againe vpon the wals going about the city, with a loud voyce he cried, Wo, wo to the City, Temple and people: and laſtly he ſaid, Wo alſo to my ſelfe. Which words were no ſooner vttered, but a ſtone ſhot out of an engine ſmote him, and ſo hee yeelded vp the ghoſt, lamenting them all.

If any one do diligently conſider all theſe, he ſhall finde that God hath a care of mankind, and C doth euery way foreſhew betime, what is moſt expedient for them, and they through their owne madnes, to haue voluntarily periſhed in their wickedneſſe. For the Iewes, when the Caſtle Antonia was taken, made the Temple foure-ſquare: notwithſtanding that it was written in the holy Scripture, that the City and Temple ſhould be taken, when the Temple was made foure-ſquare. But that which chiefely incited them to war, was the doubtfull prophecy likewiſe found in the holy Scriptures: That at the ſame time one in their dominions ſhould be Monarch of the whole world; and many wiſemen were deceiued in this interpretation, making account that hee ſhould be one of their owne nation, yet indeed thereby was foretold Veſpaſians Empire. But men cannot preuent deſtiny, though they foreſee it. Thus the Iewes interpreted ſome of the ſignes as they pleaſed, and at others they laughed, till by the ruine of their countrey, and their owne wofull D ouerthrow, their iniquity appeared.

The Iewes interpreting the ſignes to their owne good liking, are their Countries ruine, and the cauſe of their owne calamity.

CHAP. XIII.

How TITVS was made Emperour: and of the death of the Prieſts.

AFter the ſeditious were fled into the City, all the Temple and places thereabout being ſet on fire, the Romans placing their Enſignes in the Temple ouer againſt the Eaſt gate: and there celebrating ſacrifice, with great cries declared Titus Emperor, and the Romans got many preyes and booties, that they ſold gold in Syria for halfe the valew. And among thoſe E Prieſts that kept on the wall, a child being thirſty, deſired peace of the Romane watchmen, ſaying, that he was thirſty. So they, pitying both his yeeres and his need, gaue him their hands that hee ſhould haue no harme, and then hee came downe and drunke, and filled a bottle which hee brought with him: and when hee had done, hee ranne vp againe to his fellowes, and none of the watchmen were able to ouertake him, and they vpbraided him with falſhood. But he anſwered, that he had done nothing, but that which he and they intended: for they did not giue him their hands to ſecure him to remaine with them, but onely to come downe and take water, which hee had done. The Romane watchmen greatly admired the ſubtilty of him that was but a childe. The fift day, the Prieſts being almoſt famiſhed came downe, and the watchmen carried them to Titus, whom they beſought to grant them their liues. But he anſwered them, that the time of par- F don was paſt, ſeeing that was deſtroyed, for the which he might haue pardoned them, and that it was meet that the Prieſts ſhould periſh with the Temple: and ſo he commanded them to be put to death. Then the tyrants with their followers being on euery ſide beſet with wars, and hauing no way to flee, they being thus beleagured round, requeſted to parley with Titus; who for his naturall meekneſſe, his friends alſo perſwading him thereto, thought at leaſt to ſaue the Citie (iudging indeed that now the ſeditious had already their minds) and ſo he ſtood in the Weſt part of the inner Temple: for there was a gate built aboue a gallery, and a bridge that ioyned the Temple

Temple and Citie together, which was then betweene Titus and the tyrants. Many ſouldiers on both parts flocked about their Rulers; the Iewes about Simon and Iohn, hoping for pardon: the Romans about Titus, deſirous what he would ſay vnto them: and Titus by an Edict commanding the ſouldiers to be quiet, and to ſhoot no arrowes, ſpake vnto them firſt by an Interpreter, thereby ſhewing that he had the vpper hand, and ſaid, O ye men of Ieruſalem, are ye not now glutted with the calamities of your countrey? Neither calling to minde our power, nor your owne infirmity, but with a raſh fury haue deſtroyed your people, City and Temple: your ſelues alſo hauing iuſtly deſerued to periſh; who, ſince Pompey firſt conquered you, haue neuer ceaſed to be ſeditious, and at laſt, haue openly borne armes againſt the Romans. Did you truſt vnto your multitude? You haue ſeene that a ſmall parcell of the Romans army hath ſufficiently reſiſted you. Or did you expect forraine aid? What nation is not vnder our dominion? and who would rather make choyce of the Iewes then of the Romans? Did you truſt in your ſtrength of body? why, you know the Germanes ſerue vs. Or in the ſtrength of your walles? what wall, or what greater hinderance then the Ocean, wherewith the Britaines inuironed, haue yeelded vnto the Roman forces? Or to your courage, and politike counſell of your captaines? You haue already heard that the Carthaginians haue beene by vs ſurprized. It was therefore the Romans humanity that incited you againſt themſelues, who firſt of all permitted you to poſſeſſe your countrey, and gaue you Kings of your owne nation: and after all this, we kept your lawes inuiolate, and ſuffred you to liue as your ſelues deſired, not onely in your owne countrey, but alſo amongſt other nations; and which is the greateſt of all our benefits beſtowed vpon you, we permitted you to gather tribute and gifts to the maintenance of your Temple and ſacrifices to God; of all which, we neither forbad any to be brought vnto you, neither hindered any that would offer vnto your Temple, but ſuffred you our enemies to bee made richer then our ſelues, ſo that you haue vſed our owne money againſt vs. Wherefore, hauing receiued ſo many benefits at our hands, you haue now diſgorged your ſelues vpon vs, and like ſpitefull ſerpents, ſpet your poiſon vpon them that made much of you. Let vs omit that by Nero his negligence you became forgetfull of your duty, and like ſome member in the body broken or ſhrunke, you being ſtill tumultuous, at laſt were taken in a greater offence, and were incouraged with immoderate deſires to hope for vnlawfull liberty. My father came into your countrey, not to puniſh you for your miſdemeanor toward Ceſtius, but by good counſell and warning to reprehend and quiet yon. And whereas if he had come to deſtroy your nation, he ought firſt to haue cut downe the very roote, and to haue come vnto this city and deſtroyed it, with the inhabitants: he rather choſe firſt to waſte Galilea, and the places adioyning, that in the meane time you might repent you, and conſider of your eſtate. But this his mercy towards you was held for cowardlineſſe and infirmity in him, and by our long ſuffering, you were emboldned againſt vs: and when Nero was dead, you did as treacherous ſubiects are wont to do, taking occaſion by our ciuill diſſention, to reuolt from vs: and whileſt my father and I were gone into Egypt, you prepared your ſelues to war againſt vs: neither were you aſhamed to trouble them that were deſigned Princes, whom notwithſtanding you had found moſt gentle Captaines vnto you. At laſt, when the Empire fell vnto vs, and all things being now quieted, all nations with gifts and preſents came to congratulate vs: behold againe, the Iewes ſhewed themſelues our enemies, and you ſent an Embaſſador beyond Euphrates, onely to nouriſh your rebellion, walling and fortifying your townes anew: and contending like ſeditious and tyrants one with another, ſet abroach ciuill warres: all which, none but impious people would haue committed. Wherefore being commanded by my father, who was now vrged thereunto, I came againſt this city with a heauy charge; yet did I reioyce when I heard that the people deſired peace. Before I warred againſt you, I exhorted you to peace: after war was begun, I deſiſted awhile from vſing ſeuerity: I ſpared all them that of their owne accord fled vnto mee, and kept my promiſe vnto them, pitying thoſe that were captiues. I with ſtrokes reſtrained them that haſted the war againſt you againſt my will; and euen forced ſo to do, I ſet the Romans againſt your wals, and alwaies reſtrained my ſouldiers ſo much deſirous of your blood. As often as I ouercame you, ſo often did I exhort you to peace, as though I had beene vanquiſhed. Againe; when I approached vnto the Temple, I (willingly omitting the law of armes) requeſted you to ſpare both it and the holy things, offering you leaue to depart, and promiſing you ſafety, or licencing you to fight another time in another place, if ſo you thought good. All theſe my offers you refuſed, and with your owne hands fired your Temple. And now you wicked wretches vrge me to a parlee. What thing can you now preſerue ſo excellent, as that which is already periſhed? What pardon can you

A you expect, seeing your temple is destroied? nay, euen now you stand armed, not so much as counterfeiting submission in the last cast. O wretches, with what hope? Is not your people dead, is not your temple destroied, and your city now in my hands, yea, your liues also? But do you thinke death the renowne of fortitude? I will not striue with your obstinacy: yet if you will cast downe your weapons, and yeeld your bodies, I will spare your liues: And like as in a priuate house I will shew my selfe vnto you a gentle master; and after I haue punished that which otherwise is incurable, I will reserue the rest for my selfe.

Titus grants the Iewes life, on condition they should lay aside their weapons, and submit themselues.

To this they answered, that they could not receiue pardon at his hands, hauing vowed the contrary: wherefore they requested licence to depart with their wiues and children by the camp,
B which he had enuironed with a wall, and so to goe into the wildernes, and leaue the City to the Romans. Titus was hereat greatly enraged, that they being in a manner captiues, should impose vpon him conditions, as though they were victors; and commanded a crier to tell them, that henceforth they should not flee vnto him, nor hope that he would pardon them: for he would spare nothing, willing them with all their forces to fight and saue themselues as they could, for he would now in all things vse the law of armes: and so he permitted the souldiers to sacke the City and set it on fire. And that day they did nothing: but the next day following, they fired the councell-house, the palace Acra, and Ophla, and the fire came vnto Queene Helens palace, which was situate in the midst of Acra: also the houses and streets of the city full of dead bodies were set on fire. The same day, the sons and brethren of King Izates, and with them many nobles
C of the people, assembled together, besought Cæsar to pardon them: and he, though incensed against them all, yet not changing his maner, receiued them to mercy, and put them all in prison, and afterward carried them bound to Rome for hostages, that were the kings sons and kinsmen.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the prey of the seditious, and the burning of the inner part of the Citie.

D THe seditious went vnto the kings palace, where many had left all their wealth, because it was a strong place: and driuing the Romans from thence, they slew all the people there assembled, amounting to the number of 8000, and 400. and carried away all the mony, and they tooke there two Roman souldiers aliue, one a horseman, and another a footman; & they slue the footman, & drew him all along the city, as it were in the body of that one, reuenging themselues vpon all the Romaes. But the horseman affirmed that he had something to say vnto them, which would greatly profit them, and saue their liues: who was carried to Simon; and not hauing there any thing to say, Simon deliuered him to one of his captaines called Ardala to be slaine, and he brought him where the Romans might behold him with his hands bound behind him, & a veile before his eies, meaning there to behead him: but he, whil'st the Iew drew out
E his sword, fled to the Romans. And Titus would not put him to death, because he had escaped from the enemies: yet deeming him vnworthy to be a Roman souldier, who suffred himselfe to be taken aliue, he tooke from him his armes, and discharged him from bearing them any more, which to a wise man was worse then death. The next day, the Romans putting the seditious to flight that were in the lower city, they fired al vnto Siloa, reioycing that the town was destroied: yet they got no booties, because the seditious had already robbed and spoiled all, and carried it into the higher city. For they nothing repented them of their wickednes, but were as arrogant as though they had beene in prosperity: so that they with ioy beheld the city on fire, affirming that they desired death; for that the people being slaine, the temple destroied, and the city on fire, they should leaue nothing to their enemies. Yet Ioseph in that extremity laboured to saue
F the relicks of the city, much inueighing against their cruelty, and earnestly exhorting them to saue themselues: yet he nothing profited in all this, but was derided for his labor: for neither would they yeeld to the Romans for their oaths sake, neither were they able to fight with the Romans, being now as it were besieged round by them; yet their accustomed murders did encourage them to stand out.

The Iewes refuse to submit themselues to the Romans, yet are they vnable to wage warre with them.

Thus dispersed all ouer the City, they lurked in the ruines, lying in wait for those that sought to flee vnto the Romans, and many of them were taken, and all of them were slaine; for famine had so weakned them, that they could not flee, and they cast their dead bodies to dogs. And any death death were easie in respect of famine. So that many fled vnto the Romanes, hauing no promise, G no nor hope to be pardoned by them, and vpon purpose fell into the hands of the seditious, who neuer ceased from murther: and now there was no place in the whole Citie voide, but was fild with dead bodies, who either perished by famine or sedition. But the tyrants and factious theeues put their last refuge in the vaults, where they hoped whatsoeuer hapned to saue themselues, hoping that there they could not bee found, and so after the Citie was destroyed, to escape, which was onely their vaine fantasie. For they could neither be hid from God nor the Romanes: yet at that time they trusted in those caues, from whence they fired the Citie more then the Romanes, and cruelly murdred them, that hauing escaped the flames, came and fled into secret places, and spoyled them: also if they in any place found any meat, though all bloody, H yet they tooke it, and did eate it, and now one of them began to fight with another about the spoyle they got. And I verily perswade my selfe, that had they not beene preuented by the destruction of the Citie, their crueltie would haue beene such, that they would haue eaten the bodies of dead men.

The tyrants vttermost hope was in their vaults.

CÆSAR, perceiuing that the higher part of the Citie would not be won without mounts, being situate in a soile, round about the which were high and deep places, on the twentith day of August, he set al his souldiers on work, and the carrying of wood for that purpose was very painfull: all trees within 100. furlongs off the Citie were already cut downe, and vsed in the former worke, as is before said. So the foure legions raised a mount on the West side of the Citie, and all the rest made a mount against the porch, bridge and tower, which Simon during his warres with Iohn had built. About this time, the Captaines of the Idumæans assembling together, deliberated to yeeld themselues, and sent fiue of their company to Titus, beseeching him to confirme a peace vnto them: and he hoping that the tyrant would yeeld after them, who were the greatest part of his army, with much adoe granted them life, and so sent them to their K fellowes: but Simon had notice of their departure, and presently slew those fiue that were sent vnto Titus, and taking the Captaines (the noblest of whom was Iames, the sonne of Sosa) he put them in prison, and also kept and guarded the Idumæans, who now hauing no Gouernors, knew not what to doe, yet the guard could not hinder them from fleeing: for although many of them were kild, yet diuers fled and escaped, and were all receiued by the Romanes; Titus courtesie being such, as that he remembred not his former Edict to the contrary, and now the souldiers hoping for gaine, and hauing already gotten sufficient, abstained from murthers: for leauing only the common people, they sold the rest with their wiues and children for a small price, many being exposed to sale, and few comming to buy them: so that he hauing made an Edict that none should flee vnto him alone, intending thereby to bring their families with them, yet he now re- L ceiued them also, appointing some to enquire who had deserued punishment, and to inflict it on them. And an infinite number was sold, and more then 40000 of the people were saued, whom the Emperour dismissed, and permitted to goe whither they pleased. The same time a certaine Priest, the sonne of Thebathus, named Iesus, was promised pardon, on condition he should deliuer certaine holy things giuen to the Temple: and so he came and brought out of a wall two candlesticks, like to them that were in the Temple, tables, goblets, cups, all made of solid and massiue gold: also the veile and the ornaments of the Priests, and the precious stones about them, and many vessels made for sacrifice. Moreouer, the Keeper of the holy Treasure, called Phineas, brought forth the garments, and all things that did belong to the Priests, and much purple and scarlet, which were laid vp in store, to make tapestry or hangings, among which M also was some Cinamon, Cassia, and many other odoriferous things, whereof were compounded sweet odours to be offered to God. He also deliuered him much wealth of other mens, and much Sacred Treasure: for the which, notwithstanding he was taken by force, yet he was pardoned, as they were that fled vnto Cæsar.

CHAP. XVI.

How the reſt of the Citie was taken.

THE ſeuenth day of September, the mounts being finiſhed, which was the eighteenth day after they were begun, ſome of the Romanes placed their Rams and Engines to batter them; and ſome of the ſeditious, who now deſpaired to keepe the Citie, left the wals, and fled into Acra, others hid themſelues in certaine vaults, and many hindred the Romans, and reſiſted them for placing their Rams againſt the walles, who were ouercome by them, being both more in number then they were, and alſo ſtronger and more valiant. The Iewes being now all diſcouraged and ſorrowfull, ſo ſoone as any part of the wall was broken downe, or ſhaken with the force of the Rams, ſtraightwaies fled, and now the tyrants were ſurprized with a greater feare then needed. For euen before ſuch time as the enemies had entred the wall, they ſtood in doubt whether they might flee or no: and they who a little before were proud and arrogant malefactors, did now tremble and quake, ſo that it was pitifull to ſee ſuch a change in them, though they were wicked perſons. And they endeuoured to aſſaile the wall that Titus had built to compaſſe the whole Citie withall: but ſeeing themſelues forſaken of all thoſe that were wont to be truſty vnto them, euery one fled whither neceſſitie did driue him. Preſently newes were brought them that all the Weſt wall of the Citie was beaten downe, others affirmed that the Romans had entred, and that they had ſeene the enemies in the towers, feare dazeling their eyes: and proſtrate on the ground, they bewayled their misfortune; and as though they had beene lame, they ſtood ſtill, and ſought not to flee. From whence one may chiefly perceiue Gods Iuſtice toward the impious, and the Romanes fortune: for the tyrants depriued themſelues of their ſtrong holds, and voluntarily departed out of their towers, wherein they could neuer haue beene taken but by famine: and the Romans, hauing ſo much labored at the lower wals, did now by fortune take theſe, which their engines could neuer haue ſhaken, for there were 3. inexpugnable towers that could not be battered with the engines, whereof before we haue made mention. So the tyrants hauing forſaken theſe, or rather being by Gods will driuen from hence, preſently they fled vnto the valley Siloa; after the feare was paſt, they againe tooke heart, and went vnto the wall that was in that place: yet not vſing ſuch courage and violence as their need required, they were beaten by the watchmen that guarded it; their ſtrength now failing and wearied with labor, feare, famine and calamity. And ſome were driuen one way, and ſome another, and were forced to hide themſelues in vaults and ſinks. The Romans hauing obtained the wall, placed their colours in the towers, and clapping their hands, and ſinging for ioy, they cried, Victory, finding the end of the warre nothing ſo terrible as the beginning. Yet did they not beleeue that was the end, becauſe they got the wall without any bloudſhed, but admired, ſeeing no man did offer to reſiſt them. And now iſſuing into euery ſtreet, they ſlue whomſoeuer they found, without any reſpect, and fired houſes, and all the people that had fled into them, and deſtroyed many whereas they entred for to get a prey, and they found whole families dead, and houſes full of dead bodies, conſumed by famine. Thus terrified with that heauy ſight, they departed out, not taking any thing away, yet for all that they pitied not them that were left aliue, but ſlew whomſoeuer they met, whereby they filled the narrow ſtreets ſo full of dead bodies by them ſlaine, that none could paſſe that way for them: all the whole city flowed with bloud, ſo that many things ſet on fire, were quenched with the bloud of them that were ſlaine. At euening they ceaſed from killing, but all the night long the fire encreaſed: and ſo in the morning, which was the eighth day of September, all was now on fire, the city in the time of the ſiege hauing endured more miſery and calamity, then euer it receiued ioy and happineſſe from the time of the firſt foundation, notwithſtanding that they were ſo great, that all cities might iuſtly enuy it, and it no wiſe deſerued ſo to be oppreſſed with ſuch miſery, ſaue onely for that it foſtered and bred ſuch impious perſons as wrought the ouerthrow thereof.

Titus, entring into the city, amongſt the reſt admired the ſtrong holds thereof, and the rocky towers which the tyrants like madde men depriued themſelues of: and ſeeing the height, firmneſſe, bignes, and the ioyning of the ſtones together, and their breadth & height, he ſaid: Surely, God hath aſſiſted vs in the fight, and he it was that did withdraw the Iews from theſe fortreſſes. For what could mens hands and engins preuaile againſt them? And hauing ſpoke much to this effect, effect, comming with his friends, he ſet them at libertie whom the tyrants had left bound in the Caſtles: and when he deſtroyed the reſt of the Citie and walles, he left thoſe towers ſtanding as a monument of his good fortune and victory, by the which he had gained them, though vnexpugnable. The ſouldiers now being weary with killing the miſerable Iewes, and yet a great multitude remaining aliue, Cæſar commanded, that onely the armed Iewes and they that reſiſted ſhould be ſlaine, and the reſt left aliue. But the ſouldiers alſo killed old folkes and weake perſons, and taking all able men and luſty, they carryed them into the Temple, and ſhut them there in the place appointed for the women. Cæſar left one Fronto, a Libertine and his friend, to keepe them, giuing him alſo charge to make inquiry, who had deſerued puniſhment; who ſlew all the theeues and ſeditious, one of them bewraying another, and reſerued certaine choſen young men of large ſtature and beautifull withall for the triumph: and all the reſt that were aboue ſeuenteene yeeres old, he ſent bound into Ægypt, to be imployed in certaine workes there, as digging, deluing and manuring the fields, and to be vſed in other publike buſineſſe. Titus alſo ſent many of them vnto diuers Prouinces to be ſlaine in the Theaters with beaſts or ſwords: and they that were vnder ſeuenteene yeeres of age were ſold. And during the time that Fronto kept them, 10000 dyed for hunger; partly, for that their Keepers hating them, would not giue them any meat; partly, for that ſome refuſed meat when it was offered them. For there was now ſcarcitie of corne, by reaſon of the great multitude of the people.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the number of the captiues, and them that were ſlaine.

The number of the captiues and ſuch as dyed, during the ſiege of the Citie.

THE number of all the captiues that were taken during the whole time of warre, was 97000: and the number of all that dyed and were ſlaine during the ſiege, was 1100000, the moſt of them being Iewes by nation, but not inhabitants of that place. For being aſſembled together from all parts to the feaſt of vnleauened bread, preſently and on a ſudden they were inuironed with warre, and firſt of all a plague fell among them by reaſon of the ſtraightneſſe of the place, and immediately after, famine, worſe then it. And that the Citie was capable of ſo many men it is euident, for that Ceſtius before numbred them; who, deſirous to ſignifie the flouriſhing eſtate and ſtrength of Ieruſalem vnto Nero, who contemned our nation, requeſted the high Prieſts, that if poſſibly they could, they ſhould number all the people in their Citie: and that vpon the feaſt of Eaſter, when they killed offerings from the ninth houre of the day vntill the eleuenth (and to eate a Lambe not fewer then ten perſons were aſſembled, for it is not lawfull to feaſt alone, yea, many times twentie are in a company) they numbred 256000, and 500 oblations or lambs to be kild; ſo that if we reckon to euery lambe ten men, the number amounts to 2700000 men, all purified, whole and ſound: for it was not lawfull for any that were lepers, or had a fluxe of ſeed, nor women that had the monethly termes, to eate of that ſacrifice, nor for any ſtranger, except he came thither for Religion ſake. And this multitude was aſſembled together from other places, and was there by the prouidence of God ſhut vp as it were in a priſon. And the Citie being filled with men of warre was beſieged, that the number of them that were ſlaine, paſſed all that euer periſhed, either by any plague ſent from God, or by the meanes of men; who were partly openly ſlaine, partly taken by the Romanes: who ſearching the vaults, and opening the ſepulchres, ſpared none they met withall. There alſo were found more then 2000, whereof ſome ſlew themſelues with their owne hands, other-ſome kild by others, the reſt periſhed by famine. The ſtinke of dead bodies was ſo great, that many minding to goe and ſearch the foreſaid places, and being entred into them, were forced to retire: yet others for lucre ſake treading on the dead carcaſes, ſearched the dead bodies, if they could finde any thing: for much riches were hid in the vaults, and couetouſneſſe omitted no way to gaine. Moreouer, many were taken out from thence, whom the tyrants had bound, who euen in their extremitie ceaſed not to tyrannize: yet God plagued them both according to their deſerts: for Iohn being now almoſt famiſhed with his brethren in a vault, beſought the Romanes to ſaue his life. And Simon, hauing long ſtriuen with neceſſitie, as we ſhall hereafter make mention of, at laſt yeelded himſelfe, who was kept for the triumph; and Iohn was condemned to perpetuall priſon. Then they deſtroyed the walles, and fired the outward parts of the Citie.

The Romans ſearching the graues and vaults, finde much treaſure.

A briefe History of the Citie of Ierusalem.

THVS was Ierusalem taken the second yeere of Vespasians raigne, on the eighth day of September, and hauing beene already fiue times before surprized, it was finally againe destroyed. First Asochæus King of Ægypt, and after him Antiochus, then Pompey, and after them Herod with Sosius tooke the Citie, and yet destroyed it not. But before them the King of Babylon destroyed it, when he had inioyed the same, a thousand three hundreth and threescore yeeres, eight moneths and sixe dayes after it was first built: but he that first built it, was one of the Princes of the Cananeans, in his owne language called the iust King. For he indeed was so, and therefore was the first Priest that sacrificed vnto God, and dedicating a Temple, called the Citie Solyma: but Dauid the King of the Iewes hauing driuen out the Cananeans, gaue it vnto his people to be inhabited, and after foure hundreth threescore foure yeeres and three moneths, it was destroyed by the Babylonians: and from King Dauid who was the first Iew that raigned there, vntill the time that Titus destroyed it, were a thousand one hundred seuentie & nine yeeres, and from the time that it was first erected vntill it was by him destroyed, were two thousand one hundred and seuentie seuen yeeres: yet neither the antiquitie nor riches, nor the fame thereof now spred all ouer the world, nor the glory of Religion did any thing profit or hinder it, from being destroyed. Such was the end of the besieging of Ierusalem. When there was none left to kill, nor any thing remaining for the souldiers to get, and that now there was nothing, against which the souldiers could shew their outrage (for they would haue spared nothing that they could haue spoyled) Cæsar commanded them to destroy the Citie and Temple, onely yet leauing standing certaine towers, that were more beautifull and stronger then the rest, to wit, Phasaelus, Hippicos, and Mariamme, and the wall that was on the West side; meaning there to keepe a garrison, and that they should be monuments of the Romanes vertue, who had surprized a Citie so well fortified as it appeared by them. All the rest of the Citie they so plained, that they who had not seene it before, would not beleeue that it had beene euer inhabited. This was the end of their madnesse, who were alwaies giuen vnto sedition in Ierusalem, a most worthy Citie and famous amongst all nations.

Ierusalem being fiue times spoyled, was at that time once more sackt.

The Romans wholly ruinate both the Citie and the Temple.

CHAP. XIX.

How the souldiers were rewarded.

CÆSAR determined to leaue the tenth legion for a garrison in Ierusalem, with some troupes of horsemen and other companies of footmen: and all warres being now ended, hee purposed to thanke the whole armie for their valiant acts, and reward the most couragious for their deserts. And placing a great tribunall in the middest before the campe, standing in it with the chiefe Peeres about him, from whence the whole armie might heare him, he gaue them heartie thankes for that of their good will towards him, they had patiently abode with him during those warres, praising them for their loyaltie during all the foresaid time, and that in many skirmishes they had shewed themselues valiant, and by their valour had enlarged the dominions of their countrey: likewise they had now giuen all nations to vnderstand, that neither the multitude of enemies, nor strong holds, nor greatnesse of Cities, nor rashnes, nor barbarous crueltie of their aduersaries could euer resist the forces of the Romanes, nor escape their hands; notwithstanding that in many things fortune fauoured them: adding that it was a credit for them to haue ended those warres that had continued a long time; which was all that they hoped for at their comming; and which was most glory of all vnto them, that those Captaines whom they had elected to be the Romane Emperours, were well liked and imbraced of all men, all standing to their appointment; and acknowledging themselues beholding to them that elected them. Moreouer, that he admired them and loued them all, for that euery one shewed himselfe valiant and couragious: affirming that he would now recompence those with honours, and due desert, who had behaued themselues most valiantly, and most hazarded themselues, and effected worthy deeds, and whosoeuer was forwarder then the rest, should haue reward according to his desert. And that he would be more diligent in honouring them that had bin his companions in that warre, then in punishing their offences; then presently he willed them to whom it appertained, to nominate them who had valiantly behaued themselues in those warres, and had performed any worthy exployt: which being done, he called euery one by his name, and praised them, as greatly reioycing at the valour of his countrymen, crowning them with crownes of gold, and put chaines of gold about their neckes, and gaue them large speares of gold, and ensignes made of siluer; he also preferred euery one of them, and gaue them of the spoile, precious garments, with gold and siluer very plentiously: and thus hauing rewarded euery one according to his merit; and praising God with all his army, he descended with great applause out of the tribunall, and went and offered sacrifices for the victory, and hauing gathered a great multitude of Oxen about the Altar to sacrifice them, he offered them all, and therewith feasted his army, and himselfe three dayes with all his Nobilitie, dismissing all the souldiers to depart whither they would, or thought good, appointing the tenth legion to keepe Ierusalem, and did not send it backe vnto Euphrates, where before it was. He banished also the twelfth legion out of all Syria, remembring that vnder Cestius his gouernment they fled from the Iewes, being before at Raphanæas, which he sent vnto Malto that is situate by Euphrates, in the confines of Armenia and Cappadocia, and the other two hee kept with himselfe, as sufficient to guard him into Ægypt, which were the fift and fifteenth legions. And comming to Cæsarea by the Sea coast, he there layd vp all his spoyles, and caused the captiues to be kept, because that the Winter season permitted him not to sayle into Italy.

Of VESPASIANS voyage by Sea, and how SIMON was taken: and of the spectacles, and shewes made vpon his birth day.

Vespasians sayling and iourney.

WHileſt Titus was busied in the siege of Ierusalem, Vespasian in a Marchants Ship sayled to Rhodes: and from thence departing in a Gally, hauing visited all Cities by the which he passed, being ioyfully receiued of them all, he went from Ionia into Greece, from thence vnto Corcyra, and then vnto Iapygia, and afterwards by Land. Thus Titus being returned from Cæsarea on the Sea coast, he came vnto Cæsarea Philippi, and there he made a long abode, proclaiming all sorts of pastime: wherein many captiues perished, some being cast vnto wild beasts, others forced in great companies to fight one against another; being in this place, he vnderstood that Simon the sonne of Giora was taken. This Simon at such time as Ierusalem was besieged, was in the higher part of the citie, when the Romane army had entred the wals, and began to waste it: and with his most trusty fellowes, and certaine Masons, hauing prouided them all necessary tooles, and victuals that might haue sufficed them all for many dayes, he accompanied with them, and went into a secret caue, vnto the end thereof, & there he caused them to digge further, hoping so to get out at some place where he might safely escape away. Yet this his hope had not so good successe as he expected: for they had but digged a little way, ere victuals fayled them: notwithstanding, that they had made very great spare thereof. Then Simon thinking to feare the Romanes, clothed himselfe in white, and a purple cloake buttoned about him, and so came out of the earth in that place where the Temple had beene builded before-time. And they that did first see him, were astonished awhile, and stirred not, but let him alone: yet at last they came vnto him, and demanded what he was, but Simon would not tell them, willing them to call their Captaine vnto him, and presently some of the souldiers ran to call him, and so he came: at that time Terentius Rufus was Captaine of the souldiers. Terentius hauing learned the truth of all, kept him bound, and related vnto Cæsar the manner of his taking, and thus Simon was by the power of God deliuered into his enemies hands, who hated him aboue measure, and so was iustly hereby punished, for hauing so cruelly tyrannized ouer his owne countreymen, not taken by their force, but yeelding himselfe vnto them, hauing cruelly butchered many, vnder pretence of false criminations: to wit, for hauing reuolted vnto the Romanes.

But impiety cannot escape Gods vengeance, neither is the diuine iustice of so weake force, but that it can at one time or other punish them that violate it, and it many times inflicteth a grieuous punishment vpon men, when they thinke they haue escaped all, for they were not presently punished, which also Simon felt, after he fell into the Romans hands: his comming out of the earth, made a great many more of the seditious at that time to be taken in the caues. When Cæsar was returned into Cæsarea by the Sea coast, Simon was presented bound vnto him, who commanded him

Yet the Romanes thought all theſe puniſhments too light and eaſie for them. After this, Cæſar came to Berytus (which is a Citie in Phœnicia, and a Colony of the Romanes) and here alſo he made ſome long abode, and celebrated the birth of his father, with farre greater ſolemnitie then the former, as well in making diuers ſhewes vnto the people, as in great expences and ſumptuouſneſſe, and cau-
B ſing many captiues to periſh as before.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the calamitie of the Iewes at Antiochia.

AT the ſame time the reſt of the Iewes were in great miſery, and the city of Antiochia was incited againſt them, both for certaine criminall cauſes now laid vnto their charge, as alſo for certaine offences before committed, which neceſſarily I muſt recount, before I ſpeake any thing of the reſt. The nation of the Iewes is mixed almoſt amongſt all nations of the C world, and eſpecially amongſt the Syrians, by reaſon of their vicinitie, and many of them were at Antiochia, becauſe it was a great Citie, and the Kings that ſucceeded Antiochus, permitted them freely to inhabit there, and to enioy all liberties of the Citie. For Antiochus, ſurnamed Epiphanes, deſtroyed Ieruſalem, and ſacked the Temple: but the Kings ſucceſſors reſtored all the braſſe that was taken from the Temple vnto the Iewes, offering it vnto their Synagogue in Antiochia, and permitted them to haue the ſame liberties in the Citie, that the Greekes enioyed, and the other Kings alſo of later times vſed them after the like ſort: ſo that their number greatly encreaſed, and they enlarged their Temple and enriched it with ſundry offerings, oftentimes winning many Pagans to be of their religion, and ſo as it were made them alſo a part of their nation. Now about the time that the warres began, and Veſpaſian was newly arriued, the Iewes began to bee
D generally hated of all men: then one of them named Antiochus, reuerend for parentage, whoſe father was chiefe of all the Iewes in Antiochia, at ſuch time as the people of Antiochia were aſſembled in the Theater, this man came in amongſt them, and accuſed his owne father, and the reſt of the Iewes to haue conſpired together to burne the Citie in the night time, and deliuered ſome Iewes vnto them that were his gueſts, as conſpirators with the reſt. The people hearing this, could not repreſſe their rage, but preſently cauſed them that were offered vnto them, to be burnt in the Theater, and made great ſpeede to ſet vpon all the Iewes, hoping that by ſpeedy diſpatch they might preſerue their countrey, which otherwiſe was like to periſh. And then Antiochus to enrage them the more, did now offer to ſacrifice according to the cuſtome of the Pagans, therby as it were aſſuring the Antiochians, that he hated the Iewes and their cuſtomes, willing them E alſo to compell all the reſt of the Iewes to doe the like, for whoſoeuer refuſed ſo to do were traitors. The Antiochians followed his counſell: but few Iewes would obey them, yet they that denyed to ſacrifice were ſlaine. Then Antiochus receiuing a charge of ſouldiers from the Captaine of the Romanes, became moſt cruell againſt his countrymen, and would not permit them to keepe holy the ſeuenth day; but in it to doe all labour and buſineſſe, that they were accuſtomed to do vpon any other day, and ſo vrged them hereto, that within ſhort time the ſeuenth day was not onely violated among them of Antiochia, but alſo in other places and Cities round about. The Iewes at Antiochia hauing then indured the foreſaid miſery, now fell into as great ca-
F lamitie as that was, whereof I intending to ſpeake, was forced to relate the former. For it hapned that the foureſquare market was fired, and the publike places, where all Writings and Regiſters were kept, as alſo the Kings Houſes: and the fire ſo increaſed, that with much ado it was hindred from firing the whole Citie. Of this fact Antiochus accuſed the Iewes, thereby ſufficiently inciting the Antiochians againſt them, although that they had not before borne them any malice, and making them ſo eaſily beleeue his calumniations, who now gaue full credit vnto his accuſations, by reaſon of that which was paſt: ſo that now they almoſt perſwaded themſelues, that they did ſee the Iewes put fire vnto them, and ſo in a great rage all of them ſet vpon them that were accuſed. Wherefore Collega the younger had much adoe to pacifie the people, notwithſtanding that he requested them to permit him to informe Cæsar of all that was past. For Vespasian had already sent Cæsennius Portus to be Gouernor of Syria, but he was not as yet arriued there. Then Collega making diligent enquiry of the matter, found out the truth, and not one of the Iewes accused by Antiochus was guiltie: for certaine impious people had done all this mischiefe, being indebted; thinking that if they had burnt the market-place, and the publike writings, that then their debts could not be required at their hands. Yet the Iewes liued in great feare, and expected the euent of those forged accusations.

CHAP. XXII.

The yeere of the world, 4035. after christs birth, 73.

The Citie of Rome entertaineth Vespasian with all willingnesse and pompe.

AFTER that Titus had receiued letters from his father, that he was arriued in Italy, and all Cities wherein hee as yet came, welcommed him very ioyfully, and that especially Rome had entertained him with great pompe and triumph, hee was now eased of the care he had before, and very ioyfull for his fathers welfare, and good fortune. For all the people of Italy did reuerence Vespasian, though absent, as though he had beene present with them, desiring to see his expected arriuall, whose comming they so heartily wished for. For the Senate, remembring what calamities had befalne the Citie in the change of Princes, desired to receiue their Emperour dignified with the honour of old age, and martiall renowne, whose presence onely would be to his subiects profit and safetie. And the vulgar sort also troubled before with ciuill warres, long expected his arriuall, assuring themselues thereby to haue an end of their calamitie, and to recouer againe their wonted affluence. Especially he was expected by the souldiers, who knowing his skill in martiall affaires by that which himselfe had already done, and finding their other Captaines, vnder whom they warred, ignorant and vnskilfull, they wished for his comming, thereby to be deliuered from the disgrace wherein they liued, desiring to receiue him by whom they might both be honoured, and preserued from danger. The Nobilitie seeing him so beloued of all men, could no longer waite his comming, but went and met him, he being farre from the Citie, and accompanied him; and no man stayed his comming, but in whole multitudes they went to meete him, they were so desirous to see him: so that more went to meete him then stayed at home.

The Romans issue out to meete with Vespasian.

When newes was brought that he approached neere vnto the Citie, and how friendly and courteously hee had entertained all men, the people with their wiues and children stayed in the way he came, to salute and see him: and whersoeuer he came, with ioyfull applauses and acclamations they cryed, calling him their Conseruer and Benefactor, and he who onely was worthy to be the Romane Emperour, and the whole Citie was as it had beene a Temple all hung with garlands, and full of sweet odours and perfumes: and the multitude of people being such that he could scarcely get into the palace, he offered sacrifices vnto his houshold gods for his safe returne, and all the people were feasted by their tribes, kinred and neighbours, sacrificing vnto God, and requesting that Vespasian might long continue their Emperour, and his sonne after him, and that the Empire might neuer depart from his linage. The Citie of Rome hauing thus receiued Vespasian, it presently was blessed with all happinesse and felicitie.

CHAP. XXIII.

The exploits of DOMITIAN against the Germanes and Frenchmen.

The causes of the reuolt of the Germans and French, from the Romanes.

BEFORE such time as Vespasian was gone to Alexandria, or that Titus besieged the Citie of Ierusalem, a great part of Germanie was reuolted, with whom the Frenchmen that bordred vpon them, renouncing their allegeance, they were in great hope to free themselues from the yoke and gouernment of the Romanes. The first motiues that caused the Germanes to reuolt, and to warre against the Romanes, was their temeritie and rash natures prone to fight, hauing but a very little hope of successe; then the hatred of their nobles, who knew that none could by force bring them into subiection but only the Romans, and chiefly thereunto encouraged by the opportunity they had. For they seeing the Empire greatly afflicted with ciuill wars, by reason of the often changing of Emperors, & knowing that all the world vnder their dominion was now

A now in ſuſpence, they thought that by reaſon of their troubles and ciuill warres, fit opportunity was offered them, and they were hereunto perſwaded by one Caſſius and Ciuilis, two of the moſt potent amongſt them, who long before deſired alteration; and now finding opportunity, ſhewed what minds they bare: who now taking courage, made tryall what the common people thought of this point, and the greateſt part of them manifeſtly condeſcended hereunto, and perhaps the reſt were not vnwilling. At this time, as it were by Gods prouidence, Veſpaſian ſent letters vnto Petilius Cerealis (who before-time had beene Gouernour of Germanie) and declared him Conſull, commanding him to goe into Britaine and take the rule of the countrey. Hee foorthwith obeyed Veſpaſians command: and hearing that the Germanes had reuolted, hee came againſt B them, they hauing now leuyed an army, and gaue them a great ouerthrow, killing many of them, and forced them to their due obedience vnto the Romanes. Notwithſtanding, if hee had not come thither, not long after they had aſſuredly beene puniſhed for their offence. For ſo ſoone as newes of their rebellion was brought to Rome, Cæſar Domitianus hearing of it (not as one of his yeeres would haue done, being very young) vndertooke that expedition to goe and conquer them: but hauing his fathers courage, and being more skilfull then his age required, he preſently went againſt them: who terrified with the report of his comming, yeelded vnto him, thereby gayning this, that without bloodſhed they were brought vnder ſubiection as before. Now all things in Gallia being well diſpoſed of, ſo that it was not eaſie for them, although they would, to rebell any more, Domitian returned againe to Rome, being a credit vnto his C age and countrey.

At the ſame time alſo the Scythians rebelled, and the Sarmates aſſembled in great multitudes, and paſſed ouer the riuer Iſtrum, and with great violence and crueltie comming vnexpected, ſlew many of the Romane garriſons, whom they found in ſtrong holds: and Fonteius Agrippaes Lieutenant, who had beene Conſull, meeting them, bade them battell, and fought very valiantly: which done, they went all ouer the countries adioyning, waſting, robbing, and ſpoyling them. When Veſpaſian heard thereof, and how Mæſia was all waſted, he ſent Rubrius Gallus to be reuenged vpon them: who hauing ſlaine many of them in fight, he forced the reſt to retire into their owne countrey. The Generall of the armie hauing thus ended that warre, prouided to preuent them, if hereafter they did attempt the like; for he built farre more ſtronger D Forts then were before, ſo that the enemy could no way paſſe out of their owne countrey: by which meanes the warres in Mæſia were quickly ended.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of the Riuer Sabbaticus, and the famous triumph of VESPASIAN and TITVS.

TITVS the Emperour hauing ſome while remained at Berytus (as is before ſaid) and being returned from thence, hee ſhewed many ſpectacles in all the cities of Syria, wherein he E came, reſeruing for that purpoſe the Iews that were captiues, to let all men vnderſtand of their ouerthrow: in his iourney, he beheld a riuer worth the recitall, which runneth in the midſt betweene Arcas and Raphaneas, two cities of the kingdome of Agrippa, which had a miraculous nature: for when it floweth, it is very full of water, and runneth with a ſwift ſtreame; yet hauing flowed ſixe daies, it is on the ſeuenth day ſo dry, that you may ſee the bottome, and ſo continueth his courſe, which for this cauſe the Iewes called Sabbaticus, taking the name thereof from the Iewes Sabbath, which is the ſeuenth day. When the Antiochians vnderſtood that Titus was comming to their citie, they could not containe themſelues within their wals for ioy, but all went out to meete him; and not onely men, but alſo women and children, expecting his cõming thirty ſtounds off: and when he approched neere vnto them, they holding vp their hands F to him, ſaluted him with great ioy; and hauing receiued many courteſies from him, they returned with him, and amongſt other acclamations, they often beſought him to baniſh the Iewes out of their citie. But Titus returned no anſwer, making as though he heard not what they requeſted. Yet the Iewes doubtfull what he would do, and what his intent was, were all in exceeding great feare. For Titus did not tarry at Antiochia, but paſſed from thence to Zeugema towards Euphrates, where Vologeſus the King of Parthians meſſenger came vnto him, bringing him a golden Crowne for his conqueſt of the Iewes: which he receiuing, feaſted the Kings Embaſſadors, and so returned to Antiochia, where the Senate and people besought him to come into the Theater, G where all the people were assembled expecting him, & he accorded so to do: and againe they besought him to expell the Iewes out of their city; but he answerd that their country whereunto he might haue banished them, was now destroyed, and there was no place that would receiue them. So the Antiochians seeing they could not obtaine their former petition, requested another thing of him, to wit, that he would take away the brazen tables, wherein were engrauen the Iewes priuiledges: but Titus would not grant that, but leauing the Iewes in the same estate he found them, he departed from thence into Ægypt: and as in the way he past by Ierusalem, comparing the desolation of that place with the beauty and goodly buildings that were before it was destroyed, he lamented & pitied the ouerthrow thereof, not insolently reioycing as another would haue done, H for hauing destroyed so faire and strong a citie, but cursing the seditious who forced him to destroy it, not purposing to make his vertue knowne by the calamitie of wretches. For as yet great part of the treasure of the Citie was found in the ruines, and some the Romanes found of themselues; but the most they got, the captiues told them of, which was gold and siluer, and other precious things buryed by the owners in the earth, being vncertaine what would betide them. Titus going forward in his iourney speedily past the wildernesse, and came to Alexandria: and determining now to sayle vnto Italy, he sent the two legions that accompanied him vnto the places, from whence they came, the fift into Mæsia, the fifteenth into Panonia, commanding Iohn and Simon Captaines of the prisoners and others, to the number of seuen hundreth, all of goodly statute, & beautiful, to be carried presently into Italy, meaning to vse them in his triumph. When I he was now arriued at Rome as he desired, the people were so affected towards him, as if he had beene their father, and came to meet him. Vespasian also honoured his sonne Titus, meeting him in his owne person with great ioy: all the citizens likewise receiued him with exceeeding ioy, seeing that now the father and his his two sonnes were met: Within a few dayes after, they purposed to make a triumph in common, but the Senate had decreed them a priuate and peculiar triumph, for their valiant deeds: and in the day prefixed for the same, no man in all the Citie remained at home, but euery one got a place to stand in that they might see the Emperours, leauing onely roome betweene them for their passage. All the souldiers before it was day light, euery one with his Captaine in companies, came and expected the Emperour, not at the Palace gate, but neere the Temple of Isis: for the Emperours that night lodged there, and at day-breake Vespasian and K Titus came forth both crowned with Lawrell, and in purple garments made after their countrey fashion, and they went vnto Octauians walks, where the Senate, Captaines and Knights expected their comming. Before the porch was made a tribunall, and in it placed seates of Iuory, which they ascending sate downe in, & presently all the souldiers with loud voice declared their valour and fortitude. The Emperours were vnarmed and cloathed in silke, and crowned with Lawrell. Vespasian hauing receiued their praises, they offering still to speake more in his commendations, he beckned with his hand, and made a signe vnto them to be silent: which being done, he arose vp, and couering the greatest part of his head with his garment, he performed his solemne vowes, and Titus also did the like. That done, Vespasian spake vnto them all in generall in few words, and L so dismissed the souldiers to goe to dinner, which according to the custome, the Emperour was to prouide for them: himselfe departed from them to the triumphant gate, so called, for that all triumphs passed that way, and they did eate meat, and put on triumphant apparell, hauing offered sacrifices vnto the gods that were placed by the gate, and so went in triumph all along the place, where people striued to see them, to the end that all people might haue a better view of them. But the spectacles there exhibited, both for number, varietie, and costlinesse, cannot be described sufficiently, being excellent in all things, which any man could deuise, both workemanship, riches, and varieties, and nouelties of nature. For almost all things that euer were in any place amongst men that liued in felicitie, either rich or beautifull, and pleasant to behold, all of them were that day shewed and seene in that triumph, giuing a testimony of the large domini- M ons of the Romans. For there was such store of works of gold, siluer, and yuorie, that one would not haue deemed them to haue beene made onely for the pompe of that day, but to haue bin so plentifull, as if they had flowed all about the citie: some carried fine tapestry made of all sorts of purple, othersome carried others diligently wrought with pictures and Babylonian worke, and there were so many gemmes and precious stones, some set in crownes of gold, some in other workes, that it appeared, that without reason, we iudged them to be rare and scarce. Moreouer, the pictures of their gods were carried with them, which were admirable both for greatnesse and worke-

The triumphant attire of Vespasian and Titus.

Their vowes and dinner before their triumph.

The magnificence of the triumph.

The most precious garments.

A workemanſhip,and all of precious matter. And diuers ſorts of liuing creatures were there to be ſeene, all adorned with ſome attire, agreeing and alluding vnto their nature. There was alſo an infinite multitude of men, in purple garments ouer-wrought with gold, which carried all theſe things,and they who were ſeparated from the reſt to be ſeene,were attired in ſuch garments,that as many as beheld them admired. The captiues went not without their gorgeous attires, but the variety and beauty of the garments hid all the deformity of their bodies,which hapned through their bad vſage. The Pageants that were borne in that triumph, were of an admirable bigneſſe, ſo that the people that beheld them, wondred how it was poſſible that men ſhould carry them: for many were builded with three or foure lofts one aboue another, ſurpaſſing all that can bee B imagined of them for worke and coſt, for many of them were hanged about with Tapeſtrie of gold,and all things annexed vnto them,whereon they were carried,were made of wrought gold or Iuory. Therein was curiouſly repreſented the manner of warre,and all ſtratagemes, and manners of fighting,that could be deuiſed; ſome in one part of the Pageant, ſome in another. There might one haue beheld a moſt fertile and fortunate land deſtroyed, and all the army of enemies to be ſlaine, and ſome flying, others taken priſoners, and ſtrong and huge wals battered downe with Rammes, and Caſtles and ſtrong holds deſtroyed, and the wals of populous Cities to be ruined, and the army entring the wals,all places filled with maſſacred men, and how thoſe that were not able to fight, yeelding themſelues, asked mercy, the Temples ſet on fire, and after all elſe was waſted,the houſes throwne downe vpon the owners heads,and a riuer repreſenting ſor- C row,not flowing as it was wont, into tilled places,and to ſerue the vſe of man, nor for cattell to drinke, but into a Countrey which was in euery part burning, and enuironed with flames, all which the Iewes in their wars endured. Theſe things were ſo artificially repreſented vnto their viewes that had not ſeene them,as though they were now a doing: Before euery Pageant went the Captaine of the City, repreſenting the manner how it was taken. After all theſe followed many ſhips, and in euery place were carried the ſpoiles taken in warre: amongſt all which,thoſe that were taken in the Temple of Ieruſalem, were moſt excellent, for there was a golden table weighing many talents, and likewiſe a golden Candleſticke, the vſe whereof was now not ſuch as we were wont to put it vnto, for in the middeſt of the ſtem thereof was fixed a baſe, and out of it proceeded many ſmall branches, framed like a three forked ſpeare, euery one being at the D top made like a Lampe, which were ſeuen in number, ſhewing the honour of the ſeuenth day, which is called the Sabbath amongſt the Iewes. After all this,was carried the Iewes law,which was the laſt of all the ſpoyles. Then followed many carrying the image of Victory,all made of gold and Iuory. Afterwards,came Veſpaſian,and after him Titus,and with him Domitian gallantly adorned and mounted vpon an excellent horſe, and ſo they went all to the Temple of Iupiter Capitolinus, and there was the end of all this pompe, where they made ſome abode.

The laſt of the ſpoiles was the law of the Iewes.

For it was an ancient cuſtome of their country, to repoſe themſelues there till ſome came and brought newes vnto them,of the death of him,who was Generall of their enemies. This as then was Simon Giora, who was alſo carried in the triumph, and hauing a rope faſtned about his necke, was drawne all along the market place, where they that drew him did kill him. For it is E the cuſtome of the Romanes,there to put malefactors to death that are condemned. After word was brought that he was dead, all the people made ioyfull exclamations, and ſo they began to ſacrifice: which done according to the cuſtome, they returned into the Palace, and they feaſted ſome,other ſome had prepared banquets for themſelues at their owne houſes. For this day was ſacred amongſt the Romanes, in ioy of the victory ouer their enemies, and an end of ciuill calamity, and the beginning of good fortune, and hope, which they had in their new Princes. When the triumphs were ended, and all the Romane Empire quieted, Veſpaſian built a Temple, and dedicated it vnto Peace,which he did in ſo ſhort a ſpace as it was admirable:and hauing beſtowed great coſt vpon it, he alſo beautified it with diuers pictures and carued works. And he placed in that Temple all things that men of former ages had come to ſee, from the vttermoſt F parts of the earth. And he placed there all the golden veſſels,and other neceſſaries that the Iewes vſed in their Temple, doing them great reuerence. How Herodium and Machærus were taken by BASSVS.

CÆSAR sent Lucius Basilius into Iudæa to be Lieutenant there, who receiuing an army of Cerealis Vetilianus, he tooke the Castle and garrison of Herodium, being yeelded vnto him. After this, gathering together all his army, who were dispersed in diuers places of the countrey, he with the tenth legion purposed to warre against Machærus; for he thought it necessary to destroy that castle, lest that for the strength it might mooue many to rebell: for by reason of the situation of the place, they that were in it, had certaine hope of their safety, and those that sought to assault it, were in great danger. For it was built vpon a rocke that was exceeding high, which made it almost inexpugnable; and nature had so deuised, that it is hard to come vnto it, who hath enuironed it round about with vallies, so deepe, that the bottome thereof cannot be descried, neither could one passe ouer them, nor fill them vp: for that which is on the West part is threescore stounds large, and endeth at the lake Asphaltites, and on this side Machærus hath a very high prospect, and it is inuironed on the North and South with vallies of the like measure that the former is, whereby it is impossible to win the Castle: but that vally which is on the East side, is at least a hundreth cubits deep, and it endeth vpon a mountaine neere vnto Machærus. King Alexander seeing the nature of the place did there build a Castle, which afterward Gabinius in the war against Aristobulus destroied. But Herod when he was King, iudged this place worthy to be fortified, as a principall defence against the neighbouring Arabians. For it was aptly situate vpon a mountaine, where one might behold their borders: wherefore making a large wall, he builded a City there in the place that men doe enter vnto the Castle: he also compassed the very top thereof with another wall, and in the corners he placed towers that were threescore cubits high, and in the very middest of all he built a Palace, for largenesse and beauty admirable, and made many cisterns to receiue water in conuenient places, which serued the people aboundantly, as it were striuing with nature, that the places which he had made inexpugnable, he by Art might make places more strong then that was. He also laid vp there in store, arrowes and engines, and made all prouision wherewith the inhabitants might be able to hold out a great siege.

Wonderfull store of arrowes and other engines in this tower.

In the Kings Palace, there grew the hearb called Rue, which was very admirable for the greatnesse, for there was no figge tree taller or broader then it: and it was reported that it had continued euer since Herods time, and had endured longer, had not the Iewes, Inhabitants of the place cut it downe. In the vallie that lieth on the North side of the City, there is a place called Baaras, where also groweth a roote of the same name, the colour whereof resembleth the flame, and it shineth at night like the Sun beames, and is not easie to be pulled vp, till that one cast vpon it the vrine of a woman or her flowers: which done, whosoeuer toucheth it is sure to die, except he carry the roote hanging on his hand. It is also gathered another way without danger, after this manner: They dig all round about it, so that they leaue a very little of the root couered with earth, and then they tie a dog vnto it, which striuing to follow his master who maketh as though he would goe away, he easily pulleth vp the roote, and the dog presently dieth, as it were in his stead that seeketh to get it, so that afterward none that handleth it or taketh it, neede to stand in any feare thereof. This hearb notwithstanding all this danger is diligently sought out for the vertue it hath. For it driueth away diuels (which are the spirits of wicked men) out of mens bodies, if it be but applyed vnto them, whereas otherwise if they had no helpe, these diuels possessing their bodies would kill them. Out of that place also doe spring certaine hot waters, very different in taste one from another; for some are bitter, some sweet, there are also sources of cold waters, one neere vnto another in a Plaine: but which is most admirable, there is a caue hard by, not very deep, enuironed with an eminent rocke aboue, from the which there commeth as it were two dugges or paps, hard by one another, and out of the one of them there floweth very colde water, out of the other very hot; which mingled together make a pleasant bath, and serue to cure many diseases, and especially helpeth all paines of the sinewes. In the same place also are mines of Sulphure and Alume.

Bassus hauing viewed this place on euery side, resolued to besiege it, and endeauoured to fill vp the vallie that was on the East side, and so make a way vnto it: which he began to doe, hastening

A ſtening to raiſe a very high mount, and ſo make it eaſie to be taken. Thoſe that were inhabitants, conſtrained Iewes that were ſtrangers, to goe into the lower City, iudging them an vnprofitable multitude, and ſo cauſed them to endure the firſt brunt of the enemies, and they themſelues kept the Caſtle, both for that it was ſtrong, and alſo to preſerue themſelues, hoping that by yeelding the place vnto the Romans, they might obtaine pardon of them; yet firſt they purpoſed to make triall if they could auoid the ſiege: and therefore very courageouſly, euery day they made excurſions, and fought with them they found, and many were ſlaine on both parts. Fortune and opportunity ſometime cauſed one to be victors, ſometime another: for the Iewes got the beſt when they could aſſault the Romans at vnawares, and the Romans ouercame, when they were B aware of the Iewes comming and armed themſelues. But the ſiege was not ended by theſe skirmiſhes: yet a chance befell, that forced the Iewes to yeeld their Caſtle. Amongſt them that were beſieged was one Eleazar a young man, and very hardy and bold in any enterprize, who oftentimes made excurſions and ſought to hinder the Romanes worke, who alwaies in euery fight did greatly endomage the Romanes, and by his valour and aduenturous courage, he gaue them that were his fellowes opportunity to aſſault the Romanes, and to flie againe and retire in ſafety, himſelfe being alwaies the laſt that ſo retired. It hapned one day that the fight being ended, and both parts parted, he as it were contemning all men, and thinking that none of his enemies durſt vndertake to combate with him, ſtaied without the gate, ſpeaking to them that were vpon the wall, and giuing great attention vnto them. Then one Rufus an Ægyptian one of C the Roman army, eſpying this opportunity, ran vpon him ſo ſuddenly, that he at vnawares tooke him all armed as he was, and they vpon the wals ſtood amazed, whileſt Rufus led him vnto the Romans campe. Then the Generall of the Romans cauſed him to be led into a place, where they in the City might ſee him, and there to haue all his cloaths taken off him, and whipped; and the misfortune of this young man did greatly diſcourage the Iewes, and all the city was reſolued into teares for the calamity of that one man. Baſſus ſeeing this, he deuiſed this counſell againſt them; for he ſought to moue them ſo to compaſſion, that for to ſaue him they ſhould yeeld their caſtle: which fell out as he deſired. For he preſently commanded a croſſe to be erected, as though he would preſently haue crucified Eleazar: which ſight greatly moued them in the Caſtle to ſorrow: ſo that now with loud cries they lamented, ſaying that this calamity was D inſupportable. Then Eleazar beſought them not to deſpiſe him, who was now to die a moſt miſerable death: and moreouer to prouide for their owne ſafety in yeelding the Caſtle vnto the Romans vertue and fortunate ſucceſſe.

Then they moued with his words, and many alſo within the City intreating for him (for he came of a great parentage and had many kinsfolks) though contrary to their natures, compaſſion tooke place in them: and ſo ſending ſome of their company ſpeedily, they deſired to parley, affirming they would yeeld their Caſtle vpon condition that they might ſafely depart away, and Eleazar might be likewiſe reſtored vnto them. Which offer of theirs the Romans accepted; and the Iewes in the lower part of the City hauing intelligence of this couenant, reſolued themſelues to flie away in the night: but ſo ſoone as they had opened their gates, thoſe that had agreed with E Baſſus, gaue him intelligence thereof; either enuying that their countrimen ſhould eſcape, or elſe fearing that Baſſus would puniſh them for their flight: yet for all this, the moſt valiant of them that fled, eſcaped, who were gone before the reſt, and the reſt were ſlaine to the number of 1000. and 700. men, for the women and children were made bondſlaues. THIS done, hee prepared to carry his armie into the paſture called Iardes, for he had notice that many Iewes were there aſſembled together, who had eſcaped from Ieruſalem and Machæra during the ſiege. So comming vnto the place, and finding it to be as it was reported vnto him: he firſt of all enuironed it with horſemen, that if any of the Iewes ſought to eſcape, the horſemen might withſtand them, and he commanded the footmen to cut downe the wood, into the which they fled to hide themſelues. And ſo through neceſſity they

they were constrained to fight, hoping by a courageous fight to finde opportunity to flie: where- G fore they altogether with a cry violently assaulted them by whom they were inuironed, and they did valiantly withstand them, and by their valour, and the Iewes desperation the fight endured a long time: yet the euent of the warre was not like vnto the rest of the fight, for onely twelue Romans were slaine and very few wounded, and all the Iewes were slaine in that fight, being in number three thousand; and their Captaine Iudas the sonne of Iairus (of whom we haue already made mention, who during the siege of Ierusalem was Commander of a company there) hid himselfe in a certaine caue, and secretly escaped from thence. At that time Cæsar writ vnto Liberius Maximus his Gouernour, and vnto Bassus, to sell Iudæa: for he did not build in all the countrey any City but appropriated it vnto himselfe, leauing there onely eight hundreth H souldiers, and giuing them a place to dwell in called Emaus, thirty stounds distant from Ieru-salem, and he imposed a tribute vpon all Iewes wheresoeuer they liued, commanding euery one of them euery yeere to bring two drachmes into the Capitol, according as in former times they were wont to pay vnto the Temple of Ierusalem: and this was the estate of the Iewes at that time.

Of the death of King ANTIOCHVS: and how the Alanes inuaded Armenia. I

IN the fourth yeere of Vespasians raigne, it hapned that Antiochus King of the Comagenes with all his family fell into great misery vpon this occasion: Cesennius Petus Gouernour of Syria (either for enuy, or for that indeed it was so, for it is not well knowne) sent letters vnto Cæsar, declaring vnto him that Antiochus was determined to reuolt from the Romanes, together with his sonne Epiphanes, and had made a league with the King of the Parthians, and that therefore it was necessary to preuent them in time, lest that if they first began to reuolt openly, they might trouble all the Roman Empire with warres. Cæsar did not neglect these newes, for that the neerenesse of both the Kings countries one to another, seemed to require that they should be quickly preuented: for Samosata the greatest Citie of Comagena is situate K vpon Euphrates, which might both easily receiue the Parthians, and be a strong hold for them, and also there they might easily passe ouer the riuer. Wherefore Vespasian beleeuing it, permitted him to doe what he thought expedient: and he forthwith, Antiochus thinking nothing, suddenly entred into Comagena, with the sixt legion, and certaine other companies of footmen and troupes of horsemen, accompanied with Aristobulus King of Chalcidis, and Sohemus King of Emesa, who came to assist him. So they entred the countrey without any fight, for none of the inhabitants offered to resist. Antiochus daunted with these vnexpected newes, did not so much as thinke of any warre against the Romanes, wherefore he determined to leaue the whole kingdome in that estate that then it was in, and with his wife and children depart from thence, hoping hereby to cleare himselfe vnto the Romans, from that which they suspected of him: and L going almost a hundreth and thirty stounds from the City into a field, there he placed a tabernacle. And Petus sent men vnto Samosata to take it, and left them to keepe the City, and hee with the rest of the souldiers purposed to goe against Antiochus. But for all this the King though by necessity vrged thereto, yet would he not fight against the Romanes, but bewailing his misfortune, endured patiently all whatsoeuer: but his sons being lusty strong young men, and skilfull in martiall affaires, could not easily abstaine from fight in that their distresse. Wherefore Epiphanes and Callinicus his two sonnes had recourse vnto their forces, and in a great fight that endured a whole day, they shewed their valour, and departed receiuing no losse. But Antio- chus after this fight would not any longer abide in his countrey, but taking his wife and daughters he fled into Cilicia, and thereby discouraged his souldiers, who despairing to keepe the king- M dome for him, reuolted vnto the Romans. But Epiphanes and the rest were forced to seeke to saue themselues, before such time as they were left destitute, and so accompanied with ten horsemen, they passed the riuer Euphrates: and thus being out of danger they came to Vologesus, of whom they were receiued, not as fugitiues, but with great honor, and according to their degree, as though they yet possessed their ancient dignitie. And Petus comming to Tarsus of Cilicia, he sent a Centurion to carry Antiochus bound vnto Rome. But Vespasian permitted not a King

D How Maſſada a moſt ſtrong Caſtle was taken.

Beginning of the yeere of the world, 4038. after chriſts birth, 76.

BAſſus dying in Iudæa, Flauius Silua ſucceeded in his place, and now perceiuing that all the countrey elſe was conquered ſaue one onely Caſtle, he with all the forces he could make went againſt it. This Caſtle is called Maſſada. The Captaine of the Sicarians named Eleazar, who firſt inuaded it, was a very ſtrong and valiant man, borne of the tribe of Iuda, who perſwaded a great many Iewes as is before ſaid, not to enroule themſelues when Cyrenæus was Cenſor, and ſent to taxe Iudæa. For at that time the Sicarians had conſpired againſt them that obeyed the Romans, and in all things vſed them like enemies, taking and driuing away their goods, and firing their houſes, affirming that they did not any thing differ from ſtrangers, who betrayed
E the liberty of their countrey, rather then they would fight for it, and that they had rather haue them war on the Romans ſide. But that was onely an excuſe to hide their auarice and iniurious dealing, as the proofe made manifeſt, for they themſelues reuolted and bare armes againſt the Romans, and their enterprizes againſt the Romans were worſe then the reſt, and when their firſt forged pretence was knowne and confuted, they did rage more then before againſt thoſe that vpbraided them with it. For that time amongſt the Iewes abounded with all manner of iniquity, The time among the Iewes which was moſt fruitful in all manner of impiety ſo that none was left vndone: yea though one indeauoured to inuent ſome new villanies, yet could he deuiſe none that was not then practiſed: all laboured with this maladie, both in particular and in common, and euery one did ſtriue with other, to ſurpaſſe his fellow in impiety againſt God, and iniuſtice towards his neighbour. The mighty vexed the weaker ſort, and the meaner ſort de-F ſtroyed the Potentates, and tooke their riches away from them; they gaped after rule and dominion, theſe after miſchiefe.

The Sicarians were the firſt that were ſo cruell and iniurious againſt their neighbours: for not prouoked thereunto, neither by deed nor word, they ſlew and iniured all men without cauſe, but Iohn Giſcala.
Iohn ſhewed them to be very moderate. For he did not onely ſlay all that counſelled that which was good and profitable, as his greateſt enemies, and eſpecially dealing thus with the citizens, but alſo many waies iniured his country, like one who had impiouſly alſo contemned God himſelfe.

of God. Againe, what villanie did Simon Giora leaue vndone, or what iniurie did he abstain from to offer vnto their bodies, who had chosen him for their ruler? What did kinred and friendship then preuaile any man? saue onely this, that it made them be more cruelly vsed, and euery day to be more tyrannously butchered, then otherwise. For they thought it a hainous offence to abuse strangers, and a glory to exercise cruelty vpon their most familiar friends. The Idumæans time bin practised: yet they tooke their name from them that imitated good and godlinesse, but in truth it was to mock and flout them that did well: so sauage and cruell was their nature, or else accounting the greatest impiety to be goodnes. But their end was as they deserued, and God punished their desert with his iust vengeance. For euen vnto the latter end of their liues, they endured all the miseries that is possible for mans nature to abide, being killed with diuers sorts of torments. Perhaps one will say that their punishment was not so great as they deserued: but what punishment could bee deuised sufficient for their deserts? But I cannot now stand to lament those who perished by these mens crueltie: Wherefore I will returne to that where I

Silua the captaine of the Romans besiegeth Massada.

The Roman Captaine came against Eleazar, and them that kept Massada with him, who were I Sicarians, and he brought an army with him, and presently subdued all the confines and borders round about, and he placed in euery fit place garrisons, and enuironed the Castle with a wall, lest any of them that were besieged should escape, and that they that besieged them might there keepe a continuall guard. Moreouer, he placed his campe in a fit place for the siege, euen there where the rock, that the castle was built vpon, ioyned vnto the other mountain, which was an vnfit place to get necessaries in. For not onely victuals were fetcht farre off by great labour of the Iewes who were commanded to doe it, but also water for the whole army somewhere else, for there was no fountaine neere that place. This done, Silua attempted the siege, wherein it was requisite for him to vse both art and labour, by reason of the strength of the Castle, which is thus situate. It is enuironed round with a huge stone very high on euery side, and the vally vn- K derneath is so deepe, that one cannot see the bottome, all rockie, and inaccessible to all liuing creatures, saue onely that in two places there is a difficult passage vnto it, one of them is from the lake Asphaltites towards the East, and the easiest of the two is the West side: the first is called a

And thus was this Fortreſſe ſtrengthned both by art and nature.

A tower to the Weſt ſide.

The prouiſion within the Caſtle was admirable both for the magnificence thereof, and alſo for the long time it had continued, for there was Corne ſufficient for many yeeres, and Wine and Oyle and diuers other prouiſion and heapes of Dates. All which Eleazar found ready there, B hauing deceitfully obtained the Caſtle with his Sicarians, which prouiſion was all as ſound and as freſh, as though it had newly beene layd vp in ſtore: notwithſtanding, that from the time it remained there, vnto the time that the Romans tooke it, were a hundreth yeeres, and the Romans found the reliques of the fruit incorrupted: and one may iuſtly thinke that the cauſe hereof is the ayre about the Caſtle, which by reaſon of the height of the place is moſt pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was alſo found all manner of Armor in great quantity, which Herod made, and would haue armed ten thouſand men, alſo vnwrought iron, braſſe, and lead, ſo that one may iudge that prouiſion to haue beene reſerued for ſome great cauſe. It is reported that Herod prepared that Caſtle for his refuge, when hee doubted two great dangers, firſt, that the people of the Iewes would depoſe him; and make them Kings whoſe anceſtors had before C raigned.

Great ſtore of prouiſion in the Caſtle.

Fruit for a hundreth yeeres kept vncorrupt.

The other which was more dangerous then the firſt, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queene of Egypt, who not concealing her intent, did often requeſt Antonius that Herod might bee ſlaine, and that ſhee might haue the Kingdome of the Iewes giuen vnto her. And it was a great maruaile that Antonius doting ſo vpon her, did not fulfill her requeſt. Herod for theſe occaſions hauing builded Maſſada, left it vnfurniſhed at the laſt bulwarke for the Romanes to make warre againſt the Iewes. For the Generall of the Romanes, hauing now compaſſed all the place without it with a wall, (as is before ſaid) to the end that none might eſcape, hee did very wiſely, and ſo began to aſſault the Caſtle, finding one onely place that would beare a mount. For behind the Tower that on the Weſt ſide ſtopped vp the paſſage into the Caſtle and Palace, there was a great D rocke very large and long, yet not ſo high as Maſſada by three hundreth cubits. The rocke was called Leuce, which ſignifieth white. When Silua had gotten this rocke, and aſcended it, hee commanded his ſouldiers to build a mount thereupon; and they chearefully labouring, raiſed a ſudden mount two hundreth cubits high: by reaſon of the height it ſeemed not firme nor ſufficient enough to beare the engines, but vpon it was built a Tribunall with great ſtones fifty cubits high, and as many cubits broad, and the engines were ſuch as firſt Veſpaſian, and after him Titus deuiſed to batter wals with, and ſo they made a Tower threeſcore cubits high, all plated about with iron.

Herod ſuſpecting a double perill, builded the place for a refuge.

There was but one place about Maſſada to raiſe a mount to batter on.

Now the Romans with many ſhot did driue the Iewes from off the Caſtle wals, not ſuffering them to lift vp their heads. And Silua hauing builded a mighty Ramme, cauſed the wall E to be continually battered therewith, but it could ſcarcely enter vpon it: and the Sicarians quickly preuented that, building another wall within, which could not bee broken with the Ramme being yet ſoft, and ſo would breake the force thereof, for they did ſawe timber in pieces, and as it were made two railes, and then filled the ſpace betweene the two railes with earth, and with other plankes they kept the earth from falling downe, ſo that they made a worke like the wall of a houſe, and for that it yeelded vnto the blowes of the Ramme (being ſoft earth) the Ramme could not preuaile againſt it, but rather made it more ſtrong then before, by ramming the morter together.

The City battered with a large Ram, and by Siluas appointment.

Silua perceiuing this, iudged that hee might ſooner deſtroy the wall with fire then with his engine: and ſo hee commanded the ſouldiers to caſt vpon it many burning firebrands, and the fire did quickly take hold of the wall, becauſe it was for the moſt part built with wood, and eaſily alſo pearced thorow it, by reaſon it was not cleane wrought together, and there was a great flame.

Firebrands darted againſt the walles.

At the very beginning of the fire, the North winde did greatly annoy the Romans, for the fire blowing furiouſly from aboue againſt them that were Romans, it did driue it extremely vpon them, ſo that they were in great deſpaire; fearing their engines would bee burnt, and preſently the winde changing and blowing from the South, (as it were by Gods prouidence) it turned the fire againe vpon the wall, and now all of it euen vnto the foundation thereof, was there most cruelly on fire. And the Romans hauing Gods assistance, returned againe vnto their campe ioyfully, purposing the next morning betimes to assaile their enemies, and that night to place stronger watches, lest any of the enemies should escape. But Eleazar thought not to flie, neither would he permit any one of his company so to doe. And seeing now the wall was fiered, and not knowing any way else to helpe himselfe, considering likewise what the Romans would doe vnto their wiues and children if they should take them, he deliberated of all their deaths, which he in that extremity iudged to be the best way they could take. And so he assembled the most valiant of all his company, and exhorted euery one thereunto, after this manner: G H

Eleazars oration to his companions.

Valiant Champions, we long agoe resolued our selues neither to serue the Romans, nor any other saue onely God, for he alone is the true and iust Lord of all men. Behold, the time is now come, that exhorteth you to shew your resolute mindes: let vs not therefore dishonour our selues, and besides our slauery, suffer also intolerable torments if wee be taken aliue by the Romans. For we were the first that reuolted from them, and the last that warre against them. And I verily thinke that God hath giuen vs this benefit, that wee may dye well in our owne libertie, which hee denyed to others who were ouercome contrary to all expectation. Wee are certaine to be conquered as soone as it is day-light: but to die valiantly with our deerest friends, is a glorious resolution vnto valiant men, and of this our enemies cannot debarre vs, who doe labour to take vs aliue, and carry vs away captiues, and we are not able to vanquish them in fight. For truely at the first (when we who coueted liberty, suffered all misery at the hands of our owne countrimen, and worse at the hands of our enemies) we should haue considered that God, who was sometime fauourable vnto the Nation of the Iewes, had now condemned them vnto perdition: for had hee yet beene fauourable vnto vs, or had hee beene but lightly offended at vs, hee would not haue permitted so many men to haue perished, and haue deliuered his holy Citie into the hands of the enemies to bee consumed with fire. And wee onely amongst all our Nation, hoped to liue in liberty, as though wee had no waies offended the diuine Maiesty, nor beene guilty of any offence, who indeed taught others iniquity. So you see how we are checked for longing after vaine hope, being brought into greater extremity then wee expected. Neither hath our Castle by nature inexpugnable, any thing profited vs to our preseruation, but wee hauing store of victuals and armour, and all other necessaries, haue lost all hope of safety, God himselfe openly taking it from vs. For the fire that once was carried against our enemies, did not of it selfe returne against vs and vnto the wall wee built. But it was the punishment of our offences, who furiously raged against our owne Nation. For the which I request you, let vs not bee punished by the Romanes; whose forces are inuincible, but by our selues let vs satisfie the ire of God, and so it will be more tolerable for vs; euen by that meanes our wiues shall die vndefiled, and our children shall not taste of seruile captiuitie. After whose deaths, wee will one helpe another to die with credit, conseruing our liberty, which is the best sepulture of all: yet let vs first fire our Castle, and burne our treasure: for it will be no small griefe vnto the Romans, if they neither get our bodies aliue, nor can finde any one iot of our riches for recompence of their labour. Let vs onely leaue our victuals as a sufficient testimony, that famine did not at any time cause vs to be conquered, but that we, as at first we resolued, preferred death before bondage. I K L

Eleazar confesseth Gods wrath to be kindled against the people.

The best graue is when liberty is maintained.

Eleazar hauing thus spoken, they that were present did not all accord vnto him, for some ioyfully hasted to execute his aduice, thinking it so glorious a death. But they who mooued with compassion towards their wiues and families, were something effeminate, or else abhorred to kill themselues, one looking vpon another with teares, did shew his mind to disagree from that which Eleazar perswaded. Which when Eleazar perceiued, and that his counsell through feare was defeated, fearing also that they who courageously had accorded thereunto, would be withdrawne by the teares of others, he did not so end his exhortation; but standing vp, and with a vehement spirit, hee began to speake vnto them of the immortality of the soule, and fixing his eyes vpon them that wept, he vsed a vehement exclamation, saying: M

Eleazars oration as touching the immortality of the soule.

How much am I deceiued, who thought that valiant men fighting for their libertie, would rather choose to die then to liue, but yee doe shew your selues nothing to excell any ordinary men, who feare to die, notwithstanding that thereby you may escape great miserie, and calami-

A calamity, when in this point you ought not to haue expected any admonition thereunto, nor to haue made any delay to doe it. The ancient cuſtomes which haue endured euer ſince men had reaſon, the diuine doctrine of our nation, which hath continually beene confirmed by the deeds of our predeceſſors, doe inſtruct vs, that it is miſery to liue, and not to die. For death freeth our ſoules from priſon vnto their moſt pure and proper place; where neuer after they ſhall be touched with calamity. Which whileſt they are bound in a mortall bodie, and doe participate of his miſeries, may probably be affirmed to be dead. For it is an vnſeemely coniunction for that which is diuine, to be coupled and connexed vnto that which is mortall. True it is, that our ſoules can doe much being ioyned to our bodies, for they vſe the bodies as their inſtruments, ſecretly producing in them motion, and many other actions paſſing the nature of mortall things. But when the ſoule is looſed from that heauy burthen which doth weigh it down euen vnto the earth, which hangeth vpon it, and hath receiued his proper habitation, then it enioyeth free and perfect felicity, and remaineth inuiſible to our mortall eies as God himſelf is, neither is it viſible in our bodies. For it commeth ſecretly into them, and ſo departeth from them againe, that no man can perceiue it, hauing onely a nature incorrupt, and cauſing a change in our bodies. For whatſoeuer the ſoule toucheth, that preſently liueth and flouriſheth; and what it forſaketh, that incontinently withereth and dieth: ſo much doth it participate of immortality. The ſleepe may bee an euident argument vnto you of this which I ſpeake, where the ſoule not diſtracted taketh a moſt pleaſant and ſweete repoſe; and communicating with God, it is with him preſent in euery place by reaſon of affinity, and foretelleth many future euents. Wherefore ſhould we then feare death, who loue the reſt that we haue in ſleep? were not he a mad man that for a ſhort life would hinder himſelfe of eternall life? It were neceſſary that we who are inſtructed in the law of our nation, ſhould giue example to others to deſpiſe and contemne death. But if we ſeeke confirmation hereof from ſtrangers, let vs ſee the example amongſt the wiſer ſort of the Indians: for they being iuſt men do tolerate this life as a neceſſary office of nature for a certaine time, though againſt their wils; yet do they haſten to vnlooſe the ſoule bound in this mortall body, though not vrged thereunto by any calamity or neceſſity, but onely for deſire of immortality, telling others that they will depart out of this life; neither doth any one ſeeke to hinder them, but all men eſteeming them moſt fortunate, ſend by them commendations and other meſſages vnto their friends departed: ſo firm is their beliefe that the ſoules of them that are dead haue communion and conuerſation together: And ſo they hauing all inſtruction what to ſay to the ſoules departed, doe with great applauſe leap into the fire, that thereby their ſoules may be purified from their bodies. And their friends go more ioyfully with them when they go to their deaths, then any doth that bringeth his friend on the way when he is to goe a great iourney; and they bewaile themſelues, not thoſe who are dead and haue attained immortality. Shall not we then be aſhamed not to beleeue ſo firmely as the Indians doe? deſpiſing through our own ſloath our country lawes which are to be emulated of all men? Nay, ſuppoſing that by our law we had bin inſtructed contrariwiſe, to wit, that to liue in this life is bliſſe, and to die is calamity: yet notwithſtanding this preſent neceſſity, this preſent time had beene a ſufficient motiue to cauſe vs to embrace death rather then life, ſeeing that by Gods appointment, and of neceſſity we muſt now die. In times paſt it appeareth God ſo prouided, that he ſhortened their daies of our own nation, that would not vſe their life as they ought to haue done. I dare not aſcribe it vnto the Romans, nor report of our ſelues that their wars conſumed vs all. For this did not happen through their forces, but a more potent cauſe hereof there was which made them conquerors. Which of the Romans ſlew the Iewes that inhabited at Cæſarea? whom the inhabitants therof vpon the Sabbath day, they being aſſembled in one place together with their wiues and children, did maſſacre, notwithſtanding that they had no intent to reuolt from them, nor neuer lifted vp their hands in their owne defence, nothing fearing the Romans, who only accounted them of our nation their enemies that reuolted from them. But ſome may obiect, the Iewes at Cæſarea, and the inhabitants thereof were alwaies at variance, and that now they reuenged their old quarrell, hauing gotten opportunity. What then ſhall we ſay of the Scythopolitans? who bare armes with the Græcians againſt vs, and denied to aſſiſt their owne kinred againſt the Romans. What profit did they receiue by this their good will and fidelity? for they were altogether with their whole families cruelly ſlaine, and this was the reward they had for their labour, for hauing withſtood vs to haue done the like vnto them; it were too long to recount all things ſeuerally to this effect. For as ye know there is no city in all Syria that hath not maſſacred the Iewes there inhabiting, biting, being more our enemies then the Romanes were, where they of Damaſcus, although they could not deuiſe any probable cauſe for it, yet did they maſſacre all the Iewes liuing among them, who amounted to the number of eighteen thouſand, beſide their wiues and families. And as we haue heard it reported, the number of the Iewes ſlaine by the Egyptians, were aboue three-ſcore thouſand: It may be that finding no aduerſity in a ſtrange country, they were put to death by their enemies: but they that in their owne country fought againſt the Romans, wanted nothing that might haue cauſed a perfect hope of a full victory ouer the Romanes, they had weapons, armour, wals, and ſtrong holds inexpugnable; their valorous courage in fighting for liberty ſhunned no danger, and encouraged men to reuolt: which all, hauing a while ſerued their turnes, at laſt was a cauſe of their greater miſery. For all were taken and ſubdued by the enemies, as though they had been built and made to make their enemies victory more famous, and not to doe them ſeruice. And we may iuſtly deeme them happy who were ſlaine in the warre, for they died in liberty. Yet who doth not pity the multitude of them that fell into the Romans hands; or who would not haſten to die, rather then endure the like miſery that they ſuffered? Some of them being tortured, and ſome with fire and ſtripes periſhed; and others halfe eaten of wilde beaſts, were reſerued aliue for their ſecond food: and they are moſt miſerable of all that are yet aliue, who often wiſh for death and cannot finde it. Where is now that gorgeous City? where is it that was once the mother City of all the nation of the Iewes? ſo ſtrengthned with ſuch ſtrong wals, ſo fortified with towers and caſtles to defend the wals, ſcarcely able to contain the prouiſion made for warre, hauing in it ſo huge a multitude of men to fight for it; what is it now become, wherein God himſelfe was thought to dwell? It is now razed downe euen vnto the very foundations; and no other memory or reliques therof is left ſtanding; their camp is deſtroied, onely a few old men and vnhappy ſuruiue, who ſate among the aſhes of the Temple, and a few women whom the enemies reſerued to ſatisfie their filthy luſt. And will any amongſt vs, conſidering all theſe things, deſire to behold the light of the Sunne, although he could liue without moleſtation? Who is ſuch an enemy to his natiue ſoyle? who is ſo effeminate or deſirous of his life, that doth not grieue to haue liued till this time? Would God we had been all in our graues before we had ſeene that ſacred City fired by a hoſtile hand, before we beheld the holy Temple deſtroyed by impiety: and ſeeing that the hope we had to be reuenged vpon our enemies is now vaniſhed away, and that we are left alone in miſery and neceſſity, let vs haſten to dye well, and take compaſſion vpon our ſelues, our wiues and children, and that whileſt we haue time, to compaſſionate our ſelues. For both we are borne to dye, and all that are begotten by vs, and the ſtrongeſt men liuing cannot auoid it: but iniury, and bondage, and to ſee our wiues and children abuſed before our faces, is no neceſſity proceeding from mans nature, but they onely are forced to endure it, who when they might haue died without it, did refuſe for feare. We firſt of all truſting to our ſtrength, rebelled againſt the Romans; now laſtly they exhorting vs to obedience, we denyed: which of them then will not be enraged againſt vs, if they can take vs aliue? Moſt miſerable ſhall thoſe young men be, whoſe ſtrength will endure many torments, and thoſe old men will mooue compaſſion whoſe aged yeers cannot ſuffer tortures; one ſhall ſee his wife carried away from him, and another his ſonne hauing his hands bound behind him, cry out vnto his father for helpe: who now whileſt they are free from the thraldome of their enemies, may glorioufly aſſiſt vs with their ſwords. Let vs with our wiues and children die freemen, let vs altogether depart out of this life. This our religion commandeth, this our wiues and children perſwadeth; God himſelfe hath driuen vs vnto this neceſſity for this purpoſe. The Romans would haue it otherwiſe, who feare leſt any of vs ſhould periſh, and not fall into their hands aliue. Let vs therefore haſten, that in ſtead of their expected hope, whereby they verily perſwaded themſelues to take vs aliue, we may contrary to their expectation daunt them with a ſudden admiration of our glorious deaths.

Whileſt Eleazar was yet ſpeaking, and deſirous ſtill to continue his exhortation, they all interrupted him: euery one now in a fury bent to follow his aduice, made haſte to effect it; and as though they had beene vrged by ſome ſpirit thereunto, euery one laboured to preuent one another in the execution thereof, iudging him to ſhew moſt valour and fortitude, that firſt diſpatched himſelfe. They were alſo deſirous to kill their wiues and children with themſelues. And which is moſt ſtrange, their mindes were nothing altered when they came to effect this bloody worke; but with the ſame reſolution they had, when they heard Eleazars ſpeech, euery one retained his good affection towards his friends: yet permitting reaſon to take no place, and

Finally, no man was ſo cowardly, who durſt not preſume to this action; ſo euery one of them killed his deareſt friends. O miſerable people! whom neceſſity forced to ſlay their wiues and children, accounting the action thereof to be the very leaſt of all their miſeries? Wherefore now not enduring the griefe that enſued vpon this fact, and thinking that in liuing any while after them, they ſhould iniure them whom they B had ſlaine, they with all ſpeed poſſible gathered all their riches together and ſet them on fire: which done, they elected ten by lot, who ſhould ſlay the reſt, euery one proſtrating himſelfe vpon his wife and children, and embracing them in his armes, and was ſo ſlaine willingly by them that executed that wretched office: who hauing without feare diſpatched them, they caſt lots whoſe fortune it was to kill all the reſt, and he vpon whom the lot ſhould fall, ſhould kill the other nine, and laſtly himſelfe vpon them all, euery one ſo encouraging one another, that there was no difference betweene them that were to be killed, and them that were to kill, and ſo the reſt offered themſelues to death: which done, one who was the laſt of all, being yet aliue, went amongſt the dead bodies, and ſearched to ſee if none liued that needed his hand in ſo great a multitude of ſlaine people; and finding all of them diſpatched, he went and fired the Palace: which done, he C with all his force thruſt his ſword into his owne body vp to the hilts, and ſo fell downe by his deareſt friends.

This calamity hapned the fifteenth day of April. In the morning the Romans expecting that the Iewes would fight with them, made bridges from their mounts vnto the wals, and ſo aſſaulted the wals: and ſeeing none of their enemies appeare, but all the wals waſted and on fire, and deep ſilence in euery place, they could not coniecture D what was done, and at laſt they made a cry at once, as though they had beene beating the wals with a Ram, thereby to ſee if they could make any enemies come out. The women in the vaults heard this cry, and comming forth, they declared vnto the Romans all that had hapned, one of them relating vnto them the euent of all the whole matter: yet for all this the Romans did not eaſily beleeue her words, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of that fact, but they endeuoured to quench the fire, and paſſing thorow it, they preſently came into the Palace, where they beheld all the dead bodies, yet they did not inſult ouer them as their enemies, but admired that ſo many ſhould be ſo obſtinately minded to deſpiſe death.

Of the death of the Sicarians that were fled vnto Alexandria and Thebes.

THe Caſtle being thus taken, the Generall of the Romans leauing a garriſon there, went vnto Cæſarea, for there was no one enemy left in all that countrey, but now all Iudæa was deſtroied through continuance of long wars, and many of that nation though farre diſtant from it, taſted of thoſe troubles: for it ſo fell out, that afterward many Iewes periſhed in Egypt at Alexandria: for thoſe Sicarians who had eſcaped thither, were not content to bee ſafe and free from danger, but there alſo they attempted alteration, and to defend their liberty againſt the Romanes, eſteeming themſelues nothing inferiour vnto them, and that onely God F was their Lord. And ſome of the nobler race of the Iewes, ſeeking to withſtand that their enterprize, were by theſe Sicarians ſlaine: which was no ſooner done, but they exhorted the people to reuolt. The chiefe and elders of the Iewes ſeeing this, and that they could not repreſſe them without danger, they aſſembled all the Iewes together, and declared vnto them the temerity of theſe Sicarians, ſhewing them to be the authors of all the miſery that had befallen the Iewes, and that now notwithſtanding they were eſcaped, yet they were not certaine of their liues; for that if they were knowne, the Romans would preſently put them to death, and draw them alſo into the like misery, who were not partakers of their wickednesse. Wherefore they admonished the multitude to beware lest they drew themselues into the same danger, wherein they were, and to make satisfaction vnto the Romans for themselues, by deliuering such people vnto them. The Iewes were perswaded by these speeches: and foreseeing the danger that might ensue, they furiously assaulted the Sicarians, and tooke of them 600. and shortly after those who there escaping, fled into Egypt and Thebes, were taken and brought backe againe; whose hard-hearted obstinacy was so great, that none can without admiration, heare of. For notwithstanding that all torments and tortures that could be deuised were inflicted vpon them, onely to force them to confesse that Cæsar was their Lord, yet no one of them would say so, nor make any shew therof, but all persеuered in their former opinion, as though the bodie tormented had beene dead, and not aliue. Moreouer, their children were most to be admired, for not one of them could be constrained to call Cæsar Lord. So much did their boldnesse ouercome the torments inflicted vpon their bodies.

AT that time Lupus was Gouernour of Alexandria, who with all speed by letters gaue Cæsar notice of these troubles. And Cæsar, seeing that it was necessary to beware of the Iewes, who were naturally enclined to sedition and vnquietnesse, fearing also that they would once againe gather themselues together, and cause some to ioyne with them, he commanded Lupus to destroy the Temple, which Onias erected in Egypt, which was builded and named vpon this occasion: Onias the son of Simon one of the high Priests, being driuen out of Ierusalem, Antiochus King of Syria then warring against the Iewes, he came vnto Alexandria, and was courteously entertained by Ptolomæus who was then also enemy vnto Antiochus, affirming that he would annexe vnto his countrey the people of the Iewes, if he would agree to that which he required. The King according to all that could be granted, he requested him to permit him to build a Temple in some place of his countrey, and that he might worship God therein according to the custome of their countrey: for so the Iewes would hate Antiochus the more, who had destroyed their Temple at Ierusalem, and be friendly vnto him, and many of them did flie vnto him for religion sake. Ptolomæus agreed so to doe, and gaue him a piece of ground for that purpose, a hundreth and fourescore stounds from Memphis, in that place which was called the way to Heliopolis: where Onias building a Castle, made also a Temple vnlike to that of Ierusalem; but he erected a tower like that of Ierusalem, with stones, that was threescore cubits long, and he built an altar after the fashion of that of his countrey, and adorned it with all manner of gifts (saue onely a candlesticke) which had in stead thereof a lampe to giue light, which he caused to be hung before the altar in a golden chaine, and he inuironed all the Temple with a wall made of bricke, and the gates he made of stone, and the King granted vnto it great reuenues of money and ground, to the intent that the Priests might haue aboundance of all things which they required.

But Onias did not this with a good conscience, but for that he was at variance with the Iewes of Ierusalem, for that they forced him to flie: and he perswaded himselfe that by the building of this Temple, he might withdraw all men from Ierusalem thither; and of this, there was a prophecy 970. yeers before, and Esaias foretold that a certain Iew should build a Temple in Egypt. And thus that Temple was built, and Lupus hauing receiued the Emperors letters, went vnto the Temple, and taking away certaine gifts from it, he shut it vp: And after him Paulinus who succeeded in his stead, left not one gift there (for hee threatned the Priests if they did not bring forth all) and permitted not any that came thither for to sacrifice, to come neere it; but shutting vp the gate thereof, he left no signe of diuine seruice there, and from the time it was built, till the time it was shut vp, were 333. yeeres.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Maſſacre of the Iewes at Cyrene.

The yere of the world, 4038. after Chriſts birth, 76.

THE boldneſſe of the Sicarians, like ſome infectious diſeaſe, infected alſo the townes about Cyrene. For one Iohn, a Weauer, and a wicked man hauing eſcaped, perſwaded many ſimple people to follow him, and led them into the wilderneſſe, promiſing to ſhew them ſignes and viſions, and thus he deceiued the ſimpleſt ſort of the Iewes: but the nobleſt of them of Cyrene vnderſtanding his deceit, gaue Catullus notice of his preparation and departure, who was then Gouernour of Lybia; who ſending horſemen and footmen, did eaſily ſurprize them being vnarmed, and the moſt part of them were ſlaine, yet ſome were taken aliue, and brought to Catullus. But their Leader Ionathas at that time eſcaped: yet being diligently laid and ſought for ouer all thoſe countries, hee was at laſt taken, and being brought vnto Catullus, hee ſought to delay his owne puniſhment, in offering an occaſion of iniquitie vnto Catullus. For he accuſed the richeſt among the Iewes, to haue bin his aduiſers to doe this matter. Catullus was glad of thoſe allegations, and exaggerated his accuſations very much with tragicall termes, ſo that he ſeemed to haue made an end of the wars againſt the Iewes, and which was worſt of all, to be content to credit whatſoeuer was maliciouſly ſpoken: hee himſelfe inſtructed the Sicarians to frame ſcandalous accuſations; and commanding them to nominate one Alexander a Iew, whom hee had long hated, and his wife Berenice, hee put them firſt of all to death, and after them all that were well monyed, who amounted to the number of 3000, and this he thought he did without controule, becauſe he confiſcated their poſſeſſions vnto Cæſar. And leſt any Iew liuing in any other place ſhould complaine of his iniuſtice, he extended his malicious lyes againſt others further off, and perſwaded Ionathas and certaine others that were taken with him, to accuſe the moſt truſty and faithfull Iewes at Rome and Alexandria: one of them who were thus falſely accuſed, was named Ioſeph, who writ this Hiſtory. But this deuice of Catullus had not ſucceſſe as hee hoped: for he came to Rome, and brought Ionathas and the reſt bound with him, thinking that no more inquiry would be made of the falſe accuſations inuented by himſelfe.

A part of Ionathans companions were taken and ſlaine, the reſt kept captiue aliue, and brought to Catullus.

Three thouſand Iewes ſlaine by Catullus.

Ioſeph by Catullus perſwaſion is accuſed by Ionathas.

But Veſpaſian, ſuſpecting the matter, made diligent inquiry to know the truth: and finding theſe crimes iniuriouſly impoſed vpon thoſe men, at Titus intreaty, he acquited them, and puniſhed Ionathas according to his deſert; who being firſt whipped, was afterward burned aliue. And Catullus at that time, by reaſon of the mildneſſe of the Emperour, had nothing ſaid vnto him: but not long after he fell into a grieuous diſeaſe, and was cruelly tormented, not onely in body, but alſo in minde. For he was greatly terrified, and ſtill imagined to ſee the ghoſts of them whom he had ſo vniuſtly ſlaine, ready to kill him; ſo that he cryed out, and not able to containe himſelfe, leapt out of his bed, as though hee had beene tortured with torments and fire. And this diſeaſe daily increaſing on, his guts and bowels rotting and iſſuing out of him, at laſt hee dyed in this manner, leauing behind him an euident argument, that the Diuine Iuſtice doth puniſh impious malefactors. And this is the end of the Hiſtory, which wee promiſed to bee ſet downe with all fidelitie, for them that are deſirous to know the euent of the warres betweene the Iewes and the Romanes. And as for our ſtyle, we leaue it to the iudgement of the Reader: but touching the veritie of the Hiſtory, it is ſuch, as no man need to doubt of; for I doe affirme that to be the onely ſcope, which I aymed at in this whole worke.

Ionathas, being firſt beaten, is burnt aliue.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS THE SONNE OF MATTHIAS, WRITTEN AGAINST APION, AS TOVCHING THE ANTIQVITIE OF THE IEWES.

I Suppose (O thou worthiest amongst worthy men, Epaphroditus) that I haue sufficiently testified vnto them, who shall reade those bookes which I haue written, as touching the Authentique History of the Iewes, that our Nation is most ancient, and that they haue had their originall from themselues, and haue from the first beginning inhabited that Countrey, whereof they are now possessed at this present. To which effect I haue gathered out of our Sacred writings, and publisht in the Greeke tongue, a History containing the occurrences of fiue thousand yeeres. And for that I see there are diuers, who (beeing too much addicted and seduced by the scandalous blasphemies and reports which some of those who are lewdly affected towards vs, haue published against vs) haue misconceited and misbeleeued that which I haue written of our Antiquitie, and labour to approoue our Nation to be moderne, because none of the most ancient and most renowned Historiographers among the Grecians haue thought our ancestors worthy to be enrowled in their writings: I haue for these causes held it a part of my duty to write some short Treatise hereupon; both to reprooue the euill intent and affected lying of those our calumners, as also to correct their ignorance, by teaching those who are desirous to know the truth, what the originall of our nation is. For proofe whereof, I will produce no other testimony then those, who from antiquitie haue beene iudged worthy of credit among the Greekes; laying open before their eyes, that they, who haue slanderously and falsely written against vs, are conuicted by their owne mouthes: I will also enforce my selfe to expresse the causes, why very few Grecians haue made mention of vs in their Histories: and moreouer, I will make it knowne to those who are ignorant (either in effect or in pretence) who they haue beene that omitted not our History. First of all therefore, I doe not a little maruell at those, who (in respect of antiquitie) suppose that the truth ought onely to be gathered from the Greekes: and that they iustly may claime the honour and knowledge of faithfull writing, whereas they neither vouchsafe either vs, or any others, the credit or truth in that we set downe, although I am able to prooue, that all things haue falne out quite contrary. For which cause it behoooueth vs not to looke to mens various opinions, but to examine that which is right, and gather the same by the effects. For whatsoeuer is set downe by the Greekes is new, and of late memory, and hath beene brought to execution, in a manner but yesterday: I meane the foundations of Cities, the inuentions of Arts, and the descriptions of Lawes, and the latest practice among them hath beene, and is, the diligent trauell in History.

The History of the Antiquity containeth the euents of fiue thousand yeeres.

The causes that moued him to write this booke.

All things among the Greekes are moderne, but such things as were done among the Ægyptians, Chaldees and Phœnicians, are of happy memory and venerable antiquitie.

But amongst the Ægyptians, Chaldees and Phœnicians (for I presume not to compare my countreymen with them) as they themselues confesse, the memory of their writings is most ancient and infallible. For all these nations dwell in such countries as are not subiect to the corruption of ayre; and haue carefully prouided, that none of those things that haue bin done by them should

A ſhould ſleep in obſcuritie, but ſhould be kept in memory in the publike writings of the learnedſt men: whereas innumerable corruptions haue crept in among the Greekes, by which the memory of things ſo repaſſed, is defaced. But they alwaies who haue eſtabliſhed new eſtates, haue each of them ſuppoſed in their owne behalfe, that whoſoeuer was of theirs, hee was the firſt of the world. Yet notwithſtanding they haue had the knowledge of the nature of letters very late, and haue attained the ſame with very great difficultie. For they that ſpeake of the moſt ancient vſe of the ſame, do boaſt and glorifie themſelues, that they haue receiued the knowledge therof from the Phœnicians, and Cadmus. Yet notwithſtanding, there is not any one of them that can ſhew any record of that time, either in their Temple, or in their publike Regiſters: whereas, after, there B aroſe a great doubt and queſtion, whether thoſe letters were in vſe during their time, who ſince haue for the ſpace of many yeeres continued the ſiege before Troy. And in ſooth, their opinion who affirme that they were ignorant of the vſe of thoſe letters, which are at this preſent allowed and accuſtomed among vs, is not to be refuſed. For it is moſt manifeſt, that there is not any writing extant among the Greekes that is more ancient then Homers poeſie, which as it is moſt manifeſt, hath beene in allowance and continuance ſince the time of the ſiege of Troy: and yet it is reported, that he left no part of that his poeſie in writing, which was compoſed of diuers ſongs, and onely ſung by roat; by which meanes it came to paſſe, that there are ſo many contradictions in the ſame. And as touching thoſe who haue vndertaken to write hiſtories among them, I meane Cadmus the Mileſian, and Acuſilaus the Argiue, and after him if there were any others; they were C not aliue, but very little time before the paſſage of the Perſians into Greece. Furthermore, they who among the Greekes were the firſt that introduced Philoſophy, and the knowledge of celeſtiall and diuine things, that is to ſay, Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras and Thales, theſe all of them confeſſe with one accord, that being inſtructed by the Ægyptians and Chaldees, they haue publiſhed ſome few writings, which are ſuppoſed to be the moſt ancient among the Greekes, and it is hardly beleeued alſo that they were written by them. What reaſon therefore haue the Greeks to be ſo proud, as if there were none but themſelues onely who knew the affaires of antiquitie, and could exactly expreſſe their truth and veritie? Or who cannot eaſily coniecture by their owne Writers themſelues, that their writings were onely vpon heareſay and ſuppoſition, and that their ſtyle was onely tyed to their vaine coniectures? Hence commeth it to paſſe, that in D their bookes they cauill and reprooue one another, and make no conſcience to maintaine and write contradictions in one and the ſame thing.

Innumerable corruptions inuaded Greece.

The Phœnicians and Cadmus, the firſt inuenters of letters.

Among the Greeks there is not any writing more ancient then Homers poem.

But it may be ſaid, that I taske my ſelfe to a fruitleſſe labour, if I ſhould goe about to informe thoſe who are better experienced then my ſelfe; in how many points Hellanicus differeth from Acuſilaus as touching the Genealogy: in how many places Acuſilaus hath corrected Herodotus; or how Ephorus hath approoued that Hellanicus was a lyer in the greater part of that which hee reciteth. Ephorus hath bin reproued by Timæus; and in generall, all they haue taxed Herodotus. Neither hath Timæas vouchſafed to accord with Antiochus, or Philiſtus, or Callias, in the Hiſtories of Sicily. Neither haue they who haue written the Hiſtories of Athens, or thoſe who haue entreated of the Argoliques, followed others. What need I reckon vp thoſe who in particular E haue entreated of cities, or of ſuccinct and ſhort matters? whereas in the deſcription of the Perſian warre, and thoſe exploits that were performed therein, thoſe of greateſt authoritie are moſt at oddes. Thucydides is accuſed by ſome for a lyer in diuers places, notwithſtanding that hee ſeemeth to haue deſcribed the Hiſtory of his time moſt exactly. But the cauſes of this diſcord are diuers, and it may be that they who ſhall narrowly pry into them, ſhall finde more. For mine owne part, thoſe two which I ſhall here ſet downe, in my opinion are of greateſt waight. The firſt, and in my iudgement the chiefeſt, is, that amongſt the Greekes, from the beginning they haue not beene induſtrious to keepe publike Regiſters of ſuch matters as happened in any time or place: which hath made them erre, and giuen thoſe a priuiledge to lye, who afterwards would looke to write any thing of ſuch matters as were acted long ſince. Neither are the other Greekes onely to F be touched with this negligence for not making account of ſuch Regiſters, but amongſt the Athenians alſo (who are reputed to bee glorious for the antiquity of their countrey, and who are exerciſed in Sciences) there is no mention of them. For it is ſaid, that the moſt ancient and publike writing which they haue, are thoſe capitall lawes which were ſet down by their Lawmaker Draco, who liued but a little time before Piſiſtratus tyranny. What need we ſpeake of the Arcades, who vaunt themſelues of their antiquities? For they haue learned the vſe of letters with very great difficulty, and ſome time after this: whereas therefore there was not any writing publiſhed

Thucydides writ a moſt exact hiſtory of his time.

The cauſes of diſcord among the Iewes. Greekes.

liſhed before that time which might inſtruct thoſe that would learne, or reprehend thoſe that publiſhed vntruths: from thence it is, that ſo many differences haue happened amongſt Hiſtoriographers. A ſecond cauſe is, for that they, who addicted themſelues to compoſe Hiſtories, did not buſie themſelues about the inquiſition of the truth (notwithſtanding that each of them did ordinarily promiſe no leſſe) but they laboured to expreſſe how eloquent they were, and fixed their whole ſtudy thereon, as the onely meanes whereby they hoped to obtaine reputation aboue the reſt. Some of them therefore addicted their ſtyles to fables, otherſome by flattering praiſes thought to currie fauour with Kings and Cities. The reſt inforced their ſtudies to accuſations, by obtrecting the worke of the writer thereof, vnder truſt to get the more credit thereby. In effect they haue followed that courſe in compoſing their Hiſtory, that was euery way different from the true nature thereof. (For the aſſured ſigne of a perfect and true Hiſtory is, whereas all men accord both in word and writing in ſetting downe the ſame thing:) and they who haue written diuerſly, made men beleeue that they were the trueſt amongſt all the reſt. Wee ought therefore to grant the ſuperioritie to the Grecians in all that which concerneth eloquence, and the ornament of language, but not in that which appertaineth to antiquitie or truth of Hiſtory, and eſpecially when the queſtion is, what each man writ as touching his owne Nation.

Another cauſe of their diſcord recorded by the Grecian Hiſtoriographers.

The ſigne of a true hiſtory.

Seeing therefore that both the Ægyptians and Babylonians long time ſince vſed all diligence in writing, inſomuch as their prieſts were hereunto enioyned, who did moſt curiouſly intreat of all ſuch points: the ſame alſo did the Chaldees amongſt the Babylonians, and the Phœnicians alſo (inhabiting amongſt the Greekes) vſed lawes (both concerning priuate and publike affaires) which, becauſe all men confeſſe it, I will omit to ſpeake of. I let paſſe alſo to recount what care our nation had of this point (no doubt greater then thoſe nations aboue mentioned had) charging our high prieſts and prophets to execute this office, which cuſtome hath beene obſerued euen vntill this our age: yea (and if I may preſume ſo far) will be obſerued in all ſucceeding ages, as by the ſcope of my ſpeech enſuing I will endeuour to make manifeſt. For our nation did not onely depute this office to the moſt iuſt men amongſt them in the beginning, and vnto ſuch as were alwaies ready to appeaſe the heauy diſpleaſure and wrath of God kindled againſt them; but they alſo prouided to preſerue the line and deſcent of prieſts from all impurity, and from being intermingled with others. For no man amongſt vs can be a prieſt, who is not borne of a woman deſcended from the prieſts line; neither in this caſe is any reſpect made either of riches or honours: but the partie who claimeth the dignitie of prieſthood, muſt by many witneſſes proue his Genealogy, and that he is deſcended from prieſts. This cuſtome is not onely of force in Iewry, our owne country, but whereſoeuer elſe any of our nation inhabit, as in Ægypt and Babylon, and in any other place, where continually the prieſts in their marriages haue this reſpect, not to marry with any woman that is not of their owne line, and they ſend vnto Ieruſalem the name and pedigree of the woman whom they haue married, and all teſtimony hereof which they can deduce from her anceſtors. Now if warres moleſt our nation (as often they haue) in the time of Antiochus, ſurnamed Epiphanes, of Pompey the great, Quintilius Varo, and eſpecially in this our age, then thoſe Prieſts who ſuruiue make new Genealogies, and pedigrees out of our holy writ for the foreſaid women, that are not deuoured by the fury of warre. For they come vnto theſe women, not fearing the company of ſtrangers amongſt whom they liue: yea, this is an euident token of the Prieſts integritie, that euery prieſt during the reuolution of two thouſand yeeres, are regiſtred together with the names of their fathers, and if any one doe erre or falſifie any of the things before-ſaid, he is then interdicted from the altar, and from exerciſing any prieſtly function. So that in the writings of ſuch men, all things muſt of neceſſitie bee true, and as they ought to be, for that neither all men are permitted to write, nor yet any diſſonance and diſagreement is found in their writings. For ſuch things as paſt in ancient times quite beyond the memory of men, were only written by our Prophets, who had the knowledge thereof by inſpiration from God himſelfe: but other things of later time are onely recorded by thoſe who liued in the age, wherein the things they writ of were done. The bookes amongſt vs, containing the Hiſtories of all ages, are neither infinite, nor one repugnant to another: for all our Chronicle is contained in 22 bookes, to which bookes it is impietie to deny credit.

A cuſtome which the Prieſts obſerued.

The Prieſts amongſt the Iewes are euery one regiſtred with the name of their fathers: and this cuſtome hath continued two thouſand yeeres.

Two & twentie bookes of holy writ.

Fiue of theſe books were written by Moſes, comprehending Genealogies, and the beginning of mankind, and ſuch notable euents as hapned euen from the beginning of the world vntill his death; which is little leſſe then three thouſand yeeres. After the death of Moſes vntill the time wherein

A wherein Artaxerxes liued, who was King of the Perſians, and ſon to Xerxes, the Prophets of our Nation euery one writ the Hiſtory of his time wherein hee liued, ſo that of theſe mens wrrtings we haue thirteene books: the foure other books, which make vp the number already mentioned, are knowne to containe holy Hymnes dedicated vnto God, and wholſome precepts for mans life and conuerſation. All things, which from Artaxerxes vntill our time haue hapned, are alſo ſet downe in writing: yet the bookes wherein they are regiſtred, doe not deſerue ſo much credit as the former of ancient times, for that there was no certaine ſucceſſion of Prophets in this age. Moreouer, it is euident, that to the former workes we gine as great credit as to the things we our ſelues write; and notwithſtanding they haue bin ſo long written, yet in all that time no man durſt
B preſume either to alter or blot out any thing therein contained. For all Iewes euen from their cradle doe beleeue theſe bookes to be ſacred, holy, and diuine, and therefore doe giue all credit poſſible vnto them, and ſo would willingly ſuffer death, rather then to doe the contrary. Many captiues of our Nation haue already bin cruelly tormented, and diuers waies put to death in open Theaters, onely for that they would not commit any thing either in word or deed againſt their Lawes, nor violate the writings of their forefathers. Now who amongſt the Greeks did euer ſuſtaine the like? Nay, they are ſo far from doing it, that none can be found among them who would ſuffer any loſſe in his goods or fortunes, thereby to preſerue all the writings of their Nation from perdition: and the reaſon hereof is, that euery one eſteemeth the verity of their Hiſtories to depend vpon the will of the Writer. And this they do alſo of their moſt ancient Hiſtoriographers,
C and not without cauſe: for they euery day ſee men of their owne times, writing Hiſtories of matters long paſt before in former ages, wherein neither themſelues were preſent, neither yet vouchſafe they to credit the writings of ſuch as were then eye-witneſſes thereof: yea ſome among them haue diuulged Hiſtories of ſuch things as of late befell our Nation, when themſelues neuer haue beene in the place where ſuch matters paſt as they did write of were, nor haue liued in any neighbour place, where they might haue probable report how matters paſt, but onely making a few centones or broken newes, they moſt impudently arrogate to their patcht ſtuffe, the name of a Hiſtory.

The Iewes and Greciams are compared together.

Some others haue written of the warres of the Iewes.

I my ſelfe haue compoſed a moſt true Hiſtory of thoſe warres, and of euery particular thing there done, as well I might, hauing beene preſent in all thoſe affaires. For I was Captaine of the D Galileans amongſt our Nation, ſo long as any reſiſtance could be made againſt the Romans: and then it ſo fell out, that I was taken by the Romans, and being priſoner vnto Titus and Veſpaſian, they cauſed me to be an eye-witnes of all things that paſt. Firſt, in bonds and fetters, and afterward freed from them, I was brought from Alexandria with Titus, when he went to the ſiege of Ieruſalem. So that nothing could then paſſe whereof I had not notice. For beholding the Roman army, I committed to writing all things with all poſſible diligence. My ſelfe alſo did only manage all matters diſclozed vnto the Romans by ſuch as yeelded themſelues, for that I only did perfectly vnderſtand them. Laſtly, being at Rome, and hauing now leiſure, all buſineſſe being paſt, I vſed the helpe of ſome (for the priuity of the Greek tongue) and ſo I publiſhed a Hiſtory of all that had hapned in the foreſaid wars: which Hiſtory of mine is ſo true, that I feare not to call Veſpaſian
E and Titus, Emperors in thoſe wars, to witneſſe for them. I firſt gaue a copy of that booke to them, afterwards to many noble Romans, who alſo were preſent in thoſe warres, I ſold alſo many of them to our owne Nation, to ſuch as vnderſtood the Greek language, amongſt whom were Iulius, Archelaus, Herod the honeſt, and the moſt worthy King Agrippa, who all doe teſtifie, that my Hiſtory containeth nothing but truth: Who would not haue beene ſilent, if in any thing either for ignorance or flattery I had changed or omitted any particular. Yet notwithſtanding all this, ſome ill-diſpoſed perſons endeuour to diſcredit my Hiſtory, as though they were diſputing pro and contra amongſt children in ſchooles, being ſometimes on a ſudden to forge a feigned accuſation, and otherwiſe to faine a ſlanderous and ſudden detraction, neuer conſidering that hee who promiſeth other men a true relation of things paſt, muſt either bee priuy vnto them by his
F owne knowledge, as hauing beene preſent in the affaires, or elſe haue that which hee ſpeaketh from other mens mouthes by report of them who know them: both which I haue done. For I gathered my other books of Antiquity out of holy Scripture, being my ſelfe a Prieſt, and skilfull in our Law, and the Hiſtory of our warres I haue written, my ſelfe being an agent in many matters therein contained, and an eye-witneſſe of the reſt; ſo that nothing was ſaid or done whereof I had not notice. How then can any one excuſe them from impudency and malice, who labour againſt mee to prooue my relation falſe? They perhaps alleadge, that they haue read the commentarie

Ioſeph was preſent in all the wars of the Iewes.

Ioſeph writ the Hiſtory of the Iewes warres being at Rome.

Ioſeph ſold his bookes to many.

Some do derogate from Ioſephs Hiſtory.

mentarie containig the Emperours acts, yet for all this, they were not present in any action, repugnant to that, which my History recounteth. G

Thus haue I (as I thought it necessary) made a digression to shew how they are able to performe their word, who discrediting my History, promise to set down truth in writing. I haue also sufficiently (as I think) demonstrated, that the registring of things is more ancient amongst other Nations, then amongst the Greeks. I will now first of all dispute against those, who with all might and maine labour to proove our Nation of no antiquity, for that (as they say) no Greeke Writer maketh any mention of it. This done, I will bring foorth proofe and testimony of the antiquitie hereof out of other Writers, and so I will shew that their tongues are no slander, who seek to discredit our Nation. First therefore, our Nation neither inhabiteth a country bordering vpon the Sea, neither are we delighted in Merchandise, nor for this cause wearied with pilgrimages from place to place. But our Cities are situate far from the Sea in a most fertile soyle, which we till with all industry, and our whole endeauours are how to get food for our children, and to keepe our countrey Lawes, and how to leaue vnto our posterity the knowledge of piety, which work we thinke all our age ought to be imploied in. Beside all this before mentioned, we haue a forme of liuing, different from all other Nations: all which concurring together, we had no need to trafficke with the Greeks, as the Egyptians and the Phœnicians doe, who giue themselues to bargaining and merchandise onely for the couetousnesse of money. Neither were our ancestors delighted in thefts and robberies, nor did our fathers make warre vpon any Nation for desire of larger possessions, notwithstanding our countrey was furnished with many thousands of strong warlike men. Wherefore the Phœnicians sailing vnto the Greeks to traffick with them, they were thus made knowne vnto them, and by them the Egyptians, and all other Nations, who sailing vpon the Seas, brought merchandise into Greece. The Medes also and Persians were knowne vnto them, after such time as they openly raigned ouer Asia, and the Persians warred euen to the other opposite continent. H I

Two things which Ioseph intendeth.

The Iewes care to bring vp their children.

The ancient Iewes had no need to trafficke with the Grecians.

Moreouer, the Greeks knew the Thracians, because they were their neighbours, and the Scythians by sailing to Pontus, and finally all that were disposed to write, knew all the Nations bordring either vpon the Easterne and Westerne Seas; but such as dwelt farre from the Sea and seacoast, were long time vnknowne, as also appeares in Europe: for neither Thucidides, nor Herodotus, nor any other of that time, maketh any mention of Rome, notwithstanding that so long since it was so mighty, and made so great wars: yet at last, with much adoo the Greeks heard of it. Yea, their most curious Writers, and namely Ephorus, were so ignorant of the Frenchmen and Spaniards, that they thought the Spaniards to bee a people onely denominated of one City, wherein they inhabited, whereas the whole world now knoweth them to inhabit a vast countrey, and a great part of the Westerne world. Likewise, the said Greek Writes relate the maners of the foresaid people to be such, as neither are, nor were euer vsed among them. And the onely cause why they were ignorant of the truth, was the distance of the place, and these Writers would seeme to tell something which others of former time had not spoken of. No maruell therefore though our Nation was vnknowne, and none of them in their writings made any mention of vs, being both so farre from the sea, and liuing after a different manner. K L

The Romans were lately knowne to the Greeks.

Certaine Historiographers report Spaine to be onely one Citie.

Put case therefore that I denied the Greeks to be of any antiquitie, and to proove my assertion should conclude their Nation to be moderne, for that our Histories made no mention of them, would they not laugh at this reason, and vse the testimony of their neighbour Nations to proove their antiquitie? I therefore will do the like, and vse the testimony of the Egyptians and Phœnicians, whose records the Greeks cannot deny. For all Egyptians in generall are our enemies, and among the Phœnicians they especially of Tyre; Which I cannot iustly say of the Chaldees, who haue beene Princes ouer our Nation, and because of their affinity and alliance with our countrimen, haue in their Chronicles made mention of the Iewes. Yet when I haue prooued what I now auerre, and refell the slanderous reports against vs, I will then also shew who amongst the Greeks spake of vs, that so the Greeks may also be depriued of this shift and refuge, to excuse their malicious lies falsely forged against our Nation. And first of all I will begin with the writings of the Egyptians, who, as they well know, doe nothing at all fauour vs. Wherefore Manethon, an Egyptian borne, skilfull in the Greeke tongue, as by his workes appeares (for hee writ in Greeke) compiling a History of the customes and religion of his forefathers, collected (as himselfe reporteth) out of the Egyptian holy writings, often reprehendeth Herodotus, who being indeed ignorant, did much helpe the Egyptians. This Manethon, in his second booke of the M Arguments to proove the Iewes of more antiquity then the Greeks.

Egyptian

A Ægyptian cuſtomes ſaith thus (I will ſet downe his owne words, becauſe I vſe them as a witneſſe.) We haue a King (quoth he) named Timæus, in whoſe raigne God being angry with vs, contrary to all expectation, an obſcure people taking courage, came from the Eaſt, and pitching their tents in our countrey, conquered it by force, no man reſiſting them; and committing our Princes to bonds, did finally burne our cities, and deſtroy the temples of our gods, and behaued themſelues moſt cruelly againſt the inhabitants, killing many of them, and making ſlaues of the reſt with their wiues and children: finally, they choſe a King amongſt themſelues, who ſhould be then of our countrey, his name was Saltis, who comming to Memphis, made both the higher and lower Prouince tributaries, leauing garriſons in ſtrong holds, and fortifying thoſe B places in the Eaſt: Likewiſe, foreſeeing that the Aſſyrians were more mighty then he, and would inuade his countrey, he found out in this Prouince a citie called Saite fit for his purpoſe, beeing ſituate on the Eaſt ſide of the riuer Bubaſtis, which by an ancient diuine was called Auaris, hee builded vp this citie, and compaſſed it with moſt huge wals, and placed in it two hundred thouſand armed men to keepe it. This Saltis came in harueſt time, to the intent that hee might both pay his ſouldiers, and be a terrour vnto other people, and after he had raigned nineteene yeeres, he dyed.

Saltis ſubdued the Ægyptians.

After him ſucceeded another King called Bæon, who raigned foure and forty yeeres, next to him Aphinas, who raigned thirtie ſixe yeeres and ſeuen moneths, then Aphoſis, who raigned threeſcore and one yeeres, and then Iandas, who raigned fifty yeeres and one moneth, after them C all raigned Aſſis, nine and fortie yeeres and two moneths, and theſe ſixe were the firſt Kings amongſt them, euer deſtroying and warring vpon the Ægyptians, and labouring to extinguiſh their race. This nation was called Hicſos, which ſignifieth Kings ſhepheards: for Hic in the ſacred tongue, ſignifieth a King, and Sos a ſhepheard or ſhepheards, according to the common ſpeech, and Hicſos is a compound word. Some ſay theſe people were Arabians: but in other copies I find that Hicſos, is not interpreted kings ſhepheards, but ſhepheards that were captiues: for Hic and Hac, alſo when it is pronounced, doth in the Ægyptian tongue ſignifie a captiue, and this latter expoſition ſeemeth to me to be the trueſt, for it is more agreeable with the Hiſtory. Wherefore Manathon reporteth theſe foreſaid kings and ſhepheards to haue ruled Ægypt fiue hundreth and eleuen yeeres: and after theſe, the King of Thebes, and the King of the reſidue of Ægypt, vniting D their forces together, inuaded the ſaid ſhepheards, and held on great and long wars againſt them, and that the ſaid ſhepheards were ouercome by the King Aliſfragumthoſis, alſo that then they loſt all Ægypt which he had in their power, and that they were ſhut vp in a place called Auaris containing ten thouſand acres of ground, which as Manathon reporteth, theſe ſhepheards enuironed round about with a huge wall, to the end that all their whole prouiſion might be fortified, and all the preys which they got, defended. Moreouer, that Themoſis ſon of the ſaid Aliſfragumthoſis endeuoured by force to ſubdue them, and for this cauſe beſieged them with foure hundreth and 80000. armed men: and at laſt deſpairing to take them by ſiege, he couenanted with them that they ſhould ſafely depart out of Ægypt whither they would; and that they vpon theſe conditions together with all their families and goods and cattell, departed out of Ægypt into the E wilderneſſe, and ſo into Syria, being in number two hundreth and forty thouſand, and that fearing the puiſſance of the Aſſyrians, who at that time raigned in Aſia, they builded a citie in the countrey now called Iudæa, which they made ſo large that it might receiue them all, and this citie they called Ieruſalem. Further, the ſaid Manathon in another booke of the Ægyptian affaires ſaith, that in the holy writings, hee findeth the foreſaid ſhepheards called captiues, wherein hee ſaith moſt true. For our anceſtors were wont to feed cattell, and ſo leading a paſtorall life, were called ſhepheards, neither are they vniuſtly called captiues: for our forefather Ioſeph told the King of Ægypt that he was a captiue, and long time after hee called his brethren into Ægypt by the Kings command; but we will hereafter examine this point more ſtraightly: I will now cite the teſtimony of the Ægyptians concerning this point, and alſo relate the words of Manathon touF ching the time when this befell, who ſaith as followeth.

Kings ſhepheards.

After that the nation of ſhepheards were departed out of Ægypt vnto Ieruſalem, King Themoſis who draue them out of the Land, raigned twenty fiue yeeres and foure moneths, and then dyed: and his ſonne Chebron ſucceeded him, who raigned thirteene yeeres, and after him Amenophis twentie yeeres and ſeuen moneths, next, his ſiſter Ameſſes one and twentie yeeres and nine moneths, then raigned Mephios twelue yeeres and nine moneths, and Mephamuthoſis twentie fiue yeeres and ten moneths, Themoſis nine yeeres and eight moneths, Amenophis thirty yeeres and ten moneths, Orus thirtie ſixe yeeres and fiue moneths, after him his daughter Achencheres, twelue yeeres and one moneth, and the brother of Rathotis nine yeeres, Achencheres twelue yeeres and fiue moneths, another Achencheres twelue yeeres and three moneths, Armais foure yeeres and one moneth, Armeſis one yeere and foure moneths, Armeſeſmiamus threeſcore and ſixe yeeres and two moneths, Amenophis nineteene yeeres and ſixe moneths. Moreouer, that Sethoſis hauing made ready a huge armie both of foote and horſe, and alſo a Nauy at Sea, left the gouernment of Ægypt vnto his brother Armais, and permitted vnto him all other kingly authoritie, onely forbidding him to weare a Diadem, and to oppreſſe the Queene, mother to his children, commanding him alſo to abſtaine from the reſt of the Kings concubines. And Sethoſis himſelfe went to Cyprus and Phœnicia, againſt the Aſſyrians and Medes, and ſubdued them all, partly by the ſword, partly by the feare of his power and greatneſſe: and being proud of all this his fortunate ſucceſſe, he bent himſelfe againſt the Eaſterne countrey, and deſtroyed with fire and ſword the cities of that place, with whole Prouinces: and ſpending much time in theſe warres, his brother Armais whom he left in Ægypt, did without feare commit all that hee forbade him to doe: for hee oppreſſed the Queene violently, and daily lay with the reſt of the Kings concubines, and being thereto counſelled by his friends, he put a Crowne vpon his head and rebelled againſt his brother. Alſo that he who was then chiefe of the Ægyptians holy cuſtomes, ſent letters vnto Sethoſis, containing all that had hapned, and how Armais had rebelled againſt him; who returning to Peluſia, came and enioyed againe his owne kingdome which by his name was cald Ægypt: for Manethon writeth that this Sethoſis was named Egyptus, and his brother Armais Danaus.

Sethoſis King of Ægypt, made his brother Armais Gouernour of his countrey.

Whereupon Egypt tooke his name.

Thus farre Manethon: out of whom it is euident by computation of the foreſaid times, that our nation was deliuered out of Egypt, three hundreth ninety and three yeeres before Danaus, and inhabited this countrey of Iudæa ſo long, before Danaus came vnto Argos: notwithſtanding the inhabitants of Argos boaſt their Citie is moſt ancient. Wherefore Manethon recounteth two things for vs out of the Egyptian letters: firſt, that we came from another place to them, afterwards went out of their country again, and that ſo long agoe, as it was almoſt a thouſand yeeres before the Troian warres. Touching thoſe things which Manethon profeſſeth himſelfe, not to haue gathered out of the writings of the Egyptians, who did write out of certaine tales and reports, I will hereafter ſhew, how they are alledged without any reaſon for them. For I will once againe leaue theſe, and go to the teſtimony of the Phœnicians, which they writ concerning our nation. The Tyrians therefore haue Chronicles of very great antiquitie, which they haue kept with all diligence, concerning that which hath bin done among them, and indeed they are worthy of memory. Amongſt theſe Records it is written, that King Salomon built a Temple at Ieruſalem, a hundreth forty three yeeres and eight moneths, before the Tyrians erected Carthage. So they haue regiſtred the building of our Temple, for Hircanus King of the Tyrians, was our King Salomons friend, obliged vnto him for his fathers ſake, who for this cauſe alſo of his owne liberality, gaue Salomon a hundreth and twenty talents of gold towards the building of the Temple, and cut downe the moſt goodly wood called Libanus, which hee beſtowed vpon him, to make the roofe of the Temple withall: for which bounty, Salomon gaue him againe many liberall gifts, and among the reſt a country of Galilee named Zabulon: but Salomons wiſedome was the chiefe cauſe of this kings friendſhip towards him. For they ſent Problemes one to the other to bee anſwered, and Salomon in his anſwers appeared moſt witty, as alſo he did in many things elſe; and euen vntill this day, many of the Epiſtles ſent one vnto another, are kept among the Tyrians. And that I doe not feare the authority amongſt the Tyrians, I will prooue by the teſtimonie of Dius, a man who by common conſent hath faithfully written the Phœnician Hiſtorie, wherein he writeth as followeth.

Manethon ſheweth the Iewes cõming into Egypt & their departure.

Salomon built a Temple in Ieruſalem 143 yeeres and 8. moneths, before the Tyrians builded Carthage. The friendſhip of the Tyrian king and of king Salomon.

Problemes of Hircanus and Salomon.

After the death of Abibalus, Hircanus his ſon raigned in his ſtead, who encreaſed the number of his Eaſterne Cities, and inlarged Ieruſalem, he alſo ioyned the Temple of Iupiter Olympius, ſituate in an Iland, vnto it, filling vp the water with earth, adorned it with golden gifts. After this aſcending into Libanus, he cut down the wood to build temples, and that the king of Ieruſalem named Salomon, ſent vnto him certaine riddles to be expounded, and hee againe the like vnto him, couenanting together, that he who could not tell the meaning of one anothers riddles, ſhould pay vnto the other a ſumme of mony, and that Hircanus confeſſing he could not expound Salomons riddles, did pay vnto him much money: Laſtly, that one Abdemonus a Tyrian did expound the ſaid riddles, and writ more vnto Salomon, which if Salomon could not interpret, hee ſhould

A should pay vnto Hircanus a summe of money, and this testimony Dius beareth vs concerning the foresaid matter. But I will now recount the words of Menander an Ephesian, who hath registred the acts of all kings both at home and abroad, endeuouring to make a true Historie out of the writings of euery countrie. This man writing of the Tyrian kings, and comming to Hiramus, he saith thus of him: Abibalus dying, there succeeded in the kingdome his son Hiramus, who liued 34. yeeres: and this king with a rampire conioyned Eurichorus, & erected there a pillar of gold in Iupiters temple, and went into the woods, and cut downe the Cedars of Libanus to make couerings for the temples; of which, pulling downe the olde, hee erected new, and dedicated the temple of Hercules and Astartus: but that to Hercules in the moneth of Peritius, and then the other B to Astartus, when he with an army went against the Tyrians, who did not pay him tribute, whom when he had subdued, he returned againe.

The testimony of Menander the Ephesian.

The Genealogie of King Hiramus.

At this time also liued Abdemonus a seruant vnto the king, who was wont to expound the parables, which king Salomon of Ierusalem sent vnto king Hiramus: now how long it was from this kings time till the building of Carthage, we may thus calculate. After the death of Hiramus, his son Beleastartus, succeeded him, who liued forty and three yeeres, and raigned seuen: after him his sonne Abdastartus, who liued twenty yeeres, and raigned nine; but this king was treacherously slaine by the foure sonnes of his nurse, the eldest of whom raigned twelue yeeres. Next whom, Astartus the sonne of Feleastartus, who liued fifty and foure yeeres, and raigned twelue: after him ruled his brother Astarimus, who liued fifty and foure yeeres, and sate in the king- C dome nine, then hee was slaine of his brother Phelletes, who raigned eight moneths, and liued fifty yeeres, and was slaine by a Priest of Astarta named Ithobalus, who liued threescore and eight, and raigned thirty two yeeres: him succeeded his sonne Badezorus, who liued fortie fiue yeeres, and raigned sixe yeeres, to him succeeded his son Mettinus, who liued thirty two yeeres, and raigned nine. After him Pigmalion who liued fifty sixe yeeres, and raigned forty; in the seuenth yeere of whose raigne, his sister Dido builded a City in Africa, and named it Carthage: so that from the time of king Hiramus vnto the building of Carthage, is by this computation a hundreth fifty fiue yeeres, and two moneths: and for as much as the temple of Ierusalem was built in the twelfth yeere of Hiramus his raigne, the computation of the time since that yeere vntill the building of Carthage is 143. yeeres, and eight moneths. What need we alledge D more, seeing this testimonie of the Phœnicians? The truth is now sufficiently made manifest: for our ancestors must needs haue come into this countrey we inhabit, before such time as they built a temple in it, as I haue also made manifest in my Books of Antiquitie, collected out of our holy Scripture.

Carthage built in Africk by Dido Pigmalions sister.

I wil now speak of that which the Chaldees writ of vs in their Histories; which do much agree in all other matters with those of our nation. And first let Berosus be my witnes, who was a Chaldean borne, yet a man famous & knowne vnto all that loue learning, for he in the Grecian tongue did write Astronomie, and the Chaldees Philosophy. Berosus imitating the most ancient Histories writeth of the Deluge, and how mankind was therein extinguished, and he in all things imitateth Moses. He also speaketh of the Arke wherein our forefather was preserued, and affir- E meth that it was carried into the tops of the mountaines in Armenia: after this hee prosecuteth the Genealogy of all that raigned from Noe, vntill Nabulassarus king of the Babylonians and Chaldeans. He likewise setteth downe how long euery one raigned, and in prosecuting the deeds of this king he recounteth how he sent his sonne Nabuchodonosor into Egypt, and to our country with great power, who finding them rebels, subdued them and burnt the temple at Ierusalem, and so departed, carrying with him all our nation into Babylon: whereupon our City was desolate seuenty yeeres vntill the raigne of Cyrus king of the Persians. Moreouer, he affirmeth that the Babylonian kept Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia, exacting more of his subiects then euer any king of Babylon or Chaldea had done before his time. And the words of Berosus must needs be to this effect: Nabulassarus his father hearing that his substitute in Egypt, Cœlosyria, F and Phœnicia had rebelled, he himselfe not being able to take such paines, committed these affaires vnto his sonne Nabuchodonosor, and gaue vnto him a part of his army, for that he was in the flower of his age, and sent him against him: and Nabuchodonosor fighting with the said Champion, ouerthrew him, and subdued the countrey which of olde belonged vnto them, and at the same time his father Nabulassarus fell sicke in Babylon, and died, hauing raigned twenty nine yeeres. But Nabuchodonosor long after vnderstanding his fathers death, he disposed of Egypt and other Prouinces as hee thought good, and taking the captiues of Iudæa, Phœnicia, and the Syrians that liued in Egypt, hee committed them to certaine of his friends, to bee brought with other carriage and his army to Babylon; and ſo he himſelfe accompanied with a very few, took his iourney to Babylon thorow the Deſart: and finding that the Chaldees ruled all, and that their Nobilitie reſerued the Kingdom for him, he was made King, and commanded houſes to be built for the captiues that were comming, in the moſt conuenient places of Babylon, and hee of the ſpoile beautified the Temple of Belus and other places moſt richly, and built a new Citie without the wall of the old: and prouiding leſt hereafter the enemies might turne the riuer and ſo haue acceſſe vnto the Citie, he inuironed the inner Citie with three ſeuerall walles, and the outmoſt Citie likewiſe. The wals whereof were made of brick, but the wals of the inner Citie were of brick and bytumen: this done, he builded moſt ſumptuous gates which might haue become Temples: and moreouer, neere vnto his fathers Palace he builded another farre greater, and more coſtly then it was, the pompe whereof it were hard and perhaps tedious to expreſſe. Yet this we will rehearſe worth the noting, that this ſo ambitious and aboue all credit gorgeous Palace was builded in fifteene daies: in it he erected rocks of ſtone like mountaines, beſet with all ſorts of trees; hee alſo made a famous garden, all ſupported with pillers, for that his wife being brought vp in the countrey of the Medes, deſired to haue a proſpect into the fields and mountaines.

Nabuchodonoſor builded a Palace.

Semiramis did not build Babylon.

This hee relateth of the forementioned King, and many things more in his booke of the affaires of the Chaldees, wherein he reproueth the Greeke writers, who falſely affirme that Semiramis the Aſſyrian Queene built Babylon, and that they falſely report thoſe wonderfull works about Babylon, to haue beene by her made and finiſhed. Wee muſt needs thinke that the Chaldean Hiſtory is true, ſeeing it agreeth with that of the Phœnicians, which Beroſus writ of the King of Babylon, who ſubuerted both Phœnicia and all Syria: with them alſo accordeth Philoſtratus in his hiſtory of the ſiege of Tyria, and Magaſthenes alſo in his fourth book of the affaires of India; where he laboureth to prooue, that the ſaid King excelled Hercules in ſtrength and valour, affirming that he ſubdued the greateſt part of Africk, and Spaine, and that the Temple of Ieruſalem was burnt by the Babylonians, and againe reedified by Cyrus; and we may proue it out of Beroſus, who in his third book ſaith as followeth: Nabuchodonoſor hauing begun the third wall, fell ſicke and died, when he had raigned forty three yeeres, and his ſonne Euelmeradochus ſucceeded him, who for his iniquity and luſtfull liuing, was treacherouſly ſlaine by his ſiſters husband, named Nirigliſſoroor, after he had raigned two yeeres. He being dead, the traitor Nirigliſſoroor vſurped the Kingdome, and raigned foure yeeres, whoſe ſonne then a childe was made King, called by name Laboroſardochus, and he raigned nine moneths; who for that he ſeemed to be of very corrupt manners, was ſlaine by his owne friends: after whoſe death, they who ſlew him conſulting together, did make one Nabonidus a Babylonian, King. At this time the wals of brick and bytumen about the riuer of Babylon were built. In the eighth yeere of this Kings raigne, Cyrus comming with an army out of Perſia, conquered all Aſia, and came with his forces againſt Babylon: but the King of Babylon hauing notice of his comming, leuied an army meeting him in the way, and ioyned battell with him; but being ouercome in the fight, hee accompanied with a very few of his men, was forced to flie into Borſippa. Cyrus now beſieged Babylon, and purpoſed to deſtroy the outward wals thereof: but by reaſon that it was too ſtrong and too hard to win, he returned to Borſippa to beſiege Nabonidus the King of Babylon who was fled thither. But Nabonidus not abiding the euent of warre, yeelded himſelfe vnto Cyrus, who dealt mercifully with him and gaue him a Territory in Carmania, but expelled him out of Babylon: ſo Nabonidus led the reſt of his life in that Prouince. This Hiſtory agreeth with ours; for in our writings we find that Nabuchodonoſor in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne did deſtroy our Temple, and that it ſo remained threeſcore and ten yeeres: Alſo that in the ſecond yeere of King Cyrus, the foundations thereof were laid againe, and that it was finiſhed and reedified in the ſecond yeere of King Darius his raigne. This done, I will alſo relate the Hiſtories of the Phœnicians, that we may abound with proofe of that we ſay, for they make a computation of the yeeres after this manner: In the raigne of King Ithobalus, Nabuchodonoſor beſieged Tyre thirteene yeeres, after whom Baal raigned ten yeeres, next him Iudges were appointed, to wit, they that follow; Ecnibalus the ſonne of Balachus iudged two moneths, Chelbis the ſonne of Abdæus ten moneths, Abbarus the high Prieſt three moneths, Myttomus and Geraſtus ſonnes of Abdilimos iudged ſix yeeres, after whom Balatorus raigned one yeere, and after his death the Tyrians called Merbalus from Babylon, and made him King, and he raigned foure yeeres: and he then dying, they ſent alſo to Babylon for his brother

A ther Iromus, who raigned twenty yeeres, in whoſe raigne Cyrus obtained the Perſian Empire, ſo that this whole time is fifty foure yeers and three moneths: for Nabuchodonoſor began to beſiege Tyre in the ſeuenth yeere of his raigne, and in the fourteenth yeere of King Iromus his raigne Cyrus was made Emperour of Perſia.

Nabuchodonoſor beſieged Tyre.

Wherefore both the Chaldees and Tyrian Hiſtoriographers agree with vs concerning our Temple. So that the antiquity of our nation aboue mentioned is now made manifeſt, and without all controuerſie. And that which is already alledged to this end, may be ſufficient for them, who are not vpon purpoſe contradictious. It is therefore requiſite (to ſatisfie them who giue no credit to the writings of other nations, and contend that the Grecian Hiſtories onely are to be
B beleeued) to bring many teſtimonies from the Greeks themſelues, who haue as opportunity ſerued, made mention of our nation and knowne it. Pythonis a Samian borne, both of great antiquity, and excelling all other Philoſophers in holineſſe towards the gods, is not only conuinced to haue knowne the cuſtomes of our nation, but he did alſo as it plainely appeareth imitate them in many things. His writings are in no place extant, but diuers haue recorded many notable things of him, and eſpecially Hermippus a man moſt diligent in ſearching of Hiſtories. This Hermippus recounteth in his firſt booke of Pythagoras, that the ſaid Philoſopher (hauing one of his familiar friends named Calliphon dead, who was a Crotonian borne) reported this mans ſoule to be perpetually with him, and that the ſaid ſoule commanded him not to paſſe the place where his aſſe fell, and that he ſhould abſtaine from vncleane water, and that he ſhould with all dili-
C gence eſchue blaſphemie: and then it followeth, this he did and ſaid, imitating the opinions of the Iewes and Grecians, and applying them to himſelfe. For it is certainly reported, that this man gathereth much of his Philoſophie out of the Iewes lawes. Our nation in times paſt was well knowne to diuers cities, ſo that many of them doe now obſerue our cuſtomes, and others eſteeme them worth the imitation, as Theophraſtus doth witneſſe in his booke entituled De legibus: for he ſaith that the Tyrian lawes forbid to ſweare by any ſtrange Sacrament, and amongſt theſe ſtrange and forraine Sacraments, he reckoneth the oath called Corban, which oath is vſed onely amongſt the Iewes, and in our language ſignifieth the gift of God. Herodotus of Halicarnaſſa knew our nation alſo, and in a manner maketh mention of it: for ſpeaking of the Colchians, he ſaith thus in his ſecond booke: The Colchians, Egyptians, and Æthiopians onely a-D mongſt all other nations did vſe circumciſion in the beginning: for the Phœnicians and Syrians liuing in Paleſtina doe confeſſe themſelues to haue learned this cuſtome from the Egyptians, and the Syrians liuing neere vnto Thermodoontes, and the riuer Parthenius and their neighbours the Macronians, are reported lately to haue learned it of the Colchians: and theſe are they onely, that vſe circumciſion, and they doe like vnto the Egyptians, but I am not able to ſay, whether the Egyptians or Æthiopians learned it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Paleſtina to vſe circumciſion. and it is manifeſt that of all that inhabit Paleſtina, the Iewes onely vſe it, which hee knowing writeth ſo of them. Chærilus alſo an ancient Poet maketh mention of our nation, and affirmeth that our countrimen warred vnder Xerxes againſt the Greekes, and numbring them of the countries that followed him, hee laſtly ſpake thus of our E nation.

A people ſtrange followed this royall throng.
Their language was th'vnknowne Phœnician tongue:
In th'hils of Solymus their dwelling was,
Neere to a lake for greatneſſe which did paſſe:
Their heads were ſhau'd, and for the heads attire,
They ware an horſ-skin dryed at the fire.

It is euident as I thinke that he ſpeaketh of the Iewes: for the mountaines of Solymus are in our country, and that lake alſo called Aſphaltites, which is the greateſt and vaſteſt of all lakes that are in Syria, and thus Chærilus maketh mention of vs. And that the Iewes were not knowne only F of the Greekes, but alſo admired of them, it is eaſie to prooue not out of the obſcureſt writers, but by the teſtimonie of their wiſeſt Philoſophers: For Clearchus diſciple vnto Ariſtotle, and the beſt amongſt all the Peripatetickes in his firſt booke De ſomno, ſaith, that his maſter Ariſtotle ſpake thus of a certaine Iew, and reporting Ariſtotles words, he ſaith thus: It were too tedious to recount all things elſe which he alledgeth, but I will ſet downe that only that may cauſe the man to be admired. Hyperochides anſwered that they were all very deſirous to heare it: then quoth Clearchus, according to Ariſtotles precepts in his Rhetoricke I will firſt recount of what nation the man was, leſt I ſeeme to oppoſe my ſelfe to him, that ſet downe the foreſaid precept. G

Do ſo quoth Hyperochides, if ſo you pleaſe. Then he ſaid, This man before mentioned was by nation a Iew (borne in Cœloſyria) one of the ſect of the Indian Philoſophers, and they are called (as I heare reported) among the Indians, Calani, and among the Syrians, Iewes, taking their name from the place where they inhabit, called Iury; the name of their City is hard to pronounce, for they call it Ieruſalem. This man entertained many ſtrangers, and he came from out of the higher country down vnto the ſea-coaſt, and he was very eloquent and of great courage. We at that time liued in Aſia, when this diuine man came vnto the place where we were, and began to conferre with vs, and with other Philoſophers, making triall of their knowledge: and for that many learned men were aſſembled about him, he at laſt for this cauſe more willingly imparted ſome of his H knowledge vnto them. Thus farre Ariſtotle in Clearchus: recounting moreouer at large the admirable abſtinence of the foreſaid Iew from meate, and his chaſtity: all which they that are deſirous to know may reade in Clearchus, for I am loth to write any thing ſuperfluous: So now it is euident how Clearchus by the way of a digreſſion ſpeaking of another matter, maketh mention of vs. But Hecatæus Abderita a Philoſopher, and one brought vp with King Alexander, and dwelling with Ptolomæus of Lagus, did not onely briefely make mention of vs, but alſo writ a whole book Hecatæus Abderita brought vp with King Alexander. of our Nation the Iewes, out of which I will briefly note ſome few points that occurre, but firſt I will ſhew of what antiquity he is. For he recordeth the time when Ptolomæus neere vnto Gaza fought with Demetrius, which hapned the eleuenth yeere after Alexanders death, in the hundreth and ſeuenteenth Olympiade, as Caſtor writeth: who ſpeaking of this Olympiade ſaith, that in I this time Ptolomæus Lagus ouercame Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus at Gaza in fight: which Demetrius was called Poliorcetes, and all men confeſſe that Alexander died in the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiade: ſo that it is euident that at that time wherein Alexander liued, our Nation flouriſhed. And Hecatæus ſaith, that after that battell fought at Gaza, Ptolomæus was made Lord of the places bordering about Syria, and that many men hearing of the clemencie of Ptolomæus, followed him into Egypt, and conuerſed with him: amongſt the which one was called Ezechias the Iewes high Prieſt, a man about threeſcore and ſix yeeres old, and of chiefe notice and dignity of all his Nation, and moſt prudent and eloquent, one alſo who in all affaires had A thouſand and fiue hundreth Prieſts receiue the Iewes tenths. more experience then any man elſe. He likewiſe reporteth that the number of the Iewes Prieſts who receiue their tenths, and rule all in generall, is a thouſand and fiue hundred or thereabout: K and againe making mention of the ſame Ezechias, he ſaith, This man being in this reputation and honour, and conuerſing with vs, by the help of ſome about him, declared all things wherein we and this Nation differ, and ſhewed vnto vs the place of his dwelling, and the manner of his conueruſation, which he had in writing.

After this, Hecatæus ſheweth what manner of people we are, and how religious in our lawes, and how that we rather will ſuſtaine all torments and death it ſelfe, then violate them in any thing, and that we account it a worthy thing ſo to doe: adding moreouer, that being much hated of our neighbours, and hauing ſuffered all contumelies both at the hands of the Perſian Kings and their

He alſo recordeth an example of our conſtant minds: for Alexander (quoth he) being at Babylon, and purpoſing to reedifie the temple of Bell, he commanded all his ſouldiers to carry timber to the building hereof, and the Iewes onely diſobeyed his command, for the which they endured many ſtripes and torments, till ſuch time as the King freed them from it: and they (quoth he) returning to their owne countrey, deſtroyed all the temples and altas that they found there, and ſome of them were by the officers therefore puniſhed, other eſcaped fire; adding that we may iuſtly be admired for theſe things, and that our nation is exceeding populous; likewiſe that many of vs were carried captiues into Babylon, and there ſerued the Perſians. Moreouer, that many more were diſperſt into Ægypt after Alexanders death, for a tumult begun in Syria: He alſo recordeth the greatneſſe of our countrey, and the fertilitie M thereof; they inhabit (quoth he) a countrey that hath almoſt thirtie hundreth thouſand acres of moſt fertill ground; for Iury is of this largenes, and that in time paſt we inhabited a large & very great city, which was very populous; he ſpeaketh alſo of the building of our Temple in this manner: The Iewes haue many other townes and villages in euery Prouince, but they haue one moſt

A Altar made of vnhewne ſtones ioyned together, and it is twenty cubits ſquare euery way, and ten cubits high, and about it is a moſt huge building, wherein is an Altar and a Candleſtick both of gold, weighing two talents, and there is kept a continuall light night and day, which neuer goeth forth. Therein is no image nor gift, no trees nor wood growing there, nor any thing of this ſort. Therein inhabit Prieſts both night and day, celebrating certaine purifications, and they drinke no wine in the Temple. The Prieſts doe dwell in the Temple and drinke no wine.

Moreouer, he ſhewed how our Nation warred vnder Alexanders ſucceſſors, and he reporteth that which he heard of a certaine Iew in the army, and I will ſet down the Authors owne words. As I went (ſaith he) to the red Sea, a certaine Iew, one of the horſemen that conducted vs, named Moſollamus, who was a courageous man, and one who excelled all archers elſe, both Greeks and other Nations; This Iew (euery one haſting on forward of his iourney, and being willed by a Southſaier to ſtand) asked for what cauſe the multitude ſtaied and went not forward? Preſently the Southſaier ſhewed him a bird which he diligently viewed, and told the Iew, that if that bird did ſtand ſtill in the place, then it was expedient for them to ſtand, and if the bird did mount vp and flee, that then they ought to march on forward; but if it flew towards the place from whence they came, that then it was wiſedome to retire. The Iew hereat was ſilent, yet drawing his Bow, he ſhot an arrow and killed the bird; whereat the Southſaier and certaine other were offended, and curſed him. But he, taking the vnhappy bird in his hand, ſaid vnto them: Are yee ſo mad, as to thinke that this bird, not hauing the foreſight to preſerue her ſelfe from this death, is able to direct vs in the ſucceſſe of our iourney? Had this bird foreknowne future euents, ſhee would haue eſchewed this place, for dread, that Moſollamus a Iew ſhould haue ſtrucken her with an arrow. But we will now leaue the teſtimony of Hecatæus: for euery one that liſt may read his book, and there vnderſtand this more at large. I will not omit the teſtimony of Agatarchides, a man of no euill in his owne opinion, yet indeed one who hath vſed detraction to our owne Nation. This man ſpeaking of Stratonice, how leauing her husband Demetrius, ſhee came into Syria, and how Seleuchus would not marry her as ſhee hoped (who hauing an army at Babylon, warred againſt Antioch, and had taken the City) and that ſhee fled into Seleucia, whereas ſhe might haue made a ſpeedier eſcape by water, but that ſhee was forewarned in a ſleepe ſo to doe, and that ſhe was there taken and died, &c. Agatarchides, hauing vſed this preface, and inueighed againſt Stratonices ſuperſtition, vſeth an example of our Nation on this manner: The people that are called Iewes, inhabit a moſt ſtrong City, which they call Ieruſalem; theſe people are wont to reſt vpon the ſeuenth day, and doe neither beare armes, nor till their grounds, nor doe any other buſineſſe on that day, but their cuſtome is to remaine in their Temple, and there with ſtretched out armes continue in praier till night. And ſo vpon a time they perſeuering in that foolery, whileſt they ſhould haue defended their City, Ptolomæus Lagus entered it with many people and a great army: who greatly tyrannized ouer them; and ſo they found by experience, that the ſolemnity appointed by their Law, was preiudiciall vnto them: ſuch like Churches as this, did teach them and all Nations elſe to flee vnto dreames, which their law teacheth; neuer conſidering that humane policy cannot preuaile againſt that which muſt neceſſarily happen. Agatarchides thought this which he reports of vs to be ridiculous: but they that weigh it with indifferency, ſhall perceiue, that it is greater commendation to our Nation, who rather ſuffer their countrey and our ſafety to be loſt and endamaged, then to violate the Lawes of God.

I thinke, I am thus able to ſhew, that many Writers omitted to make mention of our Nation, not for that they knew vs not, but for enuy. For Ierome, who writ a booke of ſucceſſion, in the ſame time that Hecatæus liued, who was a friend vnto King Antigonus, and being Preſident of Syria, neuer mentioneth vs in all his Hiſtory; notwithſtanding he was brought vp almoſt in our countrey. But Hecatæus writ a booke of vs; ſo different are the mindes of men: for one of them thought our Nation worthy to bee diligently recorded, the other through malice was hindered from ſpeaking the truth: yet the Hiſtories of the Chaldees, Egyptians and Phœnicians, may ſuffice to prooue our antiquitie, together with the Greeke Writers: for beſides thoſe before mentioned, Theophraſtus alſo, Theodotus, Manaſeas, Ariphanes, Hermogenes, Euemeus, Conon, Zopyrion, and many others, no doubt (for I haue not peruſed all mens bookes) haue manifeſtly teſtified of vs. For many of the foreſaid men were blinded with errors, as not hauing read our holy Scriptures, yet they all ioyntly teſtifie our antiquity, for which I now alledge them. Truly Demetrius Phalerius, Philon the elder, and Eupolemus, did not much erre from the truth, and therefore reaſon it is they ſhould be borne withall: for they were not ſo skilfull as to teach our writings whereof I made mention in the beginning of this book: to wit, that I declare the detractions and the teſtimony of thoſe writers, who record, that the lying Hiſtoriographers, at ſuch time as they commited to writing the foreſaid detractions, did alſo euen againſt themſelues regiſter ſuch like ſlanders as they did againſt vs. And I doubt not, but that all thoſe who are conuerſant in Hiſtories can teſtifie, that the like hath beene done by moſt writers for certaine priuate hatred, or ſuch like reſpects. For ſome of the Gentiles haue attempted to deface the honour and reputation of the moſt renowned Cities, and to defame the manners of their inhabitants. Thus did Theo- pompus to Athens, and Polycrates to Lacedæmon; and the Author that writ Tripoliticum (for it H was not Theopompus as ſome ſuppoſe) vſed the City Thebes very hardly: and Timæus in his Hiſtories of the foreſaid places, doth many times detract both them and others. And this they do, calumniating the moſt excellent that are, in ſomething or other; ſome for enuy and malice; others, that their fond babbling may make them famous, and ſo indeed it doth among fooles, that are knowne to haue no ſound iudgement, but wiſe men will condemne their malice. To bee ſhort,

The cauſe of malice betweene the Egyptians and Iewes. this is the cauſe of ſo many ſlanderous reports forged againſt our Nation: Some to gratifie the Egyptians haue attempted to depraue the truth, and ſo haue neither reported the verity concerhaue had many cauſes of malice and enuy vrging them heereto. And chiefely for that our progenitors in their countrey waxed mighty, and ſo departing to their owne countrey, were made I happy and fortunate. Secondly, the diuerſitie of our two Religions made great diſcord and variance amongſt vs, our Religion ſo farre excelling theirs in piety, as the diuine eſſence of GOD

euery one worſhippeth diuers kindes: vaine and fooliſh men, who from the beginning haue bin accuſtomed to ſuch ſottiſh opinions, as would not permit them to imitate vs in our diuine Religion, and conformable to reaſon: and yet ſeeing many fauour and follow our Religion, they were heereby incited to ſuch hatred, that to derogate from vs, they feared not to falſifie their own ancient records, not conſidering that in ſo doing they were led through a blinde paſſion, to write a-gainſt themſelues. Moreouer, I will prooue all I haue ſpoken, to bee true, by one mans words, whom a little before (being a famous Hiſtoriographer) we haue produced as a witneſſe of our K antiquitie.

Manethon an Egyptian Hiſtoriographer. Manethon therefore, who confeſſeth himſelfe to haue gathered the Egyptian Hiſtory out of their holy writings, hauing by way of a Preface recounted how our predeceſſors came into Egypt with many thouſands, and there conquered the inhabitants, hee afterward confeſſeth that loſing all their poſſeſſions in Egypt, they got the countrey which is now called Iewry, and in it builded a Citie named Ieruſalem, and a Temple; and thus farre hee imitateth ancient Writers.
Manethons fabulous reports of the Egyptian lepers. And then vſurping to himſelfe authority to lie, proteſting that hee will inſert into his Hiſtory certaine reports diuulged amongſt the common people, hee reports things of the Iewes altogether incredible, intending to mixe with our Nation the lepers of the Egyptians, and other ſicke people of other countries, who (as he ſaith) being abominable to the Egyptians, made an eſcape L from thence; affirming alſo that they had a King named Amenophis, which is a fained name, and therefore he durſt not preſume to ſpeake determinately of the time of his raigne: whereas he ſpeaketh exactly of the raigne of all other Kings. Hereupon alſo he addes certaine fables, forgetting himſelfe that he reported the ſhepheards departure out of Egypt to Ieruſalem, to haue bin almoſt fiue hundred and eighteene yeeres before his time: for King Themuſis raigned when they departed out of Egypt, from whom the time that other Kings did raigne, vntill the two brethren, Sethon and Hermeus, accompliſhed the terme of three hundreth foureſcore and thirteene yeeres.
Hee alſo ſaith, that the eldeſt of theſe two, Sethon, was called Egyptus, and the other Hermeus, was called Danaus, whom his brother Sethon expelled, and afterward raigned fifty nine yeeres; and after him Rampſes, his eldeſt ſonne, raigned threeſcore and ſixe yeeres. Hauing therefore M confeſſed, our anceſtors to haue departed out of Egypt ſo many yeeres before, now laſtly hee addeth, that Amenophis was their King, who was a contemplator of the gods, as Orus their King before him was, and that one Amenophis a Prieſt, the ſonne of Papius, did in all things moſt excellently accompliſh his deſire: which prieſt ſeemed to participate of ſome diuine nature, for he exceld in wiſedom, and could foretell things to come, and that he gaue the King his ſurname, that he might alſo ſee the gods, if ſo be he would endeuour to cleanſe the countrey from lepers,

and

A and other vncleane people. Wherat the King reioycing, gathered together all the impotent people of his land, amounting to the number of 80000. and ſent them, and other Egyptians appointed to this worke, into the Eaſt part of Nilus, there to hew and ſquare ſtones. And that amongſt them there were alſo certaine learned Prieſts infected with leproſie, alſo that this diuine Prieſt, Amenophis, greatly feared, leſt the indignation of the gods would fal vpon the King and himſelfe (who had perſwaded and counſelled the King to do violence to the foreſaid lepers) likewiſe that he ſaid, that becauſe he vſed the helpe of vncleane perſons, they ſhould obtaine dominion ouer Egypt for 13. yeeres; yet durſt he not preſume to ſignifie this to the King, but he kild himſelfe, leauing this written in a booke, where men might finde it: and the King, hauing notice hereof, fell
B into great ſorrow and heauineſſe. This done, he ſpeaks as followeth: So the King, being requeſted for their quietnes and defence to aſſigne them a city to inhabit, appointed vnto them a deſolate place called Auaris, which had beene the ſhepheards city (this city the ancient Diuines call Triphonis) but they, hauing got the poſſeſſion of this place fit for rebellion, made choice of one of the Prieſts of Heliopolis to be their Captaine, whoſe name was Oſarſiphus, and bound themſelues with an oath to obey him in all things: and he preſently made a law, that they ſhould neither worſhip the gods of the Egyptians, nor that they ſhould abſtaine from thoſe beaſts which the Egyptians count holy, and that they ſhould marry with none but ſuch as they iudged to be their friends.

Oſarſiphus, Captaine of Auaris.

Hauing ordained this and many things elſe contrary to the Egyptians religion, he com-
C manded them with great labour to enuiron their city with a wall, and to make preparation to war againſt King Amenophis: and he himſelfe making choice of ſome Prieſts, and a few other vncleane perſons, ſent to Ieruſalem to the ſhepheards which were driuen out of Egypt by King Themuſis, declaring vnto them their owne and their fellowes iniuries, and requeſted them to leuie an army to fight with them againſt Egypt, promiſing them free entrance into Auaris, the countrey where their fore-fathers inhabited, and that hee would furniſh them with all neceſſaries; telling them that they ſhould now fight in ſo happy a time, as that without all doubt they might conquer the countrey. The ſhepheards heereat reioycing, all of them armed themſelues, to the number of two hundreth thouſand, and leauing their city, they came to Auaris. But Amenophis, King of Egypt, hearing of their inuaſion, and remembring what Amenophis, the ſon of the Prieſt Pa-
D pius, had left in writing, was in great feare; and preſently aſſembling together the people of Egypt, and conſulting with the Princes of his countrey, he ſent all holy beaſts, and all that the Prieſts eſteemed, before him, giuing the Prieſts eſpeciall charge to hide their idols: and he commended his ſonne Sethones (who alſo by his father Rampſes was called Rhameſſes) being but fiue yeers old, vnto the cuſtody of a friend of his: and then accompanied with 300, fighting men, he met his enemies, but would not fight with them, fearing leſt he ſhould fight againſt the pleaſure of the gods; and ſo he retired himſelfe to Memphis: and taking Apis and the reſt of the Egyptian gods, he, with all his troups of Egyptians, tooke ſhip, and fled into Ethiopia. For the King of Ethiopia vpon courteſie obeyed him, and for this cauſe he entertained him and his followers, and prouided all neceſſaries for them, for that fatall thirteene yeeres baniſhment, and this was
E done in Ethiopia. In the meane time, the inhabitants of Ieruſalem came down into the country with the vncleane Egyptians, and did ſo tyrannize ouer the inhabitants, that all their beholders iudged their victory to be full of cruelty: for not content to fire the cities and townes, and to commit all maner of ſacriledge, and to deſtroy the Idols of the gods, they did alſo moſt cruelly teare in pieces the ſacred Beaſts, and forced the Prieſts and Prophets to lay violent hands vpon them, and kill them: after which deed they draue them out of the country naked. It is therefore reported, that a Heliopolitan Prieſt, Oſarſiphus by name, made lawes for them, and ſtatutes to gouerne them. This Prieſt was called Oſarſiphus, taking his name from the god of Heliopolis, called Oſiris, who, being now thus conuerſant with this people, changed his name, and called himſelfe Moſes.

The warre of the baniſhed againſt the Egyptians.

The Egyptian King fled into Ethiopia, and was by the Ethiopian king courteouſly entertained.

Oſarſiphus was afterwards cald Moſes.

F Thus the Egyptians report of the Iewes, and many things elſe, which for breuity ſake I omit. Manethon furthermore writeth, that afterward Amenophis the King came with a great power out of Ethiopia, and his ſon Rampſes with him accompanied with a great army; and that ioyning battell with the ſhepheards and polluted perſons, he gaue them an ouerthrow, and purſued them vnto the borders of Syria. And this is Manethons report: but for as much as he writeth old wiues tales, dotages and lies, I will by manifeſt reaſon conuince him; firſt, diſtinguiſhing that whereof I am to ſpeake hereafter. He of his owne accord granteth and confeſſeth, that our anceſtors at firſt first were not Egyptians,but ſtrangers that came thither from another place,and conquered the G country,and againe departed from thence.I will now out of his own writings endeauor to ſhew, that the weak people of Egypt were not mixed with vs,and that Moſes,who indeed was our conductor out of Egypt,and liued many ages before, was no leper. He therefore firſt of all ſetteth downe a ridiculous cauſe of this fore-mentioned faction, which was, that King Amenophis was deſirous to ſee the gods. Which gods trow yee? he could already ſee the Oxe, the Goat, the Crocodile and the Munky,but the God of heauen how could he ſee? And why had Amenophis this deſire? Forſooth, becauſe a certain King one of his predeceſſors had ſeen them;he therefore knowing by him what things they were, and how he came to the ſight of them, needed no new deuice to accompliſh his deſire: but perhaps the foreſaid prophet was a man of great wiſedome, H by whom the King had confidence to attaine his deſire:but if ſo he had bin,how chanceth it that he was ſo vnwiſe he could not perceiue,that it was an impoſſible thing to ſatisfie the Kings de-ſire?for that which he promiſed was not brought to paſſe. Or what reaſon moued him to thinke that the gods were inuiſible, becauſe of lepers and weake people? The gods are offended with mens impieties,not with the defects of their bodies. And how was it poſſible that at one inſtant ſo many thouſand lepers and infirme perſons ſhould be gathered together? or wherein did not the King obey the Prophet? He commanded that the lepers and infirme perſons ſhould be exiled the country, and the King did not baniſh them the country, but ſent them to hew ſtones, as though he had needed workmen, and not purpoſed to cleanſe the countrey from lepers. Laſtly, he ſaith,that the Prophet foreſeeing that Egypt was to ſuffer,and fearing the wrath of the gods, killed himſelfe, and left his minde in a booke written vnto the King. How chanced it then that the Prophet did not at firſt foreſee his owne death,and ſo oppoſe himſelfe to the Kings deſire to ſee the gods? or wherefore did he feare ſuch calamities as were not to fall in his life? or what great miſery hanged ouer his head, which might worthily cauſe him to kill himſelfe to preuent it? But let vs heare that which followeth, more ſottiſh then all the reſt.

Manethons words repeated.

The King(quoth he) hearing this, and ſtricken with feare,did not for all this expell thoſe lepers he ought to haue exiled, but at their requeſt gaue them (as he ſaith) a City,wherein before-time the Shepheards did inhabit, called Auaris;whereinto they being come, they made a Prieſt of Heliopolis their Prince, who deuiſed lawes for them: commanding them neither to adore K
the gods, nor to abſtaine from offering violence to ſuch beaſts as amongſt the Egyptians are ſa-cred,but that they ſhould kill and ſpoile all things,that they ſhould marry with none but ſuch as were their confederates,that he bound the people with an oath to keep thoſe lawes,and that they fortified Auaris to fight againſt the King. Adding moreouer,that he ſent to Ieruſalem for help, promiſing to yeeld Auaris vnto them, being a place ſometime poſſeſſed by their anceſtors, and that they from that place leading their forces, might eaſily ſubdue all Egypt: he then ſaith, that the Egyptian King, Amenophis,came againſt them with 300000. and yet for that he would not ſtriue againſt the decree of the gods, he fled into Ethiopia, and carried with him Apis and other holy beaſts,and that the inhabitants of Ieruſalem comming downe, inuaded the land, fired the townes and cities,ſlew their Nobles,vſed all ſorts of cruelty poſſible, and that the Prieſts name, L who made lawes and ſtatutes for them to liue vnder,was one of Heliopolis, Oſarſiphus by name; deriuing the ſame from Oſiris, the god of Heliopolis: and that this man, changing his name,was afterward called Moſes.

Moreouer, that Amenophis,hauing liued in baniſhment thirty yeeres,came with a ſtrong power out of Ethiopia; and fighting with the ſhepheards and polluted, he ſlew many of them, and put the reſt to flight,purſuing them vnto the borders of Syria. Manethon remembreth not, that here againe he telleth a very vnskilfull tale: for although the lepers and impotent perſons were offended with the King,for appointing them to hew ſtones; yet it is to be thought, that they re-ceiuing their owne deſire at the Kings hands,to wit,a City to dwell in, that now they againe became the Kings well-willers. Suppoſing alſo their hatred ſtil continued towards him,they rather M ſhould haue attempted reuenge by treaſon againſt him, then towards all their nation, wherein they had many deare friends and alliance. And although they had purpoſed to war againſt theſe men, yet would they not haue been ſo impious as to haue rebelled againſt the gods, and to haue violated the lawes wherein they were brought vp.

A confutation of Manethons words alleaged.

We haue therefore cauſe to thanke Manethon, in that he cleareth vs, and affirmeth his owne countrimen(yea a Prieſt) to be authors of this impiety,and that by oath they bound themſelues ſo to do. But is it not againſt all reaſon, that neither any of their countrimen nor kinſmen rebelled

led with them,but that the poore diſtreſſed people were glad to ſend to Ieruſalem for ſuccour? But what ſociety of friendſhip had they with the people of Ieruſalem,of whom they came to demand help? Why? they were more their enemies then the reſt of their countrimen, and were all of quite different maners from vs. They of Ieruſalem (as he ſaith) preſently did as they were willed to doe,in hope that,according as they were promiſed, they might ſubdue Egypt. Were they ignorant of that countrey out of which they had been driuen by force? Had they liued in pouerty or miſery, perhaps they might haue bin induced to haue done it: but ſeeing they inhabited a fortunate and rich city,and poſſeſſed a goodly fertile ſoile farre better then Egypt, what might mooue them thereto? What reaſon had they,at the requeſt of their ancient enemies (and they alſo ſo diſeaſed, as they of Ieruſalem could not abide their owne friends among them that had the like diſeaſes) to thruſt themſelues into danger? they could not fore-know the Kings intent to flee; as for Manethon himſelfe ſaith,he met them at Peluſia with 300000. men. And this they that went to war well knew. But what reaſon had they to coniecture that the Kings minde would change,and he flee? Then he ſaith,the army of Ieruſalem getting the granaries of Egypt into their hands,did much harme: and this he vpbraideth them withall,as who ſhould ſay,they were not requeſted to come as enemies? or as though theſe matters be to be caſt in ſouldiers teeths,that are ſtrangers and ſent for from out of another country; when as the Egyptians themſelues before their comming had done the like, and bound themſelues with an oath to performe the ſame. But ſhort time after, Amenophis fought with his enemies, and got the victory of them, and put them to flight, and purſued them vnto the borders of Syria. As though that Egypt were a country ſo eaſily to be won by any man, that at any place or part thereof inuadeth it? and that the ſouldiers of Ieruſalem,hauing now by the lawes of armes poſſeſſed that, and knowing Amenophis to be yet aliue,would not haue fortified that part of the countrey,whereby he might haue inuaded them,hauing all opportunity to doe it? or at leaſt they would haue gotten more helpe from one place or another. Amenophis,as he ſaith,purſued them euen vnto Syria,thorow the ſandy and dry places: as though it were eaſie for an army that had nothing elſe to do, but to march on forward,to paſſe leaſurely thorow them. To conclude therefore, our nation neither came of the Egyptians,as Manethon confeſſeth, neither was it mingled with the diſeaſed of that country: for it is probable,that many of thoſe ſick people periſhed in the ſtone workes,many in the great fight and battell,and the reſt of them in the flight. It now remaineth that I refute that which he ſpeaks of Moſes.

The Epilogue that the Iewes came not of the Egyptians

The Egyptians do all agree that this man was a diuine perſon,and one to be admired,but they commit great impiety in labouring to challenge him for their countriman, ſaying that he was a Prieſt of Heliopolis, baniſhed with the reſt for leproſie. For he is recorded to haue liued fiue hundreth and eighteene yeeres before this time, and to haue guided our anceſtors out of Egypt, into that countrey wherein we now inhabit;and his owne words teſtifie his body to haue beene cleane from that diſeaſe of leproſie: for he commandeth all lepers to be expelled out of the townes and villages, and to liue apart by themſelues, alſo to be clothed in ſome torne garment, and that whoſoeuer toucheth them, or commeth vnder the ſame roofe with them, is to be accounted an vncleane perſon. And if ſo be a leper happen to be cured of that diſeaſe,he appointed certaine purifications, cleanſings, and baths of fortunate waters, and all his haire ſhould be ſhaued off; and that then after many and ſundry ſacrifices, he ſhould be admitted into the holy city. But contrariwiſe, had he beene vrged with that misfortune and calamity himſelfe, he would ſurely haue beene more prouident, and more mercifull to ſuch as ſhould haue been afflicted with that diſeaſe.

An anſwer to Manethons ſlanders touching Moſes.

Moſes was not a leper.

He did not onely make theſe ſeuere lawes againſt lepers, but he alſo interdicted all that wanted any ioynt or parcell of the body,from being Prieſts, or exerciſing any office at the Altar: yea he alſo appointed, that if any Prieſt ſhould haue any of theſe defects betide him after he was a Prieſt, that then he ſhould be depriued of the dignity. How can it then be probable, that to his owne preiudice and diſcredit he would haue enacted ſuch lawes? Alſo the changing of his name is incredible: for he was called (as he ſaith) Oſarſiph, which nothing agreeth with the tranſmutation of his name,but his true name betokeneth that Moſes was ſaued from the water. For, Moy in the Egyptian tongue ſignifieth water. But I haue now ſufficiently,as I think,declared how Manethon, whileſt he followed the ancient writers, did not much erre, but when he fell to old wiues tales, he then either abſurdly fained them of his owne head,or elſe for hatred he bare to our nation, beleeued them. I now think it not amiſſe to examine a little the words of Chæremon, who profeſſing

Moſes tooke his name of Moy,which in the Egyptian tongue ſignifieth water.

Against Chæremon the hiſtoriographer feſſing himſelfe to write the Egyptian hiſtory, maketh mention of the ſame King Amenophis his ſonne Rhameſſes, as Manethon doth, and he reporteth that Iſis appeared to Amenophis in his ſleepe, checking him for that her Temple was deſtroyed, and that Phiritiphantes, a holy Scribe, told the King, that if he would expel all polluted and vncleane perſons out of Egypt, that then he ſhould not be any more terrified with theſe night viſions. Moreouer, that hereupon making ſearch for all ſick and diſeaſed perſons, he baniſht them out of his land, to the number of 250000. and that their Captaines were called Moſes and Ioſeph, holy Scribes, alſo that theſe Egyptian names were ſo, that Moſes was named Tiſithes; and Ioſeph, Peteſephus, and that they came to Peluſium, where they found 380000. left there by Amenophis, whom he would not permit to come into Egypt, alſo that they all entring into a league together, ſuddenly inuaded Egypt, and Amenophis not abiding the brunt fled into Ethiopia, leauing his wife great with childe, who hiding her ſelfe in caues and dens, did bring forth a child whom they cald Meſſenes, who afterward draue the Iewes into Syria, being in number 200000. and this done, he recalled his father Amenophis out of Ethiopia. And thus Chæremon ſaith. G H

Meſſenes, ſon of Amenophis.

But I imagine, that which I haue already ſaid, to be ſufficient to declare the vanity of both theſe Writers. For if that which they report were true, it were vnpoſſible that they ſhould ſo much differ: but they labour to deuiſe lies, and write not any thing agreeable to other mens writings. For Manethon faineth, that the cauſe of the baniſhment of the lepers was the Kings deſire to ſee the gods. And Chæremon ſaith, that it was for that Iſis after appeared vnto him in his ſleep. Manethon alſo ſaith, that Amenophis gaue the King that counſell ſo to cleanſe the countrey; and Chæremon ſaith, that he that counſelled the King was called Phiriphantes: the number alſo of lepers hath very good conſonance I warrant you. Manethon ſaith, they were almoſt fourſcore hundreth. Chæremon ſaith, two hundreth and fifty thouſand. Moreouer, Manethon writeth how that theſe lepers were firſt ſent to a place to hewe ſtones, and afterward came to Auaris to dwell, and that they hauing already begun wars in Egypt, that then they ſent for help from Ieruſalem. And Chæremon ſaith, that they hauing left Egypt, found at Peluſia two hundreth and fourſcore thouſand men, whom Amenophis had kept there; with whom they ioyning againe, returned and inuaded Egypt, and then Amenophis fled into Ethiopia: and which is worth the noting, hee ſetteth not downe what countrimen, or to what purpoſe this great army was, whether Egyptians or ſtrangers, neither doth he ſhew any reaſon why the King would not carry them into Egypt. Moreouer, Chæremon faineth a dreame of the lepers and Iſis, and reporteth that Ioſeph together with Moſes was expelled, whereas Ioſeph liued foure ages before Moſes, euery age containing at leaſt a hundreth and ſeuenty yeers. Rhameſſes alſo, Amenophis ſonne, according to Manethons hiſtory, being a young man fled into Ethiopia, and was baniſhed with his father, and afterwards aſſiſted him in the wars: whereas Chæremon reporteth that he was borne in a caue after his fathers departure, and that hee getting the victory did driue the Iewes into Syria, who were in number two thouſand. O felicity in lying! for he neither told what nation thoſe three hundred and foureſcore thouſand were, nor yet how a hundreth and foureſcore thouſand of them periſhed, neither were they ſlaine in the fight, or fled vnto Rhameſſes: and which is moſt to be admired, one cannot gather out of his words whom he calleth Iewes, or whether he attribute this name vnto the 250000. lepers, or vnto the three hundreth and fourſcore thouſand which were at Peluſium. I K L

The differẽce between Manethons and Chæremons hiſtory.

But it is folly to oppoſe my ſelfe againſt them who haue ſufficiently contradicted themſelues: for had other men controlled their writings, they had been the more to be borne withall. I will adde Lyſimachus vnto the two former, who hath the ſame lie that they haue, yet farre more abſurd a fiction then theirs. For he ſaith, that at ſuch time as Bocchoris raigned in Egypt, the people of the Iewes being ſcabbed and infected with leproſie, fled into the temples to beg maintenance, and that ſo many men were with this diſeaſe infected, that a dearth and ſcarcity did fall vpon Egypt. Likewiſe that King Bocchoris went vnto Ammon to know of the Oracle what cauſed the dearth, and that anſwer was made, that if he would expell all lepers and vncleane perſons from out of the temples into the deſart, that then the famine would ceaſe, and that he ſhould drowne theſe lepers, as if the ſunne diſdained that they ſhould liue, and that then hee ſhould purifie the Temples, and ſo the earth would againe yeeld fruit: alſo that Bocchoris hauing this anſwer from the Oracle, he called together the Prieſts and ſacrificers, and hauing gathered lepers and vncleane people together, he deliuered them to ſouldiers to be conducted into the deſart, and that then they ſhould be lapt in lead, and caſt into the ſea. Moreouer, they being drowned M

Lyſimachus is reproued for lying.

According to Lyſimachus, the ſcabbed and leprous Iewes were to be conueied into the wildernes, & caſt into the ſea.

A drowned,other diſeaſed people were gathered together,and were carried into the wilderneſſe to be deſtroyed, and that they taking counſell one of another what to doe,the night following they made great fires and lights,wherwith they terrified and draue away the ſouldiers that kept them, and that they faſted the day following, requeſting God to be mercifull vnto them, and that the next day, one Moſes counſelled them to goe all one way, as thicke together as they could, till ſuch time as they came to ſome place inhabited, and that he then commanded them neuer hereafter to be friendly to any man, but alwaies rather to giue bad counſell then good, and to deſtroy all Temples,and Altars of the gods they came by: vnto which counſell they all agreeing, iournyed together thorow the wilderneſſe, and after much ſorrow came to places inhabited; v-

B ſing men by whom they paſt iniuriouſly,firing temples and robbing them : at laſt in this maner, they came vnto that place which they now call Iudæa; and there building a City, they began to dwell, and of this fact called the City Hieroſyla, and ſhortly after growing more potent, they for auoiding ſhame,changed the name thereof, and called it Ieruſalem, and themſelues the inhabitants of Ieruſalem.

When the Iewes got Iudea, and built Ieruſalem.

This fellow found not that King,which the two former ſpeake of, but he ioyned a more new name,and leauing the dreame and the Prophet, he goeth to Ammon, to know an anſwer of the old,touching the ſcabbed and lepers: for he ſaith, that a multitude was gathered together at the Temples : but he leaueth it vncertaine, whether the Iewes onely were infected with this diſeaſe: for he ſaith the people of the Iewes: which people,whether they were ſtrangers or ſuch as were

C borne in that country,why doſt thou call them Iewes,when they were Ægyptians? If they were ſtrangers, why doſt thou not tell of whence they were? Or how came it to paſſe that the King hauing drowned ſo many of them in the ſea,and left the reſt in the wilderneſſe,that ſtill ſo many ſhould be left? Or how did they paſſe the wilderneſſe, and get the countrey wee now inhabit, and built a City and a Temple famous thorow all parts of the world? Thou ſhouldeſt not onely haue told the name of our law-maker,but alſo what countriman he was,and of what parents, and what moued him in his iourney to make ſuch lawes againſt the gods,and againſt men. For if they were Ægyptians, they would not ſo eaſily haue forgotten the religion wherein they were brought vp:or of what place elſe ſoeuer they were,they had ſome lawes or other,which they had been accuſtomed to keep. If they had vowed to haue borne no good will vnto them by whom

D they were driuen out of their countrey, they had had ſome iuſt occaſion ſo to doe. But to vndertake war againſt all the world, and depriue themſelues from all friendſhip and helpe of mortall men, doth not ſhew their ſottiſhneſſe,but the fooliſhneſſe of him,who doth thus belie him. Who moſt impudently affirmeth,that their City tooke the name of Church-ſpoyling, and afterward changed it. For what cauſe forſooth did they change the name thereof? marry for that the former name was ignominious to their poſterity. But the Gentleman vnderſtood not, that Ieruſalem ſignifieth otherwiſe in our language, then it doth in the Greeke. And therefore what ſhould I ſtand to inueigh againſt a lie ſo impudently told?

Lyſinius his opinion confuted.

Nothing is to be ſaid againſt an impudent lye.

But my booke hath now beene long enough, making a new beginning: and therefore I will endeuour to finiſh the

E reſidue of this worke.

F

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE ANTIQVITY OF THE IEWES, WRITTEN BY FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS, AGAINST APION OF ALEXANDRIA, AND DEDICATED TO EPAPHRODITVS.

THrice Honoured and beloued Epaphroditus, I haue in my former bookes ſo farre forth as I was warranted by truth, both proteſted and approued the Antiquity of our nation, out of the writings of the Phœnicians, Chaldees and Egyptians: and for the further confirmation thereof, I haue produced the teſtimony of diuers Greek Authors. Furthermore, I haue oppoſed my ſelfe againſt Manethon and Cheremon, and diuers others. At this time likewiſe I will vndertake to contradict all the reſt of thoſe writers, that haue publiſhed any thing againſt vs; for in reſpect of Apion, who pretendeth himſelfe to be learned, I grow halfe ſuſpicious, whether it be a matter anſwerable to my deſcretion and iudgement, to vouchſafe him any reply at all. For as touching the one part of that which he hath written, it ſeemeth to be one and the ſame, with that which the reſt haue written: and as touching the other, it is very cold and barren. The greater part thereof is farſed with follies and detractions, and betrayeth his ignorance, approuing him to be a man both looſe in condition, and turbulent in his life. And for as much as diuers men are ſo disfurniſhed of iudgement, that they rather ſuffer themſelues to be won by theſe follies, then to be wearied and wrought by that which is written with better conſideration, vainly doating on detractions, and growing diſcontent to giue eare to other mens well deſerued praiſes; I haue thought it neceſſary to examine ſuch a mans labours, the rather, for that he hath written againſt vs, as if he intended to accuſe vs before a Tribunall, and conuict vs by a publike triall. For I ſee that it is an ordinary courſe for the moſt part of men, to hug and take hearty pleaſure, when as he that beginneth to blame another man, is himſelfe conuicted and found guilty of thoſe defaults, which he imputeth and obiecteth againſt another.

Apion wrote ſomething very coldly.

Truely it is no eaſie matter to lay open the ambiguous and doubtfull ſpeeches which Apion vſeth, neither to vnderſtand perfectly what he intendeth to expreſſe. But like a man that is grieuouſly diſtracted and confuſed in his fooliſh lying, he groweth almoſt to that point, to recapitulate that, which hath beene heretofore ſet out, and ſearcht for, as touching the departure of our forefathers out of Ægypt: and afterwards he falleth to accuſe the Iewes that inhabited Alexandria: and thirdly, he intermixeth his blamefull blaſphemies, againſt the ceremonies accuſtomed in our Temple, and depraueth our lawes and ordinances likewiſe. Now, that our predeceſſors haue not taken their originall out of Ægypt, neither haue beene driuen from thence for any infirmity or deformity of their bodies, or for any wound, vlcer, or pollution; I ſupooſe that I haue not onely ſufficiently approued the ſame, but alſo produced far more then was requiſite. I will therefore briefly report and repeat that which Apion alleadgeth: For in the third booke of his Egyptian hiſtory, he writ thus: Moſes, as I haue heard it from moſt ancient Egyptians, was borne at Heliopolis, who being inſtructed in the faſhions of his countrey, conuerted ſuch prayers which were wont to be ſaid in open places and abroad, and cauſed them to be practiſed and accuſtomed in priuate Cloyſters, ſuch as were within the City, and ordained that in praying they ſhould turne themſelues towards the riſing Sunne. For ſuch is the ſituation of the Citie Heliopolis, and in ſtead of Obeliſques or Pyramides, he erected certaine pillars, vnder which there were certaine ingrauen Baſons, on which the ſhadow hapning to fall (the place wherein they ſtood being diſcouered and in open ayre) they obſerued the ſame courſe

Apion concerning Moſes and the Iewes

that.

A that the Sunne doth in the firmament. See here what eloquence this learned man vſed.

Apions fiction concerning the Temple and Moſes is refuted.

Now, this lye of his needeth no words to refute it, ſeeing it is clearly refelled by the effects. For when Moſes firſt built that Tabernacle in honour of God, hee had no ſuch intent, nor faſhioned any ſuch forme, neither ordained his ſucceſſors to doe the like: and after this when as Salomon builded the Temple in Ieruſalem, he neuer thought of any ſuch curioſity as Apion forgeth. He ſaith that he hath beene informed by thoſe of antiquity, that Moſes was a Heliopolitan, for you muſt vnderſtand that Apion himſelfe was young, and beleeued the relation of the aged ſort of his acquaintance which conuerſed familiarly with him: yet cannot this learned Grammarian iuſtifie where Homer was borne, neither from what countrey Pythagoras came, although

B in reſpect, they liued but yeſterday: and as touching Moſes, who liued ſo many ages, and ſo great a number of yeeres before them, he decideth the matter ſo eaſily, and giueth credit to the reports of antiquity ſo ſlightly, that it appeareth moſt manifeſtly that he is but a lyer. As touching the time wherein hee ſaith that Moſes led away the blinde, leprous, and lame: this diligent Author accordeth very willingly with that which he himſelfe hath ſaid. For Manethon ſaith, that the Iewes departed out of Egypt about the raigne of Tethmoſis, three hundreth ninety ſix yeers before Danaus fled out of Greece. Lyſimachus, he ſaith, that this thing hapned during King Boccho-ris time, that is to ſay, one thouſand and ſeuen hundreth yeeres before that time; Molon alſo and ſome others haue alledged their opinions. But Apion, who pretendeth to be a man of more credit then the reſt, hath preciſely and exactly ſet downe the time, auerring that our departure was a-

C bout the ſeuenty Olympiade: nay more, in the firſt yeere thereof, wherein as he ſaith, Carthage was builded by the Phœnicians. Now hath he onely and purpoſely made mention of Carthage in this place; ſuppoſing it to be an infallible argument of the truth of his allegation: yet conceiteth he not, that he maketh a rod for his owne taile, and draweth an argument againſt himſelfe, by which himſelfe may be conuinced. For if we may giue credit to the Phœnician Chroniclers as touching this Colonie, it appeareth by them that King Hiram liued more then one hundreth and fifty yeeres before the foundation of Carthage. The truth whereof I haue heretofore approoued out of the words of the Phœnicians, who report that Hiram was Salomons friend, who builded the Temple in Ieruſalem: and that he furniſhed him with much timber and other matter toward the finiſhing of that building. Now Salomon builded the Temple ſix hundreth and

D twelue yeeres after the departure of the Iſraelites out of Egypt. And after he had inconſiderately reckoned the number of thoſe which were driuen out of Egypt in like manner as Lyſimachus had done, namely, of one hundreth and ten thouſand men, he yeelded a moſt admirable reaſon, and ſuch as may be eaſily beleeued: from whence hee pretendeth that the name of Sabbath was deriued. For (ſaith he) after they had trauelled for the ſpace of ſix daies, there grew certaine inflamations in their groines, by reaſon whereof they reſted on the ſeuenth day, being ſafely arriued in the countrey which at this day is called Iudæa, becauſe the Egyptians call Sabatoſis an Vlcer that groweth about the groine.

The Egyptians doe call a diſeaſe about the priuy parts, Sabatoſis.

Who can otherwiſe chuſe but laugh at this foppery? or contrariwiſe, who would not hate ſuch an impudent cuſtome in writing and coyning lies? For he reporteth as farre as a man may

E coniecture by his writings, that all the Iewes who were to the number of one hundred and ten thouſand perſons, had theſe Vlcers in their ſecrets. Now had all of them beene hault, lame, blinde, and ſickly as Apion reporteth, they could not haue iournied one day: but ſince they trauelled thorow the Deſart, and vanquiſhed all armies that reſiſted them, it is no likely matter that all of them were ſicke of a diſeaſe in their priuy parts euery ſeuenth day: neither is it naturally poſſible, that ſuch a diſeaſe ſhould befall ſo many thouſand men in their iourney, and that they euery day ſhould trauell a certaine ſpace and a limited march, neither ſtandeth it with any probability, but rather a manifeſt abſurdity, that any ſuch thing ſhould befall them: but this admirable Apion ſayth, that they arriued in Iudæa within the ſpace of ſix dayes.

Apions fiction of the ſix daies iourney is confuted.

Againe, he writeth that Moſes aſcending vp the mount Sinai, which is betwixt Arabia and

F Egypt, hid himſelfe in that place for the ſpace of forty daies, and deſcending from thence, gaue Lawes vnto the Iewes. But how I pray you was it poſſible for him to remaine forty dayes in a Deſart without water? or how could all the Iewes within ſix daies trauell from Egypt, into Iewrie? As for his Grammaticall diuination of the word Sabbath, it ſauoureth too much of impudency, or at leaſt of ignorance: for theſe words Sabbo and Sabbatum doe greatly differ: for Sabatum in the Iewes language, ſignifieth reſt from worke; but Sabbo in the Egyptian tongue, betokeneth a diſeaſe about the priuie parts, as Apion ſaith. See heere what cauilling fictions this Egyptian Apion vſeth concerning Moſes, and our departure out of Egypt; wherein hee counterfeiteth

Apion denies his countrey and origen.

feiteth and coyneth abſurdities vnthought of by any others. Shall we then wonder if he belie our forefathers, who maketh no bones to belie himſelfe? for being borne at Oaſis, a towne in Ægypt, this high vnreputed honour of the Egyptians forſweareth both his Countrey and Nation, and counterfeiting himſelfe to be an Alexandrian, he ratifieth his Nations wickedneſſe. No maruell then though hee terme them Egyptians whom hee hateth and raileth againſt, for if hee had not beene perſwaded that the Ægyptians were wicked baſe people, he would neuer haue denied himſelfe to be their countriman: for ſuch as proudly boaſt of their famous countrey, eſteeme it a credit to beare the denomination thereof, and reprehend ſuch as without iuſt cauſe make themſelues of their Nation. Wherefore the Ægyptians are one of theſe two waies affected towards vs Iewes, for either they claime vs to be their countrimen, as glorying of vs and their countrey; or elſe for that, they and their countrey being infamous, they deſire that we ſhould be partakers of their ignominy. But indeed this worthy Apion ſeemeth ſo to inueigh againſt vs, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians for beſtowing their Cities vpon him: and knowing them to be at variance with the Iewes at Alexandria, hee as it were caſteth a bone betweene them, and raileth not onely on the Iewes of that Citie, but on all whereſoeuer: but he belieth both of them moſt impudently. But let vs examine thoſe hainous and enormous matters, and (as hee ſaith) ſuch as are not to be ſuffered, of which he accuſeth the Alexandrian Iewes. Comming (quoth hee) out of Syria, they ſeated themſelues neere the Sea-coaſt, where there was no Hauen neere vnto the ſurges of the water. G H

Apion raileth againſt the Iewes, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians.

The ſea-coaſt of Alexandria.

Now if this place which they inhabited were ignominious, yet it followeth not that the Iewes owne countrey was ſo alſo: yea herein Apion raileth againſt Alexandria, which he maketh his owne countrey: for the ſea-coaſt is part of Alexandria, and as all men iudge the beſt place thereof to dwell in. Now if the Iewes by force of armes ſo vanquiſhed this place, that they could neuer ſince be driuen out of it: it is no diſcredit to them, but rather an argument of their valour. But Alexander gaue them that place to inhabit, and the Macedonians did allot them as great priuiledges as the Alexandrians had. I know not what Apion would haue ſaid, if the Iewes had dwelt about Necropolis, and not about the Kings ſeat: their Tribes being euen at this time called Macedonians. If therefore Apion haue read the Epiſtles of King Alexander, and Ptolomæus Lagus, or others their ſucceſſors Kings of Egypt, or ſeene the pillers that are erected in Alexandria, containing the priuiledges that Cæſar the great granted vnto the Iewes; if I ſay hee knew of theſe, and yet did preſume to write the contrary, then hee was a bad fellow: but if hee was ignorant hereof, he was then an vnlearned perſon. The like ignorance alſo diſcouereth he, where he wonders that the Iewes that were in Alexandria were called Alexandrians. For all that are one Colonie, though very different people, yet doe they all beare the name of their founder: and that I may ſhun prolixity, the Iewes of Antioch are called Antiochians; for Seleucus the founder made them alſo Citizens: the like may be alſo ſaid of the Iewes of Epheſus, and at the other Ionia, who by the Kings gifts enioy the ſame priuiledges with the reſt of the Citizens. The Romans alſo of their clemency haue granted the name of their Nation, which is no ſmall gift, not only to priuate perſons, but to great Nations in generall. To be ſhort, the ancient Spaniards, the Tyrrhenes, and Sabines, are called Romans; or if Apion will take away this denomination of the Citie wherein men inhabit, let him ceaſe to call himſelfe an Alexandrian: for he being borne in the heart of Ægypt, can in no wiſe be an Alexandrian, if the priuiledge of the City be taken from him, as he would haue it from vs. And the Lords of the whole world the Romans, haue amongſt all other Nations onely prohibited the Egyptians from hauing the priuiledges of any Citie: and ſo this gallant gentleman being himſelfe incapable of dignity, endeuoureth likewiſe to hinder them from it, who haue true right vnto it. I K L

The liberties and priuiledges granted vnto the Iewes.

Alexander.

For Alexander labouring with all diligence to build that Citie, did not make choyce of vs for want of people to furniſh the ſame withall; but for that he beſtowed the liberty thereof vpon vs as a reward and teſtimony of our vertue and fidelity, endeuouring in deed to honour and credit our Nation thereby: for Hecatæus reporteth that Alexander for the Iewes good ſeruice and fidelitie, beſtowed vpon them the country of Samaria, and freed them from paying tribute for it. 1. Ptolomæus Lagus.

The ſame good affection towards the Iewes of Alexandria, Ptolomæus Lagus continued after him, for hee deliuered into their hands the ſtrong holds of Egypt (for that hee iudged that their valour and fidelity would keep them) and intending to make himſelfe Lord of Cyrene and other places in Lybia, hee ſent certaine Iewes to inhabit the ſame. After him Ptolomæus Philadelphus did not onely releaſe and ſet free all captiues of our Nation in his countrey, but alſo did many times remit their payments of money, and (which was the principall point of all) he deſired to be inſtructed

2. Ptolomæus Philadelphus.

A inſtructed in our lawes and holy Scriptures, and for this cauſe ſent vnto vs, requeſting that we would ſend him ſome learned men to interpret them vnto him: and that this might be performed with more diligence, he committed the care hereof not to any but Demetrius Phalerius, Andreas and Ariſteus, Demetrius being the only mirrour of learning in his age, the other two being Eſquires of his owne body: neither would he haue euer deſired to haue beene inſtructed in our lawes and cuſtomes, if he had deſpiſed vs and had not rather admired vs. But Apion knew that almoſt all the Macedonian Kings his ſucceſſors in order, did peculiarly affect our nation. For Ptolomæus the third which was alſo called Euergetes, conquering Syria by force, did no ſacrifice vnto the gods of Egypt for his victory, but came to Ieruſalem, and there after our maner ſacrifi-
B ced many hoſtes vnto our God, and to him dedicated gifts worthy of ſuch a victory. Ptolomæus alſo ſurnamed Philometor and his wife Cleopatra, committed the rule of his whole kingdome vnto the Iewes, and Onias and Doſitheus both Iewes, were Generals of his army, whoſe credit Apion detracts: whereas he rather ought to haue admired them, and haue thanked them for deliuering Alexandria whereof he maketh himſelfe a citizen.

The 70. Interpreters.

3. Ptolomæus Euergetes.

4. Ptolomæus Philometor.

For when there was a rebellion in Cleopatras kingdome, and all was in perill to be deſtroyed, theſe two men deliuered Alexandria from ciuill warre: But Apion ſaith that after this, Onias came and brought a little army into the City at ſuch time as Termus, the Romane Embaſſadour was there preſent. True it is, and that fact of his was moſt iuſt. For Ptolomæus Phyſcon after the death of his father Ptolomæus Philometor, comming out of Cyrene, endeuoured to expell the Queene
C Cleopatra, and the Kings ſons, to the end that he (contrary to all iuſtice) might poſſeſſe the kingdome: and this was the cauſe why Onias tooke armes againſt him in Cleopatras behalfe, not forſaking his fidelity vnto Kings in the time of neceſſity: yet God himſelfe did manifeſtly witneſſe his iuſtice in this action. For when Ptolomæus Phyſcon preſumed to fight againſt Onias his army, and tooke all the Iewes, their wiues and children that were in the city and bound them, and ſtripping them naked, caſt them before Elephants to be deſtroyed (and to the intent that the Elephants might the rather tread vpon them, made the ſaid beaſts drunken) all which fell out contrary to his expectation: for the Elephants forſaking the Iews which were caſt before them, did fall vpon Ptolomæus his friends that ſtood by, and ſlew many of them; which done, there appeared vnto Ptolomæus a moſt horrible viſion forbidding him to harme the Iewes: and his chiefeſt beſt beloued
D concubine (alſo whom ſome cal Ithaca, other Herene) came vnto him and beſought him to abſtain from ſuch impiety: whereupon he being ſorry, did penance for that he had already committed, and that which he thought to commit; ſo that the Iewes of Alexandaia celebrate this day in remembrance that vpon it God did manifeſtly deliuer them; yet Apion (who ſpeaketh well of no man) accuſeth the Iewes of impiety for bearing armes againſt Phyſcon, whereas indeed he ought rather to haue commended them for it: But Apion extolleth Cleopatra the laſt Queene of Alexan. dria, onely for that ſhe was vniuſt, and ingratefull vnto vs; when he rather ought to haue reproued her, in whom all impiety and wickednes raigned, both concerning her owne kinred and her husbands who loued her, and alſo generally againſt all the Romans and the Emperours his benefactors, who killed her owne ſiſter Arſinoe in the Temple who had not any wiſe offended her: ſhe
E alſo treacherouſly ſlew her owne brother, and deſtroyed her anceſtors gods and ſepulchers: and receiuing the kingdome from the firſt Cæſars gift, ſhee ingratefully rebelled againſt his ſon and ſucceſſour; and infecting Antonie with her poyſoned drinks and amorous inchantments, ſhee made him rebell againſt his country, and to be vnconſtant to his owne friends, depriuing ſome of Kingly dignity, and compelling others to be inſtruments of her impiety. And what elſe ſhall we ſay of her, who in the battell by ſea forced Antonius her owne husband (who alſo had many children by her) to yeeld himſelfe, the Empire, and army vnto her, and become one of her followers? Laſtly, when Alexandria was taken by Cæſar, ſhe was ſo cruelly minded, that not remembring her owne eſtate, ſhe accounted this her ſafety, if with her owne hand ſhe might kill the Iewes, that ſhe might be cruell and trothleſſe to euery body.

Antonie the husband of Cleopatra.

F Is it not a glory thinke you to vs, that (as Apion reporteth) in the time of dearth and famine, wheat was plentifull in Iury, that it was not ſold by meaſure? But Cleopatra was puniſhed as ſhe deſerued. And we call great Cæſar himſelfe to witnes of our fidelity, and the ſeruice we did him againſt the Ægyptians, the Senate alſo and their decrees, and the writings of Auguſtus Cæſar, wherein our deſerts are teſtified. Theſe letters Apion ought to haue read, and to haue examined all teſtimonies of vs, which were left firſt by Alexander, and then by all the Ptolomees, and what the Senate of Rome decreed, and the mighty Emperours. And if ſo be Germanicus could not get corne to ſuffice all the inhabitants of Alexandria, that was a token of ſcarcity and dearth, and not the Iewes fault. For what all Emperours thought of the Alexandrian Iewes, it is manifeſt enough: for the Iewes want of corne was not onely left vnſupplied, but alſo the want of other Alexandrians. But they haue alwaies kept that wherwith the ancient Princes did put them in truſt, to wit, the keeping of the riuer, and whole countrey, as not being thought vnfit for their purpoſes. But Apion thus vrgeth vs; If (quoth he) the Iewes be citizens; how hap they worſhip not the ſame God, nor haue the ſame religion that the reſt of the Alexandrians haue? To whom I thus anſwer; How hapneth that you Ægyptians do ſo contend and warre againſt one another onely for diuerſity of religion? ſhall we hereupon conclude that you are all Ægyptians, or not all men? becauſe you worſhip and with great diligence nouriſh beaſts againſt nature? yet our nation ſeemeth one and the ſame. If therefore amongſt you Ægyptians ſuch difference of opinions be; why doſt thou ſo maruell of this, that we in a ſtrange place, to wit, at Alexandria, doe conſtantly perſeuer in our firſt religion? But he ſaith that we are the cauſe of all ſedition: which ſuppoſe he ſpeake true of the Iewes of Alexandria, yet are not all Iewes in all places the cauſe of ſedition, for we are knowne to be peaceable amongſt our ſelues. But indeed as euery one may perceiue, the people like Apion himſelfe are authors of ſedition in Alexandria. For whileſt the Greeks and Macedonians held Alexandria, they and we liued peaceably together, and they permitted vs quietly to vſe our owne ſolemnities: but when the number of Egyptians encreaſed, by confuſion of time, ſedition alſo by their meanes encreaſed: but our nation remained vnpermixted. They therefore were authors of thoſe troubles, not hauing the gouernment of the Macedonians, nor the wiſedome of the Greeks; but vſing their Ægyptian manners, and renewing their old hatred againſt vs. And that wherewith all they hit vs in the teeth befalleth them: for moſt of them not hauing the priuiledges of the city themſelues, call vs ſtrangers that haue them. For none of the ancient Kings beſtowed the liberty of the city vpon the Ægyptians, neither haue any of the Emperors of Rome beſtowed the priuiledge. But Alexander himſelfe brought vs into the city, the Kings after him encreaſed more priuiledges, and it hath pleaſed the Roman Emperour to ratifie and confirme them. But Apion detracteth vs for not erecting ſtatues to the Emperors, as though the Emperors knew not hereof, or that they needed Apion to ſpeake for them: whereas he ſhould rather admire the Romans magnanimity, and modeſtie, who compell not their ſubiects to violate their ancient lawes and religion, but content themſelues with ſuch honours as the giuer may with piety and equity giue them. For they account not of forced honours which come of compulſion.

The Greeks and diuers other thinke it not amiſſe to erect ſtatues; for they delight to haue the pictures of their anceſtors, wiues and children, and ſome of their beloued ſeruants alſo: what maruaile then if they accord to yeeld the like honor to Princes and Emperors? But our Law-maker, not as prophecying the Romans power not to be reuerenced: but foreſeeing that it was neither profitable to God nor man, forbade vs to make an Image of any liuing creature, much more of a not liuing God (as we will prooue hereafter.) But he permitted vs to reuerence all good men, with any honour elſe not due to God, and all thoſe we giue vnto the Emperours, and people of Rome, and make our continuall ſacrifice for them; and not onely vpon workie dayes doe this, at the proper coſt of all the Iewes, but vpon ſuch daies as we offer no other ſacrifice, no not for our owne children, we then ſacrifice for the Roman Emperour, yeelding that honour to the Roman Emperour which we doe to none elſe. And let this ſuffice to anſwer that which Apion alledgeth againſt the Iewes of Alexandria: yet can I not but admire at them who gaue him this occaſion, namely Poſſidonius and Apollonius Molon, who accuſe vs for not worſhipping the ſame gods that other doe, although they lie all alike, ſlandering our Temple moſt abſurdly: and yet for all this they doe not beleeue that they herein commit any impiety: whereas it is a moſt ignominious thing for any free-man to lie vpon any occaſion: much more of a Temple famous ouer all the world for ſanctity. For Apion affirmeth that the Iewes in that ſacred Temple placed the head of an Aſſe, and worſhipped it moſt religiouſly. And this (quoth he) was manifeſtly knowne at ſuch time as Antiochus Epiphanes ſpoyled that Temple, who found that Aſſes head being of maſſie gold, and great value. To this firſt ſlander I firſt anſwer, that were that true which he reporteth, yet an Ægyptian ought not to haue ſpoken againſt vs for it: ſeeing that an Aſſe is of no leſſe worth then a Goate, and other brute beaſts that they honour for gods. Was it poſſible that he knew not the contrary of his owne affirmations, by our deeds and Scriptures? For we vſe the ſame lawes that at the firſt we did, and remaine in them without change, and for all all that our City (as others alſo haue) hath by the variable euent of warre, beene vexed and troubled, and that Antiochus ſurnamed the god, and Pompey the great, and Licinius Craſſus, and now laſtly Titus Cæſar haue all vanquiſhed our Temple, yet did they neuer find in it any thing as Apion affirmeth, but ſincere piety, not lawfull for vs to diſcloſe to ſtrangers. And as touching Antiochus, many writers of good credit report, that he neuer had any iuſt cauſe to ſpoile our temple, but that hee was drawne vnto this fact for want of money; Not for that he was our enemy, but for that as from his friends and fellowes, he ſought ſupply, and found nothing in that place that was worthy of deriſion: and thus doe Polybius Megapolitanus, Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholas Damaſcene, Timagenes Caſtor the Chronicler, and Apollodorus auow, who all doe witnes, that Antiochus wanting money, brake the league he had with the Iewes, and robd and ſpoiled their Temple being full of gold and ſiluer. Apion ought to haue conſidered this, had he not had an Aſſes heart, and a dogs impudency, which he and his Countrimen worſhip for gods. As for vs, we do neither honour nor reuerence Aſſes, though the Egyptians do their Crocodiles and Aſpes, eſteeming them that are bitten by Aſpes, and deuoured by Crocodiles, to be happy and fit for God.

But we eſteeme thoſe to be Aſſes which all our wiſemen do, to wit, them who beare burdens impoſed vpon them; and if comming into a field they fall to eat, and doe not that which they ought to doe, wee vſe to beat them with many ſtripes, and force them to till the ground, and do other drudgery. But Apion was either the greateſt Aſſe that euer was, in telling a lie; or elſe hauing begunne to doe it, he could not compaſſe his enterprizes, in that hee found not any iuſt cauſe of detraction againſt vs. He addeth another fable of the Greekes detracting vs: to the which I will make only this reply, that it is more commendable and agreeing to piety, and leſſe vncleanneſſe, to paſſe thorow the Temple, then for Prieſts to come and faine impious words and ſpeeches: which they not reſpecting, laboured rather to excuſe the ſacrilegious Kings, then to write the truth of vs and our Temple, endeuouring to currie fauour with Antiochus, and to couer and hide his ſacriledge, vſed againſt our nation, for that he wanted money, beleeuing vs euen in things that are to come. And Apion, as prophecying of the reſt, ſaith that Antiochus found a bed in our Temple, and in it a man lying, and a table ſet before him, furniſhed with all fowles that vſe either ſea or land, and that the man was hereat aſtoniſhed: And that ſo ſoone as Antiochus came into the Temple, he adored him as though he hoped for great helpe from the king, falling downe at his feet, and with a ſtretched out arme, craning licence to ſpeake: which the king granting, and willing him to declare what hee was, and why hee dwelt in the Temple, and the cauſe of his meats before him; the man with ſighes and teares bewailed vnto Antiochus his calamity, ſaying, He was a Grecian: and that trauelling in the country to get his liuing, he was ſuddenly ſeized vpon by certaine out-landiſh men, and brought vnto the Temple, and ſhut vp therein, and that no man might ſee him, and that he was there fed or fatted with all dainties that could be prouided: and that at firſt this dainty fare made him ioyful, but afterward he began to ſuſpect it, and laſtly he was heereat amazed; and then demanding of a Iew that adminiſtred vnto him, for what cauſe he was there kept, hee vnderſtood the Iewes purpoſe, and law not to be reuealed, for the fulfilling whereof hee was there nouriſhed, and that the Iewes were wont to do the like euery yeere vpon a day appointed: and to take a Grecian ſtranger, and feed him a yeere, and then to carry him to a wood, and there to kill him, and ſacrifice him according to their rites and ceremonies, and to taſte and eat of his entrailes: and in the ſacrificing of the Grecian, to ſweare to bee enemies to the Greeks, and the reſidue of the murdered man they caſt into a certaine pit. And that then this Greeke reported vnto Antiochus, that the time allotted vnto him by the Iewes to liue was now almoſt expired, and therefore requeſted, for the reuerence he bare to the Grecian gods, to ſaue his bloud from being ſpilt by the Iewes, and to free him out of that imminent calamity.

Who are accounted Aſſes amongſt the Iewes and otherwiſe men.

Certain Hiſtoriographers endeuor to couer and hide Antiochus his periury and ſacriledge.

That the Iews ought once a yeere to ſacrifice a Grecian

This fable is not only ſtuft full of all tragical cruelty, but alſo mingled with cruel impudency: yet for all this, the firſt deuiſers hereof do not free Antiochus from ſacriledge, as they hoped hereby to doe, who writ it purpoſely to flatter him. For that which they report of the Greek found in a bed, did not moue him to come and ſacke our Temple, he not knowing of it before he came and found it ſo (as they ſay.) Antiochus therefore was moſt impious, and not aſſiſted by Gods fauour in that enterprize, (whatſoeuer theſe lyers mutter) as it is eaſie to learne of the fact of him committed. For we doe not onely differ from the Greekes in religion, but a great deale more from the Egyptians, and other nations: and what nation in the world is there, that ſometime doth not not trauaile thorow our Countrey? Is it then probable that we onely renue that conſpiracy a- G gainſt the Greekes? Or how it is poſſible that ſo many thouſand people as are of our owne nation, ſhould all eate of the entrailes of one man as Apion reporteth? Or why did he not name this man whoſoeuer he was? Or why did not the king carry him with trumpets into his country? ſeeing that in ſo doing he might haue bin eſteemed full of piery, and a great fauorer of the Greeks, & greatly ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the hatred of the Iewes by their aide? But I omit to ſpeake more of this: for vnſenſible people voide of all reaſon, muſt not be reprehended in word, but by deedes: for all men that haue ſeene the building of the Temple, can teſtifie what it was, and the vndefiled purity thereof. For it had foure porches about, and euery one of them by our lawes had ſeuerall keepers: and into the outward porch, all people, yea ſtrangers might enter without H breach of our lawes, women onely excepted that haue their monethly courſe. Into the ſecond porch it was lawfull for onely Iewes to come: and all Iewes might goe into it, and their wiues alſo when they were free frō pollution of their flowers. Into the third porch, they onely of our nation that were purified and ſanctified might come. Into the fourth, might only the Prieſts enter, who were cloathed with Prieſtly Stoles, and into the ſecret part of the Temple might only the high Prieſt come, attired with a Stole proper to him onely: yea we are in all things ſo carefull of piety, that our Prieſts are appointed houres when to enter into the Temple.

The deſcription of the Temple and porches.

For in the morning when the Temple was opened, the Prieſts that were to ſacrifice the hoſtes which were giuen them, entred into the Temple; and at noone againe when it was ſhut; yea it was not lawfull to carry any veſſell into the Temple: but there was onely there an Altar, a I
Table, a Cenſer, and a Candleſticke, as is in our law mentioned, and there is no other ſecret or hidden myſtery done, neither is there in that place any eating, and all the people can teſtifie this which I haue here ſet downe, and our writings doe the like. For notwithſtanding that there are foure rites of Prieſts, and euery Prieſts tribe containeth aboue fiue thouſand men: yet euery one waiteth on certaine appointed dayes in their turne, and their time of waiting being expired, others ſucceede them in ſacrificing; and the day before they are to finiſh their waiting, they deliuer vp vnto their ſucceſſours the keyes of the Temple, and all veſſels belonging thereto, in the full number that they receiued them: and nothing is brought into the Temple, pertaining either to meate or drinke: yea, and are forbidden to be offered at our Altar, thoſe things onely excepted, whereof we make our ſacrifice. What then ſhall we ſay of Apion, who examining nothing K of all theſe, hath raiſed ſuch incredible reports of vs? How ignominious a thing it is for a Grammarian, not to be able to deliuer the truth of a Hiſtory? Well, he knew the piety vſed in our Temple, but he purpoſely omitted it: yet could he remember to tell a fained tale of the ſacrificing of the Greeke, his dainty fare and that hidden food, that all men alſo that would, paſſed thorow our Temple: whereas the moſt noble amongſt our whole nation, are not permitted to come there, except they be Prieſts.

What was in the Temple.

Foure Tribes of Prieſts, and of euery tribe more then fiue thouſand men.

This therefore is great impiety, and a voluntary forged lie, to ſeduce them that will not examine the truth. For they haue attempted to ſlander vs by thoſe impieties before mentioned, not to be ſpoken of. And againe, like one full of all piety, he derideth the vanity of theſe L fables, and reporteth that at ſuch time as the Iewes for a long time together, warred againſt the Idumæans, Zabidus departing out of a City of Idumæa where Apollo was worſhipped, came vnto the Iewes, promiſing them to deliuer vnto them Apollo the Dorians god, and bring him vnto their Temple, if ſo bee that all of them would there aſſemble themſelues together: and that afterwards Zabidus did make a moſt excellent kind of woodden inſtrument, and placed in it three rankes of candles, and put it vpon him, and ſo walked like a ſtarre gliding on the ground (for » that ſhape he reſembled to them that were afarre off from him.) And that the Iewes hereat (ſeeing this ſtrange viſion) admired and were aſtoniſhed; and ſtanding afarre off, they were all ſilent, and how by this ſhift Zabidus eaſily got into their Temple, and tooke away the golden » Aſſes head (for ſo he writeth plainely) and ſo to haue returned ſpeedily to Dora. Wherefore M
» wee may ſay that Apion leadeth an Aſſe, to wit, himſelfe with fooleries and lies; for he nameth » places that are not, and ſetteth downe Cities to himſelfe vnknowne: for Idumæa is a Prouince
» neere vnto vs, and bordering vpon Gara, and there is no City in it called Dora: but in Phœnicia » neere vnto the hill Carmelus, there is a City of that name, yet nothing conſonant to Apions ſlanders, for it is foure dayes iourney from Iudæa.

Another tale deuiſed by Apion of Zabidus.

Dora is a city of Phœnicia and not of Idumæa.

Why therefore doth he ſo raſhly accuſe vs for not worſhipping the ſame gods that other nations doe, ſeeing (as he ſaith) our predeceſſours did ſo eaſily beleeue that Apollo would come vnto them,

A them,and that he walked vpon the earth with ſtarres vpon his backe? Perhaps indeed they had neuer before ſeene a candle or lampe, themſelues hauing ſo many: or it is likely that he walking thus quite thorow our countrey,where ſo many thouſand men are,no one of them all met him? Did he in time of war finde the townes and villages,by which he paſt,without any watchmen? Well, I omit the reſt. The gates of our Temple were threeſcore cubits high, twenty cubits broad, all couered with gold, yea,almoſt all of cleane gold, and theſe gates euery day were ſhut by two hundreth men:and it was too impious a thing to leaue them open. Is it then credible that this candle-bearer could eaſily open them,who alone was iudged to haue the aſſes head? So that now it remaineth doubtfull whether Zabidus did bring backe againe the aſſes head,or elſe Apion B tooke it of him, and brought it againe to our Temple, that there Antiochus might finde it, and ſo Apion might haue another occaſion of lying. He alſo belieth vs concerning the oath which he ſaith we Iewes do take, ſwearing by the God of Heauen and Earth,and Sea, neuer to fauour any ſtranger,and eſpecially the Greeks. This lier might better haue ſaid,not to fauour any ſtranger, and eſpecially the Ægyptians,and ſo his former lies and theſe ſhould haue had better correſpondence with the beginning, if our anceſtors had beene expelled by their predeceſſors out of Ægypt,not for their wickedneſſe,but for their owne calamity. But we are ſo farre from the Greeks, that we ſcarcely euer thinke of them: ſo that no man can ſay that there is any enmity betweene vs and the Greekes. But contrariwiſe, many of them haue embraced our religion, and ſome of them therein perſeuered: others againe haue forſaken it; yet none of them will ſay that he heard C this oath ſpoken of among vs: but it ſhould ſeeme that only Apion heard of it,in that he himſelfe indeed forged it. Truely his wiſedome and great prouidence is worthy to be admired (as ſhall hereafter appeare:) for he, to prooue theſe his lies to be true, ſaith,that it is a certaine teſtimony that the lawes we obſerue are moſt vniuſt, and that we worſhip not God as we ought to doe, in that we were ſubiect to diuers Nations, and our City endured many calamities: Whereas touching themſelues,they are of a City that flouriſheth in abſolute authority,accuſtomed to gouerne from the foundation thereof, and not to ſerue the Romans. In effect, who can reſiſt their valour? Truely no man but Apion would euer haue flouted vs herewith,ſeeing that few Cities ſo flouriſh and raigne ouer other, that they againe at no one time haue beene brought into ſubiection: For many Nations are ſubiect to others: only the Ægyptians are freed from the captiuity of D ſuch as rule Europe and Aſia, for that (as they ſay) the gods fleeing into their countrey,were ſaued by entring into the bodies of beaſts. Yet haue they not indeed had any one dayes liberty ſince the beginning of the world,neither vnder the gouernment of their owne Princes,nor vnder ſtrangers.

The gates of the Temple.

Apions lie concerning the oath is confuted.

Apion vpbraided the Iewes with captiuitie.

I will not ſtand to reckon how often the Perſians haue waſted their City,deſtroied their Temples,and ſlaine their ſuppoſed gods. For it is not decent that I ſhould imitate herein Apions fooliſhneſſe: neither am I calling to memory what befell the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, the laſt of which, are recorded to haue beene moſt valiant, and firſt to haue beene moſt deuoute and religious:neither will I reckon vp thoſe moſt godly Kings,amongſt whom Cræſus was one, who notwithſtanding fell into great calamities. Moreouer, I will not recount how the Caſtle of E Athens was ſet on fire,and the temples of Epheſus and Delphos likewiſe,and many others. There is now one Apion, a new accuſer of the Iewes, who vpbraideth them with their calamities; forgetting quite all miſery that hath befalne his countrimen the Ægyptians: but hee was blinded with the fable of Seſoſtris (whom he ſaith to haue beene King of Ægypt.) We could report and boaſt of our Kings, Dauid and Salomon, who ſubdued many Nations vnto them: but it is not fit heere to ſpeake of them. But Apion was ignorant of that which all the world knoweth, to wit, that the Ægyptians haue ſerued firſt to the Perſians, and afterwards to the Macedonians, and that as bondſlaues: where we remaining in free liberty, raigned ouer all Cities round about vs 120. yeeres, euen vnto the time of Pompey the great; and when all the other Kings were ſubdued by the Romans,onely our Kings for their fidelity and friendſhip towards them, were deare vnto F them. Oh, but this ſticketh vpon Apions ſtomacke, that wee haue not had any famous men of our Nation, who haue inuented arts and ſciences, and beene excellent in wiſedome, ſuch as Socrates, Zeno, Cleanthes, and others, whom he ſetteth downe,were: and which is moſt to be admired, Apion puts himſelfe into the number of theſe famous men: and ſaith,that Alexandria is bleſſed and happy, that hath deſerued to haue ſuch a Citizen as he is: and great reaſon that he himſelfe ſhould teſtifie that of himſelfe, which all men elſe perceiue in him,to wit,that he is an impudent deceitfull fellow, both of corrupt life and manners. So that any Alexandrians had iuſt cauſe cause to be sorry that they euer had any better opinion of him. But that our Nation had men equall at least vnto those whom hee mentioneth, all men know that please to read the booke of our Antiquitie. The rest that his accusation containeth, it is not amisse to let passe without answer, for that it rather impeacheth the Ægyptians, his owne countrimen, then vs: for he doth complaine of vs for sacrificing ordinary beasts, and for abstaining to eate swines flesh, and greatly laughed at Circumcision. Touching the sacrificing of these beasts, wee doe as all Nations else doe: And Apion, inueighing against our sacrificing, sheweth himselfe to bee an Ægyptian; for were he either a Græcian or a Macedonian, hee would not be heerewith offended: for both Greekes and Macedonians doe vow to sacrifice Hecatombes to their gods, and vse Priests in the banquets; and yet for all this, the World is not desolate of liuing creatures, as Apion feareth. G H

Why the Iews doe sacrifice common beasts, and do not eate swines flesh.

But were all men so mad as the Ægyptians, it would indeed bee desolate of men, and filled with cruell beasts, which they (supposing them to be gods) do diligently nourish. If any man should aske of Apion, whom of all the Ægyptians he iudged to be a wiseman and most religious towards their gods, no doubt he would answer that the Priests are. For they say, that their first Kings in the beginning gaue them these two commandements in charge: first, to seek wisedome; and next, to worship the gods: they also are all of them circumcised, and abstaine from swines flesh, and no other Ægyptian sacrificeth with them vnto their gods. Apion therefore was surely blinde, when, in stead of detracting vs, he speaketh ill of them, to gratifie whom, he tooke all this paines. For the Egyptians doe not onely vse those customes which Apion in vs disallow-eth, but also doe teach others to circumcise themselues, as Herodotus reporteth. So that I verily thinke, that Apion was iustly punished for blaspheming his countrey lawes and religion. For being forced to circumcise himselfe to auoid a great disease, he was hereby nothing helped, but for all this, his priuy member rotting, hee in extreme griefe and misery gaue vp the ghost. For wise men ought to perseuere in their countrey lawes in all piety, and not to deride and detract others: but Apion forsooke his owne religion, and slandered and belied ours. And this was Apions end: and heere also should end this booke, but that Apollonius, Molon and Lysimachus, and certaine others, partly for ignorance, partly for madnesse, haue most iniuriously belied our Law-maker Moses, and the Lawes hee made, detracting him as a deceitfull Magician, and then as the Author of all malice and impiety amongst vs: and for such as teach no vertue nor goodnesse at all. I will therefore, as farre as in mee lieth, declare both our conuersation in generall, and in particular: for if my iudgement bee any thing, our lawes are most forcible both to piety, and to all humanity in generall, as also to iustice, paines taking, and contempt of death. I onely request this fauour of the Reader, that he will not with a preiudicate or malicious opinion, peruse these writings: for I doe not write this as a prayse and vaine ostentation of our Nation, but as a iust Apology, refuting the slanderous reports that some haue vsed against vs. I K

The Egyptian Priests circumcised, and eate no swines flesh.

Apions death.

The defence of Moses against Apollonius and Lysimachus.

Apollonius doth not continually inueigh against vs as Apion doth, but onely heere and there; sometime affirming vs to be somewhiles hated both of God and man, sometime to be cowards, other sometimes contrariwise complaining of our Nations boldnesse. Saying moreouer, that we are more sottish then any barbarous Nation: and that therefore wee onely haue had none of our Nation founders of Arts or Sciences, which are profitable for mans life: all which obiections are easily refuted, if we shew the contrary to all these by him reported; both that we haue obeyed our lawes, and liued in all integrity. If therefore I be forced to shew that other Nations haue made contrary lawes, not I, but they are to be blamed, who, comparing ours with them of other nations, affirme ours to be the worse: neither of which can charge vs, either that these lawes which I will briefly set down are not ours, or else that we haue not persisted in them as we ought. Making therefore this beginning, I affirme, that they who haue framed themselues to liue together vnder certaine Rules and Ordinances, and kept them inuiolate, and were the first founders of them, were more to be commended for humanity & vertue, then they who liue vnder no rule nor ordinance at all: and euery Law-maker endeuoureth so to challenge antiquity for their own ordinances, as that they may not be thought to imitate others, but to be themselues the first authors thereof, and guides to direct other mens liues. Which being so, it is the dutie of a good Law-maker to make choice of that which is best, and most conuenient for them, who are to obey their lawes, and to satisfie them as much as may be, in prooving their lawes to be good and right, and both in wealth and woe, calamity and felicity, to remaine in them, neuer changing nor altering them. Wherein Apollonius accuseth the Iewes.

The louers of order and common laws are excellent in meeknesse and vertue.

A them. I therfore auerre that our lawmaker is more ancient then any lawmaker mentioned. For Lycurgus, and Solon, and Seleucus of Locris, and thoſe the Greekes admire, are moderne, of late times in reſpect of him, as it is well knowne. For the Greekes themſelues confeſſe, that in times paſt they wanted the name of law. This Homer can witneſſe, who in his whole works neuer mentioneth this word, law, for the people of thoſe times were not gouerned by lawes, but by indefinite ſentences, and the princes pleaſure, vſing cuſtomes but not written, and altering and changing them alſo as occaſion ſerued.

Moſes more ancient then all other lawmakers. Nomos. This word law is not in Homer.

But our Lawmaker being very ancient (for this is euery way manifeſt, euen by our aduerſaries own confeſſions) ſhewed himſelfe both a good prince and counſeller vnto his people: for ma-

B king lawes to direct and gouerne mens liues, he perſwaded them voluntarily to embrace them, and firmely to perſiſt in them with all wiſedome. And firſt of all let vs conſider the works of his greatneſſe. For he vndertaking the conduct of many thouſand of our forefathers out of Ægypt into our own country, he deliuered them from many calamities, almoſt impoſſible to be auoided: for they being to paſſe thorow a place wherein was no water, and a very ſandy ground, beeing alſo to warre and to keepe their wiues and children, and goods for the variable euent of wars, he in all theſe ſhewed himſelfe a moſt wiſe and prudent counſeller, and a true patron and guide vnto them all: For he made all the multitude ſo to depend vpon him, that he might perſwade them whatſoeuer he pleaſed, and yet in none of all theſe did hee vſurpe any authority ouer them: and in that time and place wherein all men of authority aſſume power vnto themſelues, & vſe tyran-

And for this cauſe he rightly deemed God to be his captaine and counſeller: and firſt examining himſelfe, and finding that all the lawes he had ſet down were agreeable to the will and pleaſure of God, the chiefeſt care he now had was how to perſwade his people the ſame, which he himſelfe now knew: for they who direct their liues according to the will of God, auoid all ſinne as our lawmaker did, being neither Magician nor deceiuer as his enemies iniuriouſly report, but ſuch a one as the Greekes do boaſt Minos and others after him to haue beene: for ſome of them affirmed their lawes to be made by

Now who of all the lawmakers made the beſt law, and who did moſt rightly thinke of God, he that compareth all their lawes together may eaſily know; for now occaſion is offered to ſpeake of them: there are therefore an infinite company of nations and lawes amongſt men, and ſome nations are ruled by Monarches, otherſome by the common conſent of the people. But our lawmaker doing neither of theſe, did as one ſhould ſay therein declare his common wealth to be diuine, chiefely aſſigning all power and principality ouer vs to God, cauſing all men to fixe their minds and cogitations on him, as the onely giuer and author of all goodneſſe, giuing them to vnderſtand, that whatſoeuer in their neceſſity they entreate him for, hee heareth their prayers, and vnderſtandeth what euery man doth in pri-

And thus the wiſeſt Greeks that euer were, iudged of God, who how learned they were (he giuing the ground of all their knowledge) I now omit to rehearſe: & that theſe things afore rehearſed are beſt and moſt agreeable to the nature and magnificence of God, many do witneſſe, as Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, and Plato, and after them the Stoickes, and almoſt all other Philoſophers haue ſo thought of the diuine nature. But our lawmakers works & words ſo agreed, that he ſatisfied at large al his people, and they that were to bee borne of them and their ſucceſſors, inſpiring as it were a certain conſtancy into them to perſeuer in the ſame, ſtill referring the cauſe of his lawes to their profit and commodity. For he did not affirme the worſhip of God onely to be part of vertue, but he aſſigned other parts thereof, to wit, fortitude, iuſtice, and mutuall concord of all his citizens. which being ſo, other lawmakers were indeed wiſe in aduice and counſell, and yet they made choice of one of theſe methods, and left the other: For the Lacedemonians were inſtructed in manners, and not in words, as alſo they of Creete were: but the Athenians and almoſt all the Greeks were directed and trained vp by lawes in euery thing they were to doe, yet neuer could they put their written lawes in practice: but our law-maker very induſtriouſly did conioyne both theſe together, for he neither omitted the training them vp in manners and good exerciſes, neither did he ſurceaſe to leaue them written lawes. And firſt of all, making his entrance from the very meates, and preſcribing to euery one a conuenient diet, he left no man liberty amongſt vs not appoint puniſhment for them that were ignorant of it, but by law enacted a moſt neceſſary and milde chaſticement for the voluntary offenders: and for this cauſe he did not onely will, that we ſhould once or twice or often heare the lawes, but that once euery week we all, omitting o-feſt and moſt eminent men amongſt them, doe profeſſe herein that they are ignorant, cauſing thoſe that are learned and skilfull in their lawes, to ſit as it were in commiſſion with them to direct them. Whereas euery one of our nation being demanded of our lawes, can anſwer as readily as hee can tell his owne name: for euery one of vs learning them as it were ſo ſoone as we come to the vſe of reaſon, wee haue them as it were written and printed in our mindes, and by this meanes both wee offend more ſeldome, and when we offend we are ſure to be

The concord of the Iewes in religion. And this eſpecially is that which hath cauſed ſuch an vnity and concord amongſt vs. For to worſhip one God all after the ſame manner, and nothing to differ in manner and conuerſation K one from another, is the onely way to eſtabliſh amity and concord in a Common-wealth. For only amongſt vs no man ſhall heare any different ſpeeches and opinions concerning God, which thing amongſt all nations elſe is moſt frequent and ordinary: for amongſt them not onely euery one of the cõmon people doth ſpeak his pleaſure in this point, but diuers Philoſophers alſo preſume to do it, ſom of them with their blaſphemous ſpeeches altogether deſtroying the nature of God, and others with the like impudency denying him to haue any care of men: neither is there any difference amongſt vs of affaires pertaining to mans life, but all men with vs follow one or. Same common expreſſe labour, and we all ioyntly affirme the Son of God, and that he hath care of humane affaires, and all our actions and exerciſes: yea any one may learne of our women and chil- L dren, that all things whatſoeuer, are to be reduced to piety. Hence it groweth that ſome detract our nation, for that amongſt vs were no men inuenters of new matters and acts: to whom we will thus anſwer, that other nations account it a glory not to perſiſt in any thing that their forefathers vſed, and hold them of moſt account amongſt them, that can beſt tranſgreſſe their forefathers wiſedome. But we contrariwiſe do account it the chiefeſt point of wiſedome and vertue, neither to doe, nor thinke any thing contrary to that which our anceſtors haue decreed, which is a token that our law was eſtabliſhed by as good aduice as was poſſible. For thoſe lawes that in all points are not as they ought to be, are often by experience found faulty. But amongſt vs who beleeue that our law was firſt eſtabliſhed by the will and pleaſure of Almighty God, nothing is pious and vertuous which may any wiſe impugn the ſame. For who can take away any title therof, or adde M better in the ſtead? or who is he that can transferre and carry vs from the obſeruance of them, and ordain for vs better lawes to gouerne our Commonwealth? Or what law can be more iuſt and better, then that which the wiſedome of God (who is the Lord of all things) hath eſtabliſhed? He firſt of all permitted the diſpoſing of all principall affaires to the Prieſts in generall, and moſt wiſely conſtituted a high Prieſt as their head: neither were they choſen to this dignity by our lawmaker, who either exceld in nobility of birth, or riches: but he appointed ſuch to ſacrifice vnto God, who were knowne to excell others in wiſedome and ſanctity: theſe doe both

A keep our lawes, and obſerue all other things belonging to their office with all integrity; for our Prieſts are appointed ouer-ſeers of all things, and to iudge all ſtrifes and controuerſies, and to puniſh the offenders. What monarchy then or kingdome can be more holy then this? Or how can God be better honoured then amongſt vs, where all the people are prepared to piety, and the Prieſts commanded ſo to rule and gouerne the common-wealth, as if they were celebrating ſome feſtiuity? And whereas other nations cannot celebrate their myſteries, which they tearme ſacrifices, in a few daies; we with ioy and pleaſure and immutable wils, do celebrate our ſacrifice continually without intermiſſion: It reſteth now that I ſet downe our precepts and lawes, as arguments of that which I haue ſaid. The firſt is of God: of whom our Law ſaith, God hath all things, he is moſt perfect, moſt bleſſed, he is ſufficient both for himſelfe and all things elſe, he is the beginning, midſt, and ending, famous amongſt all things for his workes and benefits, more manifeſt then any thing elſe, but his ſhape and greatnes is to vs vnſpeakeable, all matters (how precious ſoeuer) being compared with his excellent beauty are nothing worth, and all art compared with his inuention is vnartificiall, we can neither ſee, conceiue, nor imagine any thing like him. He is holy, for we ſee his works; the light, the heauen & the earth; the Sun, the moon, riuers, and ſea, ſo many different ſhapes of liuing creatures, and encreaſe of fruits: All theſe God himſelfe made, not with hands or worke, nor as one needing any to helpe him, but he ſeeing them to be good, they were preſently made. He is to be followed of all men, who ought to worſhip him by the exerciſing of vertue; for this is the moſt holy way to pleaſe him. We haue one temple, as also one God, which temple is common to all men, as hee is the common God of all men. For ſimilitude alwaies pleaſeth, him doe all our Prieſts honour with ſacrifice, and he amongſt them hath the firſt place, who by birth is the chiefeſt: and he firſt ſacrificeth to God, ſeeth the lawes obſerued, iudgeth controuerſies, and puniſheth thoſe that are conuicted by the law: whoſoeuer diſobeyeth him, ſhall be puniſhed as one that rebels againſt God himſelfe; he offereth ſacrifices not pertaining to gluttony or drunkennes, for God is not pleaſed with ſuch ſacrifices, but is rather iniured, and ſuperfluous expences are thereby made.

The workes of God.

The ſacrifices of the olde teſtament.

But God loueth them that are temperate, and orderly, and of good behauiour, and eſpecially requireth in vs that ſacrifice, an inuiolable chaſtity. In our ſacrifices offered for our common good, we firſt of all pray in common, and then euery one for himſelfe, becauſe we are all fellows, and he that delighteth herein more then in his owne life, is moſt acceptable to God. Wee pray and vow vnto God, not requeſting riches of him, for he of his owne accord beſtoweth them vpon euery one, and left them amongſt vs: but we pray that we may haue part of them, and hauing gotten them may keepe them. Our law hath alſo appointed purifications both from our chamber-bed and carnall copulation, and many other things, which are too long to rehearſe: And this is our ſpeech and opinion of God, who himſelfe is our Law. And what concerning marriage? Our law onely alloweth naturall copulation between man and wife, done to the intent to get children. But that man ſhould abuſe one another againſt nature, it altogether diſſalloweth, & puniſheth ſuch offenders with death. It commandeth vs to marrie, not reſpecting the dowry, neither muſt we take women violently and by force, nor allure them by deceitfull perſwaſions, but that wee rather obtaine his good will, who may grant and vſe ordinary meanes to perſwade. It alſo appointeth that a woman ſhall be in all things inferiour to the man, neither is ſhe to obey in committing wickednes, but as one vnder gouernment. For it is God that gaue man this authority. With her the husband onely may lawfully accompany, and it is abomination for her to make triall of another man: and whoſo attempteth this, can no waies auoid death: the like penalty attendeth him, if he offer violence to a virgin deſpouſed vnto another man, or if by perſwaſions hee ouercome a married woman or other, that hath children vnder her, and all this our law commandeth: It hath alſo interdicted all women from concealing their children being borne, or otherwiſe to deſtroy them, for ſo ſhe ſhould be a child-killer, deſtroy ſoules and mankinde: Whoſo therefore vſeth carnall copulation and corruption, is vncleane by our lawes, and women after lawfull copulation muſt waſh themſelues, iudging that a part of their ſoule was by this act defiled, and ſhe being puffed vp was wounded in her body, and therefore our law ordained water of purification for them. Neither is it lawfull for them to feaſt and banquet at their childe-birth, whereby an occaſion of drunkennes may grow, but that their beginning ſhould bee temperate: they are likewiſe commanded to train vp their children in learning, that they may learne the law, and actions of their forefathers, and imitate them; that ſo being trained vp in the law they may not ſinne nor tranſgreſſe them by ignorance.

Of the funerals of the dead.

Our law hath alſo prouided for the buriall of the dead, that our funerals ſhould neither be pompeous, nor our ſepulchers gorgeous, commanding euery houſhold to performe all neceſſaries touching the buriall of their dead, permitting all men at any ones death to aſſemble themſelues together, and bewaile the dead: It alſo commandeth euery one (yea euen the dead mans owne family) to purifie themſelues after the buriall, and to goe afarre off, as ſeeming to be vncleane. It alſo appointeth puniſhment for them that haue committed murder, either wilfully or againſt their will. It bindeth euery man to obey his parents next after God, and commandeth that thoſe children that do not ſhew themſelues gratefull vnto them, or in any thing do grieue them, that they ſhould be ſtoned to death: It alſo commandeth all young men to reuerence old men, becauſe God is elder to vs all. It permitteth not friends to conceale any impiety; for God is not their friend who doth not diſcloſe them: and if friends fall out that doe know one anothers ſecrets, yet they are commanded not to bewray them. If any Iudge take a bribe, he is to be puniſhed with death for omitting iuſtice, and aſſiſting the guilty. No man muſt take any thing away that he himſelfe placed not, and no man muſt take that which is not his owne. No man for lending muſt take vſury; and many ſuch like things our law commandeth, concerning cauſe of communion betweene vs and others.

The honour due to parēts.

Againſt theft and vſurie.

It is alſo not amiſſe to recount how our Lawmaker prouided for the entertaining of ſtrangers amongſt vs: For he ſeemeth ſo to haue prouided, that to our knowledge we neither corrupt our owne lawes, nor deny to impart them to others: but he entertaineth all liberally that will come and liue vnder our lawes, iudging the community of mans life, not ſo much to conſiſt in the nation wherof we come, as in the vnity of our minds and conuerſation. He forbiddeth others that are ſtrangers, and come not with that intent to be admitted to our ſolemnities; yet he commanded vs to exhibit vnto them, all other things neceſſary: and that we ſhould giue vnto all men, fire, water, meat, and bury them being dead. He hath alſo moſt mildly determined how we ought to deale with our enemies, that we neither deſtroy their countrey with fire, not cut downe their fruit trees. We are alſo forbidden to rob and ſpoile thoſe that are ſlaine in fight, and deale iniuriouſly with our captiues; and eſpeciall if they be women: yea he ſo endeauoured to teach vs humanity and mildnes, that he prouided, that we vſe euen vnreaſonable beaſts curteouſly, and only imploy them to ſerue our lawfull need, and no further: for he forbiddeth vs to kill any tame thing bred in houſes, and that we ſhould not kill the old birds and their young together, and although many wild beaſts, enemies to mankind, doe aſſiſt vs in our labours, yet he commanded to ſpare them alſo. And in euery point he eſtabliſhed humanity and mildnes, amongſt vs, vſing (as is before ſaid) lawes to direct vs therin, enacting alſo other, how they who infringe the foreſaid lawes, may be with all ſeuerity puniſhed: for the puniſhment allotted to the violaters hereof, is for the moſt part death: as if any man commit adultery, rauiſh a Virgin, vſe the ſin againſt nature with another, or ſuffer himſelfe to be ſo abuſed. We alſo haue lawes concerning our ſeruants, and our meaſures, and waights, and vnlawfull bargaines and ſales, or deceit, if either one take any thing that is another mans, or which is not his owne; all theſe are to be puniſhed not as other nations puniſh them, but much more grieuouſly. But whoſoeuer either iniureth his parents, or committeth impiety againſt God, he ſhall preſently be deſtroyed: but they that obſerue this law, are not rewarded with gold or ſiluer, nor with a crowne beſet with precious ſtone: but euery one hauing his conſcience to witnes, doth greatly profit, and gain eternity; as both our lawmaker prophecieth, and God himſelfe doth moſt aſſuredly promiſe to them that obſerue them. And if it chance that we be forced to ſuffer death for them, yet do we ioyfully go to execution, nothing doubting but that we ſhall ſo exchange this life for a better: I ſhould be loth to report this, if our deeds did not make it manifeſt: for many of our forefathers, onely for that they refuſed to ſpeake againſt our lawes, or otherwiſe then our lawes permitted, haue moſt manfully and conſtantly indured all torments and death it ſelfe. If our nation were vnknowne to all the world, and that this our voluntary obſeruation of our lawes were not manifeſt to all people, if any man ſhould report vnto the Greeks, that either he had read this which I haue declared, or elſe that he had found people in a ſtrange land, ſuch as we be, hauing ſo pious & honeſt opinious concerning God, and who had for many ages perſeuered therein; I doubt not but they would all admire and wonder hereat, conſidering the great mutabilitie amongſt themſelues. To be ſhort, there are ſome who ſticke not to deride them who haue lately written of the gouernement of Common-wealths and lawes, as though they had written things fabulous and altogether impoſſible. And that I ſpeake nothing of other Philoſophers that haue written of this argument, that diuine

This man is almoſt continually ſcoffed at by them, who in their owne conceit are skilfull in ciuill affaires, and brought in as a Vice in a Comedie. Whereas whoſoeuer conſidereth his writings with diligence, ſhall often and eaſily finde matter agreeable with moſt mens manners: yea this Plato himſelfe confeſſeth, that he dare not by reaſon of the common peoples ignorance ſet downe the true opinion of God. But many think Platoes words full of vanity, and licentiouſneſſe, and admire Lycurgus, and euery one commendeth the City of Sparta, for that it ſo long time perſeuered in his Lawes. It is therefore an euident demonſtration of vertue to remaine in their lawes. But if thoſe who ſo admire the Lacedemonians, doe compare them with
B vs, and the time during the which their lawes were in force, with the time of our Common-wealth: they ſhall finde that ours hath continued more then two thouſand yeeres. They ſhall alſo finde that the Lacedemonians did onely perfectly obſerue their lawes, during ſuch time as they were in proſperity and liberty, and that when their fortune changed, they then became vnmindfull of their lawes.

Lycurgus the Law-maker amongſt the Lacedemonians.

But wee, who haue felt many thouſand miſ-haps by reaſon of the often change of Princes in Aſia, haue not in theſe our laſt miſeries and euils forſaken our law. Neither can any man ſay, that liberty and licentious life is the cauſe, why wee ſo diligently obſerue them, ſeeing that whoſo pleaſe may ſee ſufficient proofe, that they tie vs to more ſtrict life and laborious, then thoſe of the Lacedemonians did them. For they neither tilled the earth, nor vſed any handy-craft, but
C ceaſing from all labours and paines-taking, liued in their Citie fat and faire-liking, hauing both their meate and all other neceſſaries prouided and prepared for them by others, and eſteemed that onely their felicity to doe or endure any thing, ſo that they might preuaile againſt thoſe againſt whom they enterprized warres: and that they failed alſo herein, I omit to rehearſe. For not onely one or two of them at once, but oftentimes whole companies of them, forgetting their owne lawes, yeelded themſelues to their enemies. And can any one tell of, I ſay not ſo many, but of one or two of vs that euer was treacherous to his owne lawes, or that feared to die for them? I meane not a common death, ſuch as ſouldiers are ſubiect vnto, but ſuch a death as is affected by all torments and tortures that can be deuiſed. Which I thinke thoſe that preuailed againſt vs impoſed vpon vs, not for hatred, but that they deſired to ſee ſo admirable a matter;
D and to ſee if wee being but men, and ſuch who eſteemed it the greateſt impiety poſſible to doe it, could bee compelled by them to ſpeake or doe any thing contrary to our lawes. Yet it is no wonder that wee for our law do die with ſuch conſtancy, rather then any other Nation: for other Nations cannot abide to endure that which we account a trifle, to wit, labour and ſimple fare, and that no man eate whatſoeuer, or what hee deſireth, to lie with them whom hee ought not, or to bee idle (except hee be of noble birth) or goe gallantly attyred: and we are alwayes carefull that when we fight againſt our enemies, we obſerue our lawes concerning our meates. And thus wee take pleaſure to obſerue and keepe our lawes, and to exerciſe fortitude in obeying them.

Let now Lyſimachus or Molonus paſſe, and ſuch as they be, wicked lying writers, and Sophi-E ſters, deceiuers of young men, and detracters of our owne Nation, as though we were the wickedeſt people liuing. As for me, I will not examine the lawes of other Nations: for it is our cuſtome to keep aud obſerue our owne, not to detract others; yea and our Law-maker openly prohibited vs from blaſpheming ſuch, as other Nations hold for gods, only for the name of God attributed vnto them: yet may wee not leaue the obiections of our accuſers vnanſwered, ſeeing that which we are to ſpeake againſt them, is not our owne deuice, but many before vs haue ſpoken it. Who then of all the wiſe Greeks will not condemne the moſt famous Poets, and eſpecially, the Lawmakers, who at firſt brought and ſettled ſuch vain opinions of the gods among the common people? affirming the number of them to be ſo many as they thought good, and to be
F borne at diuers times one of another, allotting to euery one his proper place, as vnto other liuing creatures: ſome to be vnder the earth, others in the ſea, and the ancienteſt amongſt them in hell, fettered and bound: and thoſe whom they place in Heauen, in words they doe terme him a father, but in deeds they ſhew him to be a tyrant, and for this cauſe they report that his wife, his brother, and his daughter, whom they affirme to haue beene borne of his braine; conſpired againſt him to binde him, and hang him, as they report him alſo, to haue dealt by his father. Againſt theſe vanities all excellent and wiſe men doe worthily inueigh, who beſide this already rehearſed, in deriſion adde, how ſome of the gods are young, and ſome old, and ſome infants, others are gods of arts and ſciences, and one is a Smith, another a Weauer, another a Pilgrime, and is at variance with mortall men, others delight in muſicke, others in ſhooting: moreouer, that they are at variance one with another amongſt themſelues, and that they fall out one with another in mens behalfe, and that not onely one of them layeth violent hands vpon the other, but that alſo they are wounded by mortall men, and ſorrow & feele griefe for the wounds; and that which is moſt abominable of all, doe vſe carnall copulation with mankinde, and that moſt vndecently, that their vnbridled luſt is extended both to men and women. Then that their chiefe god of all, whom they call father, contemned and drowned certain women whom he himſelfe had deceiued and gotten with childe, and that he could not deliuer the children borne of theſe women from calamity, for that deſtiny had obliged him, nor ſee their deaths without teares. This is all good ſtuffe, as alſo is that which followeth, to wit, adulteries committed in Heauen, ſo openly, and impudently amongſt the gods, that ſome profeſſe themſelues to enuy their fellow gods and goddeſſes tied together in ſuch filthineſſe. And what ſhould the reſt of them do, when as their King and the moſt ancienteſt amongſt them, could not refraine his luſtfull licentiouſneſſe from the company of women? Moreouer, ſome of them became ſeruants vnto men, and ſome built houſes for money, and others became ſhepheards, others like malefactors were chained in hell. What man then that euer was accounted wiſe, would not bluſh at theſe follies, and reprooue the inuentors hereof, and the fooliſh beleeuers alſo? Others preſumed to faine both terror and feare, and madneſſe, and ſuch ſimplicity, as that they might be deceiued, and all other naughty paſſions to be found in the nature of their gods, and haue perſwaded whole cities to offer ſacrifice to the moſt Noble amongſt them. And they are in great perplexity, thinking that ſome of the gods are the giuers of all good things, others againe to be their enemies, and ſo ſeeke to pleaſe them with gifts as they would doe wicked men; and they are verily perſwaded, that they ſhall ſuſtaine great damage by their meanes, except they do daily pacifie their wrath by frequent gifts. What is the cauſe of this ſhamefull ignorance, and erroneous iniquity concerning God? Truely I am perſwaded, for that their firſt Law-makers were themſelues herein to ſeeke, and ignorant of the nature of God, and that they did not faithfully deliuer vnto their Common-wealth, ſo much as themſelues knew concerning this point: but as though it had been a thing of leaſt moment, did wilfully let it paſſe, giuing licence to Poets, and permitting them to deifie and make gods whom they pleaſed, and that the Orators ſhould write of the common-wealths affaires, and tell what them liked of ſtrange gods. Moreouer, the painters and image-makers amongſt the Greeks, had a great hand in making of gods, it being lawfull for them euery one to frame what ſhape he liſt, and how he liſt, ſome of earth, others of colours: and the chiefeſt god-makers amongſt them vſe iuory and gold to make their god of; a true argument of their mutable nouelty. And then the ancient gods whom they firſt ſo honoured and reuerenced as they could poſſibly deuiſe, being now withered with age, are out of credit, and other youngſters poſſeſſe their places and honours: their temples alſo ſome are deſolate, others newly erected, as men pleaſe. Whereas contrariwiſe, they ought moſt conſtantly to keepe their opinion of God, and his religion.

Apollonius Molon was one of theſe proud fooles: but thoſe Grecians that followed true Philoſophie, knew all that is already ſaid, and the cold reaſons of this allegory, and therefore did iuſtly deſpiſe them, and agreed with vs in the true and decent opinion of Gods nature. Which Plato well ſeeing, affirmeth that Poets are not to be permitted in a common-wealth, and ſendeth Homer away very honourably crowned and anointed, leſt that he with his fables ſhould deſtroy or depraue the true opinion of God. For Plato of all others eſpecially imitated our Law-maker, as hee did herein alſo, commanding all his Citizens that all of them ſhould perfectly learne his lawes, and that for no caſualty, any ſtrange forraine cuſtome ſhould be admitted into their Citie, but that their Common-wealth ſhould be pure, and they perſiſt in the obſeruation of their lawes. But Apollonius Molon not reſpecting this, inueigheth againſt vs, for not receiuing into our ſociety men of ſtrange opinions or religion, whereas not onely we doe ſo, but commonly all Greeks, yea and the moſt prudent amongſt them. The Lacedemonians did expell all ſtrangers, and did not permit their citizens to trauell into other countries, fearing that by both theſe wayes their lawes might be corrupted. They therefore are to be ſpoken againſt rather then we, ſeeing they neither admit ſtrangers to conuerſe with them, nor to inhabit amongſt them, no nor impart their religion vnto them; but wee, though not deſirous to learne other Nations religion, yet doe we not deny to impart ours to ſtrangers that deſire to embrace it: which if I bee not

The Lacedemonians did expell all ſtrangers.

A not deceiued is a token of magnanimity, and clemency in vs: but this ſhall ſuffice concerning the Lacedemonians. Apollonius was ignorant how matters ſtood with the Athenians, who boaſt that their city is free from all nations: for they did moſt ſeuerely and without all mercy puniſh thoſe that did but ſpeake any word againſt their God. For what was the cauſe of Socrates his death? he neither betraied the city to enemies, nor deſtroied their temples, but only ſwore by a ſtrange oath, which as he ſaid (whether in ieſt or in earneſt) a diuell taught him, and for this offence was he put to death, by drinking hemlocke: his accuſers alledging, that he corrupted young men, and contemned the lawes and religion of his countrey. And this Socrates ſuſtained being a citizen of Athens.

B Anaxagoras was of Clazomenia: and for that he affirmed the Sun which the Athenians worſhipped for God, to be a fiery ſtone, he was by the ſentẽce of ſome few condemned to die. They alſo proclaimed, that whoſoeuer would kill Diagoras of Melus, ſhould be rewarded with a talent for his labour, only for that this Diagoras was ſaid to deride their myſteries: Protagoras alſo had bin by them taken and put to death, had he not made quicke eſcape, only for that they ſuppoſed him to haue written certain doubts of the Athenian gods. And what wonder is it that they ſo vſed theſe famous men, who ſpared not to vſe the like cruelty vpon women? For they killed a prieſt, for that ſome accuſed her to worſhip ſtrange gods: and their law appointed, that whoſo did introduce ſtrange gods into their city, ſhould be puniſhed with death. It is therefore euident that they who enacted ſuch ſtraight laws, beleeued not the gods of other nations to be gods: for

C had they beleeued in them, they would not haue depriued themſelues of the benefit of many gods. The very Scythians (who delight in manſlaughter, ſo that they very little differ from brute beaſts) yet do they thinke themſelues bound to maintaine their owne lawes, as beſt, ſo that they ſlew Anacharſis a famous Greek, that came vnto them, only for that he ſeemed to attribute too much vnto the Grecian gods; yea thou maiſt finde many among the Perſians, who for this cauſe haue been tortured. And it is euident that Apollonius approoued the Perſian lawes: for when the Greekes admired their fortitude and concord of opinions concerning God, I meane the fortitude they ſhewed in burning of their temples, this Apollonius in all things imitated the Perſians, violating other mens wiues, and putting out their childrens eyes; whereas our lawes adiudge him to death that ſo vſeth vnreaſonable beaſts: And neither the feare and terrour of poten-

What therfore ſhould moue vs to immitate the laws of other nations, when they that made thoſe laws (yea euen the lawmakers themſelues) did tranſgreſſe them? Or how can the Lacedemonians auoid reproach for their inhoſpitality, and neglecting marriage? Or the Elians and Thebans for accompanying with men, contrary to the law of nature, which fact moſt ſhamefull, they deemed good and neceſſary. Yea not content to doe ſo themſelues, they alſo aſcribed the like vnto

It is long to examine how great occaſions of impiety they gaue. For many haue already long ago forſaken their lawes: which cannot be ſaid of vs, who for our lawes haue ſuffered loſſe of our cities, fortunes & liues, we keeping & perſiſting in our lawes euen vnto death; and if any Iew be in a ſtrange country where there is a tyrant King, yet doth not he ſo feare him, that he would for his command in any iot tranſgreſſe our lawes. If therefore we do valourouſly endure thus much for our lawes, all men muſt needs grant our lawes to be ve-

But ſeeing antiquity of lawes is the greateſt argument to proue their goodnes, I will ſet downe of what antiquity our lawes are, together with our lawmakers opinion of the Deity; if therefore any one compare our lawes with the lawes of all nations, he ſhall finde that ours are of more antiquity then theirs by many ages. ons: For though the firſt Greeks did colourably obſerue lawes, yet all their Philoſophers did imitate ours, and our opinions of God; and in humility taught others, communion of life, and conuerſation: yea the common people did long ſince imitate our piety: neither is there any nation either Greeks or Barbarians, who haue not after ſome manner obſerued a Sabbath as we do, and faſting daies, and candleſticks with light, all which they learned of vs, yea many do alſo obſerue our cuſtoms concerning their meats, and our vnity and concord, wherin we excell all other nations, our community alſo and induſtrie in arts and labours, and ſufferance for our lawes. And which is moſt to be admired, our law, not hauing any to force vs to obſerue it, hath ſo obliged our hearts, that as God is of all the world honoured without compulſion, ſo are our lawes amongſt vs all, we not forced thereunto: And whoſoeuer doth diligently conſider his owne nation and family, ſhall find that which I haue reported, to be true. I will now generally reprehend the voluntary malice of all men: for either they meane that we hauing theſe good lawes do yet little eſteeme them, and follow worſe, or if they do not ſo meane, let them hold their malicious tongue from any further calumniation. For I do not take vpon me the defence of this cauſe, for that I beare any hatred to any man, but for that I and all the Iewes do honor and reuerence our Lawmaker, and beleeue that whatſoeuer he prophecied proceeded from God: yea although our ſelues did not know the goodnes of our laws, yet the multitude of them that imitate them, were a ſufficient motiue to induce vs thereunto. But I haue at large and with all ſincerity diſcourſed of our lawes, and Common-wealth in my Bookes of our Antiquitie. And now I againe haue made mention of them neither in contumelie of other nations, nor in praiſe of our owne, but onely to reproue ſuch as haue moſt maliciouſly and impudently belyed vs, contrary to the known truth: And I thinke I haue already fully performed that which I haue promiſed. For I haue ſhewed our nation (contrary to their affirmations) to be moſt ancient, which I haue proued by the teſtimony of many ancient writers, who in their works haue mentioned vs.

Our aduerſaries affirme vs to haue come of Egyptians: I haue ſhewed that our forefathers came into Egypt out of ſome other place. They alledge that we were expelled Egypt for their miſerie, in that they were infected with diſeaſe; I haue proued that they came from thence to their owne country, by meanes of their owne proweſſe and force, of their owne accord: Others labour to defame our Lawmaker as a wicked perſon, whoſe vertue many of ancient times, and ſo long time as hath beene ſince him, do witneſſe. It is not needfull to ſpeake more largely of our lawes: for they by themſelues appeare pious and good, and ſuch as doe not inuite or incite vs to the hatred of other nations, but rather to communion and friendſhip, being both enemies to iniquity, and commanders of iuſtice, baniſhers of luxurioufneſſe, and teachers of frugality and labour: forbidding all wars enterprized for auarice, and preparing the people to ſhew fortitude in them, and for them; inflicting ineuitable puniſhment vpon their tranſgreſſors, not eaſily to be deceiued by glozing ſpeeches; and executing in action, all that they in word command: yet amongſt vs the execution of them and obſeruation is more ready then the words of them: I therefore confidently affirme that we doe teach more pious and vertuous maners then other nations doe. For what can be better then inuiolate piety? what more iuſt then to obey the law? what more profitable and commodious, then to be at vnity and peace amongſt our ſelues, and neither to forſake one another in calamity, nor iniure one another in proſperity, to contemne and deſpiſe death in time of warre, and in peace to labour and till our grounds, and to vſe other arts and workes, and alwaies to thinke and beleeue, that God beholdeth all our actions, and ruleth and diſpoſeth all things? If this be either written or reſerued by any one before this time, wee are then to thanke them as being their ſchollers: but if they are knowne neuer before to haue beene extant, then we are knowne to be the firſt authors and inuenters of it. Let therefore all Apions and Molons goe, and all others that with them are conuicted of lying and ſlandering. And this booke is written to thee Epaphroditus who loueſt the truth, and to others who by thee will, or are deſirous to know the ſame.

I Haue not grudged, vertuous Father, to dedicate vnto thee a daies labour; wherein I haue peruſed, and what in me lieth, amended the booke which Ioſeph writ of the ſeuen Maccabees brethren: And would it had lien in my power more aboundantly to haue anſwered your expectation: I haue now (for that I counted the Greek copy) by the Latin coniectur'd the Greek, and altered ſome things, yet but very few. Ioſeph doth not falſly boaſt himſelfe to haue attained to the excellency of the Greeke tongue, and this booke will ſufficiently witnes the ſame; wherein he ſhewed both great vanity and Emphaſis, inſomuch as he eſteemeth to haue handled that famous work with eloquent ſtile, and the ornament of diſcourſe. S. Ierome for this cauſe entitleth this booke, Great eloquence; Suidas ὑπερτρέφων; out of them both we amend the corrupted ſtile, and call it αὐτοκράτορος λογισμόν, that is, the rule of reaſon: for the ſcope of this book tendeth all to prooue, that reaſon is of no force in man, except it beare ſoueraignty ouer all inordinate appetites. This is moſt euidently proued by the books of the Maccabees, in the Scripture: which books the Iewes did not receiue as Canonicall, yet do they account it among their ſacred writ. I cannot but congratulate this worthy Colledge (which though famous for many other things, yet is more happy) for that it is ſo bleſſed, as to enioy ſo worthy and vnſpeakeable a treaſure: Or rather all Colonia Agrippina, that happy and fortunate City; yet in nothing more happy, then for that it alone doth in her boſome ſhrine ſo many, ſo ſacred, and excellent pledges of piety: yet ſhould it be more happy, if it could expreſſe their vertues, whoſe ſacred relickes it ſo religiouſly keepeth, and imitate their maners whoſe bodies it poſſeſſeth, to wit, if in ſincerity of religion it imitated the piety of three Kings, and the ſacred purity of the eleuen Virgins, if it reſembled the moſt valiant young men, the Maccabees, and the inuincible courage of that woman, whoſe valorous conſtancy no miſery could conquer. And this beſt portion and part of her felicity, this worthy City might beſtow vpon her ſelfe, yea and double the ſame. Doe thou goe forward in that which thou haſt in hand, to wit, in ſpreading the praiſe of thoſe Martyrs, making that vertuous example more commendable, and your City more famous.

Farewell.

FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS OF THE RVLE OF REASON; A MOST ELOQVENT BOOKE, CORRCTED BY DESIDERIVS ERASMVS, MOST LIVELY SETTING DOWNE THE MARTYRDOME OF THE MACCABEES.

I Am at the inſtant requeſt of Polybius of Megalopolis, to put in writing the conſtant ſuffering of the Maccabees, worthy all admiration, not in a Rhetoricall and pleaſing ſtile, but rather after our owne country faſhion, thereby to exhort our nation to patience in their calamities. But firſt of all, it is neceſſary for vs to ſpeake ſomething of reaſon, and aſſigne vnto it the power and vertue to deliberate. For hee who hath once fully determined to ſuffer all miſery for Gods ſake, is in my opinion already a Martyr: it is therefore a great merit once to haue ſo determined; and therefore, as is aboue ſaid, reaſon beareth the rule of all inferiour paſſions; and then if deſtiny deny vs opportunity to ſuffer, yet haue we ſuffred all, becauſe we purpoſed to ſuffer all. Whoſo therefore will renounce the world, and aſpire onely to celeſtiall things, he muſt exerciſe ſobriety, baniſh gluttony, with his page laciuiouſneſſe, and all other ſuch like vices as may poſſeſſe and captiue the minde: he muſt likewiſe mount vp to the top of Vertues tower, that after, he may from thence war againſt the vices of his body, griefe and feare; the firſt whereof aſſaulteth vs when we begin, the laſt when we haue begun. There are many examples of the valiant ſouldiers of God, which I would vſe, but that the ornaments ſprung from the wombe of one woman may ſuffice me, which ſhe brought forth, not at one birth, but with the ſame piety and zeale. And firſt I will ſpeake of Eleazar, the cauſe and example of their paſſion, and then I will relate what tortures and torments their mother endured: yet cannot man, but only God determine, who amongſt them was firſt, and who laſt in this noble agony. They therefore, being all ſettled in one opinion, reſembling one another more in minde then they did in body, duly conſidered the frailty of this life, and therefore neither delighted in the flatteries of the world, nor any alluring enchantments thereof. They ſhewed themſelues not to eſteeme of torments, fetters, nor no other ſorts of tortures impoſed vpon them: and to returne to our firſt saying, they premeditated patience, to endure whatſoeuer the Iudges cruelty could deuiſe. I will therefore what I may, praiſe the fortitude of theſe brethren, or rather I will with all truth rehearſe the moſt worthy agony of theſe holy men, which deſerues all commendations; and ſetting all adulation apart, proſecute with a bare hiſtoricall narration the manner of their martyrdome.

Reaſon hath dominion ouer our paſſions.

The death of the ſeuen brethren and their mother.

But before I begin to declare the death of Nobility, I will a little entreat of reaſon, which as I haue affirmed, is no ſmall motiue to martyrdome. Reaſon it is, that maketh vs obſerue faſts and vſe abſtinence, it is reaſon that makes vs deſpiſe money, and by it we are taught not to account of dignities and honours, which all men generally aime at, yea reaſons gift it is that we do reſiſt the heat of luſtfull deſires. Hence commeth it, that hauing once ouercome ſuch things as the fleſh delights in, we find our ſelues a little able to reſiſt, we alſo learne to deſpiſe paines and torments, and ſo

The deſcription of reaſon and wiſedom.

A ſo reſolute to ſuffer all things that ſhall be impoſed vpon vs. Which, that it may more plainely appeare, let vs ſearch out the cauſe of this order, and wee ſhall finde wiſedome to bee the cauſe hereof. For no man can determine and diſtinguiſh good from euill, that is not endued with wiſedome; this wiſedome is alwaies accompanied with iuſtice, and iuſtice is ſtill ioyned with vertue, and vertue and temperance cannot be ſeparated; ſo that this wiſedome conſiſteth vpon foure parts. Beſides theſe, there are two things that either do cauſe or hinder paſſion, to wit, paine and pleaſure: one of which we doe alwayes refuſe, and the other we doe alwaies deſire; yet where pleaſure ariſeth, and is preſently by reaſons rule put away, the minde is there ſtrengthened; and paine compared with glory, is through hope of a greater reward contemned before it come; B and being come, our minde is aſhamed not to ſuffer that which before it was reſolued to doe. Reaſon therefore is the guide of all our actions, and by it we deſpiſe torments, and deteſt vice, which like a skilfull husbandman pruneth and cutteth away ſuperfluous branches, and killeth the heat of all corrupt and hurtfull humors, onely leauing that to remaine in vſe, which may ſome way be profitable to vs.

Griefe and paine cauſe or hinder paſſion.

Reaſon reſembleth a skilfull gardiner.

Thus reaſon purifieth vs by paſſion, encouraging to ſuffer, and in our ſuffering and agony ſtrengtheneth vs. Who is not deſirous to eat of the fleſh of wilde beaſts and fiſhes? And who luſteth not to eat of feathered foules? nay, do not the dainty diſhes got either in ſea or land inuite vs to eat of them? What then cauſeth vs to abſtaine from them? that all men deſire them, yet no man eats them? Euen in this thing the minde is taught to ouercome it ſelfe in delightfull obiects, C and to bridle all pleaſure, that when occaſion of martyrdome is offred, the minde ſetting aſide all vanities, will not for a little pleaſure forget his accuſtomed vertue.

An inſtance of Ioſephs chaſtity.

For this cauſe was Ioſeph iuſtly praiſed in that he was not ouercome by luſt, which raigneth in a youthfull body: this reaſon ſo worketh with ſound aduice and mature counſell, that it againe recouereth loſt friendſhip, and getteth new, and ſuffereth no cruelty to be committed. Of this we haue alſo the example of Moſes, who had he not iuſt occaſion to be angry againſt Dathan and Abiram, reaſon (no doubt) would haue cauſed him to haue ſmothered all griefe of mind. Did not our father Iacob with great vehemency reprooue his ſonnes, Simeon and Leui, that without reaſon they had vſed ſuch cruelty, ſaying, Curſed be your anger? Which anger and wrath of theirs had it beene bridled with reaſon, neither had they beene curſed, nor the other had periſhed. For this D cauſe, God, the maker of mankinde, when he faſhioned vs and our manners, hauing finiſhed all lineaments of the body, hee now placed the minde to bee in it, and to rule it, leauing it certaine precepts to obſerue and keep, to wit, temperance, and to imbrace and follow that which is good, and cleaue vnto iuſtice, and rule and bridle all paſſions in the body ſubiect vnto it, and obſerue the precepts of God.

But ſome will aske me wherefore wee offer to commit wickedneſſe, ſeeing that reaſon ruleth our paſſion? But it is a ridiculous thing to thinke that reaſon ſo ruleth, for reaſons rule cannot hinder the appetite from deſire, but onely correct deſire, and ſo preuaile, that it ſuffer with patience the loſſe or abſtinence from ſuch things as it deſired. For example ſake, reaſon cannot hinder thee from being angry, but it can ſo worke that thou commit no impiety when thou an- E gry: in like manner, it cannot hinder thee from deſiring filthy pleaſure, yet can it cauſe thee not to yeeld vnto it.

An inſtance of Dauids thirſt.

Reaſon therefore cannot vtterly extinguiſh vice, but onely bridle it. Witneſſe in this the example of holy Dauid, who fighting againſt ſtrangers with great ſucceſſe, and being at euening weary and faint, he came vnto his princely Tabernacle, that was guarded by his ſouldiers, where he found them all at meate: yet himſelfe being thirſty, durſt not drinke, notwithſtanding water was hard by, onely for that religion diſſwaded him, for he had vowed not to drink before he had conquered his enemies. He alſo forbade his men to drinke, ſo that they might fight more courageouſly, if not for that they were valiant, at leaſt for that ſo they might haue drinke. Whileſt thus his thirſt encreaſed, three young men of ſtrong bodies armed themſelues, and taking with F them a veſſell to put water in, they went vnto their enemies camp, and there aſſaulted the watchmen, who for feare of death fled, and ſo they paſt thorow the campe, till ſuch time as they came where the water was, and taking ſome from thence, they brought it to the King. But holy Dauid ſo bridled his humane appetite, that by reaſon hee quenched his deſire, and ſhewed an excellent token of patience, teaching how the feare of God was to bee preferred before all things. For taking the water he had much wiſhed for, and which had beene gotten with ſuch danger, hee preſently powred it on the ground, as a ſacrifice to God; chuſing rather to die for thirſt, then to offend offend the diuine maiesty: yet reason is not so forcible, that it is able without due consideration to G represse the inordinate motions of the minde, and mitigate the griefe of the body. But it is now time to come to our history, yet is not this former discourse to be thought impertinent, for that it is somewhat appertaining to the matter ensuing. Such was the wisedome and fidelity of our forefathers, that Seleucus, King of Asia, enriched our Priests, and being a man of another religion, did ascribe all his actions and worthy deeds to the religion and faith of our ancestors. But wicked mens madnes could not herewith be satisfied. For one Simon, hating the high Priest Onias, and finding no waies or meanes to be reuenged of him in his own country, went vnto Apollonius, Gouernour of Syria, Phœnicia and Cilicia, and before him in a publike assembly told him, that he could help the King to an infinite treasure, for (quoth he) there is hidden in Ierusalem an in- H finite deale of gold and siluer, which by right belongeth vnto King Seleucus. Apollonius hearing this, praised and commended Simon, and confiscated the gold and siluer to the treasure-house of Seleucus; and hauing authority from the King to get it, he leuied an army, and so accompanied with Simon, came vnto our countrey, purposing if any violence were offred, to vse the defence of his souldiers.

Seleucus and Nicanor.

Apollonius, Captaine of Syria, came with an army to Ierusalem.

When the treasure-house of our Temple was now a sacking, Onias wept bitterly, and said, that it was a heauy sight to them to whom this treasure was committed, to see it, or any part of it taken away. But Apollonius, neither respecting the teares and intreaties of the old men, women, nor children, pressed into the Temple, they all praying God to punish him, and to defend their Temple. Being now with a great guard of armed men entred into the holy Temple, there appea- I red certaine Angels on horsebacke with weapons in their hands, and shining with a fiery flame about them, and they daunted the courage of this Infidell Apollonius, who presently fell downe flat vpon his face; and lying so a great while, at last he came a little to himselfe: and rising vp, he leaned vpon his shoulder who kept the Temple, not being able to stand alone, he was so terrified with the vision he had seen. When he came a little to himselfe, and was in some hope of recouery, he stretched both his hands towards heauen, and himselfe despairing to obtaine pardon for his offence committed, he besought the Hebrews (whose Temple he came to spoile) to make intercession for him, himselfe with teares crauing pardon for his offence, and not onely acknowledging his fault, but also confessing himselfe to haue deserued death, and all punishment possible. Holy Onias seeing this, and fearing also that if Apollonius should then dy, the Hebrews would K be suspected to haue made him away, he made prayers to God for him, and so obtained his enemies life. Apollonius presently hasted to Seleucus to let him vnderstand what had hapned: but when he came he found Seleucus dead, and Antiochus raigning in his stead, a man of tyrannous nature, who bare an ancient grudge to Onias the high Priest: and therefore made Iason his brother high Priest in his stead; Iason promising Antiochus, in lieu of this good turne, to pay him 3660.
talents of siluer euery yeere.

Antiochus his rage against the Iewes.

This Iason being now made High Priest, and chiefe amongst all the nation of the Iewes, hee presently forced all the people to impiety, and to forsake religion; so that to build baths, he hindred the defence and building of the Temple, and all Doctors of our nation conspired with him L in this iniquity. But hereat God was presently wroth: who being displeased, it was not needfull to seeke forraine enemies, for Antiochus himselfe was incited to rage against them. Who warring against Ptolomæus, King of Egypt, he heard it reported that the Iewes did deeme him to be dead, yet was he very gallantly entertained by the inhabitants of Ierusalem: and presently after the fight, he made an edict, that whoso amongst the Iewes refused to offer sacrifice to the gods, hee should presently dye vpon the wheele. But the godly minded of our nation did little esteeme this edict, yea the women circumcising their infants (as our law requireth) did afterward cast themselues downe headlong, to the end that they might so obtaine a present death without longer delay. Antiochus perceiuing that the seuerity of his Edict could not compell the Hebrewes to forsake their religion, but that men voluntarily did chuse death; he sitting in an M eminent place from whence all the Iewes might behold him, calling all of them together, he caused swines flesh to be sacrificed vpon the altar, and to be offered to euery Hebrew to eate. Amongst this whole multitude assembled from all places, was one Eleazar a Priest, well instructed in learning, and the feare of GOD, a man of aged yeeres, and of a very reuerend countenance, one that was knowne to all men, and famous for his vertue. To this man Antiochus said thus: Be aduised by me, holy old man, to eschew those torments prepared for such as are obstinate, preserue thy reuerend age, and contemne not the benefit of this life, take the sacrifice and eate of the that meat which nature hath as well ordained for mankinde as any other. We ſhew our ſelues vngratefull for Gods benefits, who contemne his graces, and make difference where nature hath made none; or what reaſon is there to ſhew that this beaſt is more abominable then others? Either all beaſts are to be eaten, or elſe all to be eſchewed: it is ſuperſtition and idleneſſe to bar our ſelues from any thing by a law, when we haue no other for it but our will. Set apart thoſe vaine and ſottiſh opinions, and at leaſt in this venerable age change thy opinion into better. Or ſuppoſe your lawes are forcible and to be obſerued, yet will they excuſe thee, ſeeing thou doſt not ſinne voluntarily, but by compulſion.

Eleazars anſwer to Antiochus.

B Eleazar, being permitted to ſpeake, thus replyed to Antiochus, who both exhorted and forced him to breach of his lawes. We, Antiochus, do not follow a vaine report, but we obſerue the verity of religion which our fathers kept, and feare of torments cannot make vs embrace another religion, and forſake our owne: yea, ſuppoſe our religion deliuered to vs by our fathers had no firme grounds, yet would I in nothing, no not compelled by torments, forſake it. Doe not eſteeme it a ſmall matter to eate impious meat, and to taſte of that which is ſacrificed to Idols, for it is a profane thing to touch things that are profane. Our law condemneth your Philoſophy, wherein he is moſt ignorant that thinketh himſelfe moſt wiſe. We are taught to embrace ſobriety, to ſubdue in vs all inordinate appetite, to keep our bodies chaſte, and to ſuffer with patience whatſoeuer for Gods ſake is inflicted vpon vs, and not to deny the truth, iuſtice or piety, or GOD, who alone is C true: and therefore I refuſe this profane meat, well knowing what I ought to eate, as warranted therein by the precept of Almighty God, whoſe lawes I haue learned to obey, and eſchew all meats ſacrificed to Idols, and embrace with all my force that which is expedient for the ſoule:
it is open tyranny to compell any one to that which religion forbiddeth, and to command that which is contrary to iuſtice. Do what thou wilt, mock at thy pleaſure, yet ſhalt thou be more derided then thou thy ſelfe derideſt. I will perſiſt in the holy ſteps of my forefathers; notwithſtanding thou therefore with tyrannous hands pluck out mine eies, and with a ſharp knife rip vp my entrailes, thou ſhalt neuer conquer me. I will dye ſafe and ſound, and patient in the loue of God; neither flatter thy ſelfe for that I am aged, and that my body is now feeble: if need be that I muſt be ſacrificed for Gods ſake, thou ſhalt finde me in theſe yeers as luſty as a child, as conſtant D as a young man, yea and moſt ioyfull in torments: and prepare an extraordinary fire from me, or what elſe ſoeuer, thou ſhalt finde me more conſtant amidſt torments, then now I am before I come to them. O ſacred religion! I will neuer violate thee the foundation of my ſaluation, the defence of the beleeuer, the ground of faith; neuer will I lift vp my hands contrary to thy precepts, neuer wil I beleeue any thing to be iuſt, which is repugnant to that which thou haſt taught me: I will not loſe the merit of ſo many yeeres, nor relinquiſh the faith I haue hitherto embraced. The chaſte, pure, and deuout company of fathers ſhall receiue me into their number, where I ſhall not feare (O impious King) thy threats. But thou haſt changed the name of King to tyrant, yet thou ſhalt neuer alledge againſt me my deed, my conſent, my word.

Eleazars conſtancy.

Eleazar cruelly whipped.

Whil'ſt Eleazar, full of conſtancy and liberty, ſpake thus, the ſouldiers that ſtood thereabout E haled him to be tortured; and ſtripping him naked, they hanged him vp, and whipped him, and whil'ſt on either ſide he was beaten, a crier with an impious voice ſtill cried vnto him, Obey the Kings pleaſure and command. But worthy Eleazar was not ouercome by torment, but ſuffered all tortures, as though he had beene in reſt and ſleepe, and did manfully and without feare endure all torments: and fixing his venerable eyes vpon heauen, he knew in whom he beleeued, and to whom he ſacrificed his ſoule; and beholding the fleſh on each ſide rent and torne from his body, and the blood iſſuing out in great aboundance, he admired his owne patience, and thanked God the author thereof. At laſt, ſeeing in himſelfe the frailty of all fleſh (which is ſcarcely able to endure ſo ſharp torments) he fell vpon his face, which with ſtripes was all rent and torne, ſtill glorifying God, as he did before his fall. Then one of the ſoldiers to gratifie the King, did like a mad F man ſpurn and tread vpon him, therby to increaſe his torments more. But Eleazar, both ſtrong in body and mind, did like a right champion of the true God, neuer ſhrinke at thoſe paines, but this patient old man did by patience ouercome the cruelty of his tormenters, ſo that euen the torturers themſelues admired, that he endured ſo many torments. Then the Kings officers comming vnto him, ſaid; How long Eleazar wilt thou neglect to obey the King, and to free thy ſelfe from torments? eate of the fleſh of ſwine, and redeeme thy ſelfe from all thou endureſt. Eleazar, although in this martyrdome he had beene ſilent, yet could he not without anſwering endure to heare ſo

The ſoldiers ſeeing his conſtancy, did by the Kings command caſt him into the fire, and powred ſtinking and loathſome liquors into his noſtrils. All which this reuerend old man did moſt willingly ſuffer, and ſo was conſumed with the flame: yet when nature began to faile, he ſpake H

Reaſons victory. It is moſt true therefore which we at firſt affirmed, to wit, that the enduring of paines and torments is wrought by our reaſons lore: which once determined and reſolued, maketh a proſperous ſuffering of paines with all patience, which wiſely aduiſing men to that which is beſt, doth ſettle and confirme our opinions to follow it. If therefore reaſon and the inferiour powers be at I variance, we muſt ſubiect them to reaſon if we will make a perfect victory. With this guide of reaſon our father Eleazar was moſt ſafely directed, neither to be ouercome with paines, nor to giue place to any vnlawfull inticements and allurements, he ſaued the ſhip of his body from all ſhipwracke that might ariſe by the tempeſtuous ſtormes of vanity, and ſuffered himſelfe with no contrary wind to be driuen from the right courſe: yea, though it was toſſed vpon the waues of tyranny, yet did it remaine ſound and vnbroken, and keeping a direct courſe, arriued in the hauen of ſaluation. Neuer any man did ſeeke ſo valiantly to defend his city from an enemy, as this holy old man did his ſoule, who amongſt ſtripes, croſſes and flames, was ſtill the ſame man
A ſimilitude taken from the Rocke. he was before. For as the top of a high rocke ſtandeth ſafe, and reſiſteth the waue without any domage vnto it ſelfe; euen ſo did the rocke of reaſon in this man beat backe the rage of thoſe K

Eleazars praiſe. the celeſtiall and diuine power of the ſoule. O happy old man, more bleſſed then all of thy age, O Prieſt more ſacred then all other Prieſts, who didſt not pollute thy ſacred lips with profane meats; impiety found no entrance that way, from whence ſo many prayers to God had proceeded. The tyrants cruelty could not preuaile againſt thee, thou therefore art made an example for all Prieſts of God to imitate. Such a one behooued it a Prieſt to be, more ſtrong then torments, more able to ſuffer then the torturers to inflict puniſhment, more forcible then Princes commands, yea and more potent then the fire, wherein thou didſt periſh: and finally, thou waſt ordained to be crowned with the lawrell of martyrdome for thy ſufferance. Thou haſt ſurpaſſed L all antiquity, thou ſhalt be an example to all poſterity. If then feeble old age, wherein all ſtrength and heate of body was extinguiſhed, now vnfit to ſuffer torments (as being already broken with age) could by the aduice of reaſon endure ſo many torments, ſo many miſeries, who dare deny reaſon to be the chiefe cauſe of our ſufferance? We haue ſeene that all cruelty hath beene ouercome by a determination to perſiſt in the ſeruice and feare of God: yet many affirme, that not all men who vſe the aduice of reaſon are able to vndergoe ſuch agonies; but their aſſertion is vaine, and of no force: for moſt euident it is, that he onely is ouercome by paine, whom wiſedome hath not armed with patience. And no maruell if he, who raſhly enterprizeth ſo waighty a matter, and without due conſideration, doe at laſt forſake and repent himſelfe of that which he ſo vnaduiſedly vndertooke. But if we with due aduice and deliberation arme our ſelues, it is not an eaſie mat- M ter to remooue vs by any misfortune from our determination; when we make account that misfortune will betide vs, we are not eaſily diſmaied thereat when it doth betide, for that nothing befell vs that we expected not.

Therefore he that is wiſe and valiant, is able to conquer his paſſions, for that he doth well deliberate, and when he commeth to his agony, can put his determination in execution. Neither is the wiſedome of this old man ſo much to be admired, ſeeing children, and as it were infants, haue ſo deſerued commendations in this point, that they did worke aſtoniſhment in their tormentors;

for

A for the courage and cruelty of Antiochus, being ouercome by the wiſedome of old age, was now the more increaſed, and by wicked counſell cauſed ſeuen worthy children of the Hebrewes to be brought vnto Antioch, out of their Caſtle Soſandrum, who being young in yeers, and ſo as he thought weake and vnable to ſuffer torments, his hope was that either by perſwaſions or terror or tortures, he might force them to renounce their religion. Hee therefore commanded theſe ſeuen, together with their mother Salomona who now grew well in yeeres, to be brought before him: ſo they according to his command were brought, being of excellent beauty, and worthy children of ſo vertuous a mother; yea they reſembled Angels, their faces ſhining like the cleare light of the Sunne, their eyes ſparkled in moſt comely and decent manner, as teſtifying that they B ſurpaſſed in vertue all other of humane race and condition. She was deſcended of moſt vertuous and noble parentage, and ſo ſhe her ſelfe had continued and liued; but that excellent feature of body, enriched with nobility of blood and dignity, was now alſo made more noble by vertue and fortitude, wherein ſhe paſſed all other things that could be ſaid in her commendations. The tyrant beholding them, and their mother amongſt them, with merry and gladſome countenance, he thus craftily ſpake vnto the children: I wiſh your good (O admirable young men) for ſo both your beauty of body and noble parentage perſwade me: doe not therefore like mad men reſiſt my command, auoid not onely torments but death alſo. For I deſire not only to exalt you vnto honour, but alſo to encreaſe your riches and poſſeſſions, contemne the ſuperſtitious and ſuper- fluous beliefe of your countrimen, and imbrace our religion: Which if you refuſe to doe (as I C hope you will not) I will deuiſe all torments, whereby I may by a lingring and painefull death conſume you. And to the end to terrifie them the more, he commanded all inſtruments of tor- ment to bee preſented vnto their view and eye-ſight. So wheeles, rods, hookes, rakes, rackes, cauldrons, cages, gridirons, were brought forth; and engines to torment the fingers and hands, gauntlets, awles, bellowes, brazen pots, and frying pans: for theſe are the names which we find. For that which I tearme bellowes, was a thin plate of iron to kindle or blow the fire with, like a fan, and farre more horrible deuices of torments were ſhewed vnto them, too long to rehearſe: whereof they hauing had a ſight, Antiochus ſaid:

Antiochus cauſeth ſeuen noble young men of the Hebrews and their mother to be brought to Antioch. 2 Macc. 7.

The kings exhortation to the 7. brethrē.

Conſent vnto me, O prudent young men: for if that I command you to commit a ſinne; yet doe not you offend in doing it, ſeeing you commit it onely vpon compulſion. But the young D youths inflamed with a diuine ſpirit and ſenſe, contemned ſo many kindes of torments, and deſpiſed the tyrants threats and flatteries; and moſt godly (for they gaue him no iuſt occaſion) they did driue the tyrant into a great rage. And by this it is euident how reaſon is maſter ouer paſſion: for if any ſlothfull man not before trained vp to it, ſhould of a ſudden come to ſuch a puſh, at the very ſight of ſuch torments, his mind would haue beene troubled, and his counte- nance appalled, his legs vnder him would haue trembled, and he with feare confounded: ſo that he would preſently haue ſtept backe from ſuch an agony, and would forthwith haue alleadged himſelfe vnable to beare ſo many and ſo grieuous torments, ſaying, My ſelfe being vnwiſe, what ſhold I haue made choiſe of? Whether to endure thoſe torments, or accept of the promiſed bene- fits? Whether ſhould I haue bin mooued to pity mine owne age, or to compaſſionate my mo- E ther? God would not haue denied pardon for this deed, I being forced thereunto: and by doing it though againſt my will, I ſhall get the Kings fauour. But where reaſon and aduice taketh place, and hath well trained the minde to perfection, the other conſequently followeth: As by the ex- ample of theſe brethren I will declare, who as it were all with one voice denied to eate of the ſa- crificed ſwines fleſh, as they were commanded. Wherefore (ſaid they) O tyrant doſt thou per- ſecute vs that are innocent? We both deſire and wiſh to die, and will vntill ſuch time as death expelleth life, firmely keep that which God commanded and Moſes taught vs. And thou tyrant, do not ſeeke to ſeduce vs by proteſting fained loue towards vs: thou louer of iniuſtice, maſter of cruelty, deuiſer of iniquity, the pardon which thou doeſt offer is to vs more painefull then pu- niſhment: we are armed with contempt of death, and eſteeme not thy words, as being by our F late maſter Eleazar taught to deſpiſe them. Why then doeſt thou eſteeme ſuch puſillanimity to be in vs young men, ſeeing of late thou foundſt ſuch courage in an old man? We follow him: thou canſt not try and know our minds, except by tearing our bodies thou ſearch them out: we will ſafely and ſecurely ſuffer for our God any thing, and leauing this earth we ſhall be entertained into heauen; and thou for ſo tyrannizing moſt cruelly vpon innocent ſoules, ſhalt be reſerued to eternall fire.

The young mens conſtancy.

The 7. bre- thren reply to Antiochus.

The tyrant greatly mooued, to ſee that he could neither preuaile by faire promiſes, nor by threatnings, he cauſed them to be beaten with buls pizzles: and firſt of all he commanded Maccabeus, the eldeſt of the ſeuen brethren, to be ſtript, and ſtretched out vpon a racke, and his hands to be bound behind him, and then to be moſt cruelly beaten, who wearied his tormenters by ſuffering (ſo great the force of vertue is) ſo that they deſired more to leaue beating him, then he requeſted they ſhould leaue. This done, he was put vpon a wheele, and a waight hanged at his feet, and ſo ſtretched round about it, that his ſinewes and entrailes brake, and ſo his paines increaſed: yet he being ouercome with paine, his mouth was not for all this ſtopped or hindered from calling vpon God, who beheld all; and reprouing the tyrant who deuiſed thoſe torments for the innocents, and taking ſtrength, he is ſaid to haue cryed out after this manner; Bloudy tyrant, who perſecuteſt the Maieſty of God: I, whom thou thus tormenteſt, am no Witch, nor one who haue murdered and killed another man, but one who dies for iuſtice, obſeruing the law, and for charity. Then when the torturers, ouercome with compaſſion, willed him to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the Kings pleaſure, he anſwered: O ye wicked miniſters of tyranny! your wheels are not ſo ſharp and cruell, that I thereby will be forced to forſake heauen, whereon my mind is fixed: teare my fleſh; yea, if ſo you pleaſe, roſt it at the fire: torture and torment each parcell of my body with ſeuerall cruelty; you ſhall for all this finde your ſelues vnable to force vs young men to impiety.

Antiochus commanded Maccabeus to be racked.

As hee thus ſpake, a fire was kindled, and hee, as he was vpon the wheele racked, was ſo throwne into the fire: and thus he was by flames and torments ſo burned, that his bowels appeared; his mind nothing moued when his fleſh yeelded ouercome with paines, who amidſt his pangs cryed thus vnto his brethren: O beloued brethren, learne of me an example of vertue, conſider the ſtrength of an inuincible courage, contemne and deſpiſe the alluring baits of this world, and rather obey God then this tyrant, who can if he pleaſe humble the proud and mighty, and exalt the lowly and deiected. As thus he ſpake, hee was taken out of the flame, and flayne aliue, his tongue was pulled out of his mouth, and hee put into a frying panne, and ſo he departed out of this life to the great admiration of all that beheld him, and the ioy of his brethren and mother; and went before them to heauen, there to prepare a kingdome for himſelfe and them.

The death of the eldeſt brother.

After him, the ſecond brother, called Aber, was haled by the ſouldiers: and before thy tyrant asked him whether he would relent, he cauſed all thoſe torments to be ſhewed him, thereby to terrifie him: but he nothing thereat moued, and denying to eate of that foreſaid ſacrifice, his hands were bound with iron chaines, and hee being hanged vp by them, the skin of his body was flayne from the crowne of his head vnto his knees: ſo that the entrailes in his breſt appeared naked; yet in ſuch manner, as yet he might abide greater torments. For he was caſt before a cruell Libard thirſting moſt extremely after blood, to the intent that he might deuoure with his teeth the reſt of his body: but the beaſt ſmelling of him (no doubt by the great handy worke of Almighty God) forgot his cruelty, and turning away his face, he did no hurt to the Martyr.

The ſecond brother brought.

But hereat the tyrants rage increaſed; and the Martyr, by ſuffering ſuch torments, was made more conſtant, crying aloud: O how pleaſant is that death vnto me, which is cauſed by all ſorts of torments for Gods ſake! yea, ſo much the more pleaſant, for that I aſſuredly hope to finde reward for it in heauen. Let theſe torments inflicted vpon me (O tyrant) ſatisfie thy cruelty, for my paine is not by thy tortures increaſed, but rather my pleaſure, as thou ſhalt finde by my patience in this agony. More willing am I to ſuffer then thou to puniſh, yet my paine in ſuffering is leſſe then thine by inflicting the ſame vpon me. I am tormented for vertue and obſeruing the law, and the iuſtice of God ſhall baniſh thee from thy regall ſeat: thou by tormenting art tormented, and almoſt conſumed, thy wrath and fury being almoſt ſpent vpon me in vaine, thou ſhalt not eſcape the day of iudgement: eternall torments are there prepared for thee, which neither thy profane minde is able to indure, nor thy cruelty of power to decline, thy ſinfull ſoule being condemned to eternall puniſhments. Thus, remaining conſtant in his faith, and animated by his brothers example, he departed to heauen.

Machir the third brother is brought.

Then Machir the third ſon was brought, whom all men now pittied for the death of his two brethren, & many exhorted him by his brothers examples to deſiſt from his opinion, & ſo auoid puniſhment: but he being angry hereat, thus replyed; One father begat vs, one mother bore vs, one maſter inſtructed vs, we are all of one minde, and all like affected, do therefore no longer prolong the time in vaine. I came hither to ſuffer, and not to ſpeake, vſe all your tyranny poſſibly againſt this

A this body:for you haue no power at all ouer my ſoule. The tyrant hereat moued to ſee this third nothing relent by his brothers death, he deuiſed more cruelty then humane wit alone could inuent. Wherfore he commanded a globe to be brought,and tied the holy martyr about it in ſuch ſort,that all his bones were ſet out of ioint,and diſplaced:whereat the holy martyr was nothing diſmaid. The skin alſo of his head and face was puld off,and then he was put on the wheele: but he could not be rackt any worſe; for that his bones were all diſplaced, and did hang one ſeparated from another in moſt pitifull manner: and when blood iſſued from him aboundantly, hee was depriued of the vſe of his hands and feete; but perceiuing his life to be ſpent, he ſpake thus and died:We,O tyrant,endure this torment for the loue of God,and thou the author of ſuch vn-
B iuſt cruelty ſhalt ſuffer euerlaſting paine. Then his tongue being cut out of his mouth,he was put into a frying pan, and ſo amidſt thoſe torments yeelded vp the ghoſt.

Next after,followed Iudas,the fourth brother,whom all the people perſwaded and entreated to obey the King: but he, contemning their praiers and exhortations, ſaid thus with all conſtancy: Your fire ſhall neither ſeparate nor ſeuer me from the Law of God, nor from my brethren, who in ſtead of this mortal life enioy life euerlaſting. I denounce vnto thee,O tyrant,deſtruction and ouerthrow; but to ſuch as beleeue,ſaluation: make triall of me therefore thou cruell wretch, and ſee if God will forſake me, who hath with open and ſtretched out armes receiued my three brethren that are gone before me, and whom the wombe of ſo holy a mother at ſeuerall times brought forth vnto glory. The cruel tyrant hearing this,was much moued,and leapt down from
C his chaire to torment this martyr himſelfe,that ſo he might ouercome him, and in his fury commanded his tongue to be cut forth: but he hereat not terrified, ſaid to Antiochus, This cruelty will nothing auaile thee, neither ſhalt thou hereby tyrant, as thou ſuppoſeſt, conquer me. Our God needs not by voice to be awakened, but rather by ſecret cogitation to be praid vnto to help his ſeruants: he prouideth for them that hold their peace, and heareth the prayers of ſuch as do call vpon him,if they deſerue to be heard,and only requireth purity of ſoule. For our God knoweth all things before we aske;and before we our ſelues enter into cogitation thereof, he vnderſtandeth our neceſſity: cut out my tongue,thou canſt not cut out my mind while my life remaineth. Thoſe prayers which by it I haue vttered to Almighty God, haue taught it to ſuffer: would God thou wouldſt ſo ſanctifie all parts of my body by puniſhing them, for thou therein
D inflicteſt puniſhment on thy ſelfe,and reward vpon me,and think not that thou ſhalt thus eſcape long vnpuniſhed. When he had thus ſpoken,his tongue was cut out of his mouth, and he bound to a ſtake,and there he was beaten with ropes ends:and he did patiently endure this,notwithſtanding the colour of his face became dead and wanne. Being looſed from thence, he was put vpon the wheele: and then praying for his countrimen, he by death went vnto the reſt of his brethren.

Iudas, the 4. brother, is brought.

The death of the 4. brother.

Then Achas, the fift brother, before he was haled to torments,ſpake in this manner; Behold (thou tyrant) I come to be puniſhed before thou command me, hope not therefore any iot to alter his minde who as thou ſeeſt deſireth to be tormented. The bloud of my foure innocent brethren, which thou haſt ſhed,hath condemned thee to hell-fire: I am to make them vp the num-
E ber of fiue,that by it thy paines may be encreaſed. Tell me(bloudy wretch)for what offence by vs committed doſt thou thus puniſh vs? for what impiety doſt thou ſo perſecute vs? what villany haue we committed? what wickedneſſe,what naughtineſſe haue we attempted? This is all thou canſt alledge againſt vs,that we honor God our Creator,and liue iuſtly in obedience of his lawes, and therefore do not eſteeme thy puniſhments: but they are to vs honour and ſaluation, and not puniſhment: we ſhall be greatly rewarded by God, if no part of vs be left free from torment. Whil'ſt thus he ſpake, his executioners by the Kings command tooke him and caſt him into a brazen pot,and was preſt downe in it,his head to his feet:and afterward he ſuffred all other torments, which his brethren had endured;yet not amazed hereat, he ſuddenly ſtarted vp, and thus bitterly inueighed againſt the tyrant: Cruell tyrant, how great benefits doſt thou againſt thy F will beſtow vpon vs! yea, the more thou art incenſed againſt vs, the more acceptable to God ſhalt thou make vs: yea,I ſhould be ſorry if thou ſhewedſt mercy vpon me. This ſhort affliction gaineth vs life euerlaſting; if this temporall death ſhould not betide me, euerlaſting life could not befall me. And thus he finiſht his agony,and dyed.

Achas, the 5. brother preſented himſelfe to torments before he was called.

Then the tormenters laid hands vpon the ſixt brother, who was called Areth, whom the tyrant permitted either to chuſe honour or puniſhment: but he aggrieued at his offer, ſaid; Although(tyrant)I be younger in yeers then my martyred brethren, yet my conſtancy of mind to theirs is not inferior: for we were all nourisht vp together, all together instructed, and we will all G die together in the feare of God. Hasten therefore to thy deuised torments, and that time which " thou wouldest spend in exhorting me, spend it in deuising tortures for me. Antiochus hereat confounded, commanded him to be bound to a pillar with his head hanging downe, in such wise as humors running into it might cause ache: and this done, he caused a fire to be made so far off him, that it could not burne him, but rost him. He also commanded him as he hung to be pricked with awles, that so the heat might pearce into the holes they made in his flesh. Whil'st thus he was tormented, much blood like froth gathered about his head and face, and he then spake in this maner;

" O noble fight! O valiant war! O strife betweene piety and impiety! These men haue past their wherefore hee called the childe vnto him, and into a place where no instruments of torment

A expect any fauour at thy hands, I will follow my brethren, and remaine conſtant in our Law. The Tyrant hearing this, was wroth, and cauſed him to bee tormented: but his mother in torment comforted him, and with her kinde hands held his head, when with violence of the tortures blood iſſued out of his mouth, noſe and priuy parts, the tormenters not ceaſing till life in him was almoſt ſpent: but they (by Gods appointment) gaue ouer, and ſo he tooke ſtrength againe to endure more then any of his brethren had done; at laſt, his hands and armes being cut off, hee lifted vp his eyes to heauen, and cryed, O Adonai, O Sabaor bee mercifull vnto me, and receiue mee into the company of my brethren, let thy wrath now ceaſe and grant them mercy, who by vs doe make interceſſion to thee; hauing ſaid thus, his tongue being pulled B out, hee of his owne accord went into the fiery frying-pan, and ſo to the great admiration of Antiochus died.

The death of the youngeſt brother.

Behold how euident it is, that reaſon can rule our affections, ſeeing that children heereby ſhewed more conſtancy then the tyrant could ſhew cruelty. For, it was reaſons force that wrought in them that determination to ſuffer all torments, rather then to forſake the way of ſaluation. Theſe conſtant young men doe fitly reſemble inexpugnable towers; and them, who after a great tempeſt and ſhipwracke, do ſafely enter the harbour of ſaluation, who guiding their courſe amidſt the boyſterous waues, at laſt obtaine the wiſhed ſhoare. For euery one of them ſtrengthened the other by aduice and good counſell, and none of them was like an effeminate perſon, loth to ſuffer martyrdome. None vſed delay herein, but one followed anothers exam-
C ple. Let vs therefore dye for our Law, and imitate the three children whom the Aſſyrians fury condemned to the fiery furnace, whoſe patience ſpred their fame euen vnto heauen. Whileſt thus one of them exhorted the other, it came to paſſe, that none of them offended, but each one reſolute in his religion, tooke example of the vertue, courage and conſtancy of their forefather Iſaac, who vnderſtanding that it was Gods will he ſhould be ſacrificed, he refuſed not to ſubmit his body to his fathers ſword. Let vs (quoth they) yeeld our ſoules to him of whom wee receiued both ſoule and body: It is a ſmall matter for vs to ſuffer loſſe of theſe members, ſeeing that we ſhall in lieu of them receiue euerlaſting bliſſe. Abraham, Iſaac, and Iacob doe ioyfully expect vs, as coheires of their kingdome: let vs glorifie that wombe wherein we were for ten moneths ſpace, let none of vs be more coward then the other, nor none of vs degenerate
D from the other. Wee that were all begotten of one father, and ſucked of one milke, muſt in all things reſemble one another: we had one teacher, and one law inuiolate. And in this golden bond of concord were theſe brethren linked together, and none of them mourned to ſee the other tormented, but all reioyced at the others death. O children, whoſe dignity farre ſurpaſſeth the royalty of Kings and Princes, whoſe glory and vertue is vnſpeakeable! None of you were terrified with feare, but you ſo haſtened to your deaths, as though you had onely beene to goe to bliſſe and felicity: you were truely brethren, who euen by death were linked together. God hath greatly in you magnified our nation, and in you ſhewed vs al on example of fortitude: whom therefore I thinke he cauſed to bee ſo many in number, as were the dayes wherein he created the world, ſo that theſe ſeuen brethren may reſemble the ſeuen dayes wherein all things
E were made. And why ſhould we ſo admire this fortitude in theſe young men, when a woman armed her ſelfe with contempt of death? Who indeed is not to be called a mother, but to bee honoured with a higher title then humane frailty can affoord, who bare into this world ſo many triumphs.

A ſimilitude of the waues. The ſeuen brethren exhort one another to ſuffer death manfully.

True brotherhoood.

A pledge and ſigne of brotherly amity.

For the mother ſeeing her children dead, was with a kinde and godly zeale inflamed alſo to ſuffer: and no maruell, ſeeing that the very brute beaſts, if they perceiue violence offered to their yong, do oppoſe themſelues to perils in their defence, and protect them with their wings, teeth, and tallons: yea and euery one that is any way able to make reſiſtance, oppoſeth herſelfe to the enemy to defend her young. And not onely brute beaſts doe this, but euen Bees doe defend not onely their young, but alſo their hony, threatning their ſtings to them that offer to taſte ther-
F of, and more eſteeming the good of their young then their owne liues. But this zealous mother directed by the ſpirit of God, & reaſons lore, haſted that her children might die before her; who not being to liue depriued of her children, choſe rather to ſee them die ioyfully then to periſh in care and ſorrow. Therfore when all her familie had ſuffered, ſhe then the laſt and glory of them all, came to her agony, deſpiſing the tyrants threats, & offering her motherly breſt to thoſe torments which her children had ſuffered. O bleſſed ſtocke and bleſſed encreaſe of the ſelf-ſame wombe! Why ſhould I not affirme that in all lineaments and feature of the body you are like vertue, and religion; and that you ſo in all things reſemble her, that you are euery way equal vnalſo as conſtant in her owne martyrdome as you in yours. She therefore herein excelled you, ther thou bare theſe children in thy wombe, or created them, who could with dry eyes looke vpon them whileſt they were torne in pieces: yea I ſay little, affirming that thou patiently didſt behold theſe ſights, for euen thou thy ſelfe didſt exhort them thereunto, thou reioycedſt to ſee one of them torne in pieces with fleſhhooks, the other to be racked vpon the wheele, & the third H to be bound and beaten: thou ioyfully admiredſt the others burning, and exhortedſt the reſt not to be terrified herewith, and although whileſt thou beheldſt their torments, thy grief was greater then that which thou hadſt in childbirth, yet didſt thou frame a lightſome and merry countenance, as though it had beene one triumphing. While they were akilling, thou didſt laugh, and ſeeing only one of all thy children left, hereat thou didſt nothing relent. Can I deſcribe how e-uery one periſhed, ſeeing thou their mother didſt laugh at their deaths, and when their ſinewes were cut in two, their heads flayne, their tongues pulled forth by the roots, their hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and caſt vpon iron plates red hot, and vpon wheels, and their ribs pulled in ſunder, and many other torments for which we want names? Neuer was any Swanne, which (by the report of antiquity) ſung ſo ſweet a note before her death (ſweeter then the moſt melo- I dious harmony, and the moſt pleaſant voice) as were the funerall verſes of thoſe thy children that periſhed.

You children were not ouercome by the fabulous Syrens enchantments, who to honor God, doubted not to leaue your mother without children: And ſhe ſprung of noble ſtock, choſe rather to want you for a ſhort time, then to incurre eternall damnation, wiſhing rather that the bodies of her children ſhould be tormented then their ſoules. Well ſhe knew, that nothing was more fraile and infirme then our bodies: which though perſecution be wanting, are often killed with agues, and abundance of blood or fluxes: And who is ignorant of ſhipwrack incident to ſai-lers, hazard of life vnto them that trauaile, and ſudden death to thoſe that liue in eaſe? ſudden caſualty by fire, and by the hands of theeues, and a thouſand other waies to diſpatch our liues? K Seeing then that our mortall bodies are ſubiect to ſo many miſeries to bring vs to our end, who would not make choyce of a quick diſpatch, whereby we loſe goods of this world, and gaine life euerlaſting? O thou moſt reuerend of all women, the credit of thy nation, and honor of our imperfect Behold of what force and efficacy reaſon is, which oftentimes maketh vs men inferior to women. For neither was Daniel ſo terrified at the ſight of the Lions, nor the 3. children with the fiery furnace, as this woman was grieued at the death of all her children, before ſhe came to her L owne agony. What would another woman and mother haue done in this caſe, but wept & with pitifull lamentations haue cried: Ah wretch that I am, moſt vnhappy, and miſerable of all that breathe, who therfore bare ſo many childrē into this world, that their ſeueral deaths might be ſo many ſeuerall occaſions of my griefe & ſorrow! ſhe would haue iterated her frequent births, and her toile in her ten moneths bearing them, ſhe would haue bewailed her hapleſſe fortune who brought forth ſo many deaths and dangers, ſhe would haue recounted the milke wherewith ſhe fed them, and their meat ſhe had prepared for them, the paines ſhe had taken with them, how ſhe had carried them in her armes, and ſung to them & taught them to ſpeake, her cares, her watchings, her feare, leſt any miſ-hap ſhould betide them: and with weeping teares would haue ſaid, Shall I a grandmother embrace your children? who a while ago was too fruitfull a mother, and M

The mothers ſpeech exhorting her ſeuen ſons to ſuffer. God forgot all theſe laments that another mother would haue had, and with an Adamant ſenſe ſtouter then the neuer yeelding rocks, did neither forſake her children in their torments, nor in their death, but in a manner compelled them to periſh, and neuer ſorrowed thereat. For being apprehended together with her ſeuen ſonnes, ſhee conſidering Eleazars martyrdome, did thus exhort

A exhort them in the Hebrew tongue. O my moſt deare and louing children, let vs haſten to that agony wherein we may be a credit to our nation, and gaine of God an euerlaſting reward: let vs without feare preſent our ſelues vnto thoſe torments which Eleazars aged body endured: call to mind our father Abraham of worthy memory; who hauing but one onely ſonne, did ſacrifice him being willed by God ſo to doe, and feared not to bring him to the Altar, whom he ſcarcely in his age obtained. Iſaac alſo was willing to be ſacrificed by his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things, the like may be ſaid of Daniel and the three children: beleeue me, we are rather tried then tormented. For whatſoeuer this world affordeth, is mortall and like a ſha-dow.

B Thus did this mother arme her childrens mindes with fortitude, and ſhe a woman wrought in men manlike mindes. Laſt of all, her children being all dead, ſhe, a worthy mother of ſo many champions, kneeling downe in the place of torment, beſought of God an end of this life, proteſting, that ſhe had not for loue of life ſo long deferred to die, but onely for her childrens ſake, and that now ſhe had ſeene them all ſeuen triumphing. The fury of Antiochus now waxed hot, and he commanded this worthy mother to be tormented, who was (as the tyrant wild) ſtripped naked, and hanged vp by the hands, and moſt cruelly whipped: her dugges and pappes were pulled off, and ſhee put into the red hote frying-pan, being moſt willing to follow her childrens ſteps in torment; and lifting vp her eyes and hands to heauen, ſhee prayed for all women with childe, and ſo yeelded her chaſte ſoule to God. But Antiochus was ſtricken with fire from hea-
C uen. O miſtris of iuſtice, who followed thy triumphing children! O conqueror of tyrants, and a looking glaſſe for all Martyrs! O example of patience! not only to women, but to all men that ſhall be after thee, reuerenced of them that now are, and to be worſhipped of them that are to come, and to be admired not onely of our nation, but of all other people. Thy light obſcureth the bright ſhining Moone: and though ſhe fill the world with her brightneſſe, yet is ſhe not comparable to thy ſhining light. Seuen lights enuiron thee about, dazeling the brightneſſe of the ſeuen Planets: could any Painter expreſſe, or any hand in writing declare the torments of your paſſions? None could with dry eye read or behold them; all people would flocke about to ſee it, all people would praiſe and eſteeme him to haue offered a great gift, who to Gods glory had painted that golden ſtratageme. And if any skilfull workman ſhould engraue this Tragedy
D vpon a ſepulchre or in his houſe, doubtleſſe he ſhould be freed from all plague and misfortune. But where could a ſtone be found able to containe ſo many torments? Therefore the old man Eleazar, the mother and her 7. ſons, are for their nobility graced with a ſepulchre, and a great reuerence is done vnto them of all men, yea euen by men that are not of our religion: and there is a conſtellation of 8. ſtars ordained as an argument of their iuſtice, and Angels did execute their funerals. The tyrant himſelfe was aſtoniſhed to ſee the conſtancy of ſuch godly mindes. And thus haue they found ſuch fauour in the ſight of God, that they haue obtained remiſſion of the ſins of our nation: For preſently after, the tyrant was deſtroyed, and Iſrael there was freed from his tyranny.

But Antiochus, ſeeing the greatneſſe of their faith, and their contempt of death, gathered an ar-E my of footmen out of the Hebrewes, by whoſe helpe he terrified his enemies, and got great renowne. O bleſſed ſeed of Abraham! behold what benefit the agony of the mother and her ſeuen ſons brought to vs their countrimen: let vs perſiſt in this piety, that ſo we may be like our forefathers: behold, the death of a few did end all the miſeries and ſins of our whole nation, and you by your countrimens hands vanquiſhed your perſecutours enemies, and after that victory our ſins were remitted; and laſt of all, Antiochus being mad, and his entrailes deuoured with wormes, he ſmelling moſt like carrion, gaue vp the ghoſt: and was euer after death puniſhed for his offence. For when he could not make the Citizens of Ieruſalem to forſake their law, he made war againſt the Perſians, and there receiued that which he deſerued.

It now remaineth that we briefely repeat all that is before ſaid. For in her agony, this ſacred
F mother ſaid thus vnto the ſtanders by; Whil'ſt it was lawfull for me, I kept my ſelfe a Virgin, and then I married and liued a chaſte wife, and forſooke not my owne houſe, I brought forth ſuch ſonnes as I need not be aſhamed of; and though daunted with my husbands death, yet I did not forſake my faith: this, and many things elſe ſhe recounted. And what more? She ſet before her childrens eies the examples of the Prophets, how Abel by his brother was ſlain, Iſaac to be offred in ſtead of a ſacrifice, how Iacob was baniſhed, Ioſeph kept in priſon, Daniel caſt before the Lions, the three children into the fiery furnace: ſhe rehearſed alſo vnto them the book of Eſaias, where Vnhappy tyrant, what did thy cauldrons red hot, and thy torments profit thee? what auailed thee to cut away their eyelids, and to pull out their tongues? thou thy ſelfe for ſo doing doſt now endure farre worſe then all theſe. And they whom thou killedſt (beleeue me) enioy euerlaſting comfort, and are now ſecure of bliſſe and reuenge. For they who ſuffer for Gods ſake, ſhall haue happy ſucceſſe, when God the Father of all things, ſhall reward them with life euerlaſting that follow him. Thus haue I conſecrated theſe worthy memorials, which I find in the holy Scriptures of the ſacred Maccabees, to the reading of all men, that ſhall liue in any age hereafter.
